Hor.

My bookfeller being determined to publith a feventh edition of this work, I cannot deny myfelf the indulgence of what, I truft, is a pardonable vanity. The public will give me credit for my feelings upon the lofs of the falutary meafure of an Union; but it is no fmall confolation to me to reflect that I was the firft who unmafked the pretended advocate, but concealed enemy, of that amiable, tho' unfortunate fpeculation. I am not of that temper, that the fuccefs of any undertaking can make an alteration in my fentiments of it—I flick to my friends in diftrefs, and therefore I flick to the Union.—

Victrix caufa díis placuit, sed victa Catoni.

Cato was magnanimous, and therefore the vanquished cause pleased him. I am magnanimous too, for indeed, gentle readers, the vanquished cause pleases me not a little.

It is the nature of man to be proud of prefcience, even when he repines at the accomplishment of his own predictions. Did not I tell you fo? is very common comfort. The The author of Arguments for and against an Union went on humbugging, the world-I defired him to-Ceafe his Funning; but like Caffandra, I was not attended to, till the illuminations of Dublin, like the flames of Troy, illuftrated the forebodings of the prophet. Even after my work appeared, feveral weak, or malignant men confidered, or affected to confider him the ferious, and me the jefting author; and though I wrote expressly to guard the public against irony, one dull plodding matter of fact writer absolutely libelled me by the name of Mr. Funning; but I have my triumph now; the event, unhappily for the nation, but fortunately for my character, has shewn that no man has done fo much mifchief to the caufe as the feribe whom I detected, and in the debate which was fo near being the falvation of Ireland, I had the fatisfaction of hearing feveral of the infatuated one hundred and eleven members declare that they had been altogether and folely convinced by the perusal of Arguments for and against an Union.* Many with whom I have calmly expoftulated in private upon the frenzy of their opposition to an Union, have candidly confelled to me the caufe of their feduction, and in the fincerity of their contrition have informed against the incendiary who (to use a phrase of the United Irishmen) had put them up. If more proofs were wanting, it is worthy of observation, that Mr. Sheridan in his vain but factious endeavours to prejudice the English House of Commons against the Union, absolutely grounded his whole argument upon what is vulgarly called Mr. Cooke's pamphlet, and though an orator of the most fertile and exuberant genius, yet the greatest part of his fpeech upon that occasion confisted in reading entire extracts from that rebellious production. However, thank heaven,

* Well may I fay infatuated one bundred and eleven. In the name of argument can there be a more conclusive demonstration that an 'Union must be advantageous to Ireland than that 140 independent English gentlemen voted for it? Gentlemen (as Mr. Pitt fays) far removed from every prejudice and party motive which must prevail in the Parliament of Ireland. It is very observable, that the contemptible opposition of 15 members in the English House was headed by one Sheridan—A MERE IRISHMAN.

heaven, that enlightened affembly, the British Senate, were too magnanimous to reject an Union, though it was to be the falvation of Ireland, and have exhibited a mortifying contrast to the conduct of our own befotted legiflature. And yet it is but candid to fay, that if Mr. Sampfon's pamphlet had been published as early, and circulated as extensively in England as it was here, the event would, most probably, have been very different. It is very remarkable (and indeed it delighted me much to fee) that after Mr. Sheridan had, in the infidious manner I mention, endeavoured to millead the House of Commons, Mr. Canning, who is well known to be a minifterial character in high confidence, publicly, on the part of government, denied, difowned, difclaimed, renounced and difavowed all manner of connection whatfoever, with that abominable pamphlet, or its author. I was proud to find this great man echoing my own sentiments, fo unworthily flighted in my native land; (prophets, alas, are feldom honored in their own country) and I will confess that the cheek of the author glowed with fecret fatisfaction at the flattering fuggestion, that, perhaps, the great Mr. Canning had in a leifure hour read Ceafe your Funning. Those who are authors can judge of the sensation I experienced; I appeal with candour even to the gentleman who, in a pamphlet, called Impartial Review, &c. has defamed me under the name of Mr. Funning. Let him conceive the delight he would feel in thinking that the right honourable John Foster perused the passage in which the Impartial Reviewer, decorates him with gorgeous and refplendent panegyric. Let him confider how his fancy would be tickled to think he faw another high perfonage writhing, as he read the biting and galling fatyr, the venemous and malignant ridicule with which the author has gibetted his character by what he has faid of it; then may he understand the gratification which his friend, Mr. Funning, enjoys at tracing his own ideas in the great Mr. Canning's oration :

oration :- his friend, Mr. Funning, thus particularly appeals to a brother author to fhew him his generofity, and that he forgives the attack made upon him. Nay, he would confole his fellow artift. He has certainly miftaken Mr. Funning, but any man may make a miftake, and fome men are nothing the worfe of it. For instance, a most respectable and patriotic gentleman, early in the Union controverfy, answered publicly for the sentiments of a whole seet, a whole city, and a whole county; and though the fentiments of that fect, city, and county, have turned out the opposite of the three things which their sponsor promised and vowed in their name, yet the character of that refpestable and patriotic gentleman is as good as it was before. Mr. Funning hopes this intelligence may be comfortable to the author of An Impartial Review, &c. In truth, I forgive all my enemies, which confidering all the efforts made to depreciate my well intended publication, is a great exertion of generofity.

Even in these days of effrontery it is scarcely credible that the following advertisement could have appeared in print, and yet it was actually published in fo many words in that grave and temperate news paper, called Saunders's News-Letter, a few days after my first edition came out :

"The friends of a certain gentleman, late a flate prifoner, and now on his way to Lifbon, have feen, with much indignation, in a pamphlet called "CEASE YOUR FUNNING," an affertion, that Mr. Sampfon was the author of a work entitled, "Arguments for and against an Union between Great Britain and Ireland confidered," they think it very illiberal to impute to an unfortunate man offences of which he never was guilty, and are anxious to declare to the public, that after experiencing the lenity of government, he is incapable of publishing for dangerous and inflammatory a libel."

" They

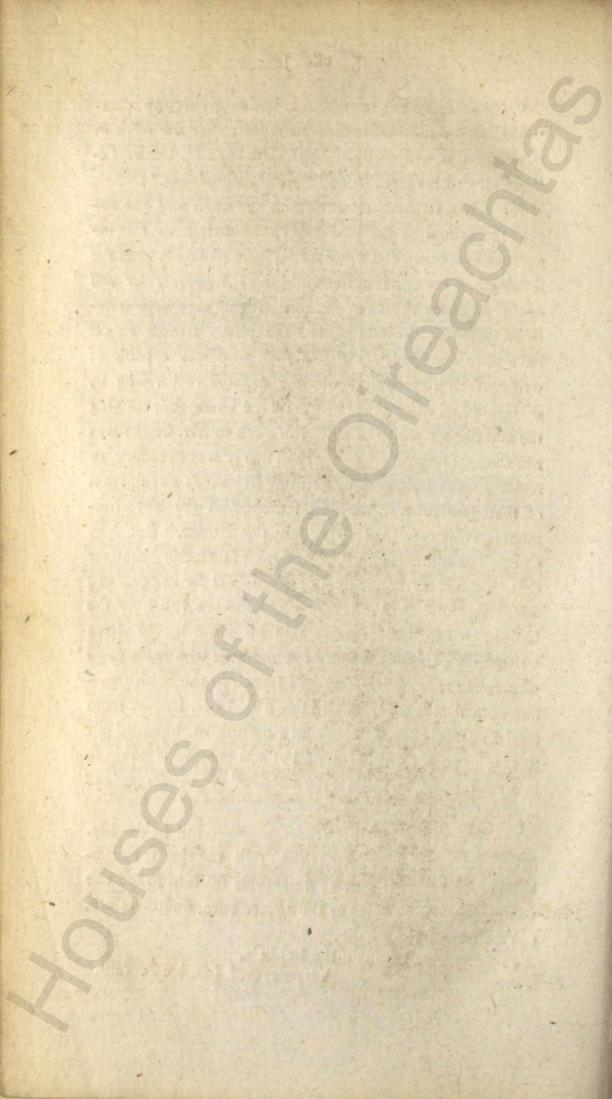

" They defire not to be underftood as giving any countenance to another malignant report, that the work in queftion is written by Edward Cooke, Efq. Under Secretary to his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant."

But this was too barefaced to impose upon any one except the printer of the newspaper, and in spite of this ingenious deception, the world still pretty generally puts the faddle upon the right horfe and gives Arguments for and against an Union to its real author. It was very well underflood that this denial by Mr. Sampfon's friends might have been expected, and that a man who was capable of writing fuch a pamphlet, was also capable of denying it. or indeed of doing any thing elfe: One would suppose that the oral flander which imputed this work to Mr. Cooke was not thought fufficiently public, but that it was neceffary to make it more notorious by printing the mock exculpation of that gentleman in the last fentence of the advertifement: It is eafy to fee through this artifice. But Mr. Cooke has himfelf proved in the most fatisfactory manner that he never wrote the libel of Arguments for and against; for he absolutely in the House of Commons voted for the Union, which demonstrates that he never could have written the pamphlet, as any one must fee who reads Ceafe your Funning, and Mr. Canning's fpeech in the British parliament. And it is very well known that Mr. Cooke, from motives of delicacy, as being an Englishman, intended not to vote upon the Irifh Union, but was compelled to do fo in order to shew he was not the author of Arguments for and against, &c. Ec.

In the next place gentle reader——But hold—Mr. Moore (in whofe fhop I write this) tells me that if I fcribble more preface, it will be impoffible for him to fell this edition at the fame price as the former ones, and therefore, for the fake of the Public,

I remain the Public's,

Very devoted humble Servant.

Ceafe your Funning.

LOVE wit as much as any man, but a joke may certainly fometimes be carried too far .-- I have never fubmitted to the justice of Lord Shaftesbury's fanciful position, that ridicule is the test of truth, and I own I think its application is peculiarly offenfive when political fubjects of the deepest and most ferious importance, are treated with idle levity and buffoon irony .--- Thefe fentiments have been principally excited by reading a pamphlet entitled ARGUMENTS FOR AND A-GAINST AN UNION CONSIDERED .- The Author of this work has evidently written after the model of some of Swift's lighter compositions; a ftyle which in my apprehenfion has never till now been fuccefsfully imitated, tho' attempted with fome talent by the fuppofed annotators of the late Alderman George Faulkner, and in fome few other inftances.

This stile confists altogether in the art of fupporting in a ftrain of grave irony the oppofite. of the opinion which you mean to establish. It is a good-humoured application of the argument called by logicians argumentum ad absurdum; but but whether it partakes more of jeft or sophifun, I again proteil against the use of either upon fubjects of national importance and public concern. I shall briefly enumerate a few of the most prominent artifices by which the Author of this work, who I am convinced is either a member of Opposition or an absolute United Irishman, endeavours by an affected recommendation of the measure to cry down and depreciate the projected Union, the only chance of this country's falvation; premifing that, in order to give a higher relish to his ridicule, he has had the addrefs to circulate a report with verv fuccefsful industry that the work in question is the production of an English gentleman of confiderable talents who is an Irifh member of Parliament, and in high official fituation in Dublin Caftle. Indeed fuch has been the prevalence of this report, and fo well fimulated is the mask assumed, that on the first perusal I was fcarcely able to diftinguish whether the Author was in earnest or not, and I am credibly informed that to this hour feveral well-meaning people continue in the erroneous opinion that he was fo.

I do not pretend to trace the progrefs of this facetious writer regularly from page to page, but thall point out a few of his topics which appear to me fufficient to detect at once the duplicity of the flyle and the depth of the intention. He affects with great appearance of gravity throughout the entire pamphlet to denounce the exiftence of the Irish Parliament as the cause of the late late rebellion and invafion, and he draws from these principles once established an inevitable conclusion that the return of fuch calamities is only to be prevented by the annihilation of the cause of them. Here, indeed, latet anguis in Herba. This is the very language of the United Irishmen .- The fame positions, the fame inferences, are to be found faintly vilible in the fpeeches of all the Oppofition members in England and Ireland, and glaringly confpicuous in every number of the Prefs, and Union Star; avowing themfelves in the confessions of Doctor M'Nevin, proclaiming themfelves in the manifestos of Arthur O'Connor. Is it not evident then that the Author in queftion is fuch as I have deferibed him ?- Is it not evident that by infidioufly inferring the neceffity of an Union from the corruption of the Irifh Legislature, he in fact directs the attention of this deluded nation at one and the fame moment to the pretence of a Reform and the project of a Separation ?- He never imputes the late calamities of this country to any thing but Parliament, and fo far from accufing the prevalence of French principles or the extravagance of French ambition as instrumental to our missortunes, he never speaks of that abandoned nation without partiality and panegyric. He cannot expect that to flimfy an artifice must not be seen through by every difcerning man. Every fuch man knows that his aft fertions and his arguments are equally unfounded, that his Majefty has every year fince his acceffion, returned thanks to the legiflature, for the patriotifm and loyalty of their conduct, and that both Lord Cornwallis and Lord Camden, have repeatedly declared (from the throne) that the difcomfiture of the difaffected and rebellious, was entirely owing to the virtue, fpirit, and fagacity of Parliament. It is well known that if it was not a good Parliament, it would never pafs the intended Union, which is to be the falvation of the country, and which there is very little doubt, will be paffed by a great majority*—notwithftanding the fly oppofition, and affected fupport, of fuch wolves in fheep's clothing, as the author of the pamphlet in queffion.

But this writer knew very well that his inference was a non fequitur; that in truth the Union is to be conceded to Ireland, becaufe the Parliament is a good one, and deferves to go to a better place—and that even if the Legiflature, as he infinuates, was the caufe of our misfortunes, it evidently could not improve our condition, to remove thefe reprefentative delinquents into a more remote theatre for the exhibition of their depravity, and give new temptation and opportunity to tranfgefs at a diftance from the controul and cenfure of their conflituents; he faw plainly, that every

* The event has falfified this prediction; but it is well known that feveral of the infatuated Members of the Houfe of Commons who opposed the principle of this falutary measure, have declared that they were induced to do fo by this abominable work. So far have the poisonous effects of Arguments for and against an Union extended. every thinking mind would be firuck by the difproportion of the remedy to the evil, and would of itfelf precipitate into the real conclusion—that fo abandoned a legiflature could only be corrected by radical reform, or complete diffolution. Thus have I fatisfactorily proved, in this inftance, that a concealed United Irifhman has jefuitically affumed the ftyle and character of a loyal Englifhman, who does honour to our country by reprefenting it, for the bafeft and worft of purpofes.

It providentially happens, that the beft concerted and best executed fraud cannot long remain undifcovered, and frequently is the inftrument of difcovering itfelf. Thus, reader, it is worth observing, how artfully this difatfected fcribbler introduces an eulogy upon the French Republic. Even the incorporating Union, which is to be the falvation of the country, he affects to recommend principally upon the example of France, well knowing that this falutary measure stands independently upon its own intrinsic merits, and really feeking to depreciate its excellence by putting it upon an improper footing. Vide page 8 of this work, where you may find thefe words :- " France has not only united to hersclf, and incorporated a great addition of territory, but has rendered absolutely dependent on her will almost all the Smaller States which Surround her." Mark the vile and profligate infinuation, that the confequence of our Union must be an absolute dependence of Ireland upon the will of England, whereas, whereas, every unprejudiced man knows, that, in fact, an Union is the only thing which can fecure the independence of Ireland, and enfure the falvation of the country. He proceeds-" Geneva is incorporated, Savoy is incorporated, all the Austrian provinces in Flanders, all the German States on this fide of the Rhine are incorporated, Spain is fubject," Bc. Bc. It would be difgusting to transcribe more of this naufeous hypocrify. The reader has already perceived the drift of it. In the first place, it feeks, by these pretended comparisons, to excite an idle national pride, and to fuggeft to Ireland how little her cafe refembles that of Geneva, (which contains about 25,000 inhabitants) or Savoy, or any petty province, or conquered enemy. But Ireland will not be diverted from her great object by fuch filly fophifin ; fhe knows her own greatnefs and diffimilitude to those affronting caricatures, and the adopts the Union upon its own intrinsic merits, and becaufe it is certainly to be the falvation of the country. The fecond object is not lefs mischievous, and indeed it was fearcely to be expected that any man could have the audacity to pronounce, even under the malk of this scribe, an exaggerated and fulfome panegyric upon the enemies of his country. We all know very well for what purposes certain perfons thought it proper to magnify all the exploits of the French. The invincibility of their troops was a conftant theme of declamation with the paragraph writers of the Prefs, and other coadjutors of this pamphleteer, at the time those troops troops were impatiently expected for the invation of this country, and now that the Great Nation. has been defeated in her attempt to effect an incorporating Union with Ireland, the fame gentry find it expedient to renovate the hopes of their party after the late difappointment, and the wretch whom I am now employed in detecting, in his pretended recommendation of an Union, abfolutely adopts the cant of French phrafeology, and talks of establishing an united empire, one and ind visible .- Vide page 9. Nor are these the only inftances in which the rebel vocabulary breaks through, and exposes the hypocrite. In page 11, the gentleman has thought proper to fay-" The king of England refides in another kingdom-the souncils of the government of Ireland are framed in the British cabinet-the government of Ireland. is actually administered by a British Lord Lieutenant, who distributes the patronage of the Crown-the Irish Parliament is subject to British influence, and near one million of the rents of this kingdom are annually exported to absentees nor can this inconvenience cease whilst affairs remain as at present." It sometimes happens to a man, on hearing particular things, to fancy he has heard them before, and to afk himfelf, where did I meet this laft? Just fo did I feel upon perufing this paffage. I rubbed my eyes, but found it was not a dream; for, on taking down an old file of the Prefs, which was my part of the plunder in ranfacking a rebel's houfe as a yeoman, I found not only the fentiments, but the identical phrases. The weak argument gument by which he would thus injure the caufe of Union is this-that if English influence at prefent predominates, the transplantation of our legislature will remedy the evil, and power, consequence, and government, will revert into Irish channels once more. He knew fuch an inference could not be fwallowed by any man at the outfide of Swift's hospital, and thus, in fact, wounds the caufe, by an affectation of unskillfully defending it. He knows it is his premises that are falle, that they are the mere cant and fabrication of the United Irifhmen, that English influence does not predominate here, and that, in fact, an Union is made neceffary by the unpliant and stubborn independence of the Irish parliament, as he is forced afterwards to admit and to exemplify by the mulifh refiftance in which the faid parliament counteracted the interests of the empire upon the queftions of the Regency,* and Commercial Propositions .- Vide page 12 and 13. Every one knows, that after an Union fuch mifchievous instances can never occur again, that this is the real motive for the measure, and therefore it was neceffary for this cunning incendiary to throw dust in our eyes upon the subject. I shall no longer, by difguifing my fentiments, follow the example of this fophist, whom I reprobate.

* It is a melancholy reflection that the events of the 22d and 25th of January, afford another inftance of the impracticable and obstinate character of the Irish Parliament. As nothing contributed fo much to the defeat of the Minister upon those occasions as the pamphlet of Arguments for and against an Union, I wish the author, if possible, a quiet conscience.

probate. I have hitherto hinted my opinion of what he is, and fhall now boldly avow my fentiments as to who he is. I have confulted feveral eminent political and literary perfonages, who all agree with me in discovering in legible characters the principles and ftyle of a certain democratic counfellor, the well known author of. Hurdy Gurdy, and the Old Livn of England, and who has recently experienced the lenity of government, in being fuffered to banish himself: and for the fake of his health, to make Lifbon the fcene of his exile, For fhame, Mr. Sampfon ! Is this gratitude? Is this honor? Is this a return for the mercy extended to you? And had you no other way of thanking my Lord Cornwallis, than by oppofing the wifest measure of his government, and by making a travefty and caricature of his Secretary, the vehicle of your malignity ? -This is one of the many proofs that rigid and effectual justice ought, long fince, to have been executed upon the Author of the pamphlet in question.

It is almost below criticism to notice the puerile and school-boy allegories, tropes, and metaphors of this author. Such, if a writer was ferious, might be confidered as innocent relaxations from reafoning, and fometimes happy, though light, illustrations of argument; but when a gibing fatyrift wifhes to counteract this great nation, in her ftruggle for fuch a conftitutional bleffing as the Union, it is evident that he must intend to ridicule both the country and the measure.

measure, by comparing her fucceffively to the Seven United Provinces, to the Sabines, to a lady going to be married, a trader going into partnership, and an aukward booby commencing his education. To the following paffage I am not able, with candour, to deny the merit of wit : If any person has a son, uneducated, unimproved, and injured by bad habits and bad company, in order to remedy these imperfections, would it not be his first endeavour to establish him in the best societies, and introduce him into the most virtuous, the most polished, and most learned company, and if he could once reconcile him to fuch companies, and teach him to relish their conversation, would he not be certain of his son's improvement, and of his finally turning out to his credit and fatisfaction .- (Vide page 8.)-This I admit to be witty, irrefiftably amufing; no gravity can withftand the idea of Old Ireland going to fchool to England; but while I pay this just tribute to the humour of the writer, I once again, and once for all, proteft and exclaim, against the use of wit upon such occafions .- I trust there is too much good fense, or (as the Rt. Hon. the Attorney General fays,) fpirit and honor, in this nation, to be difgusted, or in any other way diverted, from the great object of an incorporating Union, either by any ludicrous or affrontive fimiles, or by the affectation of using weak and trifling arguments in support of it .- The real argument in fupport of it, ftands upon a rock, and none but cloven-footed traitors pretend there is any other ;- I wish it was the only, becaufe I am fure it is the best, argument ever ever advanced upon the fubject, and that is, that it will certainly be the falvation of the country.

Another topic of this work, I cannot pafs by with the flight cenfure reluctantly imposed upon pardonable wit, and amufing bagatelle. ' It is of a more ferious complexion, and betrays the fuppreffed United Irifhman in every feature. This Gentleman affects to recommend the Union (but non tali auxilio, Sc.) as if it would preclude the poffibility of any future rebellion at home, or invafion from abroad.-If we believe him, the existence of the Irish Parliament constitutes a distunited State of the British Empire, which leaves a particular part of it open to the attacks of France, and if that avenue of difunion should be closed, then, &c. &c.-(Vide page 9.) Now we all know, that though an Union will certainly be the falvation of the nation, yet it is impoffible that a new modification of a moralrelation, can produce any change in the physical fituation of the country. Under every poffible mode of connexion, the coaft must remain in the fame geographical position as to France, and as to the probability of internal diffention, the foolish malecontents of this island, may, perhaps, be recruited by fome more foolifh malecontents, whom this falutary measure of an Union may difgust, in confequence of fuch inflammatory productions as the Pamphlet in question. Therefore we must admit, that though an Union will certainly be the falvation of the country, yet it is possible, and in rerum natura that after it is accomplished, there may be fuch a thing as B 2 rebellion rebellion and invalion. What then does this Judas mean ? Evidently to lull us, and England, into a fatal fecurity on this important fubject :---To perfuade England of the physical impossibility of fuch events, and to give France an opportunity to elude our invincible fleets, and once more annoy our domeftic peace ;- but it is impoffible I truft that the French can be fo eafily gulled ; they have already fuffered pretty fmartly by taking the advice of our Author and his auxiliaries, and I appeal to every reafonable man, whether there is not every probability that even after an Union the gallant and generous nation of England will make upon a fimilar emergency as great, or nearly as great efforts to fave this country from invation as it did before fuch an event was in contemplation. As all the Irifh militia will neceffarily and ipfo facto become Englifhmen, and the Protestants become the majority of our people upon the establishment of the Union, (vide page 26) it will of course be useles to fend over the English militia as heretofore, and therefore probably that may not be done, bur I really cannot fee why the English navy should not fail to our afliftance after this defirable event, -we know it did fo before very effectually, and therefore I think I may justly conclude that as an Union was not then found neceffary to bring the English navy to our fuccour, fo that (as far as men may conjecture about futurity) there is no great probability that there is any thing in an Union which will make it impossible for the fame. thing to happen again.

I país

I pass by the idle and intentionally feeble inference drawn from the preference which the United States of America gave to an incorporating union over a federal one : but as I pafs, muft obferve upon the artifice which this fly gentleman difplays in recommending upon all occafions the example of avowed republicans to this loyal nation. However, let me just hint how little analagous the cafes are : in the first place, after the fuccefs of the rebel arms all the States of America started upon equal terms-no one had any thing to give up to another-there was, therefore, no ftratum for the benefits of an incorporating union, whereas in our cafe Ireland has a feparate Legislature established for many centuries to furrender, and must naturally expect the refulting benefits to be exactly in proportion to the facrifice made, and perhaps it is owing to this very circumstance, that America, notwithstanding all the advantages of an incorporating union, and the interpolition of the Atlantic, has remained fubject to French cabal and intrigue and all the mischiefs resulting from them; whereas in Ireland, under all its peculiar circumftances, an incorporating union must certainly be the falvation of the country .--- This Man in the Mark has really partied by the only national analogy applicable. The cafe of Corfica is precifely in point. Upon the acquisition of that island in this war, England was weak enough to effablish a connection with it upon fuch federal principles as the prefent connection with Ireland-an Englifh glifh Viceroy and Corfican Parliament; and what was the event? The Corfican gem dropped out of the British Crown almost as soon as it was fet there, whereas had the union been incorporate, without any Parliament at all, it would certainly, as in Ireland, have been the falvation of the country.

I know very well what he means by the introduction of Scotland. I know he would fuggeft that England is divided from it as it was from Mercia by a river, and from Ireland by a fea; but the fallacy of this dark and malignant infinuation is plain to the fimpleft understanding. If the truth be once established, distance cannot affect it. If it be true that an incorporated union is advantageous for countries divided by a river half a mile broad, the addition of another half mile will not alter the moral, though it does the phyfical, pofition. Therefore you may add ad infinitum, &c. &c. Q. E. D. But as the Author remarks, example is the best of arguments, and what more pregnant example can be conceived than the cafe of America? America was united to England by an incorporated union, that is, by an English Government without any Parliament except that at Westminster, and though the entire Atlantic lay between them, no country was ever more happy or profperous, or advanced more rapidly in every defirable improvement, until the unnatural and profligate rebellion which broke out in the provinces, and which ended in their feparation from the parent country, country, and which if any form of Government could have prevented, it would have been that incorporating union, the bleffings of which the unmeritedly enjoyed. But it is eafy to know a certain perfon's fentiments of that unnatural rebellion, who in page 19, panegyrizes the virtues of Washington, and the fagacity of Adams, and who if the late dreadful rebellion had fucceeded here, would have spoken with equal fincerity of the virtues of Holt and the fagacity of O'Connor. In fpeaking of Scotland, I know, too, that he would fuggeft to our minds difcouraging ideas : For inftance, that though Edinburgh has confiderably improved fince the Union, yet that the two events ftand not in the relation of caufe and effect to each other, and that fuch a city in the fame fpace of time must at all events have advanced. This is certainly fiimfy, for who can tell what might have been the fituation of Edinburgh at this day if there had not been an union? Moft probably the luxury that would have been induced by the refidence of a Court and Legiflature would long before now have been its deftruction, and it might at this hour be a heap of ruins.

He alfo muft have wifhed to infinuate that all the avenues of ambition and promotion being fortunately clofed in Scotland by the Union, Scotfmen are proverbial emigrants, and are obliged to transplant themfelves into England, where their fuccess in pushing their fortunes is a fource of endless ridicule and national jealous, and and where in fpite of all their pains in afferting themfelves to be Britons and not Scotimen, the furly natives never fail to remind them that they are not Englishmen. Certatnly this is true; but how entirely does the application fail as to Ireland, whofe natives have always been popular and favourite characters in England. We know no jealoufy ever exifts in the bofom of an Englishman towards an Hibernian, and that the males and females of that liberal nation have always vied in paying compliments to their fortunate neighbours. Neither does the example of Scotland militate against our adoption of an Union, for though there have been two rebellions in 80 years, and though in spite of an incorporating Union the French contrived to intrigue there lately, and Muir, Palmer, and others, preached republicanism and the pike philosophy in that happy province, yet we all know that all this happened AFTER the Union, whereas in Ireland, the Union being fubfequent to fuch misfortunes, must completely extinguish the poffibility of their revival, and be in every Senfe the Salvation of the country.

I come now to the most unprincipled part of this work. Every body knows that one of the firongest and most unanswerable arguments in favour of an Union is that it must of necessity extinguish all religious animosities, and for ever filence the discordance of sectarious conflicts. For instance, it is obvious that the Catholics can can never hereafter complain of not participating in the conftitution, becaufe there will be no conflitution for them to participate in ; and that they will have nothing to alk from their Protestant brethren, because their Protestant brethren will have nothing to give them; and on the other hand, the Protestants can have no alarm taken from lest their privileges should be them, when they will have nothing to to be robbed of.---This equitable and natural composition of claims, which otherwise must have clashed in endless discord, has almost without an exception, reconciled both parties in a common unanimity of approbation, to a meafure which demonstrably will be the falvation of the country. But how does this abandoned hireling of a desperate faction, endeavour to distort this happy circumstance, and frustrate fo defirable a confummation ?

Forfooth he laments, with hypocritical quotation, in page 22, that it is a confummation devoutly to be wished, but never to be expected; and in order to tear open and fester the gaping wounds of his languishing country, he labours to difgust both religions against the Union, by affecting to represent it as exclusively advantageous to each .--He argues that each religion is to be bettered at the expence of the other, and that both muft gain, becaufe each must lose .- To the Catholic he affects to fay, while the prefent order of things continues, the Protestant Ascendancy must be maintained ; maintained ;-there is no getting rid of it-the King's Coronation Oath-the Teft Laws-the Conflitution in Church and State-all fiand in your way ;-Government with to ferve you, but the Conftitution is a Gordian Knot of difficulties, and there is no way but cutting it afunder ; What will fignify an Irifh Act of Parliament, if the Irish Parliament itself is out of the way ?---His Majesty can have no further scruples about his oath, when his Irifh Parliament have made free with theirs; in an Union all difficulties will vanish, and then who knows what the King and British Parliament, may hereafter do for you. This is a just paraphrafe of the topics he address infidioufly to the Catholics-for this very purpofe, that they should fee the tendency of his fophisms, and be prejudiced against that Union, which is to be the falvation of the country. To the Protestants he fays, the Catholics are the majority now-nothing but an Union can make them the minority. For though four Catholic Irifhmen, are more numerous than one Protestant Irishman, yet if to the latter you add ten Protestant Englishmen, the Protestant Irishmen will then exceed the Catholic Irishmen, in the proportion of eleven to four .- Haften then, to work this fum, and avail yourfelves of political arithmetic-Befides, your True Blue politics are going out of fashion-(Vide page 52)-Who will be a guarantee of that system, and whom will it content? The Catholics will not acquiesce in its propriety-A party of Protestants in Ireland, term it unjust and absurdanother

Another party in England term it by fouler names, great leaders in Opposition, possibly the future Ministers of England, may condemn it, and some members of the British Cabinet are supposed to be adverse to it. Its stability may depend upon accident, upon the death of a fingle character, upon the change of a minister, or the temper of a Lord Lieutenant; the policy of this System is much doubted by the people of England, and while your Parliament exists, you are never secure against such contingencies .- And again, in page 26-Great Britain is not pledged upon any specific principle to support one feet in Ireland, more than another-I know not by what tie she is debarred from affisting the Catholics, while the kingdoms remain separate-that is, in other words, perhaps in the next rebellion, the English may join the Catholics against the Protestants. No comparison is too ludicrous for such trash as this, and indeed I am fatigued with ferious refentment against such absurd profligacy. It is like an old finner, clapping two boys on the back, to make them break each other's heads, while he runs away with the prize for which they contend. It is like a fraudulent groom porter, proclaiming the odds in favour of one gambler, while he whilpers them in favour of the other-or a sharper looking over, and advising one hand, while he is making figns on his fingers to the adverfary. It is impudently, and for difaffected purposes, representing Government as an Auctionier, fetting the bleffings of an Union up to a puff auction, threatening the Protestants that they will be outbid by the Catholics, and the Catholics that the Protestants will get the market ; and prefumptuoufly imputing to Lord Cornwallis's administration, the abominable and Machiavelian principle of divide & impera, which is in reality the badge of the United Irishmen, and other confederates of that audacious pamphleteer .---A gang of fwindlers in London (a place notorious for fuch gentry) hired an alley which communicated from one public ftreet to another. At each end ftood one of the gang, and vociferated " Walk into the auction, great bargains, walk into the auction." The deluded paffengers, who were quietly going the broad way to St. Paul's cathedral, liftened to the voice of the charmer, and ftepped in; while, at the other fide, the equally deluded croud going through Ave-Maria-lane did the fame. What was the confequence? They knocked their heads together in the dark, and the remainder of the robbers picked the pockets of both. Such would be the defpicable images juftly applicable to the British nation and cabinet, if this shameless scribbler was a true representative of their fentiments, but we know very well the magnanimity of that nation and cabinet in conceding this Union to Ireland, which is to be the falvation of the country, and we will not be inflamed by fuch fcandalous mifrepresentation. We know that government is incapable of fuch monstrous and depraved duplicity as to fay to the Catholics, emancipation can never be granted till there is an Union ; and to fay to the Proteftants, emancipation 'can never be refused till there there is an Union. In the treating of this topic the rebel blood breaks out in fpite of every concealment-Vide page 19. The old inflammatory topic is put forward, that nine-tenths of the property of Ireland are in the hands of Brtish defcendants, and that these Protestants thus possing ninetenths of the property, are only one-fourth of the inhabitants in number, and have been obliged to rely upon British affistance for the preservation of their property and existence. This once more, as in a former paffage, fuggefts to the Catholic Irifh the defperate project which the United Irifhmen have ever proclaimed as the only chance of recovering their rights, a separation from England, and yet the fame man who urges this argument of the Catholic numbers as conclusive upon the occasion, affects in another passage to recommend an Union upon the specific merits of its annihilating that argument altogether-Vide page 26. In the event of an Union the Catholics would lofe the advantage of the argument of numbers which they at present enjoy. But, alas, this is not mere nonfense-human wickedness is equal to fuch a flight, though human folly is not. The fophift well knew, that the inferences founded upon the numbers of the Catholics are no more affected by the numbers of the English Protestants than by the number of Dutch, Swifs or American Protestants, and that before and after an Union, whether the English nation were Jews, Turks, or Anabaptifts, the Catholics in Ireland would continue the majority of the people, and all arguments guments and expectations drawn from that fact, whether juftly or otherwife, remain precifely as before. But this is neither more or lefs than a hint to the difaffected part of the Catholics, to turn this fophifm to their own purpofes. It teaches them to fay—if we are the minority of the empire, the danger of our claims, which refults from our numbers, and with which you alarm the Protestant, vanishes; and if we are the majority, you establish our right to emancipation upon the very fame principle that you establish the rights of the Protestants. Vide page 23. Every state ought to establish that religious fest which is most numerous.

In page 53, already cited, among other dangers incident to the Protestant interest, while the legislatures remain separate, we find that its ftability may reft upon accident, upon the death of a fingle character. The word fingle is printed in italics. Reader, reftrain your indignation when this is explained to you. It is generally conceived, in confequence of the mifreprefentations of the United Irishmen, that his prefent Majesty is hostile to a further emancipation of the Irifh Catholics, but that the heir apparent to the crown entertains different sentiments upon that fubject. Observe, then, this incendiary, with affected zeal for the established religion, running the king's life against the Protestant af-, cendancy, but, in reality, fuggefting to the Catholics the fhort cut to the accomplishment of their wishes. It required more than ordinary prefumption to introduce into a work, affecting to recommend that measure which is to be the falvation of the country, the blafted affaffination principles of the Union Star, and to point out the beloved father of his people to his loyal fubjects as an obstacle to their prospects, which only can be removed by the termination of his life. Indeed the mischievous principle which pervades the whole work is (to use a colloquial expression) the putting bad things into one's head, under the fubtle pretence of doing general good. It reminds me of a familiar, though innocent illustration. Some college ftudents were inflicting the difcipline of the pump upon one of those unpopular characters called a bailiff, who had been detected in violating the academic fanctuary. A fenior fellow who was a Spectator of the punishment, and who, though bound to enforce collegiate decorum, entertained the usual antipathy to the theriff's officer, "exclaimed, " fye, lads, don't be cruel, don't nall'the man's ear to the pump." The youths, who had not before thought of this improvement, thanked the preceptor for his hint, and the unhappy victim was accordingly affixed to the infirument of his difgrace.*

In page 31 occurs a paffage worthy of obfervation.—" It does not follow, that if an Union were made

* It has been long fulpected that the author of Arguments for and against an Union, was not entirely ignorant of the Union Star. I should form to infult exiled and humbled guilt, if the base trick of imputing the first work to Mr. Cooke, did not warrant every severity. It is of a piece with the English Opposition last year, accusing the Irish Government of writing the Union Star themselves. made, that the government of Ireland would be lefs vigilantly administered; it would probably be administered with more attention, because it would be less distracted by the business of party and of parliament, and for the Same reason it would be administered more impartially." In the first place, this is a malignant and slanderous calumny against government in general, and not merely infinuates, but proclaims that government hitherto has not only not been administered vigilantly and impartially, but has been distracted. In that general flander is also included much private defamation of Major Sirt, Infpector Shee, Mr. Gregg, the gaoler of Newgate, Mr. Juffice Swan, and other active and cool officers in the executive department.* Secondly, it impudently afferts that fuch the milconduct and frenzy of government is owing to that very patriotic parliament which is about to pass a measure for the falvation of the country; and thirdly, it feeks to inflame and fiir up the good people of England against their legislature, by advancing an argument which, if pushed, would conclude against the existence of all parliaments whatsoever, and at once demonstrate the pre-eminent superiority of an absolute monarchy, not diffurbed by any distractions but its own. This fophift well knew the maxim-" he who proves too much proves nothing ;"

* The fly hint against Mr. Cooke, whose fervices in this department no one can say enough of, is also obvious. Iudeed it is pretty plain that Mr. Cooke is no friend of the author of Arguments for and against an Union, and whatever be the cause, he has done him all the mischief in his power. One would suppose that this Gentleman had committed him.

nothing ;" and with affected fimplicity exposes himfelf to the application of it. But, in truth, it is very poffible that the mixed government may be beft for England, and the pure executive for Ireland. However, even though it were to be admitted that the liberty of the fubject is fecured by the refponfibility which the executive owes to the legiflative, yet the British executive who will hereafter govern this country, undistracted by an Irish parliament, being composed of men of honor, they will find themfelves bound in honor to feel that responsibility encreased, in proportion to the distance at which it refides, and therefore, in fact, the principles of the Irifh Conftitution, moving in an orbit more remote from the focus of the prerogative, will be attracted thereto in the encreafed ratio of their own centrifugal force. Befides, if hereafter any ill-advifed Lord Lieutenant should be tempted to make any unconstitutional attempt in his Government, a direct appeal can be made upon the fubject, with a reafonably fair wind to the Parliament of the empire, in about four days, and as from the encreafed numbers of imperial fenators, there will be much more time for public bufinefs, than formerly, there may be always expected a debate, and fatisfactory determination upon the fubject, to be known in Ireland, (wind and weather still permitting) in about ten days more, unlefs it should unfortunately happen to be the time of the Seffion allotted for Meafures of Finance, or English Turnpike Bills, and in the interval, whatever D little little encroachment has been made by the prerogative, will only have been de bene effe, and the fame inftance will probably not recur, foon after the law has been fettled upon the fubject.

In page 48, this difaffected man almost openly charges Government with taking advantage of a feason of war and confusion, to force an Union upon the Irish people, whereas, in truth, that very circumftance demonstrates the magnanimity of Great Britain, inalmuch as the greater are our calamities, the greater is our neceffity for a measure which is to be the falvation of the country .- But mark the manner of this flander. As to a time of war, it is true that the Volunteers took advantage of the embarrassments of Great Britain in the last war, to affert the Independence of our Parliament .- It is likewife true, that the United Irishmen in the present war, have taken advantage of the supposed weakness of Great Britain, to play the game of Separation .- When, therefore, enemies of the empire take advantage of a time of war and embarrassment to effect its ruin, we should turn against them their own game, and make use of a time of war, to establish its security. What is this but to fay the Volunteers were no better than the United Irishmen, and .nat Lord Cornwallis's government is as bad as either of them. Observe the generalship of this masterly position -he posts his favourite corps, the United Irishmen, in the centre, and flanks them with the Volunteers, and Lord Cornwallis's administration .- He knows too how popular the memory of the Volunteers is with all loval fubjects in the country, country, and that the Lord Chancellor, and all the great officers of ftate, are proud to have belonged in their youth, to that immortal affociation; and yet in fo many words, he ftiles them the enemies of the empire, who took advantage of a time of war and embarrafsment, to effect its ruin.—Can the views of this difguifed traitor be any longer difguifed?

In the fame manner that he has halloed the Proteftants against the Catholics, in the hopes of their joining in a common cry against the falutary measure which is to be the faboation of the country, has he endeavoured to commit all the claffes of fociety in pernicious jealoufies against each other, the Lawyer against the Merchant, the Man of Landed Property against both the Clergy and the Diffenters, and the Dublin Citizen against the Inhabitant of Cork. To all these feveral descriptions, he fucceffively affects to demonstrate their peculiar and exclusive advantages, at the expense of all the reft, in the corrupt expectation of uniting them all (as I forefee will be the cafe,) in one common opposition to the measure. This man for his own abandoned purpofes, would fet the two breafts on the fame bosom against each other. To demonstrate (fays he) to the Clergy the advantage of an Union, would be lost labour indeed, (Vide page 37.) And yet, (in page 56) he affects to give as the 8th Article of the Union, an arrangement with respect to tythes .- We all know what an arrangement that factious crew to which he belongs would make in that respect .- He wishes to difgust the D_2 Rebels

Rebels against an union, which is to be fo advantageous to the Clergy, and to terrify the Clergy from a meafure which is to be accompanied by an arrangement with regard to tythes; one would fuppofe he did not expect any one would read his whole pamphlet, but that each part would be ftudied by those it was intended to millead. In one and the fame page (32,) he affects to conciliate the Diffenters, by urging inducements irreconcileably contradictory. They too, like the Catholics, are to be appealed with a burnt-offering of tythes-they too, like the Protestants, are to be reinforced numerically, by the accession of Scotch and English Diffenters; and yet, in the fame page they are told, that the inevitable confequence of the measure, must be the annihilation of their fect, and their necessary merging in the mass of the Protestants. The author knew that no man writing in a strain of such profligate inconfistency, could be fuppofed to be in earnest, and he advifedly, at once fubjects the measure of an Union, to reprobation, and the defence of it to ridicule. In page 33, the temporal peers are infidiously reminded, that nothing will be left to them but their properties; and are infultingly informed, that being allowed to retain their properties, will be more than a compensation for the loss of their confequence; while the fpiritual peers are told, that they will be amply recompenced by the security given to their Diocesan Estates, and to the general interests of the Church ;-- and what is that fecurity, and what are those interests ?- That desertion of the Proteftant testant interest, and that arrangement of tythes which are promifed to the Catholics and Disfenters as the reward of their acquiescence. It is eafy to see that the same unprincipled attempt is made in the passage addressed to Country Gentlemen, and that they are scarcely mentioned in the pamphlet except for the purpose of invidious classification, and of shewing them their interests as contradistinguished from the profession of the law and the mercantile community; whereas in truth all ranks, trades, and professions are equally concerned in this momentous measure.

To the merchants the Author evidently infinuates with his characteristic artifice that none of the expected commercial advantages are neceffarily connected with an Union, and that in the prefent fystem of connexion a liberal and honest policy on the part of England would communicate this participation of privileges as effectually as under any other modification of the relation between the two countries. This is evident by the infinuations in pages 38, 39, and 40, that the English will never confume Irish corn, until there be a Union ; that they will violate national faith in regard of the Irish linen manufacture unless there be an Union ; that unless that measure takes place they will never make use of the great canals which they have extended to Liverpool and other western ports, but like the dog in the manger, will deny the enjoyment of thefe benefits both to us and themfelves. This nonfense could never have been written with any view but that that of fomenting national jealoufy, and reprefenting the magnanimous nation of England as a monster of mean injustice, and cruel illiberality. This nonfenfewould reprefent our generous neighbours buying our Confritution with their Commerce, commuting their substantial advantages for our illufory pride, and content to injure themfelves provided they degrade us. Whereas every one knows the reverfe to be true. It is well underftood and univerfally believed that the English have long determined upon the most liberal equalization of the commercial privileges of both nations; that fuch an event is by no means dependent upon the measure of an Union, but concurrent with it, and that the only reafon for making the two circumftances cotemporary is the wifh of heaping favour upon favour till the compliment overpowers us.

This refervation of the one boon until it can be accompanied by the other, is evidently the dignified and munificent intention of Great Britain, and as nothing manifefts an handfome intention fo much as a handfome manner, it particularly appears from the guarded and delicate filence preferved upon the quantity, degree and nature of the commercial bleflings in referve for us; not affronting this great nation by a mean numerical detail of paltry items, but enveloping the bepefice in an indefinite myfterioufnefs, fo as to take us by furprife, and confound us, as it were, by the magnitude of advantages which we had the opportunity of calculating. It is important, therefore, therefore, that this unfortunate Scribe should not be fuffered to misrepresent this matter. Indeed, wicked as his infinuations are, they have not the merit of originality : I remember on the debate of the Irifh Propositions in the English Houfe of Commons another factious character, Mr. Fox, faid with epigrammatic atfectation, I would not give the Commerce of England for the Constitution of Ireland : . It is not the thing I wish to purchase, nor the price I wish to pay, This foolish and reprobated notion of compromife, where there is nothing but munificence on one hand and gratitude on the other, is adopted by the pamphleteer, but, I truft, is now fufficiently exposed. The rational Irish merchant knows that the Union is to be the faluation of the country, and that is as much as he wishes to know about it. The opinion I have here combated is preffed by the enemies of both nations for obvious purpofes. The benefits to be acquired by an Union must be either fuch as are obtained by compact between the countries, or fuch as are the natural operation and refult of the measure itself. Now in this cafe the advantages to be contracted for, whether for Dublin, Cork, Waterford, Limerick, or Galway, are altogether out of the queftion, inafmuch as they are all equally attainable under the prefent connection, and as the two countries are already imperially connected, there could be no honeft or rational motive affignable, why they are not at prefent imparted, (efpecially as fuch benefits could continue only while the connection connection exifts) except the generofity of Britain withing to make each kindnefs more valuable, by giving them all at once. But becaufe that defcription of advantage is out of the queftion, we always hear of it from the enemies of the meafure, who entirely overlook, or affect to do fo, the benefits which naturally refult from the meafure itself, which flow from the mere fact of Union, and are created fimply by the transfer of legislation. It would be useless to detail the particulars of fuch benefits, honorable confidence has already given credit for them, and fceptical incredulity is proof against conviction. A few of those which the transplantation of Parliament must instantly, and of itself, generate, are, the total oblivion of all religious animofities, the immediate conversion and repentance of the United Irishmen, the multiplication of the Protestants, and confequent fatisfaction of the Catholics, the rush and influx of English capital into this peaceable and contented country, the improvement of agriculture, by the brotherly and edifying intercourfe of English and Irish farmers, the diminution of absentees and taxes, the reduction of an expensive standing army, the improvements of the metropolis, peace with the French, and glory with the world !- Thefe are but a few of the bleffings neceffarily connected with the fimple fact of changing the feat of legislation. Bleffings innumerable, and which only can be defcribed by faying, that the measure must be the salvation of the country-

I am

I am forry to find that it is not unneceffary to caution this credulous country, against the artifice of this difaffected hypocrite .- I lament, that fince these sheets were begun, his subtle and malignant poison has taken effect, in one member of the national body .- I lament that a defcription of men, whom I refpect fo much as the Bar of Ireland, has not been able to refift the infection, and I have the vanity to regret, that they had irreparably erred, before this publication could appear, to warn them of their danger .---However, my refentment to the dupes merges in my fuperior indignation against the impostor, and candour compels me to remember, that if it were not for the audacious pamphlet in queftion, most probably 166 Irish lawyers would never have difgraced their profession and themfelves by publicly denouncing to the nation a measure which is to be the fabuation of the country. This libeller knew the firings upon which to touch the profession, and by affecting to represent their possible objections to an Union as frivolous, has, in reality, made them the fubject of the livelieft anxiety and irritation. Thirtytwo independent and public spirited characters have certainly refcued the Bar from universal opprobrium; they may be confidered by an ominous coincidence of numbers as fo many county reprefentatives, and in that respect, as speaking (ex cathedra) the fentiment of the kingdom-but it is melancholy to fee the extended corruption of 166 men, all influenced by the expectation of fitting E fitting in parliament, and desperately monopolizing more than half the representation of the people, and upon this bafe and felfish principle refifting the fabuation of their country. God knows there were lawyers enough before in the House of Commons, as the writer truly has ftated (page 35,) a formidable phalanx. Of our 300 members there are no lefs than 17 practifing barrifters, and at least a dozen more, who, though they never followed the trade, were bred to that unconflitutional profession. This is bad enough, but no honeft Irishman can be sufficiently grateful for the prevention of 166 more from fitting in the next parliament. It is lamentable to fee the best and most respectable characters stoop before the idols of ambition. Even Mr. Saurin, who, during * Lord Camden's administration, was in his cool fenses, and refused the office of Solicitor General and a feat in parliament, has fuffered his quiet and fober intellect to be inflamed by the artful infinuations of this rebel in difguife, and has for ever loft his reputation with his country and profession, and for what? For the idle speculation of fitting at the head of 166 lawyers in the next House of Commons. This passage in the pamphlet was intended for more than the Bar. The author flily reminds us (page 34) that it is the habit of Irish gentlemen to educate their sons as lawyers,

* That nobleman was weak enough to treat the profeffion of the law with respect, and their armed affociation with affection, but the more vigorous intellect; which diffinguishes the administration of his fucceffor has appreciated the barand the yeomanry with more justice.

lawyers, and by this hint that there is fcarcely a gentleman's family in the kingdom which has not fome dear connection in the profession, he hopes to engage the whole class of our gentry in one common refertment with those whom he exclufively appears to inflame, while he makes fure of the indignation of both by one round affertion, (page 35) that what is bad for the Bar, must, of necessity, be good for the country. Another most deep, and, indeed, ingenious scheme, in order to deter the Bar from an Union, is a positive denunciation, that, in the event of an Union, there will be abler judges upon the bench than at present. Vide page 35. This had the defired effect with Mr. Saurin, Mr. Duquery, Mr. Fletcher, Mr. Plunket, and fome other Irish smatterers in law. This was an evil, the profpect of which they could not bear. They find it eafy now to humbug Lords Kilwarden and Carleton, and Judges Downes, Chamberlaine, Smith and George. They can hood-wink Lord Yelverton at Nifi Prius, and in Equity the facility and foftnefs of Lord Clare is fo proverbial, that the lowest attornies daily out-wit and over-reach him. But there would be an end to this hopeful trade if the bench were filled with abler judges, as in the event of an Union, from the fuperior learning of the English bar, there is every probability it would.*

The

* A late law promotion may demonstrate to the Bar, how fittle they have to fear from the patronage of their profession being in an Union Government.

The notion of young adventurers who have little stake in the country, but a facility of Speaking on every subject, (page 35) was not intended to affront the bar, as might at first appear, but to excite their emulation, and ftimulate their ambition, and it unfortunately has had the defired effect. The bar must have observed instances of young adventurers from another nation, who had no ftake. in this country, or any other, and no facility of fpeaking upon any fubject, but merely a facility of writing, (and that too with clerical errors) upon some subjects, who yet contrived to rife from the loweft, to the higheft, fituations ; and they inferred, that they ought not to be excluded from fuch pretentions, merely becaufe they are Gentlemen by birth and education.

The truth is incontrovertible, though it appears in the pamphlet in queffion, and that is, that the bar are too fond of politics. Shortly before the French came to Bantry Bay, the bar, in a political fury, took up arms, which they have not yet laid down, and, under the vain idea of defending the country, they not only wasted their own time, but infpired all over the kingdom a fimilar and general idlenefs. In the time of the rebellion this mifchief was at its height, and no man could get his busines out of the hards of a lawyer. He was never to be found at home, but indulging upon guard, or diffipating in camp; and I am convinced, if, for near fix months, the attornies had not been equally indolent, that the complaints of clients would have been innumerable. But this, though inconvenient to others, was, most of all, inconvenient to the United Irishmen, and hence the refentment and venom of this hackney scribe .- Hinc illæ lachrymæ However, I truft the bar will come to their fenses, though for a moment led away by this profligate fophift. I trust they will, even if against their own interest, concur heartily in a measure which must be the falvation of the country. But, even their most felfish interests, in my apprehension, must be promoted by an Union. The Irifh gentlemen who will emigrate for the good of their country, must borrow money to support the expence of English living, upon mortages of their Irish property. This must multiply foreclosure causes, and the encrease of ejectments, and other actions for non-payment of rent in the city Dublin will be incalculable.

I pafs by, with contempt, the infinuation in (page 39,) that this popular meafure is, in the city of Dublin, to be fupported by force, as being the head-quarters of the army. The city of Dublin will derive more benefits from this meafure than my fhort limits will fuffer me to enumerate. Its beauty (to mention but one inftance) will be confiderably contributed to by the defirable introduction of Rus in Urbe in feveral parts of it. This, together with the afcertained advantage which Dublin must derive, after the Union, by getting rid, altogether, of that riotous and troublefome defcription of men, the manufacturers in the Earl of Meath's liberty, demonstrates, that, in spite of this flagitious f.rebrand's infinuations, this city will be benefited by an Union as much as Cork, or Waterford, or any other place in the kingdom. I touch, with equal contempt, upon the crafty hint, that parliament is incompetent to its own diffolution. He repeats the fophifm of Rouffeau in defence of fuicide-that reason being given to man to atchieve happines, he has a right to deftroy himfelf whenever it tells him that death is preferable to life. He knows that delufive argument was eafily answered by Rousseau himfelf, and therefore urges it as a mock defence for what he hints to be a political fuicide. The object of Parliament, fays he, is general good, Now if general good is attainable by felf-defiruction-ergo, &c. &c. This would be very fchoolboyish if it was not very wicked.

|| The appointment of Colonel Coote to the command of the Queen's County Militia, is a demonstration that coercion is not intended.

This topic is, (upon the plan of the work) firongly enforced, by being weakly combated ;--one example is worth a dozen arguments.--In the reign of Oliver Cromwell, the Long Parliament perpetuated itfelf by a vote.--Hiftory informs us of the good confequences of that meafure.--Of courfe, a multo fortiori; if Parliament has a right to perpetuate, it has a right to deftroy, itfelf. I thall conclude now with two remarks :

ift—This infamous production labours to eftablish one proposition :—That no man can agree to an Union, unless impelled to do so by the most abject abject fear, or most abandoned corruption ; whereas, in truth, all good men concur in their approbation of it, upon the most enlarged conviction, (independent and regardless of all paltry detail) that the measure will be the falvation of the country.

2d—That there is demonstration of the utility of the measure, from one circumstance:—That during the fucceffive reigns of various Viceroy's, no English fecretary had ever the public spirit to propose this important revolution, but that as soon as an amiable young nobleman of our own nation assured the reins of government, the first measure of his administration was the falvation of his country.

Lord Caftlereagh, uninfluenced by the felfifth examples of his English predeceffors, felt the Irish blood running in his veins, and determined it should never blush in his face—his country, and posterity, will do him justice*.

The pamphlet I have anfwered, I do not hefitate to pronounce, the moft audacious, profligate, and libellous production, which ever difgraced the licentioufnefs of the prefs, or infulted the feelings of a nation.—A bad head, and a bad heart, muft have concurred to compose it, and the most unblushing and unfeeling effrontery, alone, was equal to the publication of it.—I rely upon the wifdom and spirit of the British Parliament, in which my country is so foon to be represented, not to fuffer it to escape with impunity, and I trust

* I hate old proverbs and vulgar adages.—One most illiberal one is contradicted by this Nobleman's conduct; that if you put an Irishman on a spit, you can always get another to turn him. truft one of the firft motions made in the Imperial Legiflature, may be—" That his Majefty's "Attorney General, the Rt. Hon. John Toler, " or Captain Taylor, the Lord Lieutenant's Aid-" de-Camp, may be ordered to profecute the Au-" thor, Printer, and Publifher, of the faid Libel, " by Indictment, Information, or Court-Martial, " as the circumftances of the cafe may require."
