THE

THE

PRESENT STATE

OFTHE

BRITISH INTEREST

INDIA, &c:

TO nation nor state ever acquired an acceffion of dominion fo truly valuable and beneficial, as are the acquifitions lately made by Britain in India. But the particular fituation of her circumstan-. ces at the time when these acquisitions fell into her hands, enhanced the real and intrinfic value of them to Britain. Oppreffed by a grievous debt, the annual interest of which, exceeding four millions and a half sterling, was levied by taxes, which raised the price of each manufacture, her commerce labouring under fuch difadvantages was daily finking into decay; whilft a confiderable part of this annual interest being paid to foreigners, created fuch a drain of specie, as the balance of her trade could not fupply; fo that, in proportion . as her expence increased, the means of defraying it diminished; and she was every year approaching towards a state of national poverty and bankruptcy.

In such circumstances did Britain acquire the fovereign dominion of Bengal, and of other rich manufacturing and trading countries in India; which, at the time they fell to her, were capable of not only defraying every charge of their own government and defence, but over and above that, of yielding annually to the fovereign a fum equal to 1,300,000 l. sterling, as can be readily demonstrated. Nor do we include in this fum the benefit which Britain had been accustomed to receive, in her commercial capacity, by her trade with those countries : the fum here specified would have arisen purely in consequence of dominion : and, whether tranfmitted from those countries in merchan. dize or in money, would at last have arrived at the public treasury in specie : and would thus have ferved to alleviate the burden of those taxes, that are pressing every branch of her domestic commerce to ruin. And, if Britain had bestowed the smallest attention on the political government of those countries, she might have continued to draw from them the aboveabovementioned tribute sum in perpetuum, without any danger of draining or impoverishing them: nay it is certain, that under a just, equitable and well ordered government, their commerce and agriculture might have been extended to a degree, that would have enabled them to afford a still larger annual tribute to the fovereign. The possession of this Indian dominion is likewife fo particularly fecured from domeftic and foreign danger, by the extraordinary fubmiffive disposition of the natives, the fingularly defenfible fituation of the country, and the naval fuperiority of Britain, that, by a very trifling expence of men, and no pecuniary charge, she might have maintained it against all enemies. So that Britain might have derived from this dependent dominion refources fufficient to relieve her from all her difficulties and distresses.

This is what Britain might have done : and this was not fimply possible, it was easy of execution. But if we enquire what Britain hath done, we shall find that, instead of applying these resources by a proper care and attention to the purpofe, for which it would feem the all-wife dif-B 2 pensation penfation of Providence had at this critical conjuncture bestowed them upon her, she hath indolently and desperately thrown them from her, and left them to the will of blind chance. For furely it may with propriety be faid, that the government of Britain configned all these resources to the guidance of blind chance, or rather to certain destruction, when it scrupulously withheld its own care, and implicitly confided the fovereign charge of governing and defending this foreign dominion to a Company of Merchants, fo evidently unequal to fuch a charge, that, inftead of being furprized that these countries should now at last be impoverished and ruined, we have reafon to be aftonished, that they have supported, for such a length of time, the complicated evils of tyranny and anarchy.

The confequences of committing this fovereign charge to the Company have been long forefeen, and likewife foretold, by fome who were acquainted with the nature of their government : but the power and influence of those who were fharing amongst them the plunder of those wretched countries, blasted the credit of their their representations : until at last, the effects being felt at home, it hath become imposible to totally suppress the truth. Nay even now, that these men are forced to partly acknowledge the ruinous fituation of this foreign dominion, yet have they still the assurance to mislead the public judgment, by reprefenting the Company as the only party concerned in the consequence : though it is certain, that this Indian concern, which hath been leafed or farmed out by Government to the Company, is of the very highest importance to the public intereft; as having been for many years the principal support of national opulence and credit, as well as of commerce and revenue. For, in the article of opulence, the private fortunes acquired in those countries by the servants of the Company, ever fince the time that their power prevailed over the native government, that is ever fince 1757, hath created an annual influx of specie to Britain of about 700,000 l. and the dedomagement paid to Government by the Company, fince the affumption of the dewanny in 1765, is a farther influx of 400,000 1.

400,000 l. the drawback on teas is reckoned about 200,000 l. and the Company hath increased her dividend fince the last mentioned period 200,000 l. though only one half of this last fum may be reckoned to remain in the country, the other half being paid to foreign proprietors. These four sums, making together 1,400,000 l. have been yearly drawn from India in confequence of dominion : and, whether fent from thence in merchandize, in bills, or in specie, have produced so much money to Britain : and notwithstanding the private fortunes have been acquired by means that have exhausted these sources of wealth, that might otherwise have flowed perpetually into Britain; and the dedomagement may be confidered as a base compofition, received for alienating the fovereign rights of the British crown and nation, and for furnishing a force to support the most detestable tyranny of a few individuals over fifteen millions of men, who are to all intents and purposes British subjects; yet did the opportune importation of fo much wealth, ferve to fupport the credit of the nation under the grievous accumulation of debt contracted in the last war;

war; and to prevent her feeling the drain of specie made by her foreign creditors, which otherwife would by this time have completely exhausted her. By her commerce with those countries, Britain hath exported yearly 5 or 600,000 l. worth of her own manufactures and merchandize, and for these she received the commodities of India; which commodities, being re-exported, formed the most effential article of her traffic with Africa, on which her West India colonies do entirely depend; they are likewife the most valuable article of her trade with America. And the duties levied by Government, on fuch part of these Indian commodities as is expended at home, create a very on " derable, and by far the most equitable and convenient branch of revenue.

But the value and importance of this Indian concern will appear in a ftill ftronger light, if we fhall look forward to the confequences that muft naturally and unavoidably enfue to the public intereft from the lofs of it. The first and most immediate of these confequences will be national bankruptcy; or, which is the fame thing, a stop to the payment of intereft terest on the national debt ; for a deprivation of that annual influx of specie from India will quickly produce national poverty; and an incapacity of paying in fpecie the interest of the foreign creditors. But the loss of our Indian commerce will operate this effect still more speedily; for, on the supposition that the nation shall be deprived of this branch of commerce, it must necessarily follow, that Government will lofe that branch of revenue which arifes from the home confumption of Indian commodities; and it is plain, that Government cannot then continue to pay the usual expence, without making good this deficiency of revenue by additional taxes on land, and the nerceffaries of life: but as this additional load, falling on our little remaining commerce, would by one year's experience be found insupportable, Government would be forced to retrench its expence, in that only article that can be difpenfed with, the payment of interest on the national debt; and when this happens, what advantage will the public creditor hold above the India proprietor? The only difference will be, that the latter will have felt his los lofs a little earlier than the former. But national bankruptcy, though it may be the firft, is not the only, nor even the greateft, public damage, accruing from a deprivation of this Indian concern : lofs of future credit, of trade and navigation, and confequently of naval power and defence, will foon follow ; and, in this general calamity, every one individual of the community will come in for his fhare, in proportion to his rank or fituation.

Such are the confequences that must enfue to the public interest from a deprivation of the benefit hitherto derived from this Indian concern: and if the nation is to fuffer fo grievoully by the loss of this object, can she allow herself to be perfuaded, that she hath no interest in its preservation. Now this object stands in danger of being loft to the nation by two different causes; the first being, the neglect or incapacity of the Company to maintain and defend it from the affault of enemies : and the other danger arifes from the oppression and misconduct of this Company's political government ; tending to defpoil those countries of their circulating specie, their arts, manufactures, commerce, and inhabitants, C bitants, which were the only means that enabled them to afford this benefit to Britain. The first of these dangers is scarcely dreamt of, and yet it is perhaps immediately imminent; at present however we are treating of the danger to be apprehended from the political cause.

How far the interest of this foreign dominion hath been injured by the Company's political mifgovernment; or how near it may be reduced to a state of utter inability to afford any farther benefit to Britain, is but little known by the public. For though people have heard in the grofs, that affairs in those countries are rather in a bad fituation, yet do not they either understand or believe it to be so very bad as it really is; or rather they do not comprehend how it should be fo bad; as not being acquainted with the full power of the cause that hath produced the evil; and every one will form his notion of effects that he neither feels nor fees, from his knowledge or opinion of the nature and power of the caufes that produced them. In the cafe before us, people have been taught to confider the oppreffion and extortion of its government, (of which certain tain inftances are quoted) as the fole caufe of evil to Bengal: of confequence it is fuppofed that Bengal hath fuffered no farther damage from its government, than what may have been caufed by fome private acts of extortion, exercifed by the few perfons vested with the powers of governing : and, befides that the authenticity of these acts is denied or disputed, and men who are to judge only from report are apt to make allowance for the prejudice or paffion of the accufer who brings a charge against individuals; still if all thefe acts of oppreffion that have been narrated should be fully credited; nay, if the hearer should suppose still more than is represented, yet cannot he conceive or allow himfelf to believe that fuch acts of extortion, exercifed by a small number of individuals, could fuffice to reduce the lately rich commercial kingdom of Bengal to fuch a deplorable state of misery, poverty, and distress: the cause affigned will appear too trivial for the effect; and of course the effect, at least the degree of it, will be discredited.

But he who means to acquire a just notion of the present state of those countries, and the extent of damage they have fultained from their present Government, must fully inform himself of the true nature and condition of that Government, and the manner of its operation on the general interest of the people governed; he must learn, not only that which it hath done, but likewife that which it hath not done; for the interest of a community may fuffer far more detriment from the nonaction, than from the oppression, of its government. To the end, therefore, that every one may be enabled to form a proper judgment on these matters, we mean to prefent a general view of the nature, and effects, of the Company's Government in Bengal,

and

THE

NATURE AND EFFECTS

BENGAL.

HE English East India company is, under the title of Dewan, the real and actual fovereign of Bengal, Behar, and Orixa : a dominion equal to almost any one state in Europe, in respect of either extent and fertility of country, or numbers of ingenious and industrious subjects; and exceeding most of them in the internal materials of commerce, or refources of wealth. The Company executes the government of this dominion by a deputation, confifting of a Governor and Council; who refide at Calcutta, the Company's original prefidency, or chief factory in Bengal. And the Directors, who, as poffeffing the executive authority of the Company, may be termed the fupreme fovereigns of this Indian dominion, have preferved to themfelves the fole power of immediately ordering, directing and controuling trouling the government; for this deputed government communicates its purpofes, receives its orders, and accounts for its conduct to none but the Directors.

But it is evident, that the distance of fituation must render the immediate controul of the Directors perfectly impotent, ineffectual, and nugatory; for it would be abfurd to fuppose, that the government of Bengal should defer the execution of any one purpose until it shall have communicated with, and received the opinion of the Directors, which cannot be effected in the space of a whole year ; consequently the directors cannot interfere in the direction, or ordering of this government, farther than in fome few cafes of the most general or invariable nature: but the execution of even these general orders depends upon the will and difcretion of the deputed government; feeing the Directors cannot, at that diftance, enforce it themfelves : and the fame cause puts it out of their power to prevent or reftrain abuse; fo that they hold neither positive nor negative authority in the immediate execution of this government. And the condition or fituation of these directorial sovereigns vereigns at home, renders their retrofpective controul equally impotent and ineffectual; for they have no power in themselves to inflict other punishment on their deputies, for the most audacious disobedience, or for maladministration, than difmission from their service; and this becomes no punishment, because the delinquents are previously prepared for it, being ready to fet out of their own accord with a princely fortune for the mother country; where they fet the authority of the Directors at defiance; for there these fovereigns of India are themselves subjects, and cannot call their quondam ministers to account, except in an ordinary court of juftice; and the difficulty of obtaining evidence requisite to convict in these courts; the dread of bringing to light, in the course of a legal process, some abstruse mysteries of government; and the 'apprehension of danger arising to the interest of the present direction from a powerful combination at the next election, will ever deter the Directors from ferioufly profecuting a lawfuit against their deputies, even in cases of peculation from the fovereign ; but if it respects only the interest of ndanch of the fubject, they will be more apt to palliate and defend the offence. We muft therefore perceive, that this deputed government acts perfectly independent of either the immediate controul, or future awe of the fovereign: whilft the fovereign is compelled to blindly fupport, with its whole power, the authority of this government; and, without choice, to enforce all its measures; feeing that to oppose the will of the deputy, is opposing the authority of the fovereign.

And, as to the native subjects, the power of this deputed government over them is perfectly absolute and complete. For the inhabitants of those countries, being difposed by nature or climate to passive obedience, and by long cuftom habituated to despotic authority, and being farther impreffed with a particular awe of Europeans, from a notion of their natural superiority, implicitly fubmit to the will of their prefent government, without once daring to either examine its right, dispute its authority, or question its conduct. The subject therefore holds not the smallest voice in the administration of government; the jurisdiction, the police, the finances, finances, the military government and defence, are all incontroulably directed by the Company's deputation : and the entire interests of those countries, the lives and property of the inhabitants, are subjected to its discretion, and depend on its will.

So that this deputation of the Company executes the government of Bengal with a power perfectly unlimited by any exterior controul; and if we confider that it is at the fame time foreign to the country governed, mutable, and of very fhort duration, we fhall find that it is equally unreftrained by any internal check. It is therefore the most unlimited government on earth; or rather it is the only government that can, with propriety, be termed arbitrary and despotic.

For all other deputed governments are fufficiently reftrained by the authority of the fovereign; and we have no idea of defpotifm, except in governments that are fupreme or fovereign. But the idea of actual defpotifm in a fupreme government is merely imaginary; feeing that, in one and all of these governments, the power of governing is conditional, limited by p rule, and fubjected to controul both external and internal. For it is evident, that, in all fupreme governments, the power of governing, and the means that fupport this power, must needs be derived from the people governed; and therefore cannot exist in despight of their confent; and though, in fome of these governments, the condition, upon which this power and these means are granted, is not specially expressed, yet is it perfectly understood, and invariably enforced in all of them; inafmuch as there are examples in each, of fovereigns who have fuffered the utmost punishment, for attempting to transgress the limits of this condition; nay, there is fcarce one inftance where the prince, thus transgreffing, escaped the refentment of the people; and examples of this nature are most frequent in these governments that are falfely termed defpotic. These examples must therefore convince all fovereigns, that there is a power in the people, fuperior to, and capable of controuling them; and the fense of this must ever prove an effectual external controul on the conduct of a fupreme government. But self-interest, that that primum and perpetuum mobile of human action, which we may term an internal check, operates still more forcibly, constantly, and immediately on the will of a supreme government; not fimply restraining it from doing or permitting injury, but impelling it to promote the good of the people governed. For a government that is fovereign, and perpetual (or durante vita and hereditary) cannot poffibly feparate its own private interest from that of the community which it governs; being indeed itself a part of that community : and this is fo evident, that no prince ever attempted to advance a diffinct interest of his own, at the expence of the general weal, who was not a fool, before he became a tyrant. But a wife sovereign considers his people as the channel through which alone he can receive fubftantial good or evil; and, acting upon this principle, he will, however absolute and disposed by nature to tyranny, abstain from injuring the general interest, because he is fenfible that fuch injury will recoil upon himfelf; and he will exert himfelf to promote the prosperity of his people, as the only means of advancing his own power. D 2 grangrandeur, or wealth. So that a fovereign prince, who understands his own real interest, though otherwise void of virtue, will ever study to govern well; nay, the private vices of such a prince do often operate public good; a striking instance of which we meet with in our Henry the Seventh; whose extreme and fordid avarice was the source of English commerce and wealth; and his mean felf-love, and jealousy of power, established universal liberty.

But the nature of this Bengal government differs, in every circumstance, from that of a supreme government; being deputed, foreign, mutable, and temporary, it is no way interefted in the lafting profperity of the community which it governs; on the contrary, this government holds an interest which is not only diffinct from, but diametrically opposite to that of the subject. For these Governors return to Europe immediately on the expiration of their office, which feldom dures above three years, often less; therefore their fole aim is to amafs all the wealth they can, during the fhort term of their power, in order to transport it along with their persons perfons to their own country. But the wealth which a government amaffes, muft needs be extorted from the people governed; confequently felf-intereft leads this government to pillage and plunder the fubject: and we have feen that it is not reftrained, by any external controul, from advancing its own diftinct intereft at the expence of the community which it governs, feeing it is perfectly exempted from all awe of either the fovereign or the fubject; and it cannot be reftrained by any internal check, becaufe it holds no concern in the lafting welfare of the people.

Such then is the ruling principle of this government : nor are the means which it employs to promote its own intereft lefs extraordinary than is its power to enforce them. For this government, which arbitrarily directs the jurifdiction and police, together with the imposition and collection of taxes, doth at fame time act in the capacity of a merchant. And this commercial defpotism, or defpotic power lodged in the hands of a few foreign merchants, hath, in its nature and confequences, proved infinitely more deftructive to the intereft of that commercial country, country, than all the operations of political tyranny have been: for from it fprung these cruel monopolies, which struck at the very root of manufacture, commerce, and even population.

To attempt describing the particular methods which this government hath practifed to promote its own interest at the expence of the people, in its double capacity, of an absolute sovereign and a defpotic merchant, would be a tedious, invidious, and even an unprofitable undertaking; for it is almost impossible to properly delineate the conduct of a tyranny fo various and irregular in its operations; and, to those who are unacquainted with the modes, customs, and interests of the country in question, the recital of a few particular instances would only ferve to mislead their judgment, and darken or diminish the truth. By attending to the general description given of the nature views and interests of this government, we shall form a more complete and just notion of its conduct and deportment, than can be acquired from any disjointed account of particulars. Let us suppose a few foreigners sent into a rich commercial country, country, with absolute and unlimited power over the lives and property of the inhabitants; actuated by no other principle than that of acquiring riches, and flimulated thereto not only by avarice but anibition, or the defire of excelling; unre-Arained by any species of present awe or future apprehension ; but on the contrary, encouraged by precedent to expect in their own country, titles, dignity, respect, and confequence, each in proportion to the fum he imports; and whatever methods we can suppose would be practifed by such foreigners, to accomplish their purpose, within a fhort limited term, we may fuppofe to have been actually employed by this Bengal government. The enormous amount of numerous fortunes, imported by the perfons employed in this government, together with the rapidity of acquisition, are circumstances seen and known in this country; and thefe will thoroughly warrant our supposing, that the acquirers have availed themselves to the utmost of their powers, as well as their opportuni-However, we shall err greatly in ties. our estimate of the damage caused to those countries, by their government's profecuting cuting its own distinct interest, if we shall confine the reckoning to only the lofs of fo much specie, as hath been extorted and exported by these foreigners: for this, though in itself a ruinous grievance, is merely trivial, when compared with the havoc and wafte committed on the manufacture, the commerce, agriculture, and population, by the methods employed to acquire these sums. A herd of hogs, broke into a well dreffed vineyard, will gorge their voracious maws; but that which they eat and devour doth not deftroy the vineyard; it is their manner of eating, their rutting up, their tearing down, and trampling under foot.

Hitherto we have regarded this government in only one point of view : we have feen it acting for itfelf; but we have not feen the part it acts for the people, in its capacity of a fovereign ruler, administring the government of a mighty state in all its different offices or departments; and entrusted with the care of the whole and entire interests of a numerous commercial nation. But, in the discharge of this fovereign trust, we shall find the government of Bengal a mere Vis inertia, void of

of the two efficient principles of actions ability or power of acting, and will or inclination. For how can we expect to find the ability, of governing well, in the men employed by the Company to execute the government of those countries? to attain the knowledge of any one fcience or mystery, demands an effort of the mind; but it is impossible for the brightest natural genius to arrive at even a moderate degree of skill in the art of governing, which, as it is the most elevated, fo is it the most difficult, abstruse, various and complicated of all human fciences. without long and intense application, study, and reflection ; and, we may add, a feries of practice; and all these gradations to skill, in governing, are wanting to our Bengal governors. Their scholastic education extends no farther than to qualify them for merchants clerks; and, immediately on being taken from school, they are difpatched to India; where the manner of life is confonant to the climate, voluptuous to a degree of diffoluteness, vain, idle, diffipated, and an enemy to study or reflection : the juvenile part of their life being spent in this manner, they ar-E rive rive at the charge of government with minds perfectly uninformed, and fo very averfe to application, that they commit and implicitly confide the charge of their own private concerns to fervants. If fuch men should posses the still or address of governing well, it must certainly be acquired instantaneously and supernaturally; infused into them by miracle, like the gift of speech into the ass of Balaam.

But the want of will or inclination is an obstacle to their governing well, still more prevalent than is the want of ability. Labour, fatigue, and difficulty are evils, to which the human mind is fo naturally averse, that, unless it is urged by some strong impulse of passion, such as the fear of fome fuperior evil, or the hope and defire of fome mighty good, it will decline and evade them : what fiimulum then can be fufficiently powerful to urge the habitually indolent minds of our Bengal governors to encounter the difficulties, the labour, and fatigue attending a due discharge of the duties of government; which, of all human undertakings, is the most replete with these mental evils? Yet this government, which demands a ftronger ger ftimulum than any other government that ever yet existed, is in effect urged by no one motive or confideration to discharge the duties of its office; for, as it holds no interest in the lasting welfare of the people governed, neither its hopes nor its fears are at all interested in the good or evil confequences that may be caufed by its own vigilance or neglect : being altogether superior to the refentment of the fubject, and independent of the fovereign's authority, it is not impelled, by the fear of immediate danger, nor the apprehenfion of future punishment : and as to the prospect of glory, applause, or respect, which push the generous and ambitious mind to action, our governors aim to attain them, not by governing well, but by acquiring and bringing home a mighty fortune to their own country.

Men thus actuated, or rather unactuated, muft, in the difcharge of their fovereign office, be perfectly torpid aud liftlefs; the machine of political government ftops in their hands, and ftands ftock ftill: their minds being incapable of application, they withdraw themfelves as much as poffible from attention, and leave the trouble than themselves; these inferior agents being chosen, not for their abilities or virtue, but for their fitness to serve the private purpose of the governors, otherwife by chance ; but they give themselves no trouble to inspect the conduct of these agents, who in general are unprincipled miscreants; on the contrary, they promiseuously approve and fupport every action; fo that, wherever the power of this government acts, it is only to opprefs; and all befide is left to chance. However, the power of governing, or rather of oppreffing, is not confined to the perfons vested with the charge of government : the numerous fervants whom this Company disperses over the face of the country, for the purpole of carrying on her trade, do each of them, in his own district, assume the authority of a despot; and communicates a like authority to all his fervants and dependants, who, it must be allowed, are far more unrelenting than their mafters; and thus tyranny is extended into every corner; oppression becomes general; and the opprefied are excluded from the very profpect of redrefs; for, on appeal to the fuperior, fuperior, the plaintiff is ever remanded to the very oppreffor, who punishes him for having dared to complain. And thus justice and protection are no where to be found; vice goes unpunished, and innocence unsupported; therefore every man becomes a villain in his own defence; and faith, confidence, truth, and honesty are banished the land. In short, it may with strict propriety be faid by these wretched people, Terras astræa reliquit; and tyranny and anarchy have here set up their throne.

And to this inaction or non-exertion of the powers of government we are to impute the ruin of those countries, rather than to the avarice or rapine of the perfons deputed by the Company to execute that government. For the power of governing being vested in only a few, the extortion of these few might have been long supported by a rich commercial country, provided they had exerted themfelves to restrain and prevent all others from plundering and oppreffing. The avarice, profusion and bloody tyranny of even Nero, and Domitian, was felt by only a few of their subjects at Rome; every where else the empire flourished; becaufe caufe thefe imperial monopolizers of vice would fuffer none in power to be wicked but themfelves; they narrowly infpected the conduct of their governors and officers, and feverely punished their injustice or oppression. But where the government doth not only plunder itself, but fuffers every one under it to plunder, that country must in time be completely ruined. Now Bengal hath been fubjected to a government of this nature for these fifteen years past; for though we commonly date the commencement of the Company's fovereignty from the aslumption of the Dewanny, (as it is termed,) yet hath this Company (at least her deputies) possessed a really abfolute authority in those countries ever fince the battle of Plaffey in 1757. That action rendered them mafters of Bengal; and it was equally within their power to affume the fovereign government at that time, as afterwards in 1765; their own will was the only obstacle : but notwithstanding they bestowed it on a native Nabob, yet did they retain an absolute superiority over him, and he governed in a state of perfect fubordination tion to their authority; for he well knew and experienced, that the duration of his office, and even of his existence, depended upon their will; confequently this dependent native government could but little restrain the conduct of the Company's deputies, or protect the subject from their rapacity; and when they, in 1765, fet aside this native government, they only removed a screen which they themfelves had set up, and till then preferved for their own purpose.

How far these countries may have advanced towards the period of final ruin, under the fifteen or fixteen years domination of fuch a government, we shall not pretend to determine, because the term ruin is varioufly understood. This much is certain, that the unbounded remittance of specie made, for some years, by the English Company, for fundry purposes as fovereign; and for a much greater number of years, and in much larger fums by the other European Companies, who received it from the fervants of the English Company for bills on Europe, at a very low exchange, and employed it for every purpose in the other parts of India and

and China, hath compleatly drained Bengal of its wealth, and reduced it to a state of the most abject poverty. And the grievous oppression and rapine exercifed by the Company's forvants, and their numerous dependants; together with the most cruel monopolies usurped by them over every species of merchandize, and even the necessaries of life, hath in a great measure suppressed commerce, and abolished trade. Whilst the infatiable avarice and unrestrained extortion of those employed in the collection of taxes and revenue having ruined the farmer, the lands lay uncultivated and wafte; infomuch that, not to mention the immense decrease of revenue, that naturally most fertile of all countries, Bengal, hath fuffered a more fevere famine than perhaps was ever heard of; it being reckoned that a fifth part of the inhabitants have died of want, and numbers have fled from starving and oppression.

But it is not difficult to determine how near the intereft of Britain in those countries hath approached to ruin: for Britain is to confider them as ruined to her purpose, so soon as they shall become incapable of supporting a commerce beneficial cial to her; and at fame time of yielding her a confideration, in the nature of tribute, equivalent to the expence of fubjects which the fends out annually to maintain her dominion there. And that they are nearly, if not totally, ruined to her, in both thefe refpects, we begin already to feel, in fpite of all the art or influence ufed to conceal the truth.

For, in the article of tribute, we find that, instead of receiving such a surplus of revenue as fufficed, at the commencement of the Dewanny, to not only pay for the specie part of the Company's investment in Bengal itself, but to purchase her cargoes, and defray all her charges in the other parts of India, and in China, the government of Bengal was, two years ago, reduced to the neceffity of borrowing near a million sterling on bills, which have been transmitted and accepted by the Company : in like manner hath this government been obliged to borrow last year; though the bills have been prevented, by an arbitrary stroke of deceit, from appearing against them in Europe. These borrowed fums have all been expended in Bengal itself : and if we allow that the whole F hath hath been employed to pay for the Company's investment, (though by the by the specie part of the Company's investment cannot, at least it ought not, if she exports the proper quantity of European commodities, exceed half a million,) it must even then be admitted, that the revenue of Bengal hath barely fufficed to defray the ordinary expence of government. And, if fo, from whence is the tribute of Bengal, (whether we term. it dedomagement, drawback, or encreased dividend) to arife? not from the mighty cargoes imported; for they are purchased, not with furplus revenue, but with borrowed money, which must be repaid either in India or in Europe : and as to the profits on these cargoes, they will be more than eat up by the charges of freight, and a long reckoning of India interest at eight per cent. I am fenfible, that this account is strangely perplexed and embarrassed by intricate calculations of flock in hand, annual importations, and future fales, &c. but when divefted of all these studied intricacies it will ftand fimply thus-As is the clear surplus of revenue received in Bengal, fo will be the amount of tribute. received received in Britain; the former will ever exactly balance the latter. But this furplus we find to have been, for the two paft years, equal to nothing; and the amount of tribute received in Britain must amount to exactly as much; confequently the dedomagement, drawback, and increased dividend for the two last years is still in Nubibus; where the national part, confifting of the two first articles, is like to remain; unless it shall be paid out of the Company's capital flock, as the encreased dividend hath been. But this revenue, which for the two years past hath barely sufficed to defray the expence of government, hath not been kept up even to that extent without the aid of violence : but violence itfelf must yield to necessity, and cannot extort that which doth not exist; moreover the Company had, in these two years, decreafed her military expence, by difbanding fome thousand fipahis, and otherwife diminishing the charge of her remaining force; and the attack made by Shaw Allum in conjunction with the Mharrattors will, this year, compel her to re-augment her military expence in every respect; whilft the predatory incursions of these F 2 MharMharrhattors will prevent the collection of revenue; how then will the fupport the augmented charge of this year, with a revenue decreated by a variety of caufes fo much below the degree of laft year? Another loan upon the ftrength of the capital is the only refource; but poffibly borrowing may, for feveral reafons, have become impracticable by this time; and it is certain that troops will not, nay cannot, ferve without pay—Here is a bleffed profpect indeed.

But, leaving this to the proof of time, we perceive that, at any rate, we have loft the prospect of future tribute from Bengal, through the channel of the Company; we have not fo much as the promife of dedomagement, drawback, or encreased dividend for this current year; and if we can trust to our own reason, preferably to ba krupt promites, we may give it up for good and all. Nay, there is mighty reafon to apprehend, that even the private fortunes will foon cease to exist; and then Britain will ceafe to receive the fum of 1,400,000 l. sterling, which for a number of years past hath been annually flowing in to her from India, in consequence of domi-dominion. And if the could barely fupport her burden, when aided by this influx, how will the, when deprived of it, anfwer the annual drain of the pecie made by her foreign creditors?

With respect to the present state of our commerce with those countries, it is not enquired, and therefore not known, whether the Company exports the flipulated fum of British commodities or not; and it is still less known, whether the small quantity she hath exported of late is difposed of; or whether it remains in her warehouses abroad, to swell up the account of her flock; thus much however reason tells us, that the inhabitants of Bengal, who cannot procure the neceffaries of life, millions having died of want, can but little afford to purchase foreign fopperies or superfluities. Neverthelefs we have feen large cargoes of Indian manufactures imported this very year; but we are not to suppose, that these cargoes are the produce of willing industry; they are procured by force and compulfion; the artifan being held to work under the discipline of task masters, who deprive him of his labour before it is completed, pleted, at a price that will not afford him the means of living. Of the many markets that for ages had taken off the manufactures of Bengal, Europe is now the only one remaining; and this one market cannot be fupplied without the application of force. How long force might fupply the place of willing industry, we shall not pretend to determine; but one year more will discover the united effects of want of artifans, want of money, and Mharrattor incurfions.

And thus have we demonstrated the nature and condition of this Bengal government, together with the evils it hath caufed to the country governed, not from a recital of disputed facts, but from principles univerfally underftood and admitted. For every one, the least acquainted with the Company's affairs, must know and will allow that the views, the interests, the powers and opportunities of her deputed government in Bengal are exactly fuch as we have described them; and upon this one undifputed datum we have built our whole demonstration; the truth and justnefs of which every man is capable of trying and proving, by the touchstone of his , betek his own reafon. For reafon, without the aid of circumftantial proof, can judge whether the line of conduct which we have affigned to the government of Bengal, is fairly inferred and deduced from its evident and allowed principle of action ; and common fenfe, unaffifted by demonftration, will point out the effects that fuch conduct must operate on the interest of the country governed; and, if we farther advert to the length of time that this country hath been subjected to such operation, we shall nearly guess at its present ftate and condition.

And we doubt not, that what hath been faid will enable every one, who makes ufe of his own reafon and reflection, to form a proper judgment for himfelf on certain points of this East India business, which have been most grossly misrepresented. For he will thereby discover, that the object, for which the nation hath to apprehend at present, is not the "credit of the Company;" which, had she been restrained within her natural sphere, and her conduct properly inspected by government, could never have been injured; or, if it had, the breach could (in such case) have little little more affected the general weal, than the failure of any large trading house; which, fo long as the trade remained entire, would have been immediately replaced by another; but he will perceive, that the present bad state of the Company's credit is only an effect, or consequence, of the ruinous finuation of affairs in India; and, of course, that the object of national apprehension is the ruin or loss of that mighty and important branch of national interest, which hath been committed to the charge of the Company, in a manner fo complete and implicit, that the name, as well as the interest of the nation, nay the very name of the object itfelf, hath been funk and loft in that of the Company: this Company, which is but the temporary farmer, having been, to all intents and purposes, substituted in the flead of not only the fovereign proprietor, but even of the farm itself. And it will farther appear, that the danger which threatens this object is not to be averted by blindly fupporting the credit of the Company : but, on the contrary, that the nation will, by affording this blind fupport, only furnish the means of comcompleting that ruin, which is already fo far advanced. To prevent this danger demands measures of a very different nature : and we shall proceed to point out these measures; which, had they been applied in time, would, we humbly conceive, have sufficed to prevent the ruin or loss of this important concern : and which, if matters are not past remedy, may yet serve to restore them.

IN THE ## GOVERNMENT OF BENGAL,

MEANS TO REMEDY THEM.

T is a common faying that, the caufe of an evil being known, the remedy is readily difcovered; and, upon the ftrength of this maxim, feveral, who think they have hit upon fome one caufe of evil in the political government of Bengal, have taken upon them to prefcribe a remedy; which is pronounced an univerfal panacea, a falve for every fore: but no fooner have they produced their ware, than the eye hath difcovered it to be mere powder of poft; or fomething equally unavailing.

Few of these prescriptions have at all attracted notice; the proposal for protecting the liberty of the subject from the despotism of government, by the institution of native juries, was indeed extremely well calculated to please British speculation; and therefore, like the device of hanging the bell about the cat's neck, it was highly highly applauded by those who never adverted to the difference betwixt Britain and Bengal, in point of general conftitution of government and disposition of the natives. But, for practice, it must appear a mere chimera to fuch as confider, on the one hand, that men, who are flaves to their government and its officers in every other capacity, cannot poffibly be free in that of jurymen; and that juries, if they are not free and impartial, avail nothing : and, on the other hand, that if the natives should be actually endowed with the real cap of liberty in the jury room, there is danger, nay, there is a certainty, that they would make bold to wear it elsewhere; and then, adieu to the English dominion in Bengal. In few words, the power of the English government, and the freedom of native juries, are two things that cannot poffibly exist together in Bengal; the life of the one must unavoidably cause the death of the other : and, however harsh this doctrine may . found in a freeborn English ear, the force and truth of it will immediately frike the politician.

Equally

Equally unavailing is that proposal for fecuring the liberty and property of the fubject, from the oppression and extortion of government, by granting to the native a perpetual property in land; without providing him the smalless fecurity for the free possession of its produce; which, so long as government stands on its prefent footing, is liable to be wrested from him so foon as acquired.

But it would feem, that the reason why these political physicians have been so unlucky in their prescriptions is, that they have proceeded upon false principles; as having mistaken the nature of the malady. For they have either affigned no one certain cause of evil; or else they have traced it no farther than to the perfons who have executed the government of those countries, otherwife to the Directors : as if all the evil had proceeded from fome particular viciousness in their disposition, as if they had been finners above all men, or as if no men would have done the wicked deed but they: whereas he who is the least acquainted with human nature will allow, that few, if any men, would have made any better use of their powers and oppor-opportunities; nay he will add, that every other government on earth, would act the very part that this Bengal government hath done, provided it held the fame views and interests, together with the fame powers and opportunities. And, if fo, what can be more abfurd, than the propofal to remedy the evils and abuses of this government, by fending out Supervifors, with the fame or greater powers, and confequently possessing greater opportunities of promoting their own views and interefts; which are exactly the fame as thefe of the perfons complained of ; feeing that, as the fame caufe of evil which existed in the Governors, would have existed in the Supervifors, these fimilar causes must have operated fimilar effects.

Indeed we shall err widely, if we look for the original cause of evil in these Governors : for, on inspecting the preceding description of this Bengal government, we perceive, that their maladministration is itself but an effect, or consequence, naturally flowing from the total want of certain fundamental principles or powers; which, in every other government, ferve to restrain the party governing from doing ing or permitting injury, and impel it to promote the good of the party governed: and as the want of these restraining and impelling powers hath unavoidably produced, the first tyranny, and the latter anarchy, it is plain, that all the evils and abuses in the government of Bengal have fprung from this deficiency. It farther appears, from the same description, that the want of these restraining and impelling powers arises from two different causes; the first being the particular condition and constitution of the sovereign : and the fecond is there termed the diftance of fituation, betwixt the fovereign refidence and the country governed; tho' the fequel will evince this latter to be rather a radical defect in the nature of that fystem, which the Directors have adopted for the government of this distant dominion. That these have been the two original causes of the tyranny and anarchy, and confequently of all the evils and abuses in this Bengal government, including these of the commercial despotism, is fufficiently evident. We shall therefore proceed to point out the means of removing these causes, as the only effectual method thod of remedying the evils. And as each of the two causes hath contributed its proper share of the evil, and each demands a distinct remedy, we shall consider them separately.

With regard to the condition and constitution of the Company, we have already mentioned the feveral circumstances that disqualify her for the office of a supreme fovereign; here therefore we shall only recapitulate, or collect them into one point of view. The first defect is, her impotence, or want of power to promote good government in her dominion: and this proceeds from her being, with refpect to her deputed government, a meer fellow subject, totally void of supreme legislative and judicial powers; and confequently incapable of inforcing obedience; or of punishing disobedience : and this want of authority and power in the fovereign, we have shown to be a principal cause of despotifm in the deputed government. A fecond defect in the constitution of the Company is her want of inclination, or rather of interest, to discharge the duty of a good fovereign; and this arifes from the fluctuating and hourly mutable state of

of the proprietary, the temporary and short duration of her corporate existence, the still shorter tenor of this fovereignty, and the annual rotation of her executive government; for, in confequence of these feveral circumstances in her fituation, her views are narrow, contracted, and rapacious; the fole aim of all her meafures being to make the most of the prefent moment. The third defect is the mercantile capacity of this fovereign Company; and from this defect alone flow evils fufficient to ruin the interest of the country subjected to her government: for, in confequence of her mercantile capacity, her deputed government acts as a merchant; and, in consequence of her fovereign capacity, all her mercantile fervants assume the authority of sovereigns.

Thefe are the principal defects in the being and conflictution of this fovereign Company; and it is evident, that fuch defects in the fovereign, must have contributed largely towards the existence of abuse, in the deputed government. But these defects might have been, in a great measure, remedied, and their confequences prevented, by a simple act of parliament, ment, paft by the national government, at the time it thought proper to commit the charge of this important branch of national intereft, to the care of the Company. This act might have been entitled, " An act for better enabling the Eaft India Company to administer the political government, and to protect, maintain and defend certain states and countries in India, which have become subjected to the dominion of Britain, and which, for sundry weighty considerations, it hath been judged proper to commit to her charge." And it might have been conceived in the following, or such like terms.

"Whereas it appears, that the want of a proper legiflative authority over the minifters and fervants, employed by the Company to execute the fovereign government of thefe fubjected dominions, muft be productive of many abufes, detrimental as well to the intereft of the Company, as to the honour and intereft of the Britifh nation. Be it enacted by &c. that, from the time of paffing this act, the Company fhall poffers the power of legiflation, or making laws, for the government of this foreign dominion : and the laws thus H enacted by the Company, shall be equally binding on all her ministers, servants, and subjects, in that dominion, as are the acts of parliament on the subjects of Britain. And being farther sensible of the many inconveniences, that must arise from the Company's incapacity of punishing the offences committed by her ministers, and fervants abroad, otherwife than by applying to courts of justice that are foreign to her government; where she cannot convict, through the difficulty of obtaining the evidence required by the forms of these courts; and where she is deterred from profecuting, by the fear of divulging the fecrets of her government; infomuch that, rather than apply to these courts, the must fubmit to the most audacious acts of disobedience, and maladministration; and confidering that fuch incapacity in the Company must discourage all good government, and produce tyranny and anarchy in this dominion; be it enacted, that the Company shall have authority to creft courts of justice, and appoint judges; with the like powers, as are vested in his majesty's judges, and courts of judicature, for trying and judging ing all fuits and caufes, or offences committed within the limits of this Indian dominion; and for punishing the fame, either capitally, or by fine, imprisonment, and banishment, though to Europe only. And whereas it is probable, that fome of the ministers or servants of the Company may, by various methods, elude the juftice of her courts abroad, and escape to Europe; in order therefore to prevent fuch dangerous illusion of justice, it is enacted, that the Company's court of directors shall, on due information being made to them, have power at all times to call before them fuch escaping delinquents, and to try and punish them, for the offences they may have committed within the limits of this Indian dominion, in like manner as they could have been tried or punished by the Company's courts abroad. And because the liberty of appealing from the Company's courts of justice, to the judgment of any other courts, must be productive of the fame inconveniences to the Company, as a trial of the fame caufe in the first instance would have been, and must therefore deter the Company from ever availing herself of the judicial powers H 2 granted granted by this act; it is enacted, that delinquents shall have no liberty of appealing from the Company's courts abroad, excepting to the Court of Directors at home, or to a general court of Proprietors; whose judgment in all such cases shall be final. And as the Court of Directors have, and may be, discouraged, from profecuting or punishing the crimes of their rich fervants, by the fear of danger to their own private interest, from a combination of the friends and abettors' of such rich delinquents at a futureannual election, be it enacted, that the 24 Directors, being such at the time of paffing this act, shall continue in office, durante vita."

"And whereas it appears, that the liberty of daily felling, transferring, and alienating the fhares in the Company's flock, of which this fovereign dominion forms a part, tends to infufe into the proprietors a fpirit of rapacity, that may be productive of much damage to the feveral interefls concerned; and hath many other very pernicious confequences; whilft it reflects difgrace on the dignity of all other fovereigns; be it enacted, that no proprietor in this Company's flock, of which the the fovereignty forms a part, shall have power to fend his share in the faid fovereignty to market, like as it were a hog or bullock, and to sell, transfer, and alienate the same; but that the several proprietors of this stock and sovereignty, being such at the time of passing this act, shall remain and continue proprietors, without the power of alienation, except in the cases that shall be hereafter specified.

And whereas it hath been reprefented that the Company's holding this fovereignty by leafe, and for a fhort term, may not only alienate her care and prevent her from fludying and promoting the lafting welfare of the country, but may induce her to pillage, plunder and wafte it; be it enacted, that the Company fhall hold the fovereignty of this dominion, quamdiu fe bene gefferit; to the end, that the may confider and treat it, not as the property of another, but as her own inheritance.

And whereas the Company exercises traffic in this dominion; and, in confequence thereof, her ministers do likewise traffic; and whereas the exercise of traffic is evidently repugnant to a due difcharge charge of the duties of government, as being unavoidably productive of deftructive monopolies and oppreffion; all which it is impoffible to prevent, fo long as the Company herfelf fhall continue a merchant; be it enacted, that this Company's commercial charter fhall be diffolved; and fhe, and her minifters, fhall be reftrained from trading or trafficking, directly or indirectly, within the limits of this Indian dominion, under certain penalties to be mentioned in a new charter, which fhall be granted to this Company, conftituting her the United Company of English East India Sovereigns."

These powers, grants, limitations, and reftrictions, would have qualified the Company, so far as the nature of things could admit, for administring the political government; but, in her military capacity, as the fovereign protector, maintainer and defender of this Indian dominion, she hath been still less qualified, and would therefore have required still more extraordinary powers. These however we shall not specify, as apprehending, that what hath been already demanded will shock. The grant of supreme legislative and judicial powers to subjects, over their fellow subjects, must seem an absurd communication of that which is incommunicable : the prohibition of felling and tranferring the shares of stock, would be termed a tyrannical restraint on private property : the perpetual grant of this fovereignty to the Company, must be deemed an unjust alienation of the Crown's and Nation's rights : and the diffolution of the Company's commercial charter, would alter her very being and nature. In short, if we regard the proposed act fimply, it will appear a collection of absurd inconfistencies, and ridiculous nonsense: but if we consider it conjunctly with the caufe or purpose for which it is required, then every abfurdity vanishes from the act, and centers in the cause that renders it necessary. For we appeal to common fense, whether every circumstance, specified in this proposed act, is not indifpenfably necessary, to qualify the Company for the fovereign office of administring the political government of this Indian dominion : and, if that neceffity is admitted, then doth the act become a rational and neceffary consequence, of government's having previoufly committed ted that fovereign charge to the Company. Nay, we must take the liberty to add, that government, by committing fuch a charge to the Company, and at fame time totally neglecting to capacitate her for fupporting it, is in a great meafure acceffory to all the ruinous confequences that have enfued from her incapacity.

I am fenfible it will be urged, that we proceed upon false premises; for that government never confidered these countries as subjected to the dominion of Britain; that it never granted the fovereignty of them to the Company; nor supposed her to be the fovereign; but that it only acquiesced in her holding the Dewanny, on condition of her paying a part of the revenues to the nation ; and, of confequence, that government never confidered the inhabitants of those countries as subjects to the government of Britain. But this is a most flimfy evalion, like that of shutting our eyes to the fun, that we may deny it is day : government granted to the Company a right or permission to hold the Dewanny; which is explained to be, the power of collecting and appropriating the reverevenues of Bengal; and, in confideration of this grant, government demanded and received a share of these revenues; government therefore, in its legiflative capacity, admits a knowledge, that the Company did possess the power of collecting, and also of applying the revenues of Bengal, ad libitum; and, amongst other purposes, to that of defraying the charges of the military, as well as the civil, government : and government well knows, that the power which defrays the charges of the military and civil government, muft hold the abfolute direction of both : and what conflitutes fovereign power, but the abfolute direction of the military and civil government, together with the difpofal of the revenues ? But, exclusive of the Dewanny contract, the Company hath applied, in every other characteristic of a fovereign, to government, in its legiflative capacity: fhe hath brought a bill into parliament, for the grant of certain military powers and indulgences, for the better enabling her to defend, what the there modeftly, though vaguely, terms her territorial acquisitions, (but which, by referring to the Dewanny contract, is explained plained to include Bengal :) and the hath applied for certain juridical powers and grants, for the better administration of the jurifdiction, not in her commercial factories, but over the whole country of Bengal : therefore government hath been informed, in its legislative capacity, by the Company herfelf, that the administred the military and civil government, and appropriated the revenues of Bengal; confequently that the was, in every fenfe and refpect, the actual fovereign of that country.

Now government could not be ignorant that the Company is a fubject to the national government of Britain; and that, as fuch, she could have neither right, power, nor force to subject this dominion, or afterwards to hold it in fubjection, faving what she derived from the national government; confequently government, as it understood that these countries were fubjected to the Company, must have known that they were subjected to the dominion of Britain. And as government did permit the Company to retain this dominion; and furnished her with a military force, knowing it to be for the purpose of maintaining taining dominion, it is plain, that the Company hath held this dominion, no otherwife than by the grant and support of government.

But if the Company be the fovereign of Bengal, the inhabitants must, per force, be her subjects; and if the Company holds this fovereignty as a fubject to the government of Britain, by virtue of the grant or permission of that government, and by means of a force furnished by the fame government, in what relation can this government regard the inhabitants of Bengal ? In that of fubjects furely; tho' the degree hath, by the deed of government, been somewhat implicated; like that of a child begot by the father upon his own daughter. And fubjects they have been to the government of Britain, in every fense and meaning ; they have yielded obedience to those subjects of this government whom it appointed to rule over them; and they have yielded the fruits, as well as the duties of obedience.

But the government of Britain, which hath thus by force fubjected the inhabitants of Bengal to its dominion; which hath, for a feries of years, held them in I 2 fubsubjection; and hath, all along, exacted from them the tribute of subjection; hath withheld from them the protection due to fubjects. For it hath fcrupuloully withdrawn itself from all regard or attention to their government; and hath left it implicitly to the guidance of a few merchants; whom it knew to be perfectly unqualified for administring any fort of government : in consequence of which, these wretched people have, for many years, been ruled, without law, justice, or government. Unhappy subjects, who are forced to obey a sovereign that refuses them protection, and leaves them exposed to all the horrors of tyranny and anarchy.

It will neverthelefs be full infifted that government could not, without committing a number of irregularities and abfurdities, endow the Company in the manner fpecified; as alfo that the Company, when thus endowed, would full have been altogether unequal to the charge of regularly administring a fovereign government. But furely government, if it would not or could not capacitate the Company to regularly govern those countries, ought not to have furnished her the means of oppreffing, fing, ravaging, pillaging, and ruining them; to the difgrace of humanity, and the indelible reproach of the British name. Government would have acted a part far more confistent with the rules of honour and humanity, if, instead of furnishing to the Company this military power, it had restrained her from availing herself of the advantage, gained by force and chance, over that mild, unwarlike, but industrious people; and obliged her to leave them to their own government.

But then the fituation of affairs in those countries, where the nation and Company held such a valuable commercial interest, rendered it highly improper and dangerous to leave the native government to itfelf: moreover the nation and Company could not, in fuch cafe, have acquired the mighty wealth and other benefits that have been derived from the conquest, or assumed dominion, of those countries. Oh wealth, basely acquired, and foolishly applied ! Was there then no medium, no middle channel, thro' which government might have steered the Nation and Company to this fame wealth and benefits, clear of all these irregularities, incongruities, inhumanities, manities, and reproaches? Yes furely; and one fo obvious and confpicuous, that it is impoffible to conceive how government could be fo industrious as to fhun or mifs it. Had the national government taken upon itfelf the charge of fuperintending the government of those countries, as reason and the nature of things directed, then would it have furnished them a fovereign, naturally free from all the defects of the Company, and completely endued with all the qualifications of power, ability, and inclination from interest, to protect and regularly govern them.

For it is plain, that the national government, poffeffing fupreme legiflative, and judicial power, muft have been capable of enforcing obedience to the laws which it might have enacted for the good government of those countries; and of punishing disobedience, not only in the natives, but in the ministers whom it would have employed to execute that government; as these must have been its own subjects. And, on the other hand, the nation being an immutable body, and holding this fovereignty in her own right, and by perpetual tenor; her government must must have been actuated, by the strong motive of self-interest, to exert itself in promoting the real and lasting welfare of those countries. And as to the commercial despotism, it could never have existed under the national government.

It therefore follows, that the national government, being perfectly free from all the defects of the Company, would, by the fimple, natural, and rational act of affuming the administration of government in those countries, have prevented or reformed all the feveral abuses or evils that have fprung from the defective constitution of the Company, as fovereign. But besides the mighty reform of abuses, that must have been immediately caused by thus changing the perfon of the fovereign; there is another advantage, which, though it cannot be faid to fpring directly from that change, yet would it have enfued as a natural consequence of the national government's taking upon itself this fovereign charge; and that is, the creation or institution of a new interest in that country; a fort of middle state, betwixt the native subjects and their foreign government.

The

The middle state here meant is the East India Company, (or which is the fame, her fervants in Bengal ;) which, being now reduced to the condition of a fubject, tho' ftill retaining all her commercial privileges and interests in that country, would have formed an intermediate link in the political chain, ferving to connect the natives with their government, and government with the natives. For, in every one circumstance that respected the liberty of the subject, this middle state must have held precifely the fame interest as the natives; and, in consequence, the fame inclination to oppose all oppression of government : and, in every thing that respected the real interest, the power, or honour of the fovereign, the community of Natale Solum must have led it to support the meafures of government. Therefore, this middle state, holding a great weight in that dependent dominion, (not indeed from its numbers, but from the powerful support and influence of the Company, which would have been still very respectable in the fovereign country,) must have carried a mighty poife into the scale of liberty, in opposition to the despotism of government;

ment; whilst, at fame time, it would have created no danger to the power of the fovereign. And a middle state of this nature must have been of inexpressible utility; facilitating, in many respects, the establishment of a regular political æconomy in the government of these countries. For, in fuch cafe, the fovereign could, with propriety, efficacy, and fafety, have conferred every reasonable privilege on the whole body of fubjects in this foreign dominion: feeing that the exertion of thefe privileges might have been artfully confined to this middle state : and, as on the one hand, this fineffe would not have, in any shape, withheld the benefit of these privileges from the natives; but, on the contrary, would have rendered them more effectually useful to the whole body of fubjects, than if they had been committed either entirely or in common to the natives; because the Company's fervants would, from interest, have had the same inclination as the natives, to exert these privileges for the common good; and they would have had infinitely greater power, from their superior activity, intrepidity, and firmness, as also from their superior K oppor-opportunities of obtaining redrefs elfewhere against any infringement made by government: fo, on the other hand, the authority of the fovereign could have incurred no rifk from these privileges in the hands of Europeans; whereas there is great danger in attempting to confer on the natives a power to controul even the despotism of government. With this middle state the power of juries would have been effectual to the subject, and harmless to the sovereign: however, we shall have occasion to be more particular on this head in the sequel.

But if the national government could, by taking this fovereign charge upon itfelf, have prevented or reformed thefe many evils and abufes that have arifen from the defects of the Company; and could have likewife created other fuch advantages, facilitating the eftablifhment of a regular government in those countries; what reason can be affigned for government's declining this charge, and devolving it on the Company? Government could not furely suppose that this important concern would be managed to greater national advantage by the Company, than by

by itfelf : feeing that common fense might have foreseen, what experience hath fince proved, that, under the management of the Company, the interest of Britain in those countries would, in the space of a very few years, be completely annihilated; that the countries themselves would either be completely ruined, or otherwife loft to enemies; and that the wealth, which was extorted from them by rapine and general havoc, being imported into Britain in the hands of a few indiferent individuals, would create a torrent of profusion, extravagance, luxury, and prodigality, that would fweep all before it into the gulf of bankruptcy, perdition, and despair. Whereas, under the regular administration of national government, those countries might have been still preferved in a flourishing condition; and, in consequence, still capable of yielding to Britain a tribute little inferior to the furplus revenue which the Company received in the first year of the Dewanny: which tribute, arriving immediately at the public treasury of Britain, and being there applied to the diminution of taxes, and consequent reduction of the price of -neceffaries and labour, would have proved a K 2 gentle gentle universal shower, reviving our decayed and drooping manufactures and commerce.

But neither could government be induced to confer this fovereignty on the Company, by any motive of regard to the true interest of the proprietors: seeing it was palpably evident that this charge, being fo unmeafurably superior to her powers of supporting it, must unavoidably crush her to ruin; and, along with her, the countries subjected to her rule; and, it is to be feared, even that community of which she forms a part. Whereas, if the national government had taken into its own hands, and carefully administered the government of those countries, whilst it continued the Company in possession of her commercial privileges, she would have continued to divide, in the first place, the fix per cent. which her commerce, (unaided by revenue) afforded; even when burdened with the neceffary expence of a fmall military force maintained for the guard of that commerce in those foreign countries, and which must have been equal to four per cent. on her capital: but this commercial military expence being rendered in a great measure unneceffary, fary, by the immediate protection of national government, the faving thereof would have added two per cent. to her dividend : and the equivalent, which government would have paid for her fortreffes, munition, &c. being added to her capital ftock, would have encreafed her dividend nearly one per cent. more ; whilft her ftock itfelf would, at this day, have been really, and intrinfically worth 2201. inftead of ..... its prefent real and intrinfic value.

It would be infulting the understanding of ministry, to suppose that it had been restrained from assuming this fovereign charge, by any delicacy of regard to the ideal right of the Company; derived from either conquests, as subjects; or from the sham grant of a man, who had not power to dispose of a fingle bega of land, nay, not of a cocoa-nut-tree in that country; and confequently whose grant of the fovereignty of Bengal could contribute nothing more to investiture or possession, than his grant of the crown of Britain could. Though if we should (for the fake of argument) suppose, that ministry had really admitted some such right, we must still efteem efteem its acquiescence in that right a most absurd and wildly mistaken indulgence; seeing it evidently tended to the ruin of the party whom it meant to favour.

There hath been, however, one weighty argument against government's affuming this Indian charge, which is, the danger arifing to national liberty from government's, (or, in other words, the crown or ministry's) acquiring such an accession of influence, as must arise from the possession of the many emoluments, places, posts, &c. annexed to this Indian charge : whereas liberty is completely fecured from fuch danger, whilst the Company possessies it. And the certainty of this double maxim, viz. the danger from government's poffeffing this charge, and the fecurity whilst it is in the hands of the Company, is as generally established as almost any one human principle: for, being violently enforced by those whose personal views lead them to oppose administration, and at same time not fimply allowed, but even inculcated by ministry itself, it hath been readily credited by those who, their personal interest not being so deeply concerned, were lefs curious to investigate the truth.

It

It may be deemed prefumptuous in an individual, to question the orthodoxy of a maxim fo powerfully enforced by one party, readily allowed by the other, and almost universally credited : tho' the extraordinary circumstance, of two violent rival parties concurring fo exactly on a point, where their perfonal interest seems to be fo materially and fo oppofitely engaged, would lead a bystander to suppose, that either one of the two parties must be mistaken; or otherwise, that one or both must misrepresent : at any rate, that uncommon instance of candour, in ministry's preaching up a doctrine fo repugnant to that which it pretends to be its own personal interest, would induce such bystander to suspect its fincerity. However, as a right understanding of this point may confiderably import the public, at this critical juncture, I shall venture disclosing my sentiments, at the rifk of censure for prolixity, as well as impertinence.

With regard to the first part of the maxim, I conceive that the danger to liberty, from government's holding this charge in its own hands, is supposed to arise from the influence which the minister would acquire, legislature, (those bulwarks of liberty) by means of the many emoluments, places, posts, &c. annexed to the possession of that charge. But before we admit that the ministers holding this charge would be creative of that dangerous influence, we ought to be fatisfied that he doth not already poffels it, by other means; for, if he doth already poffers fuch influence by other means, it is plain that the Indian charge cannot confer it; nor will it avail to fhut one door, whilft there are others open to admit him. And that the minister hath long been in full and plenary poffeffion of fuch influence, we have ever heard afferted by these very men who so loudly enforce the danger of his acquiring it, by means of this Indian charge: nay, we have much better authority than their contradictory affertions, (even that of fact and daily experience,) for believing that the minister hath and doth poffers pofts and places, and that, on any emergency, he hath in his power other means equally effectual, towards creating and holding fuch influence, in a degree as plenary and complete as his own heart can defire. And,

And, if the minister doth already possies fuch influence by other means, it is plain, that the Indian charge cannot confer it ; nor will it avail to thut one door, whilft there are others open to admit him. And that the minister hath been long in full and plenary poffession of fuch influence, we have ever heard afferted by those very men, who fo loudly enforce the danger of his acquiring it, by means of this Indian charge : nay, we have much better authority than their contradictory affertions, (even that of fact and daily experience,) for believing that the minister hath and doth poffefs pofts and places, and that on any emergency he hath in his power other means equally effectual, towards creating and holding fuch influence, in a degree as plenary and complete as his own heart can defire. And, if the minister doth already poffefs an influence fo fully fufficient, it must be allowed that, in fo much as refpects parliamentary influence, this Indian charge would be a thing fuperfluous and useless to him; like meat to a man that hath already filled his belly; the absence of it can withhold nothing that he wants, and the acquifition cannot confer L confer more than he already poffeffes. I may venture to add, that we certainly hold our liberty by fome latent fecurity, more powerful than that of parliament itself, which neither the minister's influence over parliament, nor posts and places, will ever induce him to attack, or enable him to fubdue; for that, otherwife, we should have been divested of our privileges and liberty long ago. And, upon confidering these several circumstances, I conclude, that if this Indian charge was in the hands of government to-morrow, it would neither enable, nor induce the minister, to attempt a jot more against our liberty, than he hath done, can do, and will do, without it. However, by way of reinforcing my argument, I shall add that, if the plan which I mean to propose should be carried into execution, it would leave but few of these emoluments, &c. to the immediate disposal of the minister; and, poffibly, this declaration may but little recommend it to his favour.

But still, if we were to admit a real danger to liberty from the minister's poffeffing these emoluments, &c. it remains to be proved that liberty hath been, is, and will be fecured from fuch danger, by the Company's holding that Indian charge. And, when the nature of this fecurity comes to be examined, I apprehend it will be found more difficult to prove this latter part of the maxim, than the former. For it is notorious that, ever until the late distraction in the Company's affairs, the arbitrary application of these emoluments, posts, &c. was vested in the Directors; and indeed the entire powers and interests 'of the Company; infomuch that the Directors might, with propriety, be termed the Company. So that the whole fecurity of national liberty, and, of courfe, the fole obstruction to the minister's dangerous views, depended on the integrity and independent spirit of 24 Directors; of whom, again, one or two generally leads all the reft. Confequently, to come at the fingering of thefe dangerous emoluments, &c. the minister had only to fubvert the integrity, or fubdue the independance, of these Directors. And, to effect this, a minister possessed more than one infallible recipe. By artfully joining the mighty influence which he held in the Company's L 2

Company's flock thro' his numerous dependants, to one or other of two parties contending violently for the direction, he could reduce both to a perfect dependance on himfelf: by the fame means he could hold them in subjection : but still more, by the awe of wrefting from them the fweet management of this Indian fovereignty, which they were fenfible he could do by a word. And thus he could work upon their fears. But inclination would naturally and powerfully lead the Directors to throw themselves into the arms of a minister; not so much for his immediate affistance; tho' even that might be of great use, for rendering matters easy with the proprietors, as well as parliament and the nation ; but because, on these terms, they fecured, in him, an omnipotent fupporter and all powerful advocate, against the day of distress, which they well knew must come, and that foon : whereas, otherwise, they must lay their account with finding him a fevere judge, and bitter prosecutor.

By these several operations on the hopes and sears of the Directors, it was extremely easy for a minister to render them as pliant pliant as a glove; as obedient as a spaniel, to fetch and carry at bidding, And the Directors being once reduced to this state of dependance, it is evident, that the minister must possess a full and arbitrary power over all the emoluments, pofts, places, &c. appertaining to this Indian charge. But the disposal of the present emoluments, &c. was a trivial matter, compared with other advantages, which this Indian bufinefs, whilft in the hands of the Company, prefented to an artful and enterprifing minister. For, under the plaufible and indeed undeniable pretext of qualifying the Company for administring this sovereign charge, he might have drawn from the legislature certain military as well as political powers; which, being gradually augmented as occasion offered, might have at last established a fort of power, in this government, diffinct from and independent of the legiflature : the exertion of which power, being confided to the Directors, would in fact have rested with the minister. Here indeed was a real danger to liberty; provided it had been poffible to hold up this Indian bufinefs, in the hands of the Company, for any any length of time; for, notwithstanding I confider national liberty as inexpugnable to the open affaults of a minister, yet, from such a secret convenient and commanding post as this mentioned, he might have made frequent fly and successful incursions on the confines of liberty; which would have greatly straitened her quarters, and wasted her strength.

On the other hand, if that Indian charge had been vested in the national government, liberty must have been perfectly fecured from this last mentioned danger; for, in fuch cafe, there could have been no pretext for demanding these extraordinary diftinct powers; and, confequently, no opportunity of establishing that truly dangerous imperium in imperio. And even in the application of the ordinary powers, emoluments, &c. a minister must have been subjected to many troublesome checks, and restraints. His Majesty, who can have no views diffinct from the general interest of his people, must have held a principal voice in every measure; as likewise must some others his counsellors, Parliament too must have proved an inconvenient restraint on a minister; particularly cularly in the article of estimates and accounts of revenue, which must have been fubmitted to its infpection; and notwithstanding the certainty of carrying points by a majority of voices, yet, as there will ever be some refractory members, these might have carried tales to the public ; which, provided this charge had been in the hands of national government, would have judged itself interested in the affair ; and would therefore have taken the liberty to criticife his measures, or censure his misconduct. Whereas, this business being fecured, as private property, in the hands of the Company, king, parliament, and nation were all excluded from participation : the proprietors alone had a right to examine measures or accounts ; and, the majority of them upon all queftions being mercenary retainers to miniftry and the direction, they must have ever been a mere servile pecus. So that the business might have been fnugly confined to three or four ministerial affociates, with their faithful dependants in Leadenhall Street; whilft the minister needed never appear in the affair; free from care, charge, or trouble; and irresponsible for either either measures, or consequences; he might enjoy all the sweets, without the least alloy of bitter.

Sure I am if I had been minister, and minded to make a job of this Indian bufinefs, I would certainly have exerted myfelf most fedulously to preferve it in the hands of the Company. And, to divert the nation from ever turning her eye towards it, I would have ftrenuoufly inculcatedtherights of the Company, national faith, the impoffibility of conducting this bufinefs otherwife than through the Company; and, above all things, I would, by my emiffaries, have alarmed the public, with fears of danger to their liberty, should this business ever come into the hands of government; whilft, by the fame canal, I would have trumpeted forth my own candour, difinterestedness as a minister, indifference to power, and delicate regard to national liberty and private property, in thus disclaiming an object fo replete with ministerial advantages, which was within my power. And thus would I have continued the game, until it was up : and then I would have directed the enquiries, which decency and regard to appearances extorted extorted from me, in fuch a manner as to suppress, instead of investigating : though, at same time, I would have boldly expreffed my indignation at the Company's mifconduct; and loudly denounced vengeance against the individuals that had shared in the plunder; not a foul that was guilty should escape. And, to wind up the whole affair dextroufly, I would have talked my own powers, and those of my myrmidons, to reprefent all these Indian acquifitions as a transitory, cafual, and accidental piece of bufinefs; which was altogether out of our tract; and which, if the nation had ever engaged in maintaining them, would have ruined and exhausted her : and fo the nation was to thank me, for withholding her from rnin.

In this manner, I fay, would I, who am a reptile, have acted, had I been minister, and minded to make a job of this busines: but I am far from intimating or infinuating that our ministers, who are men of high birth and strict honour, could be capable of admitting even a thought of taking such base advantages. M All All that I have faid is only meant to fhow, that a minifter, if he had the inclination, poffeffed an infinitely fairer opportunity, of converting this bufinefs to finifter purpofes, whilft it was in the hands of the Company; than he poffibly could have had, from the fame bufinefs, under the conduct of national government. And, from thence, I would infer that, had this bufinefs been in the hands of government, our liberty, nay and our property too, would have been fecured from many dangers, to which they have been expofed, whilft this bufinefs hath been in the hands of the Company.

I cannot then conceive what other objections could be flarted against government's taking upon itself the charge of this Indian dominion : unless it be the old trite arguments of timid fluggish indolence, want of enterprize, &c. That, the distance of fituation rendering it impossible for Britain to properly maintain and govern this dominion, it would become an object of no true value or importance, but rather a heavy load exhausting her firength. But it is now more than time for the nation to recal her faith from men whom whom the hath fufficient ground to fufpect of deceit; and, roufing her fenfes, to take the liberty of trying thefe matters by the ftandard of her own reafon; which we fhall endeavour to aid by the following hints.

To properly demonstrate the true value and importance of this Indian dominion to Britain, would demand a volume; we have, in the first part, presented a slight sketch of it; here therefore we shall offer only one or two remarks respecting its importance to our finances; and though we do not offer these remarks as the result of exact calculation, yet will they ferve to throw a light on this fubject. Ever fince the last war Britain hath paid annually to foreign creditors, in interest, about 1,500,0001. and this is paid, not in paper, but all in hard money; or, otherwise, in what is equivalent, the stoppage of fo much hard money as is reckoned to come into Britain by the balance of her trade. On the other hand, the net specie balance of trade with all the world, (exclusive of that part which frictly and properly may be termed the produce of Indian dominion,) after deducting M 2 ducting the imperceptible and enormous drain of specie made by smuggling, doth not at this day perhapsamount to 800,000l. The difference then betwixt her numerical specie disbursement and receipt in balance of trade, must needs have been made good from fome other fund than the circulating stock of specie, otherwise circulation must in that number of years have totally ceafed. And this fund we need not mention to have been the dominion in India. Ever fince 1757, the private fortunes acquired there in consequence of dominion or conquest, having been remitted either in bills on foreign Indian companies, or in diamonds, have created an annual influx of specie, (or what is equivalent,) to the amount of at least 700,000 l. * The Company

* As it is impossible to exactly afcertain the annual amount of this private remittance made through various channels, it will no doubt be alledged, that we have exaggerated this article; and yet we have certain ground to affirm, that it is greatly underrated. Sure I am, if we can suppose that the amount of fuch remittance made from 1757 to 1770 hath been in any degree equal to that of the two following years, (which is afcertained,) and we have no reason to suppose that there hath been any confiderable difference, the pany too received fince that period, and previous to the Dewanny, though by virtue of dominion or conqueft, fundry large fums of money; which fhe invefted in merchandize; and, thereby, faved to Britain fo much specie as the would, otherwife, have transmitted for the purchase of fuch merchandize; and it doth not require demonstration to prove, that all such faving is, in every respect, the same as the influx

the fum affigned by us will be greatly under mark. For no sooner did the English Company, in 1770, open her treasury, to receive money for remittance to Britain, than there was poured in at her three capital fettlements above 1,400,000 l. for which bills were granted, prefented, and accepted by the Company, and nearly two thirds of this fum was borrowed in Bengal, And in 1771 fhe hath borrowed in Bengal alone, under the promife of remittance, a fum perhaps exceeding the whole loan of the former year ; though the bills have been postponed by her agents in Bengal, on account of the Company's inability to answer them. Such was the remittance of British private fortunes for these two years, through the channel of the English Com_ pany alone : and we have good reafon to fuppofe, that there may have been fome made through other channels. And these enormous fums, borrowed by the Company, as fovereign, for the expence of Bengal, in these two years, will ferve to fhow the mighty alteration of affairs in that country fince 1765.

influx of an equal fum. And ever from 1765, till fome time in 1770, the Company paid for all her cargoes, not only in India but in China, with the furplus revenue of Bengal: and of course this furplus revenue hath, for that space, faved, (which is the fame as gained) annually to Britain, the whole fums which the Company used to transmit for the purchase of her cargoes in India and China; and which, on an average, may be reckoned 500,000 l. per annum: but these cargoes were, from 1765, encreased to an enormous degree; and if we add only 200,0001. for fuch encrease, we shall find that the furplus revenue of Bengal hath, by the return of trade, created an annual influx to Britain of at least 700,000 l. in specie: and this, added to the private fortunes, makes 1,400,000 l. received yearly by Britain, from Indian dominion.

But, for these two years past, the ruinous fituation of those countries, and the consequent deficiency of revenue, hath obliged the Company to either transmit money from Europe, or otherwife to borrow money abroad, on bill or bond, for the purchase of all her cargoes in India as well well as China: and the Company, by thus borrowing, for the purchase of cargoes, and even the expence of her government, hath abforbed the private fortunes, which, till then, had been transmitted to Britain, by bills on foreign companies. We must therefore perceive, without descending to tedious investigation, that the ruined state of those countries, having cut off furplus revenue, hath, for these two years past, diminished the annual influx to Britain from Indian dominion, at least one half, or 700,000 l. And this diminution of influx, whilft our drain continues the fame, we already begin to feel in our circulation : though this felt effect is not yet traced up to its cause. Of what mighty importance then must this Indian dominion have been, to the circulation of Britain: when this circulation feels feverely, from only two years partial deprivation of the benefit formerly derived from that dominion ? And what effect must a total deprivation of that benefit operate, in a few years, on this circulation; whilst, we are continuing to pay to our foreign creditors about 1,500,000 l. per annum in numerical specie; exclusive of other less noted noted drains, which, it is most probable mount it up much higher ? And yet it is evident, that Britain must, unavoidably, be deprived of this whole benefit, fo foon as the thall lofe her dominion in India ; whether that loss shall be caused by enemies, or by the ruin of the countries fubjected. Nay, by lofing the dominion of Bengal fingly, the must not only incur a deprivation of almost the whole dominion benefit; but the must likewife lose by far the most valuable part of that commerce, which was carried on by the Company with those countries, previous to dominion. For the commerce with Bengal, alone, is of much greater value, than that with all the rest of India: and, as to the trade with China, it is the most pernicious and lofing trade to the nation; however convenient it may be to government.

And if we shall then advert to the benefit and support which the finances of Britain have received from this Indian dominion, for so many years pass, though under the most preposterous management; but, still more, if we shall advert to the nature and degree of benefit that, under proper management, might have been derived derived in perpetuum from this Indian dominion, in not only the article of finance, but in other weighty refpects : and, if we fhall, yet farther, look forward to the difmal confequences that muft unavoidably enfue to Britain, in thefe feveral refpects, from a deprivation of this Indian dominion and its benefits; can we tamely furrender our reafon to the ipfe dixit of men who are hardy enough to tell us, that Indian dominion is of no value nor utility to Britain.

Nor do these men less abuse our underftanding, by holding forth the difficulty of maintaining and defending this dominion : feeing that, of all nations in the world, Britain is, by a variety of circumstances, the best qualified to maintain and defend maritime or commercial dominion in India. For, as the exceeds all the world in naval force, she is, through that circumstance alone, the most capable of defending fuch dominion, against the affault of European enemies : and had Britain availed herself of evident advantages, had she established her naval and land defence upon the plan that shall be explained, British dominion in India might, at this day, have been secured from even the attempt of European N

European rivals : they might have admired and envied, but they would not have dared to attack. And these European rivals are the only dangerous enemies to British dominion in India : for as to the neighbouring native powers, they would, from fear as well as inclination, have been amicable to Britain; provided her government in those countries had acted with common honesty, and common decorum, or prudence; and not as common robbers. And, as to the unhappy native fubjects themfelves, their loyalty hath been fufficiently proved, by fo many years patient fubmiffion to the most intolerable of all poffible governments. Wherein then confifts the difficulty of maintaining and defending British dominion in India?

And with regard to the fo much talked of expence or drain of native ftrength, we may furely, with good reafon, fay that this objection militated much ftronger against maintaining that dominion under the Company, than under national government: tho' the nature and extent of even that drain under the Company, is most grossly missing that the Company's annual recruit, fince the time she completed her dominion force, hath hath never exceeded 1200 men; and I am afraid it hath in general fallen short of 1000; notwithstanding she laboured under many difadvantages, from which national government would be exempted : fuch as being obliged to put up with very indifferent and unhealthy recruits, for want of better; too little attention paid to the manner of transporting them; and still less to their health and manner of living in the country : whilft her governors expended numbers of them on unneceffary predatory wars. And even this recruit we are not to reckon a drain of real ftrength from Britain : feeing that the Company's recruits have been mostly fellows of the most desperate circumstances, who had no means of fublifting at home; and who therefore would, if the Company had not taken them off, have been taken off by the gallows, or otherwife would have emigrated to America or fome other country, in fearch of bread; and would thus have been equally loft to Britain. So that, upon rationally confidering this matter, we shall find that, for the maintenance of dominion in India, the Company hath not drained this country, of 100 men an-N 2 nually, nually, that could, in any fense, be termed useful, or a real strength to it. But, fetting aside the precedent of the Company, it is certain that, to maintain and defend the mighty dominion of Bengal, demands an European force very little fuperior in number to the garrifon of that barren fortress Gibraltar : and to maintain and defend the whole territorial poffeffions, together with the commerce of Britain in India, requires a force very little exceeding the aforefaid garrifon with that of its fister fortress in Minorca. And the annual recruit, neceffary to keep up this force, after allowing largely for climate, and every other circumstance, would, on a complete plan of defence, not exceed goo or at most 1000 men : and, of this recruit, at least 200, would be wanted annually to maintain commerce, if there was no dominion. Nay, if this is judged 'too great a drain for Britain, one fourth part of that number may be reduced, by recruiting that proportion of foreign protestants: such being eafily procured; and, in fuch a low proportion, they can in no respect be dangerous. And can Britain regard 6 or 700 men annually as too great a drain a drain, for the maintenance of that important dominion and commerce, which is as one of the capital limbs of her body; and at fame time beftow a nearly equal fhare of her ftrength on maintaining thefe two barren, and I had almost faid useles, fortreffes; the pecuniary charge of which fhe pays out of her proper finance, never to return; whilst Indian dominion defrays its own charge.

The only remaining objection then to Indian dominion is, the difficulty of properly governing it. But this difficulty doth not arife, like that in America, from the indomitably obstinate spirit of the fubjects; on the contrary, it arifes from their over paffive or submissive disposition, and incapacity of refifting the power of government: and this, instead of being an objection, is the most valuable qualification of a dependent dominion. To remove this difficulty demands no exterior aids, no exertion of powers or force; it depends entirely on the will of the fovereign; and a very little art, a very little care, with a little honefty, would ferve to completely remedy it; as we doubt not to evince.

In

In fine, Bengal, being one of the richest commercial countries is, to Britain as a commercial nation, the nobleft and most truly valuable acquisition that providence could poffibly beftow on her : by the mild disposition of its inhabitants it is the most facily governed and maintained; and, by the nature of its fituation, it is the most defenfible foreign dominion on this globe; particularly to Britain which excels in naval force. And one may almost venture to fay that providence, by throwing Bengal into the arms of Britain, feems to have intended that this, the richeft commercial state in Asia, which, through the effeminacy of its inhabitants, is incapable of maintaining its own independance, should be subjected to Britain, as being the fittest, through fimilarity of commercial difposition, interest, and modes, to properly govern it; and, through her fuperiority in naval force, the best qualified to defend and protect it from all enemies.

In what light then must posterity regard the policy of Britain, during the third quarter of the eighteenth century: when it shall find her, in the East, slighting flighting and giving up that glorious field, which annually yielded a golden crop, to be rutted up and trodden down by hogs and viler beafts : whilft, in the Weft, fhe was tugging with all her might, exerting her utmost study, care and attention, much ftrength, and more money, on cultivating the fea fands; straining to fubdue nature; and forcing the horfe to drink in fpite of inclination ? Will it not be faid, that fhe would have acted a far wifer part, if she had left nature and time to flowly operate in America, the effects which they will unavoidably produce, in spite of all her efforts; and had converted her care and attention, to properly govern, and maintain, that noble, rich, and grateful dependent dominion in India; which, upon fuch terms, would have poured, into her publick treasury, resources, that would have ferved to alleviate her burden of taxes; and, confequently, to reduce the price of necessaries, of labour, and of manufactures; which, again, would have preferved her commerce, not only with America, but with other countries; and would at fame time have preferved to her thoufands of industrious and useful subjects, who, GI DVC who, through want of employment, were forced to emigrate from her to America. And, by the fame care and attention to the government and revenue of that Indian dominion, she would have prevented the inundation of eastern profusion and extravagance; which chiefly contributed to convert this formerly graniferous island, into a pasture for horses of parade and stately pride; infomuch that, instead of fupplying her neighbours as formerly, with fome hundred thousand pounds worth of. grain annually, the could not feed the greatly reduced number of her own inhabitants; nor furnish the means of living to the industrious agricultor, and peafant; who, in fearch of livelihood, fled from her to America; thereby debilitating her own best fource of strength, and prematurely accelerating the manhood of those otherwise infant colonies.

Nevertheles there still remains a possibility of retrieving this error in policy; or at least of preventing a farther encrease of the evils that have arisen from it; provided that, in the first place, this Indian dominion shall still be in our possession : and, in the second place, that national govern-government shall, by taking upon itself the charge of administring the government thereof, remedy that first and radical cause of evil and abuse which hath existed under the Company's government : and shall, at fame time, with honest and fincere intention, spirit and activity, apply a proper remedy to that which hath been affigned as the fecond caufe of evil, and the nature of which remedy shall be explained in the fequel. For, upon fuch terms, there is no doubt that a regular fystem of government may be established in that dependent dominion ; under which it may be reftored to its pristine prosperity, nay, it may be elevated to a state still more flourishing than it ever knew; and, in consequence, to a capacity of yielding a still superior degree of benefit to Britain; and in a manner widely different, and truely falutary to her.

But I must again repeat, that it is vain to expect this reform of evils from the management of the Company; loaded as she is with so many natural defects, which it is out of the power of art to remedy, otherwise than by conferring upon her the sovereign government of Britain, along O with with that of this dependent dominion. For the execution of these two sovereign governments is, by the nature of things, inseparable: it being morally impossible, that any power can execute the sovereign government of those Indian countries, as a dominion dependent upon Britain, unless that power shall posses the sovereign execution of government in Britain.

However, it would be still more vain to look for any good from that extravagant fancy of joining the Company, with government, in this fovereign charge. What quota of powers, proper to her and wanting to government, can the Company contribute, to render her a necessary or useful affociate with government, in this fove-_reign charge? I doubt not that the proposer's intentions were good and honest: but his scheme would be so far from promoting his or any one good purpose, that it would produce the very opposite effects. For, instead of checking and contrasting, it would ferve, in the first place, to furnish, in the Directors and their governors, a convenient cloke of excuse to ministry and its governors, with the nation; whilft ministry and its governors would ferve the Directors tors and their governors a like good turn with the proprietors : they would mutually vouch for and fcreen each other; neither would be responsible, and neither would act; and thus, between stools, &cc. in the fecond place, commercial defpotifm which, by feparating the Company from the powers of government and the confequent jealoufy of privilege, must have been completely suppressed, would, under this double-headed monster, flourish with redoubled vigour : the national governors would, by their connection with the Company's, become merchants as well as tyrants; and the Company's governors would, by their power in the government, continue tyrants as well as merchants : and thus the candle would burn at both ends. In the third place, the Company which, by being excluded from the powers of government, would have contributed fo effentially in the nature of a middle state to the establishment of a regular political syftem in those countries, must, by being joined in the execution of government, entirely lose that virtue: instead of supporting liberty, she would join in promoting tyranny; and would still continue a ruin-02

ous pest to those countries. Indeed that strange partnership of Nation and Co. in this sovereignty business, is a cure infinitely worse than the disease.

In fhort, there is no alternative: if Britain means to preferve the possession of that mighty benefit derived from dominion and commerce in India; if the means to prevent the abfolute ruin of the Company, and her creditors; if she hath any regard to the loud cry of oppreffion fent forth to her for a feries of years, by her numerous wretched fubjects in those countries; and means to fave them from final destruction, she must furnish their government with a fovereign, or head, properly qualified to administer it : for this is the foundation, as well as the crowning of all good government; it is the center upon which the machine revolves, from which every line iffues, and in which every line terminates; it is the fine qua non, for without it no regular government can exist. And what proper fovereign can Britain furnish to that dependent dominion, unless it be her own sovereign government?

We have shown that the nation and her supreme government are perfectly equal to the the charge: to them there is not the fmalleft difficulty in fupporting it. Neither is there the fmalleft difficulty to her executive government or miniftry, provided it fhall poffefs an ordinary fhare of fpirit, activity, or enterprize; and fhall proceed with fincere and upright intention. For, a regular form of government being once eftablifhed abroad, and a properly digefted office or department formed at home, the bufinefs would go on with great fmoothnefs and facility to miniftry.

Nevertheless, as I have affumed the liberty of prefcribing in this important and almost desperate case, I am forry, that a fincere regard to the welfare of the patient should compel me to add, (by way of concluding on this head,) that, unless miniftry shall act upon a principle, and with a spirit, extremely different from that which it hath hitherto discovered in this business, it would be much more adviseable to continue the charge in the hands of the Company : for it can be but ruined under her. However, in strong hopes of a melioration in these respects, which depends altogether on the will of government, I shall proceed to A P L A N,

WE have before obferved, that the fecond caufe why thefe reftraining and impelling powers, which alone can prevent tyranny and anarchy, have been altogether wanting in the Company's fyftem of government, appears to be the diftance of fituation, betwixt the fovereign refidence and the country governed. And we fhall here add that, if national government fhould adopt the fame fyftem, this diftance distance would operate, under it, effects the fame in nature as these under the Company; and nothing but the difference in other circumstances, betwixt the national government and Company, could prevent these effects from being likewise equal in degree. For it is evident that, if the executive government of the nation should, as the Directors have done, preserve to itself the charge and power of immediately fuperintending and controuling the execution of government in that Indian dominion, the diftance of fituation would create to that government an equal impoffibility of advising and directing measures, of enforcing the execution or observance of orders, and of preventing or reftraining abuse : confequently, in the immediate execution of all measures, the national governors would poffess the fame unlimited power, as the Company's governors have done. And the only advantage to that Indian government, from national governments affuming from the Company the charge of adminiftring it, would arife from the following circumstances. First, the superior retrospective or ex post facto authority of national government, enabling it to judge and punifh nish the maladministration, or disobedie ence of its ministers. Second, The superior inclination or disposition of national government (arifing from its perpetual interest in the property) to exert itself in promoting proper measures. Third, The fuppreffion of commercial despotism. And fourth, The existence of the Company as a middle state betwixt the natives and their foreign government. All which innovations, arising from national government's taking upon itself the administration of this Indian government, though they are indifpenfably neceffary and highly conducive to the establishment of a regular political system, yet do we perceive that they, fingly and unfupported, cannot fuffice to create that due proportion of restraint on the power, or of impulse on the will of the deputed executive government, which is abfolutely neceffary to the perfect fuppreffion of tyranny, anarchy, and abuse. Nor is it poffible to complete this reftraint and impulse, to that fufficing degree, unless by a proper exertion of the fovereign's own supreme influence.

But we find that, upon the Company's system, the distance of situation renders the the influence of the fovereign altogether impotent to this effect : and if we should take it for granted that her fystem hath been just or complete, then must we conclude, that this fovereign impotence is a confequence naturally and unavoidably arifing from the diftance; and, therefore, above the remedy of art. But, if we confult our own reason, we shall perceive that the Company's impotence, in that particular respect, proceeded from a radical defect or error in her system; which might have been remedied by art. For, it is evident, that the distance of situation was in every circumstance fimilarly and equally obstructive to the Company's immediately or perfonally executing the government of that Indian dominion, as it. was to her immediately reftraining or enforcing the manner of execution : and yet we find that the Directors could discover a remedy for the first of these obstructions, by the fuccedaneum of appointing a deputed executive government. And, as the fecond fprung from the fame caufe, and was exactly fimilar in its nature, common sense must surely have instructed her, that it was to be removed by a fimilar remedy, medy: it being certain that, if the Directors had thought proper to inftitute in India a deputation properly qualified to controul their executive deputation, the meafures of those Indian governments might have been enforced or restrained by the sovereign residing in Europe, as effectually as they have been executed by the fame sovereign: that is to fay, as efsectually, as the defective constitution of the Company, (which equally disputations) could admit.

But it could not be ignorance, or want of common sense, that prevented the Directors from inftituting a controuling deputation of this nature : feeing they had before them the precedent of these other European nations, who hold any pofferfions in India: all of whom have provided fomething of this kind: for instance, the Dutch government at Batavia. Sound policy quickly pointed out to the Dutch, the abfurdity of committing the charge of their dispersed concerns in India, to a multiplicity of diffinct heads, all acting under no other constraint, or restraint, than that of the Company's Directors reliding in Europe.

Europe. Therefore, fo foon as the Dutch Company began to extend her poffeffions in India, she instituted one supreme government at Batavia, with full powers, and authority, to direct and controul the executive government of all her other fettlements. And this government acts in India as an intermediate power, betwixt the Company reliding in Europe, and her various possessions in that distant country; and as the perpetual refidentiary fupervifor of all her interests there. The Directors communicate all their purposes immediately to it : and it disperses orders and instructions to all the subordinate governments; which again transmit to it a regular account of their fituation, wants, or transactions. All governors, chiefs, &c. are immediately responsible to it : all appointments to, and removals from, office in the fuborninates, are made immediately by it : and all complaints or appeals, against the misconduct or injustice of these governors, are immediately addressed to it. In fine, it may be termed the center of the Dutch government in India. And though this government can in no shape be termed the complete model of a deputation, fit to

to controul or enforce the execution of fovereign government, in various territorial dominions; yet, to this inflitution, defective as it is, the Dutch owe it, that the government of their numerous fubordinate poffeffions in India hath been conducted, for about two hundred years, clear of any enormous abufe.

But if the Dutch and other European nations, which hold little other concern in India than a few settlements established there for the purpose of commerce, found it neceffary, for the regular management of these commercial concerns, to institute a sort of intermediate supreme power, as a local check on the rest of their settlements: how much more incumbent was it on the English Company, to constitute an immediate directing and controuling power, over the conduct of her deputies, who were entrusted with the charge of executing the fovereign government, of fundry mighty states ; a charge of fuch superior intricacy, weight, importance, and delicacy; and fo very liable to be abused.

What may have been the motive of the Directors for thus wilfully omitting an inftitution fitution fo evidently useful and neceffary, I shall not pretend to determine. Poffibly they might apprehend that if, upon their acquiring this mighty fovereign dominion, they fhould alter that which had been all along their commercial fystem, fuch alteration might induce the nation to enquire into the caufe of it, and fo difcover the nature of their dominion, which they have ever carefully hid from the pub-Though, it is more probable, they lic. might perceive, that the inftitution of fuch an intermediate power would greatly interfere with their own perfonal influence, power, and emoluments ; feeing it must have possessed the immediate disposal of places and posts, as well as a confiderable share in the direction of affairs : and, in order to prevent this, they preferved to themselves the power, of immediately fuperintending, and directing, the execution of government in those Indian dominions.

But whatever the motive of the Directors may have been, it is certain, that the want of a deputed controuling power in India, hath been a radical and grievous defect in their fystem : which hath produced duced a number of those evils that have been falfely ascribed to the distance of fituation. And though we are far from alledging, that it was poffible for the Company to establish in those countries a government in any degree regular, feeing that the numerous natural defects in her constitution, unavoidably producing many destructive abuses, must have ever proved an infuperable obstacle to that; yet do we affirm that, the inftitution of a duly qualified intermediate controuling power, would have totally prevented fome, and would have greatly diminished most, of these enormous abuses which, upon the fystem of the Directors, have served to ruin those countries.

Now we have feen that the national government would, by taking upon itfelf the charge of administring that Indian government, remedy or suppress all the abuses that have sprung from the defective conflictution of the Company, (besides creating other circumstances of high utility, that could not exist under the Company's government.) And as the distance of stuation, preventing the sovereign from immediately exerting his supreme influence over over the deputed executive government, is the only remaining caufe of evil or abuse; it is plain that, if it is possible to construct in India, a deputed power, upon fuch principles, as that it shall effectually and completely fupply the place of the fovereign, in immediately directing, enforcing, and controuling the measures of the deputed executive government, then must the only obstruction to the establishment of a regular political system, be remedied and removed. Confequently the grand defideratum, the only thing that is wanting, to enable the national government of Britain to regularly administer the government of those Indian dominions, is the inftitution of a deputed controuling power in India, properly qualified to fulfil the purposes that have been here specified.

And that it is poffible, to conftitute an intermediate power in India, that shall effectually and faithfully direct, enforce, and controul the measures of the deputed executive government in those Indian dominions, I doubt not to evince : though, at same time, I am fully sensible of the many real difficulties, arising from nature and and circumftance, to obstruct it; as likewife of the many artificial difficulties proceeding from the endeavours of those who have an interest to obstruct such a measure; and who have influence to enforce their objections, however suile, on the understanding of others.

But before we proceed to defcribe the plan upon which we mean to construct this controuling deputation, it will be neceffary to explain the extent of its charge, or number of the government's compofing that dominion which it is meant to controul. For tho', in our description of the Company's government in India, we confined our account to that of Bengal alone, as being the most important and best known part of her dominion; yet doth the Company posses, besides Bengal, certain other territorial governments, of no fmall value and importance, in respect of either revenue or commerce. All which governments being formed upon the fame fystem as that of Bengal, do not less demand reform, supervision, and controul.

For, in the first place, the government of Madrass possesses a very confiderable and and valuable territorial dominion, avowedly in the name and right of the Company. This fame government doth likewife, in every thing befide the name, poffefs the absolute sovereignty of that rich commercial province of Arcot, or the Carnatic, in which it is fituated : for, notwithstanding it tolerates a nominal Nabob, whose name it uses in most acts of government; and who, confequently, for the Company's convenience, posses the shadow of fovereignty; yet, as the government of Madraís holds the charge of defending the country, and maintains the military force requisite thereto, it is the actual fovereign: feeing that, in all Indian or Afiatic governments, he who holds the fword must be the absolute lord and master. And, notwithstanding all the Company's parade of appearances, this Nabob of Arcot is, in respect of sovereign power, as much a pageant as he of Bengal : a mere screen or blind, placed before the Company's fovereignty.

Bombay is likewife embarked in dominion, fince it feized on the rich commercial city of Surat, with its diffrict, &c. Though found policy must direct Britain to reprobate all territorial dominion on that fide of the peninfula; as caufing a dangerous division and weakening of her force and defence.

But the fame policy will inftruct Britain to regard dominion on the eaft fide of that peninfula in an oppofite light; becaufe, on that fide lay all the truly valuable dominions which fhe already poffeffes.

To fully explain what is the true interest of Britain, respecting territorial dominion in India, would be, here, foreign and tedious; and, to flightly touch on that fubject, might afford ground for censure and criticism: we shall only observe, in the general, that Britain ought to value only fuch dominion in India as is maritime: because, in the first place, these are ever . trading and manufacturing countries; and, as fuch, are highly useful to her proper commerce; they are likewife capacitated, by their own active foreign trade, to richly reimburse her for her expence of native ftfength in defending them, as well as for her trouble in governing them : and, in the fecond place, being acceffible to her naval force, they are eafily maintained and defended by her. Therefore, fo much of

of this maritime dominion as the can maintain and defend, without creating any additional expence of native ftrength; and, upon a footing fo connected with that truly valuable dominion which the already poffeffes, as not to caufe any dangerous divition of that original ftrength, fo much of this maritime dominion in India may be truly useful and advantageous to her; on any other terms it may be detrimental.

Such is the prefent state of British dominion in India: and fuch is the intereft of Britain, with respect to future augmentation of dominion in that country. And we have undertaken to plan the construction of an intermediate power or deputation, which, under the national government of Britain, shall effectually and faithfully fuperintend, enforce, and controul the measures of these several governments that, at prefent are, or in future may be, fubjected to Britain : and which deputation shall of course, in the first place, enable the national government of Britain to establish a regular system of political government over this whole prefent or future dominion : and, in the fecond place, shall constitute a complete system of military Q 2 military government, and secure defence, for all the several branches of this dominion. At present we are on the subject of political government.

The properties requisite to qualify this intermediate power, or deputation, for effectually fuperintending, enforcing, and controuling the political government of dominion in India, are, first, virtue and integrity, to faithfully and honeftly difcharge the duties of its office : and, fecond, power or ability, to effectually fulfil the purpose of its institution. The latter is more eafily conferred; but the former is rendered difficult, by fundry ob-Rructions, arifing from the nature or difposition of the persons who must necesfarily be employed to compose this deputation. For it is needlefs to obferve, that this controuling power cannot be lodged in the subjects native of the dependent dominion; the nature of the government, as well as the nature of their disposition, rendering that impracticable; (as hath been shewn): otherwise this difficulty might be more eafily furmounted. But, the Indian subjects being set aside, there remains no choice ; this controuling deputation must, per per force, be composed of British born subjects: whils the several governments, which it is meant to controul, are at same time executed by British born subjects. And, from this circumstance, it follows, that the personal interest of the party controuling must naturally be the very same, with that of the party controuled: and, of course, the views of both must likewise be the same.

This fimilarity or fameness of personal interest and views it is that creates the difficulty of conferring virtue, integrity, honour, and fidelity, on the controuling deputation. For it is morally certain, that the fimilarity of interest and views will, naturally and invariably, draw the party controuling, to concur and join, instead of controuling or opposing, the measures of the party executing, (feeing fuch meafures tend to promote that which is their common interest) provided that this party controuling shall posses the power, and opportunity of fo joining interest, with the party executing. And it is no lefs certain, that this controuling deputation must, unavoidably, possess the opportunity of thus joining interests, unless it can, by

by some means, be prevented and restrained from joining and uniting the action of its own proper powers, with the action of these powers that are proper to the executive office. Whereas, if it shall be found poffible to divide and feparate the action of these two different powers, the one from the other, in a manner fo diftinct, that each shall act, in the sphere affigned to it, with freedom and liberty; and neither shall have the opportunity of transgreffing the limits prescribed, to its own proper department, by the fovereign; then, and in fuch cafe, it is not only poffible, but certain, that this controuling deputation may, and will be, prevented from joining interests, with the executive deputation; and, confequently, from promoting the very measures which it was meant to restrain. And, from thence I conclude, that the only poffible and certain means of conferring, on this controuling deputation, virtue and integrity to faithfully and honeftly discharge the duties of its office, is to cut it off from all opportunity of joining the powers of its office, with those of the executive; or of asiuming any share in the executive government:

ment: in other words, it must be restrained from interfering, either directly or indirectly, perfonally or by proxy, in the immediate execution of measures, in any one of these governments which it is meant to controul.

But it is evident that, if this controuling deputation shall exist or reside within any one of those dominions whose government it is meant to controul, it will be morally impossible to prevent it from joining its powers, and, confequently, its interests, views, and measures, with the deputed executive power of that government where it refides. For, by virtue of its authority, which from the nature of its office must needs be fupreme over the executive deputation, it will usurp at least a part if not the whole power of execution : or otherwife it will, by confent, join and unite its powers with those of the executive, in order to promote their mutual interest, by measures diametrically repugnant to the purpose of its institution. Nor is it poffible, in this cafe, by any art, device or separation into parts, to prevent this usurpation or union : let the controuling power be termed judges, supervisors, officers officers of the revenue, or what elfe; and let the office of controuling be divided, into as many parts as can be conceived ; still, the difference of term, will not alter the nature of the men employed; nor will the division of parts sepaa rate their interest. All the various perfons, composing this office, will still be Europeans; the fame as thefe who compose the executive office; and fo, all the perfons in both offices will be foreign to the country governed, acting by an authority which is deputed mutable and temporary; confequently they will all hold the fame view; which is, to amass all the money they can during the fhort term of their office, in order to transport it to their own country: and as all of them would, by virtue of their refiding within the fame government, possess the fame powers, and the fame opportunities of exerting them, they would all be irrefistably attracted, by the omnipotent fympathy of felf-intereft, to join their feveral powers, in promoting that which is the common view of one and all of them. In fine, if these controuling and executive deputations, which thus, from the community of the natale Solum.

folum, hold one and the fame interest, shall both refide together in one and the fame government, and thereby poffess the fame opportunities, it will be equally impoffible to prevent these two deputations, however artfully separated into parts, from joining and uniting their different powers, &c. as it is to preferve feparate the guttæ of quickfilver; which, however gently and carefully they are dropt upon the fame confined and fmooth furface, will meet, join, and conglobate into one united mass. But if the controuling deputation shall be thus permitted to join its powers with these of the executive, and confequently forfeit its virtue and integrity, with respect to that one territorial government where it refides, it thereby becomes difqualified and unfit to controul the measures of any one other government: for the judge who is himfelf corrupt, is but little qualified to judge or punish corruption in others. I therefore conclude that, in order to preferve the virtue and integrity of this controuling deputation, it is indifpenfably neceffary that it should not refide within the limits of any one of these territorial govern-R ments;

ments; these being the governments which it is meant to controul.

On the other hand, it is equally certain. that this controuling deputation cannot exe cute in perfon, or affume any perfonal share in the execution of measures, in any one of those governments where it doth not actually refide; it being impoffible that it can act perfonally where it is not perfonally prefent. It therefore follows that, by fituating or placing this controuling deputation at a fufficiently proper distance from all these several territorial governments, it may be prevented from affuming a perfonal share in the immediate execution of measures in any one of them. And being thus, by the fituation of its refidence, cut off from all opportunity of acting perfonally, it may likewife be precluded from acting fecondarily, or usurping by proxy any influence, in the immediate execution of these governments, if it shall, after the manner of the Dutch government at Batavia, be strictly prohibited from exercifing its fupervising authority any where without the limits of its own fixed refidence; and from delegating or deputing its powers to any perfon or perfons.

fons, its own members or others, who shall refide, or may be beyond these prefcribed bounds. For though the fystem of the Dutch government at Batavia is, in many respects, far too rude and unpolished; yet is it, in this particular, most nicely circumfcribed : that government being reftrained, in the most precise manner, from delegating and transferring its authority; or from deputing any power to examine into cafes, of even the most dubious nature, within the fubordinates : but to obviate any inconvenience, that might otherwife arife from fuch restraint, it hath a power to call before it, from the fubordinates, all persons or records necesfary to information. For the Dutch were well aware, that the fupreme government, if it should be permitted to carry its fupervifing authority on any pretext into the subordinates, would gain an occasion of interfering in the execution of those meafures which it was intended to controul.

We must then perceive, that this controuling deputation being feated at a properly sufficient distance from all these territorial governments, and the exercise of its powers being expressly confined to that R 2 parparticular feat of refidence, it will, by fuch means, be effectually reftrained from interfering, in any shape, either directly or indirectly, in the execution of any one of those governments which it is intended to controul. And we must farther perceive that, by virtue of fuch effectual restraint, that clear separation of office, which alone can prevent the junction or union of the powers, interests, and views of this controuling deputation with those of the executive, will be completely accomplished. Seeing that, the action of the controuling power being frictly confined within the limits of its own proper sphere, the executive power must remain at full liberty to act diffinctly and freely in the office affigned to it by the fovereign.

The principal fource of corruption, and grand flumbling block of virtue, being thus removed, the integrity of this controuling deputation may be eftablished on a firm and folid basis, by skilfully dividing the parts which go to compose it: and, in particular, by clearly separating the political and judicial powers: which, if they shall be judiciously divided into two distinct departments, mutually independent and unin-uninfluenced, will, each of them, act as an effectual check, and powerful impulse, on the other: so as to prevent either from abufing its authority, or neglecting its duty. Whereas, if the political power should, at same time, possess the power of judging, trying and determining, or fhould even poffess any influence over the judicature, there is danger that it might, on fome occasions, sacrifice its duty to its intereft. And this is the very capital error of the Dutch fystem at Batavia, inasmuch as that government, poffeffing the judicial power, hath thereby the opportunity of perverting justice, fometimes to the prejudice of its conflituent, and often to the detriment of its fubordinates.

Nor would we be here underftood to fignify, by judicial power, a fimple court of judicature, eftablifhed for the purpofe of deciding litigated cafes of property; the judicial power here meant, must extend to every thing that refpects a due execution of the jurifdiction and police, in the fubordinate governments. Therefore its authority must not be passive, and confined to fuch matter as shall come before it by complaint; but it must be active, assuring ing cognizance of all public nuifance, trespass, or delinquency, that may be brought before it by information. For, here, juries may exift with great propriety and efficacy, feeing that the Company will, on account of her commerce, keep a number of fervants at this fupreme fettlement; there will likewife be, no doubt, many free merchants (as they are termed): and, confequently, there will never be wanting a choice of perfons unconnected with, and uninfluenced by the political government; and therefore fit to form a grand inquest; as well as petit or special juries, to decide in either criminal cases, or disputes of property. And this judicial power must farther be endued with . all proper and neceffary officers; particularly an attorney general: it must likewise be divided into distinct courts; refembling, as nearly as circumstances will admit, or occasion requires, the courts of justice in the fovereign country.

Neverthelefs, we do not prefume to dictate or prefcribe the exact or complete form of this judicial power: we would only hint at the main purpofes of its inftitution; a due confideration of which will readily fuggeft fuggest the particular form, to those whole province it may be to construct it. We shall only observe that, in order to confer a due weight on the judicial power. it is not fufficient that it should be independent, in its corporate capacity; the judges and officers composing it must, in their perfonal capacity, be placed as far as poffible beyond the influence of the political power. The falaries annexed to their offices must be fuch as will afford dignity, as well as independance: whilft, on the other hand, they shall be debarred, under the feverest penalties, from holding, either directly or indirectly, any place, post, emolument, or employment, of any nature. distinct from that of its own proper department. Moreover, the political power should hold no voice in conferring the degrees of this department: that should be vested in the judicial power itself, with reference to the confirmation of the fovereign.

This judicial power may be termed the fupreme Court of Judicature, for the whole British dominion in India : to which all the subjects, under the several governments, whether natives or Europeans, may readily readily appeal, against the oppression of their governors, or the perversion of justice: and, on which they may securely depend for redress; provided it shall be placed above the influence of the political power. This supreme court of judicature would likewise be of inexpressible utility, as a check on the power, and an impulse on the will, of the political branch.

We may add, that a judicious fubdivifion of the political power, into different departments, might contribute confiderably to its virtue.

Thefe are the outlines of that meafure, by which we propose to preferve this controuling deputation free from corruption : and we doubt not but, upon this plan, when meliorated and improved by the fuperior understanding of others, a controuling power may be constructed, which shall be completely qualified, in point of virtue and integrity, to faithfully and honourably superintend, enforce, and controul the execution of political government in those Indian dominions. And this is, by far, the most difficult, delicate, and important part of the undertaking. For,

[ 133]

For, as to the power and ability, requifite to qualify this deputation for effectually fulfilling the purpose of its institution, that is readily bestowed. The degree of power is altogether in the difpofal of the fovereign. And, its efficacy or ability depends, principally, upon the choice of fuch a fituation for the feat of its refidence, as shall enable it to keep up, at all feafons, a ready and fpeedy correfpondence with the feveral fubordinate governments.

With regard to the choice of fituation proper for the refidence of this controuling power; (which is indeed a point of high importance,) we shall readily conceive, from adverting to its nature and the purposes of its institution, that this residence ought to be some convenient sea port; fituated at a confiderable distance from the limits of all these territorial governments; but, at fame time, fo centrically near to each, that the communication, to and from it, shall, in either monsoon, be not only practicable, but certain and speedy. I shall referve the farther explanation of this intended feat of refidence, till I come to treat of the military fystem ; fystem; because there are some properties, particularly requisite to a proper centre of military defence: and it is proposed that the same power, and confequently the same refidence, that superintends the political government, should likewise direct the military government and defence, of this dominion.

But this fupreme controuling power being thus centrically fituated, with respect to the feveral fubordinates, as that it shall at all times hold a ready and fpeedy correspondence with each, will be thereby enabled to effectually superintend, enforce, and controul the execution of political government in that whole dominion. For, in the first place, the ready and speedy communication with all the fubordinates, affording to the supreme power an opportunity of obtaining, from each, the most early intelligence of every transaction, incident, or occurrence; as likewise of immediately transmitting the orders and inftructions, that may be fuitable to the occafion; will cut off from the feveral governors of the territorial dominions all pretext for acting diferentionally. And, in consequence, that despotic and arbitrary power, power, which hath fubfifted under the Company's fystem, will be completely fuppreffed. And, from adverting to this circumftance, we shall perceive the importance of a proper choice of fituation, for this fupreme center of government.

In the fecond place, this ready correfpondence with all the fubordinate governments, enabling the fupreme power to acquire a minute and complete knowledge of every circumstance, respecting the state and nature of the general police, in this whole dominion, will qualify it for originally planning, and for afterwards improving, all fuch defigns and meafures as can contribute to the inftitution of regularity and good order. It will likewife attain an intimate knowledge of the whole manoeuvre of finance, respecting the mode of collecting as well as appropriating the revenue and taxes : and it will be thereby enabled to project judicious forms, with different offices, as mutual checks upon each other, in that branch : which will ferve to remedy that incredible extortion, rapine, and peculation : which, by ruining the farmer of the lands, hath almost totally suppressed agriculture, and greatly S 2 depo-depopulated those miserable countries; whilft it hath grievously defrauded the forvereign of his right. And all these planned modes, being approved and confirmed by the fovereign, would be continued in vigorous and perpetual action, by the vicinity of the supreme political power : and all these feveral measures, being enacted into laws, the strict observance of them would be effectually enforced by the same vicinity. And thus, that supreme power will, not only establish, but perpetually conferve a just regularity in police, and an exact oeconomy in finance.

In the third place, the fupreme judicial power will, by its neighbourhood to thefe dependent dominions, acquire a juft knowledge of the modes, cuftoms, and difpofitions of the inhabitants; and, by that, it will be enabled to devife the beft forms or offices, together with fkilful rules for adminiftring the jurifdiction, in a manner truly effectual, and at fame time confonant and agreeable to the humour of the fubject. It will likewife be capable of afterwards improving and adding to thefe forms and rules, as future occafion may require, or better information may fuggeft. All which which forms or offices may, by the approbation of the fovereign, be established into standing courts; and the rules enacted into laws. And a punctual observance of all these laws enacted, either for the regular administration of justice, or confervance of the police, will be completely enforced, by the awe of this supreme tribunal: the communication with which, from all parts of that dependent dominion, being eafy and speedy, will afford a ready access and opportunity to all the fubjects, of presenting their complaints, against any oppression of their government, or denial, or perversion of justice : whilft the fame ready communication will render the trial of all litigated cafes, fpeedy and eafy. A mighty innovation this, from the former mode of justice in those dominions; when it was impossible for even Europeans to obtain redress, in our diftant precise European courts, against the most glaring oppression of government: and the natives were excluded from even that distant and deceitful prospect of remedy.

And in order that the course of justice may be rendered thoroughly complete, it may may be enacted, after the manner of the Dutch, that no perfon, who hath held any office of power or truft within the fubordinates, fhall depart immediately from thence for Europe; but fhall be obliged to repair to the fupreme refidence; there to remain for three months; to the end that any perfon or perfons who may, by any means, have been reftrained, during the existence of his office, from preferring their complaint against him, on the fcore of either public or private trefpas, may there have the free opportunity of profecuting him.

The fupreme political power shall immediately appoint to all offices, as well political as military, within the subordinate governments; with reference held to the future approbation, and confirmation, of the sovereign: and it shall preferve regular minutes of all such appointments, orders, and other transactions made in its supreme capacity; which minutes, together with regular and properly vouched accounts of the collection, as well as the appropriation of the revenue, shall be punctually transmitted, by every occasion, to the sovereign. The judicial power shall shall likewise keep an exact register of all trials, causes, and proceedings; more particularly those of the grand inquest and affizes: this latter to be figned by all the judges and officers of the court, and attested by the foremen, with a majority of the juries : two copies of which shall be regularly transmitted to Britain; one to the fovereign; and the other to the Company; which, as holding a material intereft and share in these law proceedings, hath a claim to fuch participation of knowledge. All which minutes, accounts, and proceedings, being communicated to the fovereign, will enable him to act as an ultimate check on the political government, the finance, and the jurifdiction of that Indian dominion.

Such is the form of this intermediate power, through which I propose to convey, into the execution of government in those distant Indian dominions, that plenary exertion of the sovereign's restraining and compelling power, which, alone, can suffice to prevent tyranny and anarchy. And notwithstanding the materials are, through hurry and want of time, rude, unpolished and coarfely arranged, yet do I statter myfelf, felf, that candour will allow them to be folidly good, proper, and fully fufficing to construct, at least, the groundplot, or basis, of a regular political system. Sure I am, the high propriety, nay the indispensable necessity of such a meafure, must immediately strike every perfon who employs his own judgment, however flightly, to confider, first, the nature, interests, and views of the executive government in those Indian dominions; as being foreign, deputed, mutable, and temporary. Second the timid, paffive, and flavishly submiffive difposition of the native subjects. And third, the distance of fituation, betwixt the fovereign refidence, and the fcene of government; which, rendering the immediate restraint and constraint of the fovereign perfectly impotent, confers on this foreign executive deputation an unlimited and arbitrary power, of promoting its own perfonal views and interest, by measures, which tend to the intolerable oppreffion of the wretched inhabitants, and the utter ruin of those subjected countries; as well as to the mighty detriment of Britain's dearest interest, and the blackest reproach to

to her reputation. Nor can all this be remedied or prevented, but by fuch a meafure as is here proposed.

And now we shall take a flight glance at the operation of this measure, on the jurifdiction, and police, of the subordinate dominions. And though, for the sake of perspicuity, we confine the view to Bengal alone, as being the most eminent part, yet will the effects be equally felt through the whole.

As to the fundamental eftablishments of Governors, Councils, &c. these are fufficiently obvious; as likewise are the proper chambers of revenue: and these, with the minutiæ appointments of inferior offices, will be more properly provided and improved, by the better judgment, true information, and future experience of the fupreme controuling power. Here we mean to offer only one or two hints on the mode of jurisdiction and police.

And first, with regard to the courts of justice, I should propose that the mayor's court at Culcutta should still subsist, as a court of equity for the whole country: and a most equitable court it is, if properly regulated: for the truth of which affer-T tion, tion, I appeal to all those who knew it previous to that alteration of the Company's charter of justice, which rendered it dependent on, and fubservient to, the Governor and Council: never was justice more exactly or more expeditionfly administered, than it was by this court, previous to that alteration. In order therefore to reflore it to its primitive utility, it ought to be reftored to its original state. Let the judges or aldermen, who at prefent compose it, continue such : being fervants to the Company, or free merchants, they must be unconnected with, and uninfluenced by the national government. And, in the cafe of death, or removal, the vacuum to be supplied by the court itself, from amongst the Company's servants, or free merchants only: and if any alderman shall, subsequent to entering on his office, accept of any post or place under government, let that be an express difqualification and vacation of his office; which is to be immediately made good, by the choice of another perfon, properly qualified. The newly elected aldermen to be presented, for acceptance, to the supreme court court of judicature only. And the officers of this court to be chosen by itself.

But as it would be impoffible for the mayor's court to difpatch all the bufinefs that might be brought before it, there ought likewife to be a court of law; confifting of a chief juffice, with three judges; to be appointed by the fovereign. And this court fhould guide itfelf, by fuch laws as may be enacted for the jurifdiction of those countries; otherwife by equity.

Appeals from this court of law, as well as that of equity, to be made immediately to the fupreme court of judicature; and from thence to his Majesty in council.

If it is thought proper, there might be another mayor's court, of the fame nature, established at Cossimbuzar, in the neighbourhood of the old capital, Maxadavad.

And as to the forms, for the more univerfal diffribution of juffice to the natives, thefe will be adjusted by the fupreme fupervising power; as before mentioned. We shall only observe, that their courts of Zemindary and Cutchery are, as they stand at prefent, a grievous nuisance.

But

But the nobleft inftitution for protecting the liberty and property of the fubject, from the extortion and oppreffion of their foreign government, and of its inferior train of native harpies, who are infinitely more rapacious than the Europeans, would be that of juries, properly constructed. Let the grand inquest of, the country be held at Culcutta, four times in the year : and let the juries, both grand and petit, be expresly composed of Company's fervants, or free merchants, Europeans, and none others: the judges of law, or at least two of them, to sit on the affizes ; the sheriff to be chosen annually, from amongst the Company's servants.

The powers of this grand inqueft, if adapted to the fituation of things, muft be enlarged beyond thefe of our juries in Britain; where there are judicial and political aids, that muft be wanting in thofe countries: for inftance, the enquiry muft not be confined to place, but muft extend every where through the country : it muft likewife have authority to bring before it all manner of nuifance or trefpafs committed against the liberty or property of the fubject, natives as well as Europeans. And And the judges should have no power to reject or postpone the bills, found by the grand jury : but should bring them on to decifion, in turn, as prefented. Moreover, as the extent of enquiry may render it impoffible for the more diftant defendant to appear with his evidences, during the fitting of that affize to which the bill hath been presented against him; let fummons be isfued, upon the bill's being presented, for fuch diftant defendant to appear at next affizes ; or let some other method be found, either by means of the grand jury's meeting a sufficient time before the commencement of trials, or by fome extraordinary power vested in the judges or sheriff to produce fuch distant defendant with his evidences in due time. And as this fame extent of enquiry may, on the other hand, produce inconvenience to the fubject, by affording occasion to litigious persons of distreffing others, by bringing them from a great distance to these affizes, on frivolous or ill grounded complaints, it may be ordered that, where the caufe shall appear to the court truly litigious, the plaintiff shall be bound over to stand fuit at law, for damages to the defendant : and, one or two examples, examples, of this nature, will prove a barr to frivolous litigation.

And leaft the judges should, by any means, be influenced to act that part which the Company's governor and council commonly act, when they abfurdly preside at these affizes, as his Majesty's judges in their own cause; namely, to difmiss the Court, so foon as the grand jury shall find a bill that may be disagreeable to them; it may be ordered that neither the judges, nor any officer of the Court, shall have power to adjourn the affizes, until all the trials shall be decided; or, otherwise, by the confent of a majority in both juries.

The principal check however upon the conduct of these affizes, would be that of obliging the Court to keep exact registers, of all trials, and proceedings; figned and attested, as before mentioned. And if any part of either jury shall except to the authenticity of such register, which shall be publickly exposed in the Court, then, such differing part shall have a right to protest, and affign its reasons. Three copies of which register, with protest, (if any,) shall be dispatched, by the earliest occasion, after each affize. One copy to the the fupreme Court of Judicature; which will, thereby, have the earlieft notice of any abufe; and, with the concurrence of the fupreme political power, fhall have the opportunity of immediately correcting it. A fecond copy fhall be transmitted to the fovereign; who will act as an ulterior check on the fupreme controuling power. And a third copy to the Company for the reasons before specified.

But, as this fingle inquest at Calcutta cannot poffibly carry justice to the extremes of that extensive country, circulating affizes may be held, at least once, or if possible twice a year, at Muxadavad as the center, and at Patnah as the northern extreme; two judges to go this northern circuit: and the other two judges to go on an eastern circuit, at Dacca. And, as there may not be a fufficient number of Company's fervants, properly qualified, to form complete juries at thefe northern and eastern affizes : I would propose that, to make up any such deficiency, natives should be mixed with the Europeans. Which mixture, if it shall be artfully tempered, in the following manner, would produce all the efficacy of entirely tirely European juries; and, at fame time, none of the bad effects, that might be apprehended, from an attempt to confer freedom and impartiality on juries entirely native.

Let, at least, one half of both the grand and petit juries be Europeans; and the remaining part natives : and if it should happen, that there cannot be collected, at the affize factory, and from the neighbouring inferior factories, fo many Company's fervants as shall make up half the usual number of jurymen; then, let the whole number be diminished, to the fufficing half of Europeans. Let the unanimity of verdict, in fuch mixt juries, be dispensed with; and let the majority of voices, in either jury, find the bill or verdict; as is the cuftom in Scotland. And let an additional provision be made to the oath of the juryman, purporting that he shall not, on any account, disclose the opinion given by any individual, in the jury room.

By this artful mixture, and these precautions, the native jurymen would be liberated from that flavish dread, of future revenge from their own countrymen employed ployed under government; seeing it would be impoffible, for these native officers of government, to discover the particular opinion of each individual; which, if the juries were entirely native, they would infallibly do, to the utter ruin of the poor native jurymen. So that the native Jurymen, acting thus with freedom, under the cloke and protection of the Europeans, would answer all the effectual purposes of. Europeans. Whilst, being sensible that they owed their freedom and impartiality, together with all the other benefits arifing from juries, to their connection with the Europeans; this freedom conferred on them in the jury room, would not in the least diminish their awe and deference to government. The proceedings at these circuit affizes to be registered and transmitted in like manner as at Calcutta.

These juries would prove the Magna Charta, the palladium, and true security of Indian liberty and property, against the despotisin and extortion of their foreign government. And it evidently appears, that the virtue of these juries, (as being, at one and the same time, truly effectual to the subject, and perfectly safe to the U sovefovereign,) entirely depends upon the circumstance, of completely excluding the Company and her fervants, from the fmallest participation in the executive powers of government. But the efficacy of these juries, and of other inferior institutions made through the supreme controuling power, being once felt and known, would fpeedily induce the natives to purchase perpetual property in lands: feeing they would perceive themfelves thoroughly fecured in the produce of those lands. And this, being divulged abroad, would draw the inhabitants of the neighbouring countries to the standard of Britain; together with their wealth, and industry. By which means the British dominion in India, which, at present is, through oppreffion and confequent famine, in a great measure deserted and depopulated, would again be completely peopled and cultivated: arts, manufactures, and commerce would foon be reflored to their former state ; nay, they would be extended to a degree far superior: and these countries would, of course, be enabled to richly repay Britain for the bleffings conferred by her, of perfect fect fecurity in liberty and property; bleffings, never before known in India.

And all this may be effected by means of that intermediate fupreme controuling power: which would, not only create, but preferve, the full and vigorous efficacy of all these institutions, in the subordinate dominions. Whereas, if it was even poffible, (though indeed it is morally impoffible,) to inftitute, by any temporary means, all these powers, forms, rules, and regulations in those dominions, yet is it evidently certain that, fo foon as thefe temporary means were withdrawn, the virtue and efficacy of all these institutions would immediately vanish, and be suppreffed by the power of the executive government; which, from the nature of things, must unavoidably be, either defpotic over the native fubjects, or cannot exift at all.

But this fame controuling power, as it would, on the one hand, by its fixed refidence in the immediate neighbourhood, perpetually preferve the action and motion of all these institutions, like to a power ever present to wind up the springs of the machine; and, so, would check all the  $U_2$  bad bad effects of that naturally necessary defpotifm in executive government : fo would it, on the other hand, effectually support the power and authority of that executive government; and prevent its being encroached on, by an over exertion of the privileges conferred on the fubject. For, on this fide too, there is a danger; which will be readily comprehended, by those who confider the nature of government; and, at same time, the disposition of human nature. But all danger, of preponderating either scale, would be prevented, by the vicinity of the controuling power: which, holding the balance in its hands, and nicely diminishing from one, or adding to the other scale, would ever preferve a just equilibrium, betwixt the liberty of the subject, and the power of government.

Nor would the inftitution of new regulations be the only means, in the hands of the controuling power, of preventing the dangerous over exertion of privilege: it would likewife poffers the inftantaneous power of feizing, or otherwife of ordering to its own refidence, all fuch perfons as thould prove over troublefome, or dangerous to to the due authority of executive government. For, though it would be extremely abfurd to truft a power of this nature, immediately in the hands of executive government; which would, infallibly, employ it to its own worft purpofes : yet might fuch power be fafely trufted to this controuling government; which could not have the fame motives to abufe it.

Neverthelefs we do not mean that this, and all thefe other powers, fhould be unlimitedly confided to this controuling deputation: we ftill preferve a check over it, in the national government. And a most effectual check too; by means of the beforementioned copies of registers, immediately transmitted to Britain, from the fubordinates; as likewife by its own minutes, accounts, and registers.

So that here would be a regular gradation of effectual political checks. The privilege of juries, and other inflitutions in the fubordinate dominions, being preferved in vigorous action, by the influence of the intermediate controuling power, would prove an effectual check on the defpotifm or extortion of executive government; and would thus completely fecure the the liberty and property of the fubject. And the fame influence of the controuling power would fufficiently check the luxuriancy of privilege; and fupport the power of government; thus preferving an exact poife betwixt both. Whilft the fovereign, at a diftance, could deliberately and effectually watch the hand that trimmed the fcales.

And thus the inftitution of this intermediate controuling and impelling power, would completely remove every obstruction arifing from the distance of situation : it would serve as an intermediate link of the political chain : or, as a bridge of communication, joining this dependent Indian dominion to the fovereign country. But, all obstruction arising from the distance of situation being thus removed, what difficulty can the national government of Britain find, in administring the political government of that Indian dominion? Upon this plan, that task appears to me more facil, less pregnant with difficulty, charge, or care, than it is to govern any one, the most pretty, of our foreign Colonies: nay it appears equally eafy, as it is to govern the neighbouring Isle of Man :

Man : feeing that the oppofition of the fubjects, to the authority of government in this Indian dominion, though they be fo infinitely more numerous, is not greater than is the opposition of the few fubjects in Man. The only difficulty, that could exift to national government, was that of duly tempering, or abating, the power of the deputed executive government: and it appears, that this may be completely effected by means of this intermediate controuling power; which, in the hands of the fovereign, would act upon the government of this Indian dominion as the pegs or keys upon the strings of a mufical inftrument; of which one being gently strained, and another properly relaxed, would create, and perpetually preserve, a perfect harmony, or concord, in this political fystem.

AND OF

SECURE DEFENCE,

INDIA.

HE Company's system of military government and defence in India is, at least, equally defective, faulty, and abfurd; and, therefore, doth equally demand reformation, as doth her political system. For the fame caufe that renders the power of the Company's feveral deputed governors perfectly arbitrary and difcretional, in civil matters; namely, the Directors having preferved to themfelves the charge of immediately directing and fuperintending those governments; confers, upon these deputed governors, a like arbitrary and difcretional power, in military matters. And furely it is impoffible to conceive any thing more ridiculoufly extravagant vagant, than is this military fyftem of the Company; which affords to each governor, of four different capital fettlements, the abfolute, independent, and difcretional power, of applying the military force of his own government; and likewife of directing the measures of defence : whils, each, of these four governors, holds a particular interest of his own; which is, not only diftinct from, but opposite to that of all the others.

Can it be supposed that four men, thus oppofite in their perfonal views and interefts, and thus independent of each other, should heartily concur in general measures; or should cordially unite in a system of common defence? Common fense informs us that they will not; and experience convinces us that they do not. For it hath been known that one, of these settlements, hath furnished arms and ammunition; and hath otherwise befriended a power, at open war with one of the others. And, in the cafe of any one of these settlements being attacked, the others are extremely backward in fupporting it; becaufe each, of the four governors, giving the preference to his own particular charge, X charge, in which his own perfonal intereft is more immediately concerned, confiders all communication of his force, to any of the other fettlements, as a diminution of his own fecurity, and even of his importance. So that, upon fuch terms, the union betwixt thefe four diftinct, and mutually independent, governments, can fcarcely be termed federal.

Moreover, each of these four governors posseffes, within the limits of his own government, the diferetionary power of making war and peace. And, fo, hath the opportunity, whenever it shall fuit the purpose of his own personal interest, to pick a quarrel, and engage his government in war, with fome one of the neighbouring native states. Nor is this an imaginary evil; or a fimple fuppofition of what may poffibly happen; it is a real cafe; an abuse that hath actually existed. For we can produce several instances where these governors, more particularly on the coaft of Cormondel, have commenced, and industrioully protracted, wars with the neighbouring flates, expressly for the purpose of plunder and peculation,

And,

And, from this diferetionary power of peace and war lodged in the hands of these feveral governors, and the confequent abufe thereof, flow the following evils to the fovereign. First, the governor, thus warring, exhaufts and confumes the treafure of his conftituent; to the end that he and his affociates, may gain occasion to pocket a part. Second, by these offenfive wars, he waftes and deftroys that force, which was intended by the fovereign for defence : and, thereby, exposes his own charge, naked and defenceless, to the attack of other enemies. And third, by these wanton unnecessary and unjust wars, he provokes the hatred and jealoufy of all the neighbouring states; and, thus, converts into enemies, those native powers, who would, otherwife, be amicable and friendly to the fovereign.

To correct thefe, and many other abuses of a like nature, which flow from this abfurd military fystem of the Company, it is evidently and indifpenfably neceffary, that there should be instituted, one fupreme head of military government. Which, being vefted with the fupreme power of making peace and war in India, X 2 fhall shall reftrain these feveral territorial governors, from engaging in unnecessary wars with their neighbours. And which, poffeffing the supreme direction of the common force, shall, in the case of particular or general danger, apply that force to the most proper and necessary purposes.

Now it is naturally proper, that the fame intermediate supreme power, which superintends the political government, should likewife supremely superintend the military government, and defence, of those Indian dominions. And, for this latter purpose, the choice of a proper situation, for the refidence of that supreme power, becomes likewife a point of most effential consequence. For it is evident, on the one hand, that this military superintending power ought not to exist in any one of these territorial governments; nay it ought not to refide in the immediate neighbourhood of any one rich native state; because, in either of these two fituations, it is liable to be tempted, by views of avarice or ambition, to apply the general force, to its own perfonal purpofes; and, if fo, the cure would be worfe than the difease : and, on the other hand, it is no no lefs evident, (from the reafons affigned on the fimilar head in the political fyftem) that this fupreme military power ought to be fituated fo centrically near, to all the feveral territorial governments, as that it may, at all times and feafons, be capable of keeping up a ready and fpeedy correfpondence with each.

The distant and unconnected fituation, of these four capital governments, is likewife a mighty obstruction to a fecure fyftem of defence. For, the wind, blowing in those seas for fix months from one quarter of the compass, and for the other fix months from the oppofite quarter, doth, alternately, cut off in a great measure all naval communication betwixt these four governments. For inftance, during the violence of the fouth west monsoon, that is, from the middle of April till the middle of July, it is almost impracticable for ships to pass from Bengal to Madrass : and, during the three more moderate months of that monfoon, this paffage is difficult and tedious. And during the north caft monfoon, the paffage is much the fame from Madrafs to Bengal. But the communication betwixt Bombay, and these two.

two settlements, is still more obstructed. For Bombay, being fituated in lat. 19 deg. north, on the west fide of the peninfula of India, it is almost impossible, from the latter end of November till the middle of February, for ships from Bombay, bound for the Bay of Bengal, to round the island of Ceyloan: and, for the other three months of the north east monsoon, they are obliged, in order to weather Ceyloan, to stand over to the eastward almost as far as Atchen head, and back again to the island; a run of about 20 degrees. From the end of April till August, it is almost impracticable for ships from the Bay and bound for Bombay, to round Ceyloan; and in the other three months of the fouth west monsoon, that passage is difficult and tedious. And, even in the fair paffage, the run betwixt Bengal and Bombay is feldom made in less than a month. Moreover, during the force of the fouth west monfoon on the west fide of the peninfula, that is, from the middle of May till the middle of August, it is extremely dangerous for thips to attempt running in for Bombay : the weather being then fo extremely thick, that fometimes a folar obfervation fervation cannot be obtained for feveral days together: and if a fhip fhould, in fuch circumftances, run in for the land, which in fuch weather is not diftinguifhable at three leagues diftance, and fhould mifs the opening of the harbour, which is but fmall, it is more than probable that fhe would not be able to clear the fhore, with the wind blowing fiercely right on, and rolling before it a heavy fea. As to Bencolen, circumftances are nearly the fame with it, as betwixt Bengal and Madrafs.

Now it is evident, that this obftructed naval communication, betwixt the four chief governments muft, in many refpects, greatly weaken the common defence : and muft greatly augment, to the fovereign, the charge, in both men and money, of maintaining and defending those dominions and possefilients. Seeing it must neceffitate him to keep up, in each of those governments, a force fufficient to defend it against the whole united strength of an offensive enemy, without trusting to any aid from the others : because, otherwise, he runs the risk of losing them all fingly, fingly, to a force that can overpower but one of them.

But all the danger, inconveniences, and extraordinary expence, arifing from this obstructed naval communication, may be obviated and removed, by establishing one supreme center of military defence; so fituated, with respect to the several parts of those truly valuable territorial dominions, as that the communication betwixt it and them shall, in either monsoon, be not only practicable but fpeedy and eafy. For it is evident that, in fuch a fituation, this supreme center of defence could, at all times, receive fpeedy notice of any impending danger, or actual attack; and that, upon fuch notice, it could immediately transport its own garrison, by sea ; as well as collect aid from the other fettlements. So that the garrifon of this fupreme center of defence would act as an army of observation; ever ready to pour in, at any quarter, on the back of an aggreffive enemy. And, of courfe, fuch a center of defence must connect, and unite, the strength of all the feveral parts of British dominion in India.

Now

Now it appears that, the fituation of refidence, becomes a circumstance, highly effential to the efficacy of each purpofe, proposed from this supreme intermediate power. And it farther appears that one, and the fame, fituation is required, for all these several purposes: seeing that, from a convenient naval port, fituated at a proper distance from the limits of all the territorial governments; and, at fame time, fo centrically near to each, that the communication with all the feveral parts of dominion will be fpeedy and eafy; this fupreme power would, in the first place, completely and effectually, faithfully and honourably fuperintend, enforce, and controul the measures of political government, as well as the conduct of military government: and, in the fecond place, it would unite and connect the general frength of those dominions, and completely secure the defence of the whole.

But, of the feveral fettlements poffeffed by the Company in India, Bengal and Madrafs are evidently difqualified for this feat of refidence; not only becaufe the communication betwixt them and the other fettlements is, at certain feafons, altogether cut Y off; off; but because they are, themselves, territorial governments; and therein, the very object to be controuled. Bencolen is, in every respect, out of the question. And, there then remains only Bombay; which is fo far possessed of the properties requisite to this refidence, in that it is, at prefent, not greatly embarked in territorial dominion; and is, likewise, a sea port. But in respect of communication, with the truly valuable possessions of Britain in India, Bombay is altogether unfit to be either the refidence of the supreme controuling power, or yet the center of defence; as must appear from the preceding description; which was more particularly enlarged, for the express purpose of evincing this, Far from being a proper center of defence, all the force that is lodged at Bombay becomes detached, and completely loft to the defence of Britain's truly valuable possessions; at least on any sudden emergency. Indeed Bombay is, in every thing, respecting either dominion or commerce, a dead load, and useless fettlement; faving it be for the fole purpose of a naval port, or a place for refitting our squadrons.

But the choice of Bombay for a naval port, is the most dangerous and fatal error, in the whole abfurd fystem of the Company's defence : feeing that, by this abfurd choice, Britain loses the use of her naval force; which is her capital ftrength of defence, against the attack of France, her only dangerous enemy in India-As will appear-It is impossible that ships, the best fitted from Europe, can subfist, in those feas, for two years, without a thorough repair: and more particularly in time of war; when action hath happened, and is again expected. And this thorough repair they cannot obtain but in a naval port, properly filled with docks, or careening platforms. Bombay is the only naval port, thus fitted by Britain, in India; consequently the squadron of Britain must retire, at least every second year, to Bombay, for repair. But the British fquadron being once retired to Bombay, (as is common, in October,) which is fituated in lat. 19 degrees north, on the west fide of the peninfula; it is as effectually excluded, for five months, from the bay of Bengal, and more particularly from Bengal itself, as if it was still in Europe. And, Y 2 during during these five months, the enemy may either fcour that Bay with fingle cruizers, or fhe may transport, and, without oppofition, land a force in Bengal; and these faid five months are the very fittest in the whole year for land operations. This must be thoroughly underftood by all those who are acquainted with the navigation of those feas: and could be here readily demonstrated; was it not that, by publickly pointing out our own weaknefs, we should point out to the enemy her strength. It is most certain that, if France understands her own advantage, (and it is to be apprehended she is but too well acquainted with it) fhe may either wafte and confume theBritish squadron, through preventing its repair; or otherwise she may effect every purpose, against Bengal, nay against Madrafs, with as great fecurity, as if there was no British squadron in India: ever so long as Britain shall continue her only naval port at Bombay. Nor is there any al-For as to that ridiculous noternative. tion, of carrying a squadron of large ships up the river of Bengal to repair, no commander in his senses would, in the time of war, when he expected to be equally matched matched by the enemy, fo foon as the feafon arrived, incur the rifk of lofing fome of his ships, in the passage up and down that incredibly dangerous river; and still lefs would he fubject himfelf to the certainty of lofing half his hands, by that putrid unhealthy air at Culpee, or Ingelee. Neither would he be mad enough, in the while of a hot war, to use that dangerous expedient, of half repairing at Trincamalay; where he is liable to be furprized by an enemy, in the act of repairing. In fine, fo long as Bombay continues to be our only naval port, our commanders must, of necessity, either waste and lose their squadron; or else they must retire to Bombay, at the leaft, once in two years; and, thereby leave the feas, with all our valuable possessions in the Bay of Bengal, freely exposed to the attack of an enemy, for five months.

It therefore follows that, if Britain means to avail herfelf of her naval force, which is the principal defence of her dominion and commerce in India, the muft establish a proper naval port, on the east fide of the peninfula; because, on that fide lay all her truly valuable possessions, and and commerce. And that port, which I mean to propole, is in every respect completely qualified for this purpole: though I cannot, in this publication, specify the place; less the enemy should anticipate, and take the advantage of our shameful neglect.

I am fenfible it will be immediately exclaimed that we have already too many poffeffions in India; and that this is no time to increase our settlements there; and thereby to increase the drain of our native strength, as well as the expence of treafure.

But, to this, I anfwer, that this new eftablifhment would not encreafe the number of our capital fettlements in India: on the contrary, it would diminifh it, from four to three: for it would fupprefs, in the firft place, Bombay; which is in every refpect a truly ufelefs fettlement; and would therefore be exchanged for this new fettlement; which would ferve to connect the whole ftrength of this dominion; as well as to promote a variety of other very important purpofes. In the fecond place, Bencolen would be reduced to the degree of a fubordinate, immediately under the direction direction of the refident at this new fettlement; and completely fecure under its protection.

As to the drain of native ftrength, this eftablifhment would, inftead of adding, confiderably decreafe it : for the garrifon, together with the artillery, &c. of Bombay, would be transported thither; as likewife would the better part of the garrifon at Bencolen : and these two garrifons, being placed there, would form an army of obfervation, for all our valuable possefilions, as hath been described; consequently the territorial governments would not demand that degree of force, which is requisite at prefent, when each stands on its own bottom.

And with regard to the expence of treasure, I shall only observe that, it is most unaccountably absurd in Britain to fend out to India, a squadron of 17 ships of the line, besides frigates, (as she did in last war,) for the protection of her dominion and commerce in that country; which squadrons become evidently unprofitable to that purpose, through the circumstance of wanting a properly situated naval port; when less than a single year's charge, of such such squadron, would suffice to completely fit up a naval port, fo fituated as that, from thence, her naval force would completely effect its intended purpose. For I affirm, that the port which I propose would be completely fitted up, in every respect, as a naval port, for less expence than one year's charge of fuch fquadron; feeing that I do not propose docks, but platforms for careening, as at Batavia; and these are prepared, in infinitely lefs time, and at much lefs charge than docks; whilft they are far more convenient and expeditious for repairing large ships, than these docks at Bombay. And, as to the fortification immediately requifite, it would be but little expensive, and would demand but little time to rear it : because it would be perfectly acceffible to the fhips; and fo, whilft it protected them, would be protected by them.

Moreover no part of the treasure, expended on originally fitting this naval port, would come immediately out of Britain's proper treasury; for the whole would be defrayed by the dependent dominion in India. And this new establishment would, in a very little time, not only support its own own charge, but would richly reimburfe Britain for her original coft. Seeing it would, in the first place, as a colony or fettlement, yield her immediate treasure, together with fundry commodities peculiar to itfelf; and, in a little time, it would, under proper conduct, produce rich manufactures. In the fecond place, it would, as an Emporium, (for which purpose it is perfectly adapted by its fituation,) greatly improve the commerce of Britain in India: and as a centrical magazine or warehouse, for the commodities of China as well as India, it would reduce the term of the Company's voyages to one year ; and, thereby, reducing the expence of her carriage nearly one third, it would enable her to fell cheaper ; and confequently advance her commerce in Europe. Likewife the Company's ships rendezvousing and departing from this port for Europe, under proper convoy, this would fecure her trade from that imminent danger to which it is exposed, from her ships rendezvousing fingly, at that button of an island, St. Helena : a circumstance that may, in the very first year of a French war, completely ruin this Company; as Z that that enemy is now perfectly acquainted with her route. Now Bombay is perfectly ufelefs to all thefe, and indeed to every other purpofe; as can be readily demonftrated: and the whole benefit derived from it, as a colony or fettlement, in the year, doth not fuffice to defray one month's expence.

But this new establishment, being once fitted up as a naval port, from whence the squadrons of Britain can, in either monfoon, command all her valuable poffeffions; this fame establishment would, at same time, completely fuit for the refidence of that fupreme intermediately fuperintending power. For this port is fituated, at fuch a diftance from all the territorial governments, as would fuffice to effectually prevent the controuling power, from interfering in the immediate execution of government. And, having faid that it is perfectly well fituated for a naval port, it follows that the communication, betwixt it and all the parts of the British dominion in India, must be speedy and easy, in either monfoon: and confequently that, from this refidence, this fupreme power can effectually superintend, enforce, and controul the measures of political, as well as of military, government, in this whole dominion. And, being the center of naval defence, it must be the only proper center of land defence : feeing the fquadron will be ever at hand, to transport its land force, to any part of this dominion, that may be in danger.

And thus have I accomplished that which I proposed : having planned the defign of an intermediate power which, in fuch a fituation as hath been described, would establish a completely regular system of government, civil as well as military, in the whole present or future dominion of Britain in India: nay which would, in the hands of national government, render the task of governing this Indian dominion, as facil and eafy, as it is to govern the fmall Isle of Man. And, the feat of its refidence being at fame time the center of naval and land defence, it would completely connect the, otherwife, divided strength of the several governments: and would eftablish the general defence, upon a footing fo fecure, that no enemy, either European or native, would dare to attack British dominion in India. It likewife appears that the drain of native ftrength, Z 2 ftrength, requifite to maintain this whole dominion, would but little exceed that which Britain expends on maintaining the two barren fortreffes, of Gibraltar and St. Philips's. Whilft no part of the pecuniary charge, of either eftablifhing or afterwards fupporting this fyftem of government, nor yet of the land and even naval defence, would come out of the treafury of Britain; but would all be defrayed by the dependent dominion.

I have farther demonstrated the moral impossibility of governing and maintaining this Indian dominion, by means of the Company; upon any other terms, than these, of constituting her sovereign at home as well as abroad; and of conferring, upon her Directors, the sovereign execution of government in Britain, as well as in that dependent dominion.

And I have endeavoured to rouze and awake the nation, to fome fenfe of, and regard to, the intereft fhe holds in this Indian dominion; by a flight defcriptive fketch of the nature, and degree, of benefit received by her from it, for fome years paft. And, as the fenfation received from fact and experience makes ever a ftronger imprefimprefiion on the mind, than that which is conveyed by fpeculative argument, I shall here again apply to the experience of the public, on this topic; which cannot be too much inculcated, nor prefented in too many different points of view; at this truly critical juncture, when nothing less than the most speedy application, of the most vigorous measures, can prevent the total loss, of this most important object to Britain; either through the final ruin of the countries themselves; or, otherwise, by the affault of enemies.

Britain feels a general failure of credit, not only in the East India Company, but in individuals : and this failure of credit fhe can ascribe to no other cause, than to fome extraordinary defect of numerical circulation, or a deficiency of numerical specie, sufficient to support the wonted credit of paper. How happens this want of numerical specie to be fo feverely felt, all of a sudden; or from whence should fuch defect arife? Affuredly from a decrease of her wonted influx of numerical specie; whilst her drain of that specie continues to be at least the fame as formerly. But what channel or fource, of Britain's Britain's influx, hath been dried up fo fuddenly, as to create this furprizing failure of numerical circulation? We have shown it to originate in Indian dominion; which being, through mifgovernment, reduced to a ruinous state, the consequent wonderful decrease of revenue, hath obliged the Company, to abforb and dry up that channel of Indian private fortunes; which, till within these two years, used to convey into Britain, by foreign Company's bills, &c. at least 7,00,000 l. per annum, in numerical specie, or what is equivalent. And as Britain hath, during the two years that this channel was dried up, been continuing that drain, which the could barely fupport, when aided by that private fortune influx, it is plain that, within these two years, she must have diminished the standing flock of her numerical circulation, at least, 1,400,000 l. And one year, more of only an equally decreafed degree of influx, will diminish her circulating stock 2,100,000 l. and fo on. But a total deprivation of the influx received, for fome years past, from Indian dominion, will, annually, double the diminution of circulating flock.

And;

And, from this view, the nation may draw the following just inferences : first, the mighty value and importance, of this Indian dominion, to Britain; in point of financial aid ; as well as in other weighty respects. Second, the mighty alteration of circumstances, in these Indian countries, fince the time they became fubjected to the dominion of the Company; as alfo, the present ruinous state of that dominion. And from these two inferences she may deduce, that conclusion which hath been just mentioned, that nothing less than the most speedy application of the most vigorous and effectual measures, can poffibly fave those countries from final ruin; and Britain from confequent bankruptcy, poverty, loss of credit, of commerce, navigation, naval power, &cc.

I have, in this hafty production, fketched out the nature of the neceffary measures; but the application of these measures depends entirely upon the nation's exerting her own attention. I am far from meaning to work upon the passions, I apply only to the reason and understanding of men; for had not respect to decorum, and to the dignity of government, restrained me, I might, might, on this fubject, have thrown out many things, that muft have excited difcontent and indignation. Neverthelefs the importance and urgency of the cafe obliges me to add, (and, without this, all I have faid can avail nothing,) that unlefs the nation shall exert herfelf most vigorously in this her own dearest concern, she must not look for any such effectual measures, as will fuffice to prevent these difasters.

For the nation must confider, that her prefent administration confists of the very men who transacted, and (by their truly reverberating eccho) confirmed, to the Company, the second * grant of the Dewanny: knowing that this Dewanny was nothing other than the sovereignty of a

* We must make a wide difference betwixt the first and fecond grants of this Dewanny, (as it is termed.) The first grant was made for only two years, at a time when the then ministry were in a great measure unacquainted with the nature of the thing which they granted : having been deceived by base art : nor did this ministry, in the course of their administration, exert any manner of ministerial influence over the Directors. But far different were the lights, as well as the conduct of that ministry which, on the expiration of the first two years, renewed that grant for the long term of five years.

mighty dominion, dependent upon the Crown, and Nation, of Britain : and, confequently that, by fubjecting the numerous inhabitants of those countries to the dominion of a few merchants, incapable of administring any fort of government, they were configning over to tyranny and anarchy, intolerable oppression and ruin, many millions of men, who were, to all intents and purposes, subjects of Britain. And they are the men who, during the four years that elapsed fince that grant, have furnished the force to support this tyranny and anarchy : and, in spite of wherein the Directors were compelled to perform the fame part in Europe, that the native Nabobs have exhibited in India. It cannot, therefore, be expected that they will, willingly, change their plan of conduct : feeing that, befides their former motives, they have the additional one of obftinacy; or fhame of ftanding felf-condemned, for paft mifmanagement, fhould they now alter their meafures. It is rather to be fuppofed that they will continue the cloke of the Company; together with the Directorial farce : and that, to fupport

the broken credit of the Company, (broken by collusive management,) they will, through eccho, grant her a power, to force her paper upon the public, for its money. As also that, under the pretext of honouring the nation with some share in the charge of this fovereignty, (under the Company, but no share in the profits,) they will gradually thrust her shoulders under that whole load, which, as the Company must manage it, will foon become intolerable. And, by the aid of these fresh reinforcements, they will juggle it and bungle it, and bungle it and juggle it on, for one, or poffibly two, years longer: and then Nation and Company will both tumble together, into the pit of bankruptcy, perdition, and defpair.

But shall the nation, with eyes open, fuffer the pilot to crowd stemlings on the rocks, which have already grazed the ship's bottom? No, we must about ship, and call another hand to the helm. Matters, it is to be hoped, are not yet past remedy; the channel is obvious; if the nation will but put to her hand. His Majesty can have no real interest but what is common with that of his people: and, howhowever the views of the Crown may, in fome cafes, differ a little from these of the people; in this particular case they must both exactly concur. He will, here, hearken to the voice of his people: and a little popular heat will force into administration something of that patriotic ambition, fire, spirit, and enterprize, which alone can save this nation from dreadful impending misfortunes.

But if the nation, funk in the bed of flavish floth, inebriated with the transforming Circean cap; enervated and emafculated by the lewd embraces of fenfual pleasure, shall slight and disregard her own dearest concerns : like the prodigal debauchee, who chides from him the faithful friend that attempts recalling him to fober reflection; and implicitly confides in the management of a fleward, who hath already wasted the better part of his fair patrimony : then let the nation, fome two or three years hence, recollect, that she was advised of her danger, by a hafty production, iffued about the middle of January, 1773 : though not thought of, until that most difinterested of all possible ministers had, by way of remedying all evils, difdifpatched kis Secret Committee to the India Houfe : there to infpect the Company's private œconomy : a thing, with which neither law, justice, government, nor nation hath any thing to do; and which, unlefs in cafes of bankruptcy, is facred to the meanest individual. As if, from the Company's books of accounts, it was poffible to discover the cause of abuse in the government of those Indian dominions : or, as if schemes of faving to the Company, one shilling per ton, freight of her cargoes : or, three pence per pound, in warehouse room, would retrieve the, almost ruined, Interest of Britain in India.
