EXAMINATION,

&c. &c.

MY LORD,

I HAVE read your lordship's speech with the attention that it deserves; it has been composed with much consideration, and logically arranged. Your first position, that from the relative situation of Great Britain and Ireland, a connexion is necessary for their mutual security, is so evident, that it needs not argument to support it. The real question for consideration is, (as you properly express it) what is the best and most eligible form of such connexion.

Your fecond position is, "That when two countries are so circumstanced as mutually to require connexion, the only mode of connexion which can perfectly remove the evil of separation, and fully confer the benefit of Union, is a perfect identity and incorporation of their government." From this position, you declare it to be your decided opinion, that if the intended connexion between Great Britain and Ireland be not fuch as shall produce a perfect identity and incorporation of their government, it will not remove the evil of separation, or confer the benefit of Union. It will therefore be a proper subject for enquiry, whether the Union intended to be formed between these two nations, constituting distinct islands, and adjusted in such manner as may be agreeable to the outlines of the plan laid before his Majesty by the British parliament, will fo perfectly identify and incorporate their government, as that there shall not remain any folid distinctness of interest between them: the professed object of such Union being, that it shall be so formed, as by consolidating those nations, to remove all danger of separation. The present connection between Great Britain and Ireland, has for many centuries, maintained their Union; it has arisen from the only natural bond which can form a permanent cement between two nations, that of their mutual interest. To this has been added the most powerful artificial meafure that can bind two nations, the irrevocable act of the legislature. I say irrevocable, as Ireland, under its present constitution, has not a power to repeal it. From the experience we have had of its falutary and powerful effects, there is not any reason to apprehend that such connexion shall not continue, fo long as it shall be their mutual interest to support it. Alteration in their mode of connexion may be attended with great danger, and it appears to me unwife to liften to the wild speculations of empires, and substitute a new fystem in the place of that, the advantage of which we have for fuch a length of time experienced; an exchange which may occasion the destruction of our constitution, and a separation between the two united kingdoms. Your lordship refers to preceding Unions which have taken place in Great Britain, that of the heptarchy, the Union of England with Wales, and lastly, that which was formed between England and Scotland. You observe that all those Unions were of great advantage to the nations which formed them; and argue from analogy, that fimilar benefits must flow from an Union between Great Britain and Ireland. Such reasoning would apply with great force, if Ireland stood in the same relative situation to Great Britain in which Wales and Scotland did to England, and that the Union now tn contemplation could affect that perfect identity of government between Great Britain and Ireland, which was produced by the Union of those nations with England.

All those nations were part of the same island, and nature pointed out the propriety of their constituting one kingdom. From the time of their Union they have been as perfectly identified as if they had never formed distinct kingdoms; the royal functions throughout all are executed by the king personally, the produce of their revenues all form one aggregate fund, applicable to the general expences of the united kingdoms, the intercourse of trade is carried on with the same facility, as between the respective parts of any of them, their parliament meets in their capital, and the representatives of all those united kingdoms attend it without difficulty or inconvenience. Being so perfectly identified by nature and fituation, there subfists no distinctness of interest between them, their parliament is so effentially interested in the general welfare of the whole, that it cannot be induced to act with partiality towards any of its parts, fitting in the capital contiguous to the boards of revenue, treasury, trade and others, it can daily and hourly receive every necessary article of information in their departments, all these are necessary concomitants of perfect identification. Let us now compare the state of Ireland with theirs in those particulars, should the proposed Union take place. The royal functions will still be executed by a viceroy affifted by a privy council, the produce of the respective revenues of Ireland and Great Britain will still create distinct funds, distinctly applicable to the expences of the respective kingdoms; the taxes imposed by the joint legislature are not to extend extend alike to the whole united Empire, but to affect Great Britain and Ircland separately; the commercial intercourse between both islands will still be carried on, through the medium of diltinct revenue officers, according to an adjustment of reciprocal duties, founded upon fimilar principles with the treaty of commerce between France and Great Britain; the attendance upon Parliament of the Irish members will be in another island, with no slight inconvenience and with much additional expence, far beyond the means perhaps of many who may be delegated. While from the unavoidable distinctness of their local and commercial interest, Ireland can scarcely hope for a perfect impartiality and an unbiassed attention to her peculiar concerns, in the parliament affembled at Westminster, the British members will no doubt avail themselves of the preponderancy of their majority, and apply it to the interest of that country which they represent. Such real and fubstantial difference as I have pointed out, will I trust convince your Lordship, that the two nations will not be eafily identified, and that the inferences drawn from the benefits which England, Wales and Scotland derive from their joint parliamentary Union, by no means apply to the projected Union between Great Britain and Ireland. The propositions laid before his Majesty intimate, that each nation is to defray the expence of her own finking fund, that Ireland land is to pay a certain proportion of the ordinary expences of the united kingdoms, and that the duties to arise from their commercial intercourse are to constitute part of the revenue of that kingdom into which the commodities shall be imported. From these provisions it necessary follows, that their respective revenues must still be kept perfectly distinct; that each nation must still have its separate boards of treasury, revenue and accounts, as at present will not this necessarily be productive of distinct interests between the two nations; in truth, I scarcely know any fubstantial distinctness now subsisting between Great Britain and Ireland under their present connexion, which will not continue after the proposed Union, save that very material one, that Ireland shall be deprived of that distinct and independent Parliament which belongs to her, under her present Constitution. Whether the consequences of fuch a change will be falutary or injurious, it behoves every Irishman to consider well before he shall consent to merge his own in the united parliament. At present the parliament of Ireland fits in her capital, and every member can attend it, without inconvenience; its whole attention is concentered in Irish affairs, each member shares in the operation of every law enacted and feels every tax imposed; her parliament sitting in Dublin can receive without difficulty or delay from her own boards of revenue, treasury or accounts, accounts, every necessary information concerning fuch matters as belong to their respective departments, her Lawyers and Merchants may then constitute a part of such parliament from whom every necessary information within their peculiar province, respecting the laws and commerce of Ireland may be obtained. By means of the appellant jurisdiction lately restored to the Irish parliament, the fuitor can have his cause finally determined at home, without the trouble, expence and delay of restoring to another court of supreme judicature abroad. The members from their refidence, their station, and their intercourse with its inhabitants must necessarily be the best judges of the ability of the people, to support the taxes to be imposed. and of the ways and means which will render them least oppressive, and of fuch laws as may be best adapted to their internal regulation.

These are the folid and fubstantial advantages which Ireland may expect from retaining her own parliament, I trust they will fix her determination not to yield to wild speculations but to adhere to that Constitution. the falutary effects of which she has felt since the time that it has been established.

Having thus pointed out fuch important diftinctnesses in the government and in the interests between the two nations which must subsist, if the intended Union between them shall be effected, furely furely my Lord, you who have afferted, "that the abolition of the Privy Council of Scotland was necessary to consolidate the Union, by removing that remaining nucleus of a local government, and feparate interest," (fol. 92) cannot think, that a Union accompanied with all the foregoing distinctnesses of viceroy, privy-council, revenues and expences, will produce that perfect identity and incorporation of their government which you represent as the only mode of connexion which can perpectly remove the evils of separation, and confer the benefit of Union. The principle of the intended Union we are told is, that it will effectually remove the danger of separation between Great Britain and Ireland. I am of opinion that danger will rather be increased. The real object which has induced Great Britain to press this measure by means of promifes and menaces, rewards and punishments, is very far from that which she profeffes.

To the Protestant is held out, protection against the Catholic, who is represented as still retaining claims not only upon their liberties, but also upon their properties. To the Catholic, fallacious expectations are held out of being admitted into Parliament, and being placed upon a level with the Protestants in point of political power. Far be it from me, however, to infinuate that such expectations have originated from the Parliament of Great Britain; their language has been manly and direct, and authorifes no fuch delusive hopes as the understrappers of administration have held out to them.

The oftenfible argument in favour of the Union arises from supposed apprehensions being entertained of a separation between the two kingdoms. Be affured, that this is a mere pretence, and that when it is considered for what a great length of time those nations have continued united under the present connexion, such apprehensions cannot be really entertained. The real motive that lurks in the bottom of this measure I suspect to be widely different; to me it appears, that the recovery of reluctantly relinquished power is the real object of the British minister. It is to recover the power of binding Ireland by her acts of Parliament. This right afferted in the British act of the 6th Geo. 1st she exercised until she lost America; then, indeed, she reluctantly yielded to the nervous exertion of the Irish Parliament, and confented that Ireland should have a Constitution founded upon the basis of British freedom. And how reluctantly this emancipation of Ireland was granted, clearly appears from the Duke of Portland's correspondence in 1782, lately, and perhaps, unwittingly produced by Mr. Pitt; and from the affiduous exertions of Mr. Pitt to do away that Parliamentary Constitution of Ireland, which was folemnly adjusted in 1782, by denying that it was intended to be a final adjustment of constitutional constitutional questions between both nations. The British Cabinet now feems anxious to reassume that power in its fullest extent, claimed by the 6th Geo. 1st of binding Ireland in all cases whatfoever, thus including the momentous and alarming power of taxation: this in truth appears to me the great object of the minister's exertions.—He wishes that the power over the whole property of the kingdom of Ireland should be at his disposal; and how is this to be effected? by Ireland's transferring a part of her Parliament to be added to that of Great Britain, such part fufficient to legalize the acts of fuch united Parliament, under the flimfy pretence of Ireland's being represented there, although such infignificant part will not give her any more power in fuch Parliament, than she would have had if she was not represented in it at all.

If the parliament of Ireland shall be once melted down into an united parliament, the power which she now has over her liberty and property, will be thereby transferred to the disposal of the preponderating majority which Great Britain will have in such united parliament. Ireland should well consider that if she once gives up her own parliament, the act cannot be recalled.—Should the articles be infringed, she will be left without redress; there is not any tribunal upon earth to which she can appeal. He is little read in the book of mankind who expects to have good faith faith observed between nations, where it is inconsistent with their interest. Let Ireland consider, that by giving up her parliament, she parts with the only sole security she can have for her liberties, and will thenceforth hold them, at the precarious tenure of the liberality and good will of the British majority in the united parliament.

I now proceed to that part of your lordship's fpeech relative to the internal and political regimen of Ireland. You observe, that nothing " can be less rational, or more dangerous, and often fatal, than abstract views of practical questions affecting the interests of multitudes and of nations; that in the pursuit of abstract right, we shall often find ourselves (innocently, no doubt, if our intention is confidered, but yet too effectually) the instruments of great practical injustice and oppression, that there are few cases to which that observation applies more closely, than that which you are confidering." (fol. 72.) It appears to me rather extraordinary, that your lordship, entertaining ideas of the danger of such abstract views, should enter into the discussion of fuch; and the more fo, if it should appear that your mode of treating them is of a hazardous tendency, originating perhaps, from want of due information respecting the present state of Ireland. You affert, "that Ireland is a divided country as to property and numbers, the least numerous class (alluding I presume to the Protestants) posfeffing festing the property and the power; the more numerous (the Catholics) entertaining claims both on the property and the power." So far as relates to the division of property and power, your representation appears to me to be well founded .-You next state the violence "of those passions which influence and exasperate both parts of the Irish nation against each other, the firm and immoveable basis on which their mutual hatred stands, the irreconcilable nature of its motives, its bitter, malignant, and implacable character. You represent them as two nations in Ireland, two Irish peoples; the one sovereign, the other fubject. You confider them as two enraged and implacable opponents, thut up on the very arena of their ancient and furious contentions. To me the tendency of fuch representations appears calculated to stimulate animosity between the two parties, by impressing an idea on their minds, that an inveterate hatred subsists between them, which is rooted in fuch principles, and actuated by fuch motives, as must make it continue for ever.

But to shew how totally unfounded these affertions are, I shall appeal to the parliamentary transactions in Ireland for the last twenty two years. Until the year 1777, the penal statutes affecting Catholics remained in force. From the time of their enaction, the Catholics had conducted themselves peaceably and loyally. Two rebellions had taken place in Scotland, notwithstanding standing the Union; the one in 1715, and the other in 1745; in the course of which, the Irish Catholics (though strongly folicited) took no share. Such conduct naturally conciliated the regards and affuaged the prejudices of their Protestant brethren, who were convinced that the penal statutes might with fafety be repealed .-Parliament chearfully and freely engaged in that laudable business, warmly wishing to contribute to the happiness and comfort of their fellow-subjects, and enacted the statutes of the 17th and 18th of Geo. III. whereby, after reciting, that from the uniform peaceable behaviour of the Catholics for a long feries of years, it was expedient to relax those laws, that it would tend to the prosperity and strength of all his Majesty's dominions, that his fubjects of all denominations should enjoy the bleffings of a free constitution, and should be bound to each other by mutual interest and mutual affection; for these purposes, therefore, they enacted, that perfons professing the popish religion should be capable to take, hold and enjoy, any leafes for years, not exceeding 999 years, should have full power of dispofing of them, or of any estates, whereof they were, or to which they should become entitled; that they be capable of taking any estate by descent; that no maintenance or portion should be granted to a child of a popish parent, upon a bill filed against such parent; that it should not be in the power of the eldest son of a popish parent, to make his father tenant for life, by conforming, but that the father, notwithstanding such conformity, should have full power over his estate, thereby repealing all those laws which were most grievous and galling to the Catholics of Ireland. The remaining disability to purchase the inheritance, subjecting Catholics to many legal inconveniences, peculiar to chattel interests; the act of the 21st and 22d Geo. III. was made, whereby Catholics were enabled to purchase the inheritance, their estates made descendible according to the course of the common law; the penal laws against popish ecclesiasticks, upon their taking the oaths appointed by the 14th and 15th Geo. III. and feveral other laws, subjecting Catholics to disabilities, were repealed. This liberal act fully compleated the wish of the Catholics at that time, they felt and expressed the warmest gratitude to that parliament, for fuch fubstantial proofs of their friendship and good will; the Protestants and Catholics became as one family, and the most perfect cordiality appeared to fubfift between them; the power of acquisition and disposal of property was equally enjoyed by Protestants and Catholics.

Things remained in that state of increasing harmony for several years, until Great Britain having complied with the wishes of the British protesting Catholics, enabled them to act as barristers, attornies, attornies, and folicitors, in the British courts of justice. The Irish parliament immediately followed their example, and by flat. 32 Geo. III. conferred on the Irish Catholics, similar privileges, and at the same time repealed such remaining penal laws as still subsisted in the statute book, however obfolete; whose repeal, therefore, as being rather immaterial, had been before neglected. In the next fession also, the parliament even outstripped the most sanguine wishes of the Catholic body in Ireland, and the bounty of a British parliament, by admitting them to the elective franchife, and enabling them to take and enjoy every civil and military employment, the judicial department, and a few of the highest offices of administration only excepted. And do fuch liberal concessions, such substantial grants on the part of the Irish legislature, far outstripping the liberality of Great Britain to her protesting Catholics, intimate, that a bitter, malignant, and implacable hatred fubfifts between the Irish Protestants and Catholics? No, furely. Your lordship has been strangely misinformed. These facts, I conceive, fully refute that charge, and are fufficient to fatisfy the Catholics, that their Protestant brethren ardently wish to unite with them in heart and hand, and in every respect to contribute to their happiness, as far as is consistent with the established constitution in church and state.

After this injurious mistatement of the disposition of the Protestants and Catholics of Ireland towards each other, you next proceed to venture upon the delicate and hazardous question of abstract rights. You say that you cannot "admit of the ascendancy of one part of the nation over another part of the fame nation, to the extent and purpose claimed in Ireland, as capable of affuming any character deferving the denomination of right. That which is wrong on one fide, cannot intelligibly to you become right on the other. You do not think the virtues of possession, prescription, or any other limitation of time at all applicable to the case of perpetually fubfifting, and as it were renovating wrongs, especially such as affect the political rights of great numbers of men. That the frequency of the repetition of wrongs, instead of diminishing the injury, must be felt as a grievous aggravation of it; and instead of converting wrong into right, feems only to improve and fortify the title of those who fuffer, to shake off the injury on the first opportunity that offers. You say that part of Ireland which you wish to redress, claims not only political equality in the government of their country, in which you cannot help sympathising with them, but are known to entertain claims of a very different nature." How revolutionary is this mode of reasoning? How inflammatory, how perfectly does it coincide with the principles broached by Paine, in his Rights of Man? Does it not tend to awaken discontents among the Catholics of Ireland, to justify their reforting to first principles, to vindicate their political equality, to authorife downright rebellion? Is not all this, treason against the Constitution which it encourages the Catholics to overturn? Andmaynot government be fairly taxed with countenancing those principles adopted by your lordship? They have circulated, as I am informed, at the public cost, your elaborate speech, although the printer of Paine's Rights of Man, founded upon the very same principles, has been prosecuted and punished in England. If I understand your lordship, you consider every part of his Majesty's subjects entitled to an equality of civil and political rights, and that it is an act of injustice to the Catholic to deprive him of a participation of them. The exclusion of the Catholics from a share in the legislature results from the oath of Supremacy, which is required to be taken by persons of every persuasion, previous to their admission into parliament. This oath relates merely to the political, not the religious tenets of the Catholics. I will state for your information the introduction of that oath. Immediately after the revolution, by the English stat. 1st of William and Mary, it was enjoined to be taken by every person before his admission into the English Parliament; by the English stat. of 3d William and Mary, it was enacted, that it should be taken before any person should D be be permitted to fit in the Irish parliament; for at that time the English Parliament did claim the right, and did actually exercise the power of binding Ireland by its laws. The exclusion, therefore, of the Catholics from fitting in Parliament was the act of the English Legislature, not of that part of the Irish People whom you consider as unduly invested with legislative power. If such exclusion from an equality of political rights be a wrong, it is a wrong enacted by the English Parliament, not by the Irish, who in fact never made any law to that effect, until after the restoration of their legislative Constitution in 1782, at which time they by an act of their own, adopted generally all those English laws, which related to the taking of fuch oaths. The political creed of the English Catholic being the same with that of the Irish, equally induces the expediency of enjoining the oath of supremacy to be taken in both countries, and excludes both from a share in the legislature. If such exclusion then be a wrong to the Irish Catholic, it must be a wrong to the English Catholic also. The dictinctions of right and wrong equally apply to both, furely the afcendency of one part of a nation over another part of the same nation, cannot assume the denomination of right in the one kingdom, and that of wrong in the other. Your Lordship's feelings are alive to the oppression of the Irish Catholic, occasioned by his being deprived of an equality of political political rights by the English Parliament, and you fympathife with him on account of that injustice committed by an English Parliament. But your compassion does not extend to the British Catholic who is in the very fame predicament, and who fuffers the very fame wrongs. Are the principles of right and wrong different in Ireland and Great Britain? The Irish Protestant has been by the foregoing English act subjected to the same penalties and disabilities, if he shall omit to take the oaths, and there are instances where the punishment for omission has been inslicted upon the Protestant both in England and Ireland. Thus, my Lord, the cenfure which you levelled against the Irish Parliament, recoils against the English. I am happy, however, to be able to vindicate the wisdom and justice of the English Parliament in excluding persons from a share in the legislature, who professed such political principles as are avowed by persons of the Catholic persuasion in Great Britain and Ireland. By the Constitution the King is fupreme head of the Church; his power both in temporals and spirituals, is limited to the laws of the land. It is contrary to every found political principle of Government, that any powers should be exercised therein, save such as are confistent with the Constitution; the king is as much bound by the laws as the meanest of his fubjects; every person partaking of the benefits of the Constitution, is bound to obey the King in all all his just prerogatives. This it is which creates the allegiance due by the fubject to the king, and enables him to afford reciprocal protection to the fubject. The oath required to be taken confifts of two parts :-- Ift, The member is to fwear that he abbors, detests, and abjures that damnable doctrine and position, that princes excommunicated or deprived by the pope, may be murdered and deposed by their subjects. No person will attempt to maintain, that a man entertaining fuch deteftable principles, is fit to be admitted into the legislature. Secondly, the oath declares, that no foreign prince, prelate, state or potentate, has, or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power or authority, within this realm. To this part of the oath the Catholic objects, as repugnant to his creed, which maintains, that the pope has absolute power and authority within this realm in all matters spiritual or ecclesiastical. No article of faith is contained in the faid oath, it is merely political, and relates only to ecclefiaffical government; it only excludes from parliament fuch persons as support a power in the pope, which the constitution has vested in the crown. The principle which it opposes, aims to introduce a foreign power into this realm, absolute in its nature, above all law, uncontrouled and uncontroulable, and utterly repugnant to the fundamental principles of the constitution. Surely the establishment of such a power would be in fact to fubject the crown in spirituals, to the authority of the pope. The Catholic who supports such power thereby.

thereby acknowledges himself the subject of the person who is invested therewith, he divides his allegiance, he professes himself subject to the king in temporals, and to the pope in spirituals. That fuch are the tenets of the catholics, appears from Doctor Huffey's Pastoral Letter: addressing himself to the soldiers he fays, "their personal religion is their natural incontrovertible imprescriptible right, subject to the spiritual authority of the Catholic Church, and in which the laws of the land cannot enjoy a coercive authority. In all temporal matters, they are subject to their temporal rulers in all spiritual matters they are fubject to their spiritual rulers;" how then can a legislature vesting and establishing the supremacy of the church in the crown, disclaiming and refisting the authority of any foreign power within the realm, admit persons into their body whose tenets are fo repugnant to their own? These obfervations will I trust vindicate the propriety of the English parliament in framing for Ireland such a political test. Your Lordship will also observe, that every argument which you adduce, to prove the injuffice of excluding catholics from the Irish parliament, militates with equal force against their exclusion from the British, and with what confistency, my Lord, do you impeach the Irish parliament, reprefenting it as inadequate to make laws for binding Catholics, after having contended for the omnipotency of that very parliament, and represented presented it as invested with sufficient power to bind for ever those very catholics by an incorporative Union with Great Britain, in the formation of which, it appears from the propositions laid before his Majesty, and supported by your Lordship, that the very same oaths are required to be taken by the members of the united parliament, as are now prescribed to be taken by the members of the respective parliaments of Great Britain and Ireland. I decline entering into the abstract view of the competency of parliament, to fubstitute another Constitution in the place of that, for the preservation of which they have been invested with their legislative functions; it is a question of fo dangerous a tendency, and upon which fuch a diversity of opinions has prevailed among men of the first abilities, that I shall not venture to enter upon the confideration of it; but this much I shall venture to affirm, that if the formation of the parliament of Ireland be fo vicious and defective as you represent, it cannot be competent to bind the catholics by establishing fuch articles of Union as shall exclude them for ever from participating in the legislature of the united kingdoms. Expectations have been held out to the catholics that those laws of exclusion will be altered bythe united parliament: whether there be any reasonable foundation for such expectation, will be best ascertained by taking a retrospective view of the conduct of parliament since the Revolution

Revolution. There are in Great Britain as well as in Ireland a confiderable number of catholics, though not in fo great a proportion to the proteftants, the English legislature have required such oaths to be taken by members before their admiffion into parliament as have excluded catholics from sitting in it; they are in Great Britain deprived of the elective franchise, they are rendered incapable of enjoying any employment, civil or military, in that kingdom. An attempt was made not many years ago in the British parliament to repeal the Test Act, but without effect. In the prefent case the British parliament by the propositions which they have laid before his Majesty, acted fairly and openly by the catholics; they have constitutionally declared, that the Churches of England and Ireland, and the doctrine, worship, discipline and government thereof shall be preserved as by law established, thereby affirming, and securing the ascendancy of the protestant religion and the king's supremacy in the government of the church; they have declared that the same oaths now in force shall continue to be taken by the members of the united parliament. When fuch then is the language of parliament, how unwarrantable must it be in individuals to use endeavours to impose upon the catholics by holding out to them expectations totally incompatible with the spirit and meaning of the propositions themselves. Compare the condition of the Irish Catholic

Catholic with that of the British; in Ireland he has the elective franchise, and is capable of enjoying every office, civil and military, a few only excepted, from all which the British catholic is excluded. Your Lordship, notwithstanding your feelings for the Irish catholics, has never attempted to procure for the British catholic the rights and privileges which the Irish catholic enjoys. Should an Union take place, no distinction can be made between the catholics of the united kingdoms, either the British catholic must be raised to the level of the Irish catholic, or the Irish lowered to the level of the British. This measure of adjustment must be determined by the united parliament, where British influence must always predominate, and can it be expected that the great British majority will concede to the Irish minority? That the standard of adjustment will probably be lowered, may be collected still further from the fagacious conjecture of that eminent statesman Lord Auckland, who expresses himself thus; " it has long been my opinion, that whatever may be the indulgences, more or less limited, to the catholics of England, the measure of those indulgences ought to guide our discretion with respect to the catholics of Ireland." Whither the Irish catholic is more likely to be raised or depressed by the proposed Union, I leave to the fagacity of the most intelligent Catholics to decide, from the foregoing observations; earnestly wishing wishing that they may not feed themselves with vain hopes of further concessions which will ne ver be realized. The illiberal and mischievous policy of ruling by division in order to rule by Union, I am forry to observe, seems to be your maxim as well as that of feveral other ministerial grand speakers on the imperial question of Union. But let me tell you, my Lord, honesty is the best policy between states, as between individuals. The torch of discord has been unhappily kindled in Ireland, and has blazed out into infurrection, and open rebellion. It has been the fashion to attribute it principally to popish fanaticism, but I apprehend, without fufficient foundation; the primary promoters of that rebellion were proteftants and presbyterians as well as romanists, and the hostility of the united conspirators was levelled against all religious eslablishments, although they endeavoured to avail themselves of the political engines of superstition and bigotry. This clearly appeared upon the examination of the leaders of the conspiracy before the parliamentary committees; their object was the same with that of the English and Scotch conspirators, all were actuated by the same jacobinical principles; they wished to overturn the civil and religious government of both kingdoms, and to substitute in its place the anarchy and confusion of a democratic republic on the miserable model of France. The Irish rebels did not limit their revolutionary views, as has been infinuated by your Lordship, to regain the forfeited lands of which they confidered themselves to have been injustly deprived. Few indeed engaged in that rebellion had any fuch claims to urge; their views extended to a new partition of the whole landed property of Ireland among themselves. In England also and Scotland, as well as in Ireland, the fame revolutionary principles were unremittingly propagated and disseminated, where the Romish religion had small comparative influence. The reports of the parliamentary committees prove its progrefs through Great Britain. It appeared there fufficient to authorife the enacting of fuch laws, as the necessity of the case could alone justify. At that time Great Britain was secured by a great military force, Ireland was in a most defenceless state, France clearly faw that Great Britain was most vulnerable in that part of her Empire, she applied herself with redoubled activity to diffuse her principles among the Irish people, with whom from their poverty and ignorance she had the greatest prospect of success. The object of the rebels was to overturn all government, which neceffarily would have produced a feparation between Great Britain and Ireland. Let the loyal Irish compare the state their country would have been in, if at the time the rebellion broke out, the parliament melted down into that of Great Britain had been sitting at Westminster and one hundred and thirty-two of her most distinguished characters for talents and property, engaged in attending that parliament, with that in which she then stood, assisted by a parliament of her own, fitting in her capital, whose most diligent attention was exerted, in investigating and defeating the machinations of the rebels, and whose principal gentry exercised their utmost influence in preferving and restoring good order and tranquillity among the inhabitants of their respective estates. Believe me, my Lord, the indefatigable industry of the Irish Houses of Parliament and of the refident gentry, were under Providence the powerful means by which that rebellion was counteracted and suppressed. The meritorious conduct therefore of the Irish parliament furnishes a most forcible additional argument against its extinction. Whilst Ireland has a Constitution worth preserving, she will ever apply her most strenuous exertions in its support, her parliament she considers as the only security for the permanent preservation of the liberty she now enjoys. You have taken a review of the prefent Constitution of Ireland to shew that she is not an independent nation, in which I perfectly agree with you, the act of annexation of the crown of Ireland to that of Great Britain, the act of 1782, by which the legislative functions of the fovereign of Ireland can only be performed through the Great Seal of Great Britain, speak in the strongest language, the superiority of Great Britain over Ireland. The administration of the executive government of Ireland by a viceroy (which must still continue if the Union should take place) in another instance to which you refort, to prove her fuperiority over Ireland. I do not only acknowledge her fuperiority in those instances, but I consider such as necessary to her prosperity. In all imperial concerns Ireland ought to follow in the wake of Great Britain, the fole power of making war and peace, entering into treaties with foreign powers is vested in the king of Great Britain by virtue of his royal prerogative, in all these particulars (as Blackstone expresses it) the Constitution considers him as the representative of the people but it has been obferved that although those powers are vested in the crown yet the support of a war depends upon the concurrent will of the parliament. History does not furnish one instance where parliament has withheld fuch fupport; the motive which has produced this uniform concurrence with the Crown is that, which ever will produce the fame effect, self interest and self preservation; this must operate with greater force upon Ireland than upon Great Britain, as she in such a case would be much more defenceless; wherefore since Great Britain under the present mode of connexion between her and Ireland, is by your own statement invested with all those powers in imperial concerns, of the Empire, I cannot find any occasion upon that account to refort to an incorporating Union.

A private correspondence between the Duke of Portland and Lord Shelburne in May and June 1782 has been rather unguardedly produced to the public by Mr. Pitt, which his Grace states to be so delicate in its nature, requiring so much secrecy and management, that he would not trust the communication of it to any hand but his own. I shall decline making any comment upon the nature of that transaction. Ireland however may profit from its being made public. The object of the acts of Parliament then in the contemplation of his Grace were, that the superintending power and supremacy of Great Britain in all matters of state and general commerce, should be virtually and effectually acknowledged; but your Lordship has clearly shewn, that without any such act of Parliament, Great Britain is already invested with such powers. Another object in his contemplation was, that the share of the expence in carrying on a defensive or offensive war, either in the defence of our dominions or those of our allies, should be borne by Ireland in proportion to the actual state of her abilities. To this part of his plan, I do not imagine that any objection could reasonably be made by Ireland; participating as she now does in the commerce of Great Britain, she is bound to contribute her proportion to the protection of the Empire of which she constitutes an essential part. He surther proceeds, that Ireland should adopt such regulations as may be judged necessary by Great Britain for the better ordering and regulating the trade and commerce with foreign nations and her own colonies and dependencies, consideration being duly had to the circumstances of Ireland; this part of the plan also appears unobjectionable. These are the great objects which are avowed to be expected from the Union, and it appears that the corresponding parties then thought that they could be secured by such acts of parliament as they described, without depriving Ireland of her present constitution.

Your lordship having pointed out all those instances in which Ireland is dependant on Great Britain, I shall advert to those particulars in which I consider Ireland as independent under her present constitution. She now has the sole and exclusive right of making laws for her internal regulation and taxation; for although it may be said that she has not absolutely the power of enacting any law, as it must be first ratisfied under the great seal of Great Britain, yet she has a moral certainty, from the interest which Great Britain must necessarily take in the prosperity of Ireland, that such ratisfication will never be withheld by the executive of Great Britain, unless in cases where such law may be really injurious to her;

nor is there more reason to apprehend that the king shall refuse his royal affent to bills really useful and expedient to the public, than that he should refuse to permit the great seal of Great Britain to be annexed to them. Upon those powers therefore, with which her own Parliament is invested, Ireland relies, as the foundation on which her liberties are to be supported. The interest of Great Britain is intimately interwoven with that of Ireland; the strength, the opulence, the prosperity of Ireland, are the strength, the opulence, and the prosperity of the fister kingdom; Ireland must stand and fall with Great Britain. This measure of an Union is pressed upon Ireland, not required by her. The language held forth by Mr. Pitt, Lord Auckland, and others of the ministerial phalanx, has been that of persuasion mingled with menace, extolling the great advantages in commerce which Ireland enjoys through British bounty, their precarious tenure depending on the good will and pleasure of a British parliament, at the same time infinuating the danger of their being withdrawn, should Ireland refuse this great boon now tendered to her, alledging that her protection depends upon the strength of Great Britain, which might perhaps be withdrawn from her. Such indirect menaces need not alarm Ireland; she well knows that the continuance of those benefits depends upon the best possible security, the interest of Great Britain, that she should should continue to enjoy them. In truth, mutual interest is the only cement which can bind nations; it is that which has preferved the connexion of these kingdoms for so many centuries. To the powerful aid of that connexion and efficacious co-operation of Ireland, is furely to be attributed much of the high rank and proud station in which Great Britain now stands, as the bulwark of the liberties of Europe. Your language upon this part of the subject has indeed materially differed from that of others of the ministerial phalanx; and it is but justice to your principles of liberality and found policy, indicating the enlarged mind of a profound statesman, to state, that (according to your representation) Ireland has a perfect right to claim in times of danger, whether " from foreign or domestic enemies, the protection of the British navy and military, as well as securing aid; that the preservation of Ireland is an English interest, and sufficiently precious to call for those exertions, even in a distinct and separate view of her own advantage; in the next place that she is entitled to it, as she is at all times contributory to the general fervice and fecurity; that her feamen, her foldiers, and her revenue all augment the general stock of British resources; that if peculiar and temporary emergencies have at this or any other particular period, encreased the local demands of Ireland upon the exertions of Great Britain, the scene of danger may at other times be shifted, and that there are recent grounds to be convinced that she will be ready to make extraordinary exertions upon extraordinary danger, in Great Britain, if fuch occasions should arise. That in respect to the extensive commerce from without, and prosperous manufactures from within, which flow from a free participation of the imperial greatness of Great Britain, these upon a view of the present connexion with Great Britain, belong to the very nature of the cafe, and naturally flow from the fentiments of fraternity and reciprocal kindness, which should accompany fuch a connexion; that fuch favours are prompted by a liberal, but at the same time by a wife policy." This is, indeed, my lord, the true and rational principle upon which the connexion between Great Britain and Ireland should fubfift; and fuch connexion would never have been formed, but from an expectation of mutual advantages. Every increase of prosperity which Ireland receives, contributes to the strength and prosperity of the British empire; and most justly does your lordship observe, " if identity of constitution be not founded on identity of interest, and is not followed by identity of fentiment and feeling towards the united empire, fuch an Union will not cure the evils of imperfect relation, or even feparation, but may bring fome of them nearer and more home to both." (fol. 60.)-This indeed is an observation well deserving the most

most ferious attention. The great object now held out to induce these two nations to adopt this meafure of an incorporating Union is, that it will preclude all danger of separation. No man can feel more strongly than I do the ruinous consequences that would ensue from separation; and therefore, upon that very ground I deprecate fuch Union. I presume it will be admitted as an incontrovertible position, that mutual interest and reciprocity of advantages are the only strong and permanent bonds of Union between two nations. Their Union will continue fo long as their mutual interest prompts them to it; no acts of parliament will bind them longer, than whilst the connexion continues to be useful to them; The present connexion has for many centuries preserved their Union, each nation has felt the reciprocal affiftance which they afforded to each other. Great Britain was entitled to a superiority in all imperial concerns, and has enjoyed it. To the acquisition and peopling of her extensive colonies, Ireland has largely contributed; still, however, Great Britain for a long time was fo blind to her own interest, as to grudge to Ireland a participation of colonial commerce. We may further observe, that although the British parliament has occasionally exercised the power of making laws for the internal regulation of Ireland, she never attempted to interfere with her internal taxation, that that power having been folely exercised by her own parliament. The dangerous consequences of attempting to impose internal taxation, may be illustrated by the American contest.

In 1770, Great Britain assumed a right of imposing an internal tax upon the article of tea imported into America. This occasioned much discontent; in consequence of which, the act was fo far repealed, as to leave only a remaining tax of three pence a pound. This tax was not attempted to be collected, until 1774. At that time, unfortunately, the minister hazarded the experiment, whether America would submit to that unproductive tax, and thereby establish Great Britain's right to tax her. Ship's freighted with tea were fent to Boston for that purpose, with orders to enforce the payment of the duty. The Americans felt the magnitude of the precedent, though the tax was fmall. They would not permit the cargoes to be landed, but threw them into the fea. Immediately upon this the Boston port act, and other compulsory acts, were passed, for the purpose of punishing the Americans, and forcing them to submit. This produced no other effect than that of uniting them in oppofing the collection of the tax. I need not remind you of the hostile proceedings which followed; but it is proper to observe, that the Americans had neither a navy nor an army, and that it was the univerfal opinion in Great Britain, that her power was fufficient.

fufficient to compel them to fubmit, if they flould dare to refift. Ireland was not an inattentive obferver of those proceedings; she assimilated the case of the Americans to her own, and sympathized with them during the progrest of the war; she considered, that if Great Britain should establish her power of internal taxation on America, the herself was to become the next victim. Unable to cope with Great Britain fingly, America was fecretly affifted by France. At length, in 1778, the French threw off the mask, and notified by their ambaffador to the British minister, that they had formed an offensive and defensive alliance with America. Things then, indeed, assumed a most serious aspect, Great Britain was alarmed, Ireland grew discontented, and her manufacturers were stationary. She exclaimed against the injustice of Great Britain, for withholding from her the colonial trade, and urged it most forcibly in her own parliament. Alarmed by the danger of lofing America, Great Britain vielded to the necessity of cultivating the affections of Ireland, and by encreasing Irish resources, to enlarge Irish ability to succour and support her, These considerations induced her to admit Ireland into a share of her trade with the colonies. The crisis at which this took place, may suggest a doubt, whether it proceeded from an enlarged fpirit of liberality, or merely of felf-interest; I wish I could fatisfactorily ascribe it to the former motive.

motive. The attempt to tax America made a strong impression on the Irish mind. What advantage, they faid, could accrue from the enlargement of their trade, if Great Britain should have a power to make laws by which their property might be affected? In 1782, Great Britain acknowledged the independence of America; and learning wisdom from misfortune, she saw the necessity as well as the justice, of yielding to the wishes of Ireland, and of admitting her to share in British freedom. By the constitutional adjustment of that year, the fole power of making laws for the internal regulation and taxation of Ireland was vested in her own parliament. This folemn recognition of her independent legislative power is now confidered by Ireland as her Magna Charta. Can we then be furprized, if she be tremblingly alive to any measure which may tend to infringe it?

In 1785, the commercial propositions were introduced in the Irish parliament; they had been framed in Great Britain, and offered by Mr. Orde, for settling the intercourse in commerce between the two nations, and the contribution which was to be furnished by Ireland towards the support of the British navy. The mode of contribution was judiciously planned by regulating it according to the encrease of her commerce.—

These propositions were represented by Mr. Orde as perfectly satisfactory to Great Britain; and so much much were they approved of in the Irish house of commons, that upon a division, the tellers of opposition had none to tell. These propositions having been fent back again to Great Britain, met with great opposition in the house of commons, chiefly raifed by petitions presented against them by the trading interest. They underwent many alterations, and had ten propositions added to them. They were again laid, as altered, by Mr. Orde, before the Irish house of commons, who moved for leave to bring in a bill for establishing them; but upon the discussion of that motion, some of the additional propositions were strongly objected to, as tending to infringe upon the acknowledged independence of the Irish legislature. It is not improbable, that having been introduced as additional propositions to those which had been stated as satisfactory to Great Britain (no part of which in any fort pointed to constitutional questions) and the people of Ireland, being particularly jealous at that time of any thing which tended to touch upon her constitution fo recently established, this circumstance might have created an opposition to matters, which in other circumstances might have passed without notice. Although Mr. Orde's motion was carried by a majority of nineteen, he did not, however, introduce the bill, and no further proceedings were taken towards carrying that meafure into effect, he probably judging, that an adjustment justment of such consequence to the connexion between the two nations, required a more general approbation. Had the bill been introduced, it might perhaps have been fo framed, as to remove the particular objections urged against them; but those very propositions contained every thing which related to the commercial interests of Ireland, as fully, equitably, and beneficially to both nations, as can be effected by the proposed Union. Had that bill passed, all the commercial questions under debate would have been adjusted, and the specific contribution ascertained to be had by Ireland towards the support of the navy; and furely fuch a bill as might have been then brought in, may still be passed, without infringing on the legislative independence of Ireland .-It has been reported, that meetings have been had between the British minister and several persons holding high offices in Ireland, for the purpose of digesting the plan of the intended Union, and that the result in respect of the formation of the united parliament, has been to the following purport: That both houses of the British parliament shall remain in their present state, persect and entire; that Ireland shall furnish to the house of lords 32 members, namely, 28 lay lords and 4 spiritual, and that 100 members shall be added by Ireland to the British house of commons. In a parliament thus constituted, the Irish lords would make one-tenth of the united house of lords lords, and the commons amount to one fixth of that body. Such is the intended plan of the united parliament, to be substituted in the place of that which now exists in Ireland. By a parliament thus compoled, all laws to affect the united kingdoms are to be enacted; but what influence can so scanty a proportion of Irish members have upon the decisions of the legislative body? In the name of common fense, can any one imagine that fuch laws will not be actually made by the preponderating power of the British members? The determination must ever be the same as if the 100 cyphers of Irish members did not sit in such parliament: Irishmen cannot be satisfied with fuch a mockery of representation.-When they shall feel the increase of their taxes, (which certainly will be the case) they will attribute it to their being laid on by the British members who impose taxes, the weight of which they do not feel, and which they may be induced to lay on, in order to alleviate burthens of their own. Ireland may have abundant reason to compare the taxes to be imposed with those formerly laid on by her own parliament. Irishmen will lament the irremediable change, and their legal inability to be restored to their former constitution. Universal discontent may ensue, and what fatal consequences to the peace and tranquillity of the empire may refult, and how far it may endanger danger the connexion between the two islands, I tremble to anticipate.

It has been represented that Ireland is so circumstanced, that she must submit to the power of Great Britain; that she has no army, no navy, and no other alternative but to embrace French fraternity, the mifery of which cannot be reprefented in too strong colours. Wretched as the despotism of France is at present, by following wild theories of impracticable government, it is contrary to the nature of things that she should remain for ever in her present state of anarchy; the fever must at length subside, and a rational form of government fucceed. She may then gradually recruit her navy, and take her proper station in the scale of Europe, while her inveterate implacable animofity to Great Britain will never subfide. She will court every opportunity of humbling that formidable rival, and should difcontents at any future period prevail in Ireland, will take every step to foment them. She will not fail to infinuate how grossly Ireland has been duped, by exchanging her independent parliament for the mockery of legislative representation. Should she find fuch infinuations operate, she will add her fraternal offers of emancipation, and enter into a similar offensive and defensive alliance with Ireland as fhe did with America.

Let Great Britain beware of prefuming too much upon her own strength and our weakness.

G

If there be a prudent jealoufy in the British Constitution, respecting the disposal of the public purse; if the commons have been so tenacious of that right, that they will not fuffer the lords even to make an addition to a pecuniary fine, laid on by them, will Ireland be fatisfied to be taxed at the discretion of the British parliament? for fuch the imperial parliament must in fact be confidered. I shall now shortly observe upon the circumstances of the two nations in respect of A confiderable increase of taxation must necessarily take place in Ireland, if she is to bear a part of the discharge of the British debt. I shall state its amount from Mr. Pitt's representation during the last session. Great Britain owes about four hundred millions. The annual charge arifing from that debt, for interest and annuities, amounts to upwards of twenty millions and an half, of which four millions and an half are appropriated as a finking fund; on the other hand, the annual charge upon Ireland for interest and annuities, amounts to somewhat more than one million one hundred thousand pounds, of which one hundred thousand pounds is applicable as a finking The rental of Great Britain scarcely reaches twenty-eight millions, and that of Ireland, whose contents are about one-third of those of Great Britain, may be estimated at about seven millions.

Certain resolutions have been laid before his majesty by the parliament of Great Britain, stating the outlines of the intended Union, one of which, the 7th, applies to this part of the subject. It is therefore proposed, " That the interest, or finking fund, for the reduction of the principal of the debt incurred in either kingdom before the Union shall continue to be separately defrayed by Great Britain and Ireland respectively." This applies to that part only of the interest, which is appropriated as a finking fund, but is totally filent in respect of the remaining part of the charge occasioned by their respective debts, the annual charge of which amounts to fixteen millions, to be paid by Great Britain, and to one million to be paid by Ireland. I should collect from the silence of ministry, upon a subject of such magnitude, that it is intended, that Ireland should be chargeable with, and subject to some part of that enormous debt. Should this take place, and the part to be paid by Ireland be proportioned to her rental, it might occasion an additional annual charge upon Ireland of two millions and an half. Additional taxes must then be laid on Ireland, to raise this enormous charge, which is far beyond her abilities to support. She will fink under the burthen, will grow defperate, and embrace the first opportunity of relief. The rapid encrease of debt in Ireland for these last two turbulent and disastrous years, has occasioned a great encrease of taxes, which the poverty poverty of her people feels already most heavily. But should fuch an addition to their taxes be made, as will be fufficient to raise this additional annual charge, it will in effect be putting Ireland into a state of requisition; and further, Ireland would not only fuffer in the quantum of its amount, but also in its application. The whole sum so levied would be drawn out of this kingdom into Great Britain, and applied there to the discharge of her debt. Such a drain would gradually diminish, and in a few years annihilate the specie of Ireland; the course of exchange would come to be so high, that not a fingle guinea would be left in that kingdom. Commerce would cease from want of capital, bankruptcies ensue, and the taxes become unproductive, from the decay of trade. Great Britain would too late feel the impolicy of fuch a measure. If it is meant that Ireland should not be affected by the debt of Great Britain, it will require much ingenuity, indeed, to form such a plan of arrangement between the two nations, as shall secure each from being affected by the debt of the other, and more especially to fecure Ireland, when it is confidered that the power of taxing Ireland is to be vested in the united parliament, more properly to be called the British parliament, and that Great Britain is not to be affected by the taxes which shall be imposed upon Ireland. I would suppose that by the articles of Union, it should be agreed that Ireland should should be indemnified against that debt, and thereupon confent to give up her only fecurity, her own parliament. Can she expect that such articles will be adhered to longer than Great Britain shall find convenient? Is not felf-interest the primary motive which governs the actions of one nation towards another? The omnipotence of parliament does not extend to prevent any future parliament from repealing or altering laws which former parliaments have enacted. Where is the tribunal to which Ireland can appeal, if fuch articles folemnly entered into by the present parliament shall be infringed by any fucceeding parliament. There is none other which I know of but that of reforting to first principles, which God forbid should ever become necessary. Ireland knows, that while her own parliament subsists, her liberties are secure, and I trust, will have more good sense and virtue than to exchange the fecurity she now has, for the precarious tenure of retaining her liberties fo long as the parliament of Great Britain (for fuch I must ever consider the united parliament constituted in the manner proposed to be) shall be graciously pleased to permit her to enjoy them.

Having clearly shewn, that an Union to be formed agreeable to the outline laid before his Majesty, will not identify the two nations, but that all those distinct interests in pecuniary, and other matters, which I have pointed out, will continue continue as they do, under the now subsisting connexion between them. It is not in the nature of things, that one parliament should afford security to the liberties of two nations thus circumstanced.

Notwithstanding that it appears to me totally impracticable, that any Union can be formed between those nations, by which they shall be so perfeetly identified, as that there shall not remain any distinct interest between them. Yet, as it may be possible, that persons of superior abilities may, contrary to my expectation, be able hereafter to suggest such a plan of Union between those two nations, as shall perfectly identify them, in which case one legislature may be well suited to their government. It will become a matter of much importance, that their parliament should be so formed, as to produce satisfaction to both nations, be best suited to the exercise of the legislative functions, and should most effectually fecure the liberties of the people.

In an arrangement for the perpetual Union of two nations, much regard ought to be had to the feelings of the people, and it should at least carry the appearance of being adjusted upon the scale of equality. Wherefore then should the diminution of the numbers entirely fall upon the parliament of one of the nations to be united, whilst the parliament of the other shall remain perfect and entire? The Irish house of lords consisting of 230 is intended by the proposed plan, to be decreased fix-sevenths of its members, who are thereby to be deprived of their hereditary right of fitting in parliament; and the Irish house of commons to be reduced two-thirds of its members. The proportion of the house of lords is to confist of nearly nine-tenths British, and onetenth Irish members; and that of the commons five-fixths British, and one-fixth Irish. The circumstance of the numbers in the two houses being fo disproportionate proves that they have not been adjusted upon any scientific principle of calculation, but are intended to be dictated to Ireland, not proportioned to her claim. If reference is had to the history of the Union with Scotland, it will appear, that confideration was had, both to the population and territorial property of the respective nations, from which the proportion of members for each nation was adjusted. That mode of proceeding was acting upon an acknowledged political principle, that of establishing their numbers according to their just claims. I shall not take upon myself to point out the just proportion to which each nation ought to be entitled, but shall state some extracts from the statistical tables, published in 1789, which not having been tramed for any particular party purpose, may with propriety be reforted to for information. From these it appears, that the supposed population of South Britain is 8, 100,000, that of Scotor or endmon with the land, land, one million and an half, and that of Ireland, three millions forty thousand. That the contents of South Britain are 54,112 square miles, that of Scotland 25,600 square miles, and that of Ireland 28,012 square miles, all English measure. I should suppose it not far from the truth, that the land contained in Ireland may be confidered equal in point of value to the average of the lands contained in South and North Britain. It is observable, that at the time of the Union with Scotland, the English house of lords did not confift of more than one moiety of its prefent number, which occasioned the proportion of Scotch peers in the British house to be no more than fixteen. The British house of commons, confisting of 558 members, is already fo unwieldy a body for a deliberative affembly, that it would be extremely inconvenient to add to its numbers fo many as the proportion to which Ireland would be entitled. I shall therefore submit the following plan for confideration, as better fuited to the mode of forming the house of commons, if fuch kingdoms should be united, than that of which it would be constituted, according to the arrangement herein before-mentioned. In the first place, the due proportion should be ascertained to which Ireland ought to be entitled, the relative circumstances of each nation being justly compared with each other. I shall then recommend, that instead of adding such proportional number of Irish members to the British house house of commons, so many of the representatives of the minor boroughs of Great Britain shall be struck off, as will make sufficient room for the number to be added to the house of commons as representatives for Ireland; these to consist of two members for each county, great town and city, and of one representative for each of towns next in consequence to them. This plan will prevent the inconvenience of enlarging that body, rather too numerous in its present state, and it will produce a most effential parliamentary reform, by purging the house of commons of one moiety of the British representatives for such boroughs as have been confidered as exceptionable, and its effect upon the Irish part of the representation will still more comprehensive, as thereby the whole number of the members representing their infignificant boroughs will be struck off. This reform will be effected without infringing any one constitutional principle. If the legislative functions for both nations shall be performed by one parliament, it is effential to the interests of the empire, that it be so arranged as to furnish the best possible fecurity for the prefervation of the constitutional liberties of the united nations. I shall again, however, repeat it, that where so many interests substantially distinct and incompatible as I have already pointed out, must necessarily subsist between the two kingdoms, it is not possible that the legislative functions for both nations can be H performed!

performed by one parliament with that equality and impartiality which might be expected from it, if those kingdoms were perfectly identified.— In respect of the house of lords, it may be proper to add to the British house, such number of Irish peers as may be their due proportion, according to the present number constituting the British house of peers; and provision should be made, that if the number of the peers should hereafter be encreased, such number should be added to the Irish peers to sit in such house, as should be necessary to preserve the same proportion.

There has lately been published a pamphlet, entitled, "Observations upon that part of the Speaker's Speech which relates to Trade." The author introduces feveral returns of the imports and exports from Great Britain and Ireland, for three years, ending the 5th January, 1799, according to the current prices of the imports from Ireland into Great Britain, made by Mr. Thomas Irvine, inspector general of the imports and exports of Great Britain. As I understand those returns, they state the current prices of the imports from Ireland, when brought into the British market. Those accounts were made out by the direction of Lord Auckland, and laid before the British bouse of lords. His object was, to shew how great the balance of trade carried on between the two kingdoms, was in favour of Ireland, which his lordship stated thus, " upon our entire trade frade with Ireland, the annual balance in her favour is above two millions*. The author of that pamphlet, adopting Lord Auckland's inference from faid returns, states the balance of trade carried on between Great Britain and Ireland, to be £2,056,844 in favour of Ireland, which sum he alledges that Ireland annually gains by such trade.

In confidering this subject, I shall suppose Mr. Irvine's returns correct, both in respect of the quantities of the commodities they relate to, and their respective values. Some mistakes may be noticed in them, which I attribute to errors in the press. It shall be my business to examine, whether the conclusion drawn from those returns be fallacious. In considering that question, I shall not enquire whether the articles included in such returns have been properly named by Mr. Foster, whether they are articles of the first necessity, or fall under this, or that description, but I shall take them merely as articles of commerce, without any distinction whatsoever.

These returns state the current price in the British market of the different articles imported from Ireland, and also the current prices in that market of the articles exported to Ireland, calculate their annual amount according to such prices, substract the produce of the exports to H 2 Ireland, Ireland, from the produce of the imports from Ireland, and concludes that the difference between them is the amount of the gain of Ireland.

In order to form a proper judgment whether fuch conclusion be just, I shall analyse the sum produced in the British market upon the sale of the commodities imported from Ireland; it confists of four parts—the price paid in Ireland for those commodities, the expence of transportation to the London market, the profits of the merchant, and the customs paid upon their import. I am well informed that the average rate of infurance during those three years referred to, amounted to 4 per cent., taking therefore the whole expence of transportation at 5 per cent., must certainly under-rate it, which I choose to do to prevent cavil. I shall take the expence of transportation at 5 per cent., and estimate the merchant's profit according to that stated by Mr. Pitt, in computing the income tax at 15 per cent., and take the amount of the customs at £47,500 as stated by Lord Auckland. Those parts of the value of the commodities according to their prices in the British market return into the merchant's pocket, they cannot produce any gain to Ireland, and therefore ought to be deducted from fuch estimated value. The remainder will be the fum actually received by Ireland, as the price of her exported commodities; after deducting the amount of the customs paid, there will remain

I am perfectly fensible, that the commerce between Great Britain and Ireland is a great advantage to Ireland, but I trust, that I have shewn that the balance in her favour has been greatly exaggerated, both by Lord Auckland and the author of that pamphlet. It is by this balance that Ireland is enabled to remit those large sums which are annually drawn into Great Britain by her absentees, the produce of whose estates Mr. Pitt states at one million.

I have thought it necessary that Great Britain should know what the real loss amounts to, which she sustains by her trade with Ireland, and that Ireland should be informed of the amount of the gain which arises to her, from her trade with Great Britain.

I have read with much astonishment that part of Lord Auckland's speech, wherein after stating from Mr. Irvine's returns, that the value of the imports into Great Britain from all the world amounted to £46,963,000, and that of her exports to £48,000,000, he concludes, that the balance of trade carried on by Great Britain with all the world amounts to one million in her favour* Thus stating that the balance of trade between Great Britain and Ireland amounts in favour of Ireland to double that balance of trade which Great Britain has in her favour, from her immense commerce with all the world. That state ment supported by the authority of a person of fuch distinguished abilities and clearness of understanding, and upon a subject to which he had directed his greatest attention, could not fail to make a strong impression upon the mind of every man who read it; certainly it at first produced that effect upon me, and yet I found it very difficult to reconcile it with the idea I had formed of the immense wealth which Great Britain derived from her extensive trade with all the world, nor could I conceive it possible that Great Britain should not gain more from her trade with the whole world than one half of what Ireland gained from her trade with Great Britain. I had ever confidered the balance of trade in favour of Great Britain as one of her principal resources, these confiderations have led me to examine the nature of those returns, not without hope, that I should find that Lord Auckland's conclusion had arisen from some error or misconception. I do suppose that in Mr. Irvine's returns, the comparison of the trade of Great Britain with all the world is stated in the same manner, as that of the trade between between Great Britain and Ireland, and confequently that the value of the imports is therein rated, according to their current prices, after their being brought into the British market. It gives me much satisfaction to find, that understanding thus, the nature of those returns I am enabled to remove the alarming impression which Lord Auckland's representation must have occafioned in the mind of every man who feels, with me, a warm interest in the prosperity and welfare of Great Britain. Upon examining those returns I find, that the fame cause which produced the erroneous representation of the balance of trade between Great Britain and Ireland has occasioned the mistatement of that between Great Britain and the whole world, I have already shewn, that the only mode by which the balance of trade between two nations can be afcertained, is, by comparing the fums actually received by each nation respectively for the commodities exported by them. Mr. Irvine's returns of the amount of the imports, do not only include the fum paid for them in the countries from whence they came, but also the expence of their transportation, the customs upon their import and the merchant's profit; all these make part of the price which the purchaser pays for them in the British market, these additions do not confer any benefit upon the country from whence they are exported, or occasion any loss to that country into which they are imported. I shall estimate the average charge of importation from the different parts of the world at ten per cent., which must in my judgment be much under-rated, when it is confidered that the infurance alone from Ireland to Great Britain is four per cent. The amount of the customs paid upon the importation has been stated by Lord Auckland to amount to £6,897,500*, that fum must therefore be deducted from the sum of £46,963,000 the estimated value of the imports, the remainder will be £40,065,500 which fum is made up of the prime cost, the charge of transportation, and the merchant's profit. The merchant's profit, taken according to Mr. Pitt's estimate at 15 per cent. and being added to 10 per cent. (the expence of importation) making 25 per cent. that fum of £40,065,500 will be divided thus:

First cost,

Expence of importation and merchant's profit, making 25 per cent upon that sum,

$\frac{\pmax}{32,052,400}$

8,013,100

Amount of customs,

40,065,500

Value of imports by Irvine's return, £46,963,000

The prime costs therefore of the imports compared with the prime cost of the exports, will give the amount of the real balance of trade in favour of Great Britain:

Prime

Prime cost of exports from Great Britain,
Prime cost of imports,
- 1.48,000,000
32,052,400

Balance of trade in favour of } Great Britain, - 1.15,947,600

The amount of the imports from the West Indies have been very properly introduced in Mr. Irvine's returns, as constituting a part of the balance of trade. However, the greater part thereof, instead of occasioning any loss to Great Britain, constitutes a considerable part of her resources; they are in fact remittances to the absentee proprietors in commodities instead of Mr. Pitt states their amount at five millions nett, taxable as income; these added to the above balance of trade and the million annually remitted from Ireland to her absentees, occasion an annual influx of money into Great Britain of nearly twenty-two millions. These are the refources which have enabled Great Britain to fupply the state with those immense sums which have been raifed during the prefent war.

The measure which has been under consideration is so momentous in its consequences, and so complicated in its nature, that it requires the most attentive investigation. I have endeavoured to examine it in its various ramifications, and to view it in its different bearings. I have particularly attended to your Lordship's position, that the only mode of connexion which can remove the evil of separation, or confer the benefit of Union, is a perfect identity of government. This you lay down as the criterion to determine whether fuch Legislative Union ought to be formed between these two nations. For this purpose I have examined the nature of the connexion intended to be formed, agreeable to the outlines laid before his Majesty by the Parliament of Great Britain, from which it clearly appears, that if fuch connexion shall take place, every distinctness in revenue, taxation and expenditure now fubfifting between the two kingdoms will continue, and confequently, that they will not be thereby identified. I therefore consider myself justified by your Lordship's authority in afferting, that fuch Union ought not to be adopted; it has been shewn, that the great object of the minister in the pursuit of this measure, is to acquire the command over the purse of Ireland. This will be procured by the Union, through the immense majority of British members in the united Parliament. Should an Union take place, Ireland will be chargeable with a proportion of the expences of the empire, her own finking fund, and at least the interest of her own debt. Taxes must necessarily be laid on for providing for fuch expences which shall extend to that kingdom only, they will be imposed nominally by the united Parliament, but actually by the majority of British members in such Parliament. Of the taxes thus confined to Ireland in their

their operation, those British members will not feel the pressure, nor will either they or those whom they represent be in any fort affected by them. By the Constitution the power of taxation is lodged in those who are to pay them, the people; this arrangement furnishes a security, that such power shall not be improperly encreased, but that constitutional check will here be undermined, and the people of Ireland will be taxed by the representatives of another people, who do not participate in the burthens they impose. Although unaccustomed to write, I have ventured to lay my thoughts before the public, in the plain language of common sense upon that momentous question, which must determine whether Ireland shall continue to enjoy a free Constitution, or become a province of Great Britain. I shall now with all due respect take my leave of your Lordship, relying upon the good fense of my Countrymen, that they will resist this ruinous measure.
