SOME Historians write that Phaeton was the first King after the Deluge that reign'd over the Thresprotæ and Molossians, and that he was One of Those, who came with Pelasgus into Epirus.

Others tell us (1) Deucalion and Pyrrha having built a Temple at Dodona, settled there among the Molossians. In after-times Neoptolemus the Son of Achilles transplanting a Colony thither, possess'd himself of those Parts, and left a Succession of Kings after him, nam'd Pyrrhidæ; for in his Youth he was call'd Pyrrhus; and gave the same Name to the (2) eldest of his Sons by Lanassa the Daughter

(1) By this Account the Temple of Jupiter at Dodona was the first that ever was built; but the Greeks have attributed That to Deucalion, which did not come to pass 'till many Years after.

(2) He had Eight Children by that Princess, of whom Pyrrhus was the Eldest, but He dying very young, his Brother Pielus, who was the Second, succeeded his Father, of Cleodes Son of Hyllus. From Him Achilles came to have Divine Honours paid to him in Epirus, where he was worship'd under the Name of Aspetos. (1) After these first Kings of this Branch, Those that follow'd became so barbarous, and were both for their Wealth and Actions so obscure, that there are not the least Footsteps of them to be found in History. (2) Tharrytes is said to be the First who adorn'd his Cities with the Customs of the Grecians, made Learning to flourish, and establish'd good, and wholsom Laws among his Subjects, and by this means he became famous to Posterity. Alcetes was the Son of Tharrytes, Arybas of Alcetes, and of Arybas and Troas his Queen was born Æacides. He married Pthia the Daughter of Menon the Theffalian, who acquired much Reputation in the Lamiac War, and next to Leofthenes had the greatest Authority among the Confederates. Æacides had by his Wife Pthia two Daughters, Deidamia and Troas, and a Son call'd Pyrrbus. Æacides was depos'd in an Insurrection of the Molossians, who set up the Sons of Neoptolemus the Brother of Arybas, and murder'd all the Friends of Æacides that fell into their Hands. Pyrrbus, who was then an Infant, escaped the search of the Assassines by the

(1) That is after Neoptolemus, and his Son Pielus, the thirteen or fourteen succeeding Kings are so unknown in History, that it is with great difficulty we find out so much as the Names of Some of them.

(2) Justin does not attribute This to Tharrytes, but to Arybas the Son of Alcetas I. who had been educated at Athens. He saith of him that quanto doctior Majoribus suis, tanto & gravior Populo fuit. Primus itaque Leges, & Senatum, annuosque Magistratus, & Republica Formam composuit, & means of two faithful Servants, Androclides and Angelus, who secur'd him in the very beginning of the Troubles, and fled with a few Domesticks, and some Women, who were the Child's Nurfes. This Train, small as it was, retarded them in their Flight, so that they were soon overtaken by the Enemy. In this Extremity they committed the Infant to the Care of Androcleon, Hippias, and Meander, three young Men of approv'd Courage, Strength, and Loyalty, directing them to continue their Flight without stopping, 'till they reach'd Megara a Town in Macedonia, whilst They themselves, partly by entreaty, and partly by force, stopt the course of the Pursuers 'till it grew late in the Evening; when having with much Difficulty got clear of them, they hasten'd to join Those who had the care of Pyrrhus: But the Sun being ready to set, and They near the utmost point of their hopes, were on a sudden defeated; for coming to the River that runs by the City, it look'd very dreadful and rough, and endeavouring to pass over, they found it was not fordable; for some late Rains had swell'd the Water, and made the Current very high, and boisterous. The darkness of the Night added to the horror, so that they despair'd of carrying over the Child, and the Women that attended him, without some other Assistance: Wherefore perceiving some of the Country People on the other side, they desir'd them to assist their passage, and show'd them Pyrrhus, calling out aloud, and importuning them; but they could not hear for the noise and roarings of the Water: Thus Time was spent, whilst These bawled out as loud as they cou'd, and Those listened with all their Ears without being able to understand them. At last One of them recollecting himself, pill'd off a piece of Bark from an Oak, and with the Tongue of a Buckle expressed on it the Necessities and the Fortunes of the Child, and then rolling it about a Stone, which was made use of to give force to the Motion, threw it over to the other side. Some report they fastened it to the end of a Javelin, and darted it over. When They on the other Shoar had read what was on the Bark, and considered the shortness of the time, they instantly cut down some Trees, lash'd them together, and came over to them. It fell out, that He who first got ashoar was named Achilles. He took the Prince in his Arms, and convey'd him over, whilst his Companions perform'd the same Service to his Followers. When they were thus got on the other side of the River, and out of the reach of their Enemies, they continu'd their Journey 'till they arriv'd at the Court of Glaucias King of Illyria. They found this Prince sitting in his Palace with the (1) Queen his Consort, and laid the Child down at his Feet, imploring his Protection. The King, who stood in fear of Cassander the mortal Enemy of Æacides, remain'd a long time in suspence, weighing with himself what Part he was to act in that Conjunction, when the Child crawling towards him, and with his little Hands seizing on his Robe, rais'd himself on his Feet, and embrac'd the King's Knees. This Action at first provok'd the King to Laughter, but soon after touch'd him with Compassion for an helpless Infant Prince, who was come to him for Refuge, and with his Tears implor'd his Protection. Others say, he did not crawl towards Glaucias but towards the Altar of the Penates, and that raising himself up he spread his little Arms about it; which made Glaucias consider it in a religious View, and imagine that the Gods were interested in it. Wherefore taking the royal Infant up into his Arms, he deliver'd him to the Queen, and order'd her to see him brought up with his own Children. Some time after This the Enemies sent to demand him, and Cassander Himself offer'd two hundred Talents provided he would deliver him into his Hands; but Glaucias refus'd it, and when he was (1) twelve Years old conducted him at the head of an Army, and restored him to the Throne of his Ancestors. Pyrrhus had in his Countenance an Air of Majesty more Terrible than August. The Teeth in his upper Jaw were not separate, or distinct, it was all one continu'd Bone, divided with small Lines, resembling the spaces of a row of Teeth. (2) It was a general belief that he could cure the Spleen by sacrificing a white Cock, and with his right Foot gently pressing the Part affected, the Patients lying on their Backs for that purpose. Nor was any one so poor or inconsiderable, as not to receive the benefit of the Royal Touch, if he desired it; after the Sacrifice he accepted the Cock as a Reward, and the Present was always most grateful to him. The great Toe of that Foot was said to have a divine Virtue; for after his death, the rest of the Body being consum'd, This was found unhurt and untouch'd by the Fire: but of these things afterwards. Being now about

(1) That is when he was enter'd into his twelfth Year; and This agrees with Fustin's Account, who saith Pyrrhus was eleven Years old when he recover'd the Kingdom; but he does not say that Glaucias carry'd him back into Epire, but that the Epirots having turn'd their Hate into Compassion recall'd him of their own Accord, and appointed Tutors or Governours for the Administration of Affairs during his Minority.

(2) It appears from this Passage that the Opinion of some Kings having the Power of curing certain Maladies with a Touch is of an ancient Date, since here we find an Instance of it of near two thousand Years standing; and I take This to be the first Example of that kind. But our own Experience of the like Pretensions now-a-days will not warrant us to give Credit to this imaginary Virtue in Pyrrhus.

Seventeen years of Age, and the Government in appearance well settled, he took a Journey out of the Kingdom to be present at the Nuptials of one of Glaucias's Sons, with whom he had been educated. But the Molossians, taking the Benefit of his Absence, rebell'd again, turn'd out All of his Party, rifled his Exchequer, and gave themselves up to Neoptolemus. Pyrrhus having thus lost the Kingdom, and in want of all things, apply'd himself to Demetrius the Son of Antigonus, who had married his Sister Deidamia. That Lady when she was very young had been promis'd to Alexander the Son of Roxana by Alexander the Great ; but Their Affairs in time proving unfortunate, when she came to Age they married her to Demetrius. At the great Battel of Ipsus, (1) where all the Kings of the Earth were engag'd, Pyrrhus, tho' yet but a Youth, taking party with Demetrius, routed Those that encounter'd him, and highly signaliz'd Himself among all the Soldiery. Afterwards, when Demetrius's Fortunes were low, he did not forsake him, but secur'd for him those Cities of Greece with which he was entrusted. Upon Articles of Agreement made between Demetrius and Ptolemy, Pyrrhus went over an Hostage into Egypt, and both in Hunting, and other Exercises, gave Ptolemy a lively demonstration of his Strength and Courage. Here observing Berenice in greatest Power, and of all Ptolemy's Wives, highest in esteem for Virtue and Understanding, he made his Court, and paid his Respects principally to Her : for he had a particular Art of obliging the Great for his own Interest, and easily overlook'd such as were below him.

(1) He saith all the Kings of the Earth were then engaged, because Lysimachus, Seleucus, Ptolemy, Cassander, Antigonus, and Demetrius were there in Person. I am of Opinion this Battel was fought the third Year of the hundred and nineteenth Olympiad, three hundred Years before the Birth of our Saviour.

And

And forasmuch as there appear'd an uncommon Prudence and Moderation in his Behaviour, He was preferr'd to the other young Princes, who then made their Court to Antigone the Daughter of Berenice by her first Husband Philip. This Match help'd him to make a greater Figure, and be more taken Notice of than before. For Antigone prov'd a very good Wife to him, and obtain'd for him Men, and Money, which enabled him to recover his Kingdom. At his arrival in Epire his Subjects receiv'd him with open Arms, for they began to hate Neoptolemus for his arbitrary and tyrannical Government. However Pyrrhus, for fear Neoptolemus shou'd have recourse to Some of the other Kings, came to an Agreement with him, and associated him in the Kingdom. Some time after there were Those who secretly exasperated them, and fomented Jealousies between them. Pyrrhus his Quarrel to Neoptolemus was owing to this Accident. It had been a Custom time out of mind for the Kings of Epire to hold an Assembly at Passaro, a Place in the Province of the Molossians, where when they had perform'd a Sacrifice to Jupiter the Warrior they took an Oath to their Subjects, who were likewise sworn to Them. The Kings obliged themselves by Oath to govern according to Law, and the Subjects to maintain and defend, according to the same Law, the King, his Crown, and Dignity. The Ceremony was at this time perform'd in the presence of both the Kings, and when it was over Presents were made, and receiv'd on all sides. Among the Men of Note that were then present was one Gelon, a faithful Friend and Servant of Neoptolemus: This Man, in token of Respect to Pyrrhus, made him a Present (1) of two Yoke of Oxen.

Myrtilus

(1) This was a Constant Custom amongst the Antients, and was That which brought the wise Men from the East to worship

Myrtilus the King's Cup-bearer begged them of Pyrrhus, who refus'd him, and gave them to Another, at which Myrtilus was highly offended. (1) Gelon, who was not ignorant of the Provocation, or Resentment, invited Myrtilus to Supper. Some say that in the heat of Wine he had an infamous Commerce with him, for Myrtilus was young, handsome, and well made. However after Supper he instigated him to embrace Neoptolemus's Interest, and remove Pyrrhus by Poison. Myrtilus seem'd to be pleas'd with the Motion, and to enter into the Design, but immediately went, and discover'd all to his Master. Pyrrhus commanded him to take Alexicrates his chief Cup-bearer with him, and recommend Him to Gelon, as a fit Instrument for their purpose; for he was desirous to have so hellish an Undertaking prov'd by more than one Evidence. Gelon being thus deceiv'd, led Neoptolemus Himself likewise into the Snare. He in confidence of Success cou'd not conceal his Joy, but gave it vent among his Friends. Particularly one Night at an Entertainment at his Sister Cadmia's he blab'd out the whole Design, thinking None within hearing but Themselves. Nor indeed was there a Soul in the room but Phanarete the Wife of Samon chief Keeper of Neoptolemus's Cattle. She had laid her self on a Pallet with her Face turned to the Wall, and pretended to be fast asleep: But she heard all that ship our Saviour at his Birth, and acknowledge his Sovereignty, by presenting unto him their Gitts as to the King of Kings, and Sovereign of the Universe. This Present of two Yoke of Oxen made to Pyrrhus is an Instance of the Simplicity of those times. The Ox was in high Esteem on account of its great usefulness in Husbandry. For which Reason Hesiod has not forgotten to recommend it among the other Precepts he gives to Persa. You ought in the first place, saith he, to have a House, a Wife, and Oxen for Tillage.

(1) The very Man, who had been just making a Present to Pyrrhus of two Yoke of Oxen is for having him poison'd; whilst He, who had begged them of Pyrrhus, and been repuls'd, continues loyal and faithful.

pass'd without being in the least suspected, and went early the next Morning and discover'd to Antigone every thing Neoptolemus had said to his Sister in her hearing. This was immediately carry'd to Pyrrhus, who for the present took no notice of it: But one Night, after the Performance of a solemn Sacrifice, he invited Neoptolemus to Supper, and kill'd him. He had great Reason to be assur'd that all the leading Men in Epire were in his Interest; for they had often press'd him to remove Neoptolemus, and not sit down satisfy'd with Part of the Kingdom, when the Whole was His of Right; but to follow his Destiny which was leading him to a higher Point of Glory. Being encourag'd by this Disposition of the principal Men in the Kingdom, and justified by this villainous Design upon his Person, he no longer hesitated, but was before-hand with Neoptolemus.

In acknowledgment of the Obligations he lay under to Berenice and Ptolomy, he nam'd his Son by Antigone, Ptolomy, and having built a City in the Peninsula of Epirus, call'd it Berenicis. From this time he began to revolve many and vast things in his thoughts; but his first hope and design was particularly laid near home, and he found means to engage himself in the Macedonian Affairs under this pretension. Antipater, Cassander's eldest Son, had kill'd his Mother Theffalonica, and expell'd his Brother Alexander. Alexander sent to Demetrius for Succour, and implor'd likewise the Assistance of Pyrrhus. Demetrius being retarded by other Affairs, Pyrrhus got the start of him, and march'd to the Aid of Alexander, of whom he demanded (as a Reward for his Services) the City of (1) Nymphea, all the maritime Coast of Macedonia, Macedonia, and of the conquer'd Countries which did not anciently belong to the Kingdom of Macedon, together with Ambracia, Acarmania, and Amphilochia. The young Prince giving way to this Demand, he took Possession of these Countries, and secur'd them with good Garrisons, and kept for Alexander himself the other part of the Kingdom which he gain'd from Antipater.

King Lysimachus wou'd willingly have assisted Antipater, but had his Hands, at that time, full of other Business; wherefore knowing that Pyrrhus would not disoblige Ptolomy, or deny Him any thing; he feign'd Letters to him in his Name, desiring him to give over the Expedition, upon the payment of three hundred Talents by Antipater: Pyrrhus opening the Letter quickly discover'd the fraud; for it had not the accustomed Style of Salutation, The Father to the Son health, but King Ptolemy to Pyrrhus the King health. He reproached Lysimachus for this piece of Forgery, and yet soon after listen'd to Terms of Accommodation. The Peace was so far advanc'd, that the three Princes met to swear to the Articles upon the Sacrifices. The three Victims were a Goat, a Bull, and a Ram; but as they were leading the Ram up to the Altar he fell down dead, not by any Blow he had receiv'd, but by meer Accident. All the Assistance laught at the Adventure; (1) but Theodotus the Southsayer mous Rock near it, call'd Nymphæum, so well describ'd in the Life of Sylla, and in Dion, Lib. 41. The learned Palmerius is of Opinion, that instead of Nymphæa it ought to be read Tympheia, because there is a Town of that Name in those Parts. Stephanus Τύμηνη ὄρη Θρακῶν καὶ Τυμφαία πόλις. Tymphe a Mountain in Thesprotis, and Tympheia a City.

(1) In those Days great Regard was had to the Explications the Divines or Southsayers gave of Signs and Prodigies. However here are three Princes, of whom One only is touch'd with that Superstition. Pyrrhus refuses to take the Oath, the other Two take it. Theodotus's Prediction was verifi'd in the Event, for Alexander was murder'd soon after.

wou'd not suffer Pyrrhus to swear, declaring that Heaven by that Omen portended the death of one of the three Kings, upon which he refused to ratify the Peace. The Affairs of Alexander were now in some kind of Settlement, notwithstanding which Demetrius arriv'd, and 'twas evident he came undesir'd, and struck a Terror into Alexander. After they had been a few days together, their mutual Jealousies made them design upon each other; but Demetrius taking advantage of the first occasion, was before-hand with the young King, slew him, and proclaim'd himself King of Macedon. There had for some time past been no very good understanding between Him and Pyrrhus; for he cou'd not forget the Inroads he made into Thessaly; besides, that Distemper natural to Princes, the Thirst of Power and Dominion, render'd their Neighbourhood not only uneasy but formidable to each other. This Jealousie and Distrust was infinitely augmented by the death of Deidamia. In short each of them having seiz'd on Part of Macedonia, and Both laying Claim to the Whole, This added Fuel to the Flame, and gave a specious Colour to their respective Pretensions. Demetrius having subdu'd the Ætolians, left Pantauchus with some of his Forces to secure his Conquests in that Country, whilst He march'd at the Head of the rest against Pyrrhus; and Pyrrhus, as soon as he was advertis'd of it, took the Field in order to meet him; but they Both mistook the Way, and so past by each other. Demetrius fell into Epirus, and wasted the Country, whilst Pyrrhus meeting with Pantauchus, gave him Battel. The Dispute was warm and obstinate on both Sides, especially where the Generals fought. For Pantauchus, who in Dexterity, Courage, and Strength of Body, came not behind any of Demetrius's Captains, and being moreover full of Fire,

Fire, Confidence, and Ambition, challeng'd Pyrrhus to single Combat. Pyrrhus on the other hand yielding to none of the Kings his Cotemporaries in Fortitude and Thirst of Glory, and esteeming the Honour of Achilles rather due to him for his Courage than his Blood, advanc'd against Pantauchus through the Front of the Army. First, they us'd their Lances, then came to a close Fight, and managed their Swords both with Art and Force. Pyrrhus receiving one Wound, but returning two for it, One in the Thigh, the Other near the Neck, repuls'd and overthrew Pantauchus, but could not kill him outright, for he was suddenly rescu'd by his Friends. The Epirots, rais'd with the Victory of their King, and admiring his Courage, forc'd through, and cut in pieces the close Body of the Macedonians, and pursuing Those that fled, kill'd Many, and took five thousand Prisoners. This Fight did not so much exasperate the Macedonians with Anger for their Loss, or with Hatred to Pyrrhus, as it caus'd an Esteem and Admiration of his Valour, which furnish'd a new Subject of Discourse among Those who had seen what he did, and were engag'd against him in the Action. They thought his Countenance, and Swift-ness, and Motion exprest Those of the Great Alexander, and that in Him they beheld strong Resemblances of his Vavacity and Strength in Fight. The other Kings represented that Conqueror in their purple Robes, number of Guards, bending of the Neck, and a fierce lofty Tone: it was Pyrrhus only who represented him in Strength and Feats of Arms. Of his Knowledge in Military Order and Discipline, and his great Ability that way, we have the best information from the Commentaries he left behind him about that Argument. Antigonus being ask'd who was the greatest Soldier, said, Pyrrhus wou'd be, if he liv'd to be old; meaning meaning Those only of his own time; (1) but Hannibal said, that of all great Commanders in general he esteem'd Pyrrhus for Sufficiency and Conduct the First, Scipio the Second, and Himself the Third, as is reported in the Life of Scipio. Indeed he apply'd himself to no other Science but that of War, which was the constant Subject of his Thoughts and Conversation. He look'd on (2) That as the most Noble and Kingly Part of Learning, considering all other Sciences as Curiosities beneath his Notice. Wherefore 'tis reported of him, that when he was once ask'd at a Feast whether he thought Python or Caphisias the best Musician, he reply'd Polyperchon is the best Soldier; intimating thereby that War only was what a King ought to be instructed in, and understand. Towards his Familiars he was mild, and not easily incensed, but forward and ready in answering Kindnesses; so that when Æropus, who had done him many Services, was dead, he could not bear it with Moderation, saying, He indeed had suffer'd what was common to human Nature, but he could not

(1) I know not what was written by Plutarch in the Life of Scipio. As it stands here he seems to have made two Trips of Memory; One is, for saying he had mention'd That in the Life of Scipio, which we see actually written in the Life of Flaminius; and the Other, that there he relates Hannibal's Opinion quite different from what he tells it here. For he saith that Hannibal and Scipio Africanus meeting at Ephesus, when their Conversation turn'd upon Generals of Armies, Hannibal affirmed, that of all Commanders Alexander was the First, Pyrrhus the Second, and Himself the Third. What he saith here is quite different; for Pyrrhus, who is there only the Second in Rank, is here the First; and the Second is given to Scipio, of whom there is no mention in the other Place. Cou'd Hannibal have been of two contrary Opinions on two different Occasions?

(2) Miserable are the States whose Princes have their Heads possess'd with that Notion. It is to be confess'd that the Military Science is fitter for a Prince than many Others; but the Science of Peace and Justice is the Best of All, by which That of War is to be govern'd and regulated.

forbear condemning Himself for having delay'd it so long 'till he had lost the Opportunity of being grateful to him; (1) for our Debts may be satisfy'd to the Creditor's Heirs, but the acknowledgement of receiv'd Favours not paid in, while They to whom it is due can be sensible of it, afflicts a good and a worthy Nature. Some thinking it fit that Pyrrhus should banish a certain ill-tongu'd Fellow in Ambracia, who had spoke very indecently of him; Let him rather, said he, speak against me here to a few, than rambling about, spread an ill report of me every where. Another time some young Fellows were brought before him for having rail'd at him in their Cups, and He asking them if they said such and such things of him, One of them answer'd, We did, Sir, and should have said a great deal more if we had had more Wine; at which Words he smil'd, and discharged them. After Antigone's Death he wedded several Wives on purpose to enlarge his Interest and Power. For he marry'd the Daughter of Antoleon King of Pæonia, Barcenna Daughter of Bardyllis King of Illyria, and Lanassa Daughter of Agathocles the Syracusian, who brought with her in Dowry the Island of Corcyra taken by her Father. By Antigone he had Ptolemy, Alexander by Lanassa, and Helenus the youngest by Barcenna. All these Princes were naturally of a martial Temper, which he quicken'd and fomented by their Education, sharpening in their very Infancy their innate Courage and Disposition to War. 'Tis said when One of them, yet a Child, ask'd him to which of them he would leave his Kingdom, he said, to Him that had the sharpest Sword; which was much like that (1)

Tragical Curse of Oedipus to his Sons,

——— Divide not as the common Rout,
But with the Sword each cut his Portion out.

So unfociable and brutal are the measures which Ambition takes.

After this Battel Pyrrhus returning gloriously home, entertain'd himself with the sense of his own Honour and Greatness of Mind, and being call'd Eagle by the Epirots: By your means it is, says he, that I am an Eagle; for how should I not be such, while I am born up by your Arms as on Wings? A little after having Intelligence that Demetrius was dangerously sick, he fell on a sudden into Macedon, intending only an Incurfion, and to harrafs the Country; but was very near seizing upon All, and taking the Kingdom without a Blow. For he march'd as far as Edeffa, the Capital of the Kingdom, without any Opposition. On the contrary, many of the Inhabitants came in, and joyn'd him. This danger excited Demetrius beyond his Strength, and his Friends and Commanders in a short time got a considerable Army together, and with all

(1) He means the terrible Imprecation of Oedipus against his own Children, and alludes to that passage in the Phœnician Women of Euripides, where Jocasta saith of her Husband, v. 67.

He utters the most impious Imprecations against his Children. He prays that each of them may parcel out his share in the Succession with the Edge of his Sword. The Latin Interpreter has translated it rendering διαλαχέειν by perdant instead of sortantur. Plutarch's Reflection is very apposite. Pyrrhus his Answer does not come much behind the Imprecation of Oedipus.

their Forces briskly attack'd Pyrrhus, who coming only to pillage would not stand a Fight, but retreating lost part of his Army, as he went off, by the close pursuit of the Macedonians. Tho' Demetrius had with so much ease driven Pyrrhus out of his Country, yet he did not flight, or overlook him. But as he had been forming great Designs in his Head, and thought of nothing less than to recover his Father's Dominions with an Army of a hundred thousand Men, and five hundred Sail of Ships, he thought it not prudent either to embroil himself with Pyrrhus, or to leave behind him so dangerous a Neighbour. For these Considerations he struck up a Peace with him, that he might with more Safety turn his Forces against the other Kings.

Demetrius his Designs were soon discover'd by this Peace, and these mighty Preparations. The other Kings were alarm'd at it, and sent their Ambassadors to Pyrrhus with Letters, in which they express their Astonishment at his neglecting so favourable an opportunity which Demetrius Himself had given him, and his sitting still 'till his Enemy was at leisure, and in a condition to attack him. They represented to him with how much ease he might drive him out of Macedonia, now whilst his Hands were full; instead of which he waited 'till he had dispatch'd all his other Affairs, and was so increas'd in Power and Strength as to be able to carry the War home to his own Doors, as he certainly wou'd, and put him under the necessity of fighting in defence of the Temples of the Gods, and the Sepulchres of his Ancestors in Molossia. And all This after that Prince had given him so late an Instance of his peaceable Disposition towards him, in taking from him his Wife, and the Island of Corcyra. For Lanassa had taken Offence at Pyrrhus, for shewing greater tokens of his Love to his other Wives, tho' Barbarians, than to Her, and so withdrew to Corcyra; where being desirous to marry some other of the Kings, she made an Overture to Demetrius, knowing that He of all the rest was the most likely to embrace the Proposal. Accordingly he sail'd thither, married Lanassa, and plac'd a Garrison in the Island. The Kings having writ thus to Pyrrhus, did Themselves likewise find work for Demetrius, while he was delaying and making his Preparations. Ptolemy setting out with a great Fleet, drew off many of the Greek Cities; Lysimachus out of Thrace wasted the upper Macedon: Pyrrhus also taking Arms at the same time, march'd to Beroea, (1) expecting (as it fell out) that Demetrius drawing his Forces against Lysimachus, would leave the lower Country without Supplies. The very Night before he sat out on this Expedition, he seem'd in his Sleep to be call'd by Alexander the Great, and approaching saw him sick a-bed, but was receiv'd with very kind Words, much Respect, and a Promise of sudden Assistance: He making bold to reply; How, Sir, can you, sick as you are, assist me? (2) With my Name, says he; and mounting a (3) Nisæan Horse, seem'd to lead the way: At the

(1) This was Reasoning like a wise General; for it was more the Business of Demetrius to hasten to the Succour of the upper Macedonia, than to march against Ptolemy, who was tampering with the Cities of Greece, and courting them to Revolt. One ought to provide first against the Danger that is most imminent.

(2) The Names of such renown'd Captains as Alexander, are of great Significancy upon Occasion, especially to Such as can make a proper Use of them, and lay some Claim to them by their Courage.

sight of this Vision he was much assur'd, and with long Marches over-running all the Interjacent Places, took Berœa, and making his Head Quarters there, reduc'd the rest of the Country by his Commanders. When Demetrius receiv'd Intelligence of This, and perceiv'd likewise the Macedonians ready to mutiny in the Army, he was afraid to advance farther, lest coming near Lysmachus, a Macedonian King, and of great Fame, they should revolt to him. Wherefore dropping his Design against Lysmachus, he return'd, and marching directly against Pyrrhus, who was a Stranger, and hated by the Macedonians, he encamp'd with his Forces near Berœa. Whilst he lay there, many of the Inhabitants came out of Berœa to visit their Friends and Acquaintance in the Camp, where they infinitely prais'd Pyrrhus, as a Person invincible in Arms, a very Illustrious Prince, and one who treated all Those that fell into his Hands with great Tenderness and Humanity. Besides These, Phyrrus himself sent several Others into the Camp privately, who pretending themselves to be Macedonians, insinuated up and down that now was the time for them to deliver themselves out of the cruel Hands of Demetrius, by declaring for Pyrrhus, a popular Prince, and highly belov'd by the Soldiers.

This Artifice had its desired Effect upon the greatest Part of the Army; who cast their Eyes towards the Enemy's Camp to see if they cou'd not discover Pyrrhus, that they might go and present themselves to him. It happen'd in that Instant that his Helmet was off; but immediately recollecting himself, and considering that he cou'd not be known without it, he put it on, and was in a Moment discover'd by his glittering Plume, and Crest of (1) Goat's Horns. Then the Macedonians running to him, desir'd the Word; Others clapp'd Oaken Boughs upon their Heads, because they saw them worn by His Soldiers. Some took the confidence to say to Demetrius Himself, that he would be well advis'd to withdraw, and lay down the Government. And He indeed finding the mutinous humour of the Army agreeable to that sort of Discourse, privately got away, disguis'd in an old Macedonian Hat, and a common red Coat.

Pyrrhus soon after arriving in their Camp, became Master of the Army without fighting, and was declar'd King of the Macedonians. Immediately upon This Lysimachus arrived, and affirmed that (2) He had contributed as much to the Flight and Expulsion of Demetrius as Pyrrhus, and that the Kingdom therefore ought to be shar'd between them.

(1) In the Manuscript at St. Germain des Prez, instead of τοῖς τραγυκοῖς κέρασιν, Goat's Horns, it is, τοῖς στρατηγικοῖς κέρασιν, the Horns of General; but I may safely venture to affirm that This is the Fault of the Transcriber, who not understanding what was meant by those Goat's-Horns, transcrib'd it τοῖς στρατηγικοῖς, which he understood as little. Those Princes adorn'd their Crests with the Figures of several Animals; That of Pyrrhus had on its sides two Goats Horns. Alexander is represented on the Medals with such a Crest.

(2) How cou'd He lay claim to any Share in that Action, since All was over before his Arrival? He pretended that the Report of his March had encourag'd the Macedonians to abandon Demetrius, and forced Demetrius to withdraw and shift for Himself. This Pretension was without question very weak and groundless, and at another time wou'd not have been minded; but it receiv'd its Weight from the present Conjunction. Lysimachus was arriv'd at the Head of an Army, and was by Birth a Macedonian. Pyrrhus therefore had just Reason to fear that the Army which had that Moment revolted from Demetrius, might revolt from Him likewise, for the sake of a Prince of their own Blood. This Consideration determin'd him to give way to the Pretensions of Lysimachus, and content himself with them. Pyrrhus, not yet well assur'd of the Macedonians, and in doubt of their Faith, consented to the Proposition, and so they divided the Cities and Provinces between them. This was for the present useful to them Both, and prevented a War; but shortly after they found the Partition not so much an avoydance of Dissatisfactions, as an occasion of mutual Complaint and Difference. For to Such whose Ambition neither Seas, nor Mountains, nor the forsaken Desarts can limit, nor the Bounds dividing Europe from Asia confine their vast desires; 'tis hard to say how They should forbear injuring one another, when they touch, and are close together. These are ever naturally in War, envying and seeking advantages of one another; they make use of those two venerable Names, (1) Peace and War, as of Money, not so much guided by Justice, as when it falls out to be for their Interest, and are really better Men when they openly enter on a War, than when they give to the meer Forbearance of doing Wrong, only for want of opportunity, the sacred Names of Justice and Friendship.

Of This Pyrrhus was a flagrant Instance. For opposing himself again to Demetrius, who began to recover his Affairs, and checking that Power which was returning by degrees, as Strength does to a Man lately come out of a Fit of Sicknes, he

Half the Kingdom, rather than run a Hazard of losing the Whole. In publick Affairs of the greatest Importance, the present Conjunction is often the Rule to steer by; of which History furnisheth us with many Examples, and Pyrrhus's Fears were justified by what happened soon after.

(1) Peace is certainly a very venerable Name; it is the Source of publick Happiness and Prosperity, and causeth Justice and Piety to flourish; but how comes War to be a Name so venerable? No otherwise than as the End of it is the Support of Justice, and Re-establishment of Peace; but Ambitious Princes abuse these two Names, and, like Money, depreciate or inhance their Value, as it serves their Purposes. This Idea is very noble and beautiful.

marched to the Assistance of the Grecians, and made a solemn Entry into the City of Athens. He went in Proceſſion up to the Citadel, where he perform'd a ſolemn Sacrifice to the Goddeſs; from thence returning down into the City, he told the Athenians, that he was highly pleas'd with the Affection they had manifested towards him, and the Confidence they repos'd in him, but added, if they were wiſe (1) they wou'd never ſuffer any King to enter their City, but ſhut their Gates againſt all ſuch as ſhou'd offer it. Soon after this he concluded a Peace with Demetrius, and yet he was no ſooner paſſed into Aſia, but Pyrrhus at the Inſtigation of Lysimachus tamper'd with the Theſſalonians, and perſuaded them to revolt. He likewiſe attack'd the Garrifons he had in Greece. For he found the Macedonians were more ſubmiſſive and tractable in times of War, than in Peace, and he was of his own Inclination not much given to reſt. At laſt Demetrius having receiv'd a Deſeat in Syria, Lysimachus, who had now ſecur'd his Affairs on that ſide, and nothing to do elſewhere, immediately turn'd his Forces againſt Pyrrhus, who lay in Quarters at Edeſſa. Upon his Arrival near the Place he fell on one of the King's Convoys, which he took, and ſo diſtreſs'd the Army for want of Proviſions; then partly by Letters, partly by ſpreading Rumours abroad, he corrupted the principal Officers of the Macedonians, reproaching them for that they had made one their Maſter, who was not only a Stranger, but deſcended from Thoſe who had ever been ſubject to the Macedonians, and thruſt the old Friends and Familiars of Alexander out of the Country: Theſe Re-proaches gain'd upon moſt of the Macedonians;

Thus Kings have no reason to condemn the People when they change sometimes for their Interest, since in That they do but imitate Them, as the great Examples of Unfaithfulness and Treachery; holding Him (1) the Bravest that makes the least account of being an Honest Man.

Pyrrhus retiring thus into Epirus, and leaving Macedon, had a fair Occasion given him by Fortune, of enjoying himself in quiet, and peaceably governing his own Subjects; but He thought it a nauseous course of Life, not to be doing mischief to Others, or receiving Some from them, as Achilles could not endure repose, but

The Romans were in War with the Tarentines, who not able to go on with it, nor yet give it over, by reason of the bold and ill-advis'd Harangues of their leading Men, bethought themselves of calling in Pyrrhus, and making Him their General, as of all the Neighbouring Kings the most at leisure, and the greatest Soldier. The more grave and discreet Citizens opposing these Counsels, were run down by the noise and violence of the Multitude; which when they saw, they came no more into the Assemblies; only one Meton, a very sober Man, the day this Publick Decree was to be ratified, and the People all plac'd, like one quite drunk, with a wither'd Garland and Torch in his Hand, and a Woman playing on a Flageolet before him, came dancing into the Assembly; and as in great Multitudes met at such popular Assemblies no decorum can be well observ'd, Some clap'd him, Others laught, None forbid him, but call'd to the Woman to play, and Him to sing to the Company; and when they thought they were ready to begin, there was a profound Silence in the Court; but Meton, instead of singing, spoke with an audible Voice to them in this Manner: 'Tis very well done of you, O ye Tarentines, not to hinder Any from making themselves merry that have a mind to it, while it is yet in their Power; and if you are wise, you will still keep and enjoy this Freedom, for you must change your course of Life, and eat other Diet, when Pyrrhus comes among You. These Words made a strange impression upon many of the Tarentines, and it was mutter'd about, that he had spoke much to the purpose; but Some who fear'd they should be sacrific'd if a Peace were made with the Romans, revil'd the whole Assembly for so tamely suffering themselves to be abus'd by a lewd drunken Sot; and crowding together upon Meton, thrust him out; so the Publick Order was pass'd, and Ambassadors sent into Epirus, not only in their own Names, but of all the Italick Greeks, carrying Presents to Pyrrhus, and letting him know they only wanted a General of his Fame and Experience, that as for Forces they had enow, being able to raise a powerful Army of Lucanians, nians, Messapians, Samnites, and Tarentines, amounting in the whole to no less than twenty thousand Horse, and three hundred and fifty thousand Foot. This mighty Promise did not only quicken Pyrrhus, but rais'd also in the Epirots an earnest Desire, and strong Inclination to the War.

(1) This is a fine Lesson which Plutarch has put into the Mouths of Princes. They indeed too often appear persuaded of the Truth of that detestable Maxim, that Injustice and Infidelity are more serviceable to their Designs than Truth and Justice. From Them this Opinion gets into the Minds of their Subjects, and opens a Door to all sorts of Knavery and Violence.

Pyrrhus had at that time in his Court a Thessalian named Cineas, a Man of sound Sense, and who having been Demosthenes's Disciple pass'd for the only Orator of his time, (1) who cou'd most effectually revive in the Minds of his Hearers, and represent, as in a Picture to them, the Force and Eloquence of his Master. This Man had devoted himself to Pyrrhus, who employ'd him in several Ambassies, in all which he confirm'd that Saying in Euripides,

——— *That force of weighty Words
Can out-do all that's done by conqu'ring Swords.*

This made Pyrrhus say of him, that Cineas had taken more Towns with his Words, than He with his Arms, and always did him the honour to use him in his most important occasions. Cineas seeing Pyrrhus intent upon his Preparations for Italy, and finding him one day in good humour, and at leisure, drew him insensibly into the following Conversation. Sir, said he, the Romans have the Reputation of being fine Soldiers, and have many stout warlike Nations under them. If we have the good luck to conquer them, what Benefits shall we reap from our Victory? Cyneas, reply'd the King, thy Question answers it

(1) Here is a Person of such prevailing Eloquence, that Pyrrhus himself confess'd he had gain'd more Cities by His Tongue than he had conquer'd by the Sword. And yet all the Commendation given him by Plutarch is, that self. When once we have overcome the Romans, there will be no Province, no Town, whether Greek, or Barbarian, able to oppose us. We shall at once be Masters of all Italy, whose Riches, Strength, and Power are better known to Thee than any Man. Cineas after a little pause continued, And having subdu'd Italy, what shall we do next? Pyrrhus not yet discovering what it was he drove at, reply'd; Sicily next holds out her Arms to receive us, a fortunate and populous Island, and easie to be gain'd; for ever since the Death of Agathocles all things there have been in Combustion. Faction and Anarchy domineer in all their Towns, and every thing is at the Discretion of their turbulent mercenary Orators. You speak, says Cineas, what is highly probable; but shall the possession of Sicily put an end to the War? Far from it, answer'd Pyrrhus; for if Fortune favours us with Victory, and we succeed there, That shall serve only as the Forerunner of greater Undertakings. When Sicily is reduc'd, who can forbear Lybia and Carthage, then within reach? which Agathocles, even when forc'd to fly in a clandestine manner from Syracuse, and passing the Sea only with a few Ships, had almost surpriz'd. Now when we have added Africa to our Conquests, will it be suppos'd that One of those Enemies that at present cut us out so much Work, will presume to lift a Finger against us? No certainly, reply'd Cineas interrupting him; (1) For, continu'd Pyrrhus, thou can'st not but see that when we are at the Head of such a mighty Power we shall soon recover Macedon, and govern in Greece without Controul.

(1) The Interpreters have very much misunderstood this Passage, when they make Cineas the Speaker. These are the Words of Pyrrhus, and not of Cineas, whose Business it was not to furnish Pyrrhus with Reasons to justify his Undertaking. It is Pyrrhus therefore that continues the Speech. They have been led into this Mistake for want of perceiving that Plutarch suppresseth the said he, or answered he, where the Matter itself supplies the Omission, as it does very visibly in this place.

That

That is not to be deny'd, answer'd Cineas; but when we have conquer'd All, what is the next thing we are to do? What are we next to do? Why we will live at our Ease. We will spend whole Days in banquetting, and entertaining our selves with agreeable Conversation. We will think of nothing but our Pleasures. Cineas interrupting him at these Words said, Ah! Sir, what binders us now to live at our ease, to banquet, feast, and rejoice? (1) We have already at hand, and in our possession, without any care or trouble, what we are going in quest of, at the Expence of so much Blood, Labour, and Danger; at the Expence of so many Calamities, which we shall suffer our selves, and draw down upon others.

This Discourse of Cineas rather afflicted Pyrrhus than corrected him. He was convinced that he was foregoing a certain Happiness, but he cou'd not abandon those Hopes, which had got such strong hold of him, and flatter'd his Desires, and Ambition. Wherefore he first detach'd Cineas with three thousand Foot to Tarentum; soon after which arriv'd from thence a great Number of Transports, Gallies, and flat-bottom'd Boats, on board of which he ship'd twenty Elephants, three thousand Horse, twenty thousand Foot, two thousand Archers, and five hundred Slingers.

(1) This Answer of Cineas contains in it a very wholesome Lesson, if we knew how to make a right use of it. Tho' it is a Sentiment that cannot miss a Man of good Sense upon any proper occasion, I am of Opinion Horace had this Answer of Cineas in view when he said in the XIth Epistle of his first Book, "All the trouble we are at is unprofitable, nothing but a laborious Idleness. We go in quest of " Happiness by Sea, and by Land.

 " What thou art in search after

 " thou can'st but moderate thy " Affections.

When all things were in a readiness he set Sail, but by that time he was out at Sea he was overtaken by a Storm, the Wind, contrary to the season of the Year, blowing hard at Nore. The Ship on which he was aboard, was by stress of Weather forced to Leeward; but by the great skill and resolution of his Officers and Seamen he bore with the Land, and made the Italian Shoar with infinite Labour, and beyond Expectation; the rest of the Fleet could not hold their Course, but were dispersed. Some of the Ships being beaten off from the Coast of Italy, were driven into the Libyan and Sicilian Sea; Others not able to double the Cape of Japygium, were overtaken by the Night, and a very boisterous and grown Sea throwing them upon a dangerous and rocky Shoar, they were all in very great Distress. The Admiral-Galley having Demetrius on board, whilst the Sea bore upon her sides, resisted with her Bulk and Strength, and avoided the force of it, 'till the Wind coming about, blew directly in their Teeth from the Shoar, and the Vessel keeping up with her Head against it, was in danger of opening by the raking of the Sea: and yet to suffer themselves to be driven off to Sea again, which was very raging and tempestuous, the Wind shifting about every way, seem'd to them the most dreadful case of all. In this extremity Pyrrhus flung himself over board, and was instantly follow'd by his Friends and Guards, earnestly contending who should be most ready to assist him; but the Night which was exceeding dark, and the roaring Sea, which was forced by the Wind with great impetuosity upon the Coast, and repuls'd with equal Violence, made it extream difficult to save him. At last, after having struggled all Night with the Winds and Waves, by that time the Day began to break, and the Wind was pretty well laid, he was tols'd a-shoar, extremely weaken'd and disabled in Body, but with the same high and invincible Courage, which still supported him.

At the same time the Messapians, on whose Coast the Vessel was thrown, ran with great diligence to render him all the Service and Assistance they were able; and also met with some of the other straggling Vessels that had escap'd the Storm; in which were a very few Horse, and not quite two thousand Foot, and two Elephants; with these Pyrrhus march'd streight to Tarentum. Cineas being inform'd of his Approach drew out his Forces to meet him. At his first arrival he did nothing unpleasing to the Tarentines; but when he heard his Ships were all safe in Harbour, and the best part of his Army had join'd him; then considering the People as neither able to preserve Themselves nor secure Others, unless they were necessitated to it, and that they intended, whilst He was fighting for them in the Field, to remain idle at home, and spend their time in their Baths, Collations, and Love-Intrigues, he first shut up the Places of publick Exercise, and their Walks, where vainly solicitous they fought for their Country only in discourse of Wars; he prohibited likewise all Solemn Festivals, Revels and Merry-makings, as improper, and unseasonable. Instead of These, he call'd the Youth to Arms, and was very severe and inflexible against Such as were wanting in their Musters and Exercises. In-somuch that Many who were unaccustom'd to so exact a Discipline, left the City, calling That a state of insupportable slavery, which wou'd not suffer them to live at ease, in the full enjoyment of their Pleasures.

He now receiv'd Intelligence that Levinus the Roman Consul was upon his March with a powerful Army, and that he was already advanced into Lucania, where he burnt and pillaged every thing as he pass'd. The Confederate Forces were not come up to him, yet he thought it very indecent to suffer so near an approach of an Enemy, and neglect it; and therefore drew out with his Army, but first sent an Herald to the Romans to know if before they came to extremities they wou'd be content to have the Matters in dispute between Them and the Greek-Italians brought to a friendly hearing, and allow Him to be Arbitrator between them. Levinus returned for Answer, that the Romans neither accepted him as Arbitrator, nor fear'd him as an Enemy, whereupon Pyrrhus advanc'd, and encamp'd in the Plain between the Cities of Pandosia and Heraclea, and having notice that the Romans were near, and lay on the other side of the River (1) Siris, he rode up to take a view of them; and seeing the Order, the appointment of the Watches, the excellent Form, and, in a word, the whole Scheme of their Encampment, he was amazed, and calling one of his Friends next to him; This Order, says he, Megacles, of a Barbarous Nation, is not at all barbarous, we shall soon see what they can do; and growing a little more doubtful of the Event, resolv'd to expect the arrival of the Confederates. And to hinder the Romans (if in the mean time they should endeavour to pass the River) he planted men all along the Bank to oppose them; but they hast'ning to prevent the coming up of those Forces he look'd for, attempted the Passage with their Infantry, where it was fordable, the Horse getting over where they cou'd, so that the Greeks, fearing to be surrounded, were obliged to retreat.

Pyrrhus being much concern'd at this News, commanded his Foot-Officers immediately to

(1) So it ought to be read, the River Siris, and not Liris; for the Liris is in Campania, and the Siris in Magna Græcia, running near Heraclea. Strabo has very judiciously distinguish'd them. The Siris is the River here in Question.

draw up, and form, and stand to their Arms, whilst He advanced with great Diligence at the Head of the Horse, being about three thousand in number, hoping he shou'd be still time enough to distress the Romans in their Passage, dispers'd up and down, and in disorder; but when he saw a vast number of Shields glittering above the Water, and the Horse following in good order, he then drew up his Men into a closer Body, and Himself at the Head of them began the Charge. He was soon known by the Bravery and Lustre of his Armour, which was exceeding rich, but more by his Performances, which gave signal proof that his Fame had not out-gone what he was able effectually to perform: For rushing into the Battel without the least concern for his own Safety, and breaking through every thing that oppos'd him, he gave his Orders with a steady and undisturb'd Reason, and such a Presence of mind, as if he had been quite out of Danger, flying from place to place, and assisting Those whom he thought most oppress'd by the Enemy. Here Leonatus a Macedonian, observing one of the Italians very intent upon Pyrrhus, and changing places as He did, and moving as He mov'd: Do you see Sir, said he, that Barbarian on the black Horse with white Feet? he seems to me to have some Design of Consequence in his Head; his Eyes are steadily fixt on You; he seems to aim only at You, and tho' it is certain he does not want Courage or Resolution, he takes no notice of any Others, but is bent upon You alone; Good Sir have a care of him. Leonatus, said Pyrrhus, it is impossible for any Man to avoid his Fate; but neither He nor any other Italian shall have much satisfaction in ingaging with me to-day. While they were in this Discourse, the Italian poising his Launce, and clapping Spurs to his Horse, rid full drive at Pyrrhus, and run his Horse through, as Leonatus did the Italian's, so they

they both fell together. Pyrrhus was immediately surrounded by a crowd of Friends, who carry'd him off, and kill'd the Italian, who defended himself with a desperate Courage to the very last. He was a Ferentine by Birth, Captain of a Company, and named Oplacus. This made Pyrrhus use greater caution; and now seeing his Horse give ground, he brought up the Infantry, and rang'd them in order, and then changing his Robe and his Arms with Megacles one of his Friends, and obscuring as it were himself in His, charg'd upon the Romans, who receiv'd and engag'd him, and a great while the Success of the Battel remain'd undetermin'd; and 'tis said there were seven Turns of Fortune both of pursuing and being pursu'd. This change of his Arms was very serviceable for the Safety of his Person, but had like to have overthrown his Affairs, and lost him the Victory; for the Enemy fell in Crouds upon Megacles, whom by his Robe and Armour they took to be King. He who was the most forward among them, and gave him his Death's Wound, was a Horseman named Dexous. This Man seizing on his Robe and Head-piece, rode away full speed to Levinus, and shewing them to the Consul, cry'd out, that he had slain Pyrrhus. These Spoils being carry'd as in Triumph through every Rank, and shewn about, gave an incredible Joy to the Romans, whose Army eccho'd with the Shouts of Victory, whilst That of the Greeks was struck with a general Consternation. Pyrrhus understanding what had happen'd, rid about the Army with his Face bare, stretching out his Hand to his Soldiers, and telling them aloud it was He. Having thus restored the fight, his Elephants chiefly distress'd the Romans, so that to Them was owing the Gain of the Battel. For perceiving that the Roman Ranks were broken by those frightful Animals, and that their Horses cou'd not bear them, but even before they came near recoil'd back with their Riders, he immediately commanded the Thesſalian Cavalry to charge them in this diſorder, and gave them a total Rout with great effuſion of Blood. Dionyſius of Halicarnaffus affirms near fifteen thouſand fell of the Romans. Hieronymus, no more than ſeven thouſand. On Pyrrhus's ſide, the ſame Dionyſius makes thirteen thouſand ſlain, the Other under three thouſand ; but they were the flower of his Men, as well of his particular Friends, as Officers in whom he always chiefly confided, and made uſe of in the moſt important Occaſions.

Pyrrhus without loſs of time made himſelf Maſter of the Roman Camp, which They had deſerted, drew off ſeveral of the Confederate Cities, waſted the Country round about, and advanc'd ſo far, that he was within thirty ſeven Miles of Rome it ſelf. The Lucanians and Samnites came in and join'd him after the Fight, and were ſeverely reprov'd by him for their delay ; however it plainly appear'd that he was extreamly ſatisfy'd and rais'd in his thoughts, that he had defeated ſo great an Army of the Romans with the aſſiſtance of the Tarentines alone.

The Romans on their ſide were Maſters of ſo much Courage and Magnanimity, that notwithstanding ſo ſignal a Deſeat they wou'd not recall Levinus their Conſul ; tho' we are told Fabricius ſhou'd ſay on that Occaſion, that the Romans were not overcome by the Epirots, by that Pyrrhus had overcome Levinus. Intimating that their Loſs was owing to the ſuperior ſenſe of the General, and not to the Courage, and ſuperior Numbers of his Forces. Wherefore raiſing new Levies to fill up their Legions, and diſcourſing of the War with an air of Confidence and Reſolution, as if no Deſeat had happen'd, they ſtruck Pyrrhus with amazement. For this reaſon he thought it adviſable, ble, to send first and make an Experiment, whether they had any Inclination to treat, thinking that to take the City and make an absolute Conquest, was no work for such an Army as His was at that time, but if he cou'd bring them to terms of Accommodation, and strike up a Peace with them, That would be highly honourable after so signal a Victory.

Cineas therefore being sent on that Errand to Rome had a Conference with the Chief Men in the City, to every One of whom he sent Presents from the King, as likewise to their Ladies; but they One and All refused them, the Women as well as Men, declaring that when the Peace was publicly concluded, they should then be ready on their parts to give the King all possible Demonstrations of their Duty and Respect.

When Cineas was introduced into the Senate, and admitted to Audience, He made a Speech, and in a very graceful manner endeavour'd to incline them to an Accommodation. But tho' Pyrrhus had offer'd to release the Prisoners taken in the late Battel without Ransom, and to assist them in the entire Conquest of Italy; asking for nothing on his part but their Friendship, and Security for the Tarentines; yet they were immoveable, and rejected every thing. There were Some indeed that seem'd well inclin'd to a Peace, urging that they had already receiv'd a great Overthrow, and were in danger of receiving another still greater, for that Pyrrhus his Forces were daily increasing by the Junction of many of the Italian People his Confederates.

There was at that time in Rome a Person of the first Rank, call'd Appius Claudius, who by reason of his great Age and loss of Sight had retir'd from publick Affairs; but when he heard of the King's Offers to the Senate, and that it was whisper'd about that they were likely to be accepted, he cou'd not contain himself, but commanding his Servants to take him up, they carried him in his Chair through the Forum to the Senate-house : When he was set down at the Door, his Sons and Sons-in-law took him by the Arms, and brought him into the Senate. An awful Silence possess'd the whole Assembly at the appearance of that venerable Member, whilst He deliver'd his Sentiments in the Terms following. 'Till now, O ye Romans! I consider'd my loss of sight as my greatest Misfortune, (1) but now I wish I was as deaf as I am blind, that I might not hear the shameful Resolutions you are taking, and the dishonourable Treaty you are about to make, a Treaty that will in a Moment efface the Glory Rome has been so long acquiring with Toils, and Hazards innumerable. Where are now those big Words with which you us'd to frighten Mankind, when you brag'd that if Alexander the Great had invaded Italy, and turn'd his Arms against Us when We were Young, and our Fathers in full Vigour, He wou'd not now have been call'd the Invincible, but either by a shameful Flight, or honourable Death, wou'd have added fresh Lawrels to the Roman Name and Glory? How vain and childish was that Boasting! Are you not afraid of the Chao-nians, and Moloffians? Of Those, who were always a Prey to the Macedonians? Do you not tremble at the very Name of Pyrrhus, who has been educated in a Dependency upon one of Alexander's Life-Guards? Hither he is come, not so much to succour the Greeks,

(1) For if there are somethings offensive to the Eye, there are Others no less offensive to the Ear. Sophocles had made Oedipus say, before Appius Claudius, Tell me not that I have done ill to deprive my self of sight, &c. Ah! if I cou'd likewise destroy the Sense of Hearing I wou'd perform that double Sacrifice to my Despair; and wou'd soon be as deaf as I am blind, that I might shut the Door of the Understanding against those Calamities with which I am surrounded. But Appius cou'd not borrow this Sentiment from Sophocles whom he had never read, it was dictated to him by Nature.

who inhabit among us, as to fly from his Enemies in the Bowels of his own Country; and has the Insolence to promise Us the Conquest of Italy, with that very Army with which he was not able to preserve to himself a small part of Macedon. Do not therefore flatter your selves with thinking that the way to get sbout of him, is to enter into a Treaty of Friendship and Alliance with him. That Step will only open the Door to more Invaders. Who is there that will not despise You, and look on you as an easy Conquest for the next Comer, if Pyrrhus escapes, not only without being punish'd for his Presumption, (1) but with the Samnites and Tarentines for his Friends and Allies, as a Recompence and Reward for his insulting the Romans?

Appius had no sooner done speaking but they voted unanimously for the War, and dismiss'd Cineas with this Answer, That when Pyrrhus had drawn his Forces out of Italy, then if he pleas'd they would be ready to treat with him about Friendship and Alliance; but while he staid there in Arms, they were resolv'd to prosecute the War against him with all their Force, though he should have defeated a thousand Levinus's. 'Tis said, that Cineas while he was managing this Affair, made it his Business with an exact Care to inspect the Manners of the Romans, and perfectly understand their Methods of Government; and afterwards in discourse told Pyrrhus, among other things, that the Senate seem'd to Him an Assembly of many Kings, and for the People they were so numerous that he fear'd they had to do with another Hydra. For Levinus had already rais'd an Army twice as numerous as the former, and had left behind him at Rome an infinite number of Romans capable of bearing Arms, and ready to form many Armies as strong as That he had been then raising.

(1) This is the true Sense of the Passage, which has been misunderstood by the Interpreters. Appius considers the Samnites and Tarentines as a Reward to Pyrrhus for his Insult to the Romans; for they will remain his fast Friends and Allies if he procures to them Impunity and Safety. In this Sense the passage is clear, and beautiful, in the Other it is low, and hardly intelligible.

Cineas was follow'd to Tarentum by the Roman Ambassadors, who were sent to treat of the Ransom or Exchange of Prisoners. Among These came Fabricius, who, Cineas told Pyrrhus, was in the highest Veneration among the Romans, as a Man of Virtue, and a good Soldier; but that he was in extream Poverty. Pyrrhus receiv'd him with great kindness, and prest him in private to accept from him a handsome present in Gold, not to engage him in any thing dishonourable, but as a Pledge of Friendship, and Hospitality. Upon Fabricius's refusal, he prest'd him no farther; but the next day having a mind to discompose him, and knowing that he had never seen an Elephant before, commanded One of the largest compleatly arm'd to be placed behind the Hangings in a Room where they were to be in Conference together. Upon a Sign given, the Hangings were drawn aside, and the Elephant raising his Trunk over the Head of Fabricius, made an horrid and frightful noise. Fabricius turning towards the Beast without the least sign of Terror or Surprise, told Pyrrhus smiling, Sir, neither cou'd your Money yesterday, nor can this Beast to-day make any Impression upon me.

In the Evening whilst they were at Supper their Conversation turn'd upon many Subjects, particularly upon the Affairs of Greece, and the Grecian Philosophers. This led Cineas to mention Epicurus, and to give some Account of the Epicurean Sentiments with respect to the Gods, and civil Government. He said they placed the chief End and Happiness of Man in Pleasure; that they avoided all Offices and Employments in the State, as so many bars to that Pleasure. That they attributed to the Supreme Being nor Love nor Hate, maintaining maintaining that it was perfectly regardless of Man, and all human Affairs, and confin'd it to an unactive Life, where it spent whole Ages in the full Enjoyment of all sorts of Pleasure and Delight.

Before he had finish'd his Discourse, Fabricius, to whom this Doctrine seem'd as new as it was monstrous, cry'd out, (1) O Hercules! may Pyrrhus and the Samnites espouse this Doctrine as long as they are at War with the Romans. Pyrrhus admiring the Wisdom and Gravity of the Man, was more than ever transported with a desire of making Friendship instead of War with the Romans. And discoursing with him in private, conjur'd him, after having mediated a Peace between Him and Rome, to come and settle in his Court, where he shou'd be Chief both in the Army and Ministry. To This Fabricius answer'd in a low Voice, That, Sir, will not be for your advantage, for They who now honour and admire you, when they have had experience of Me, (2) will rather chuse to be govern'd by Me, than You. So great a Man was Fabricius.

Pyrrhus was not in the least offended at this Answer, as might have been expected from a Tyrant. On the contrary, he highly extoll'd to his Friends the Magnanimity of that Roman, and entrusted the Prisoners to Him only, upon condition that in

(1) By This it appears how that Doctrine of Epicurus was detested by the Romans at first sight. It rais'd in Fabricius that Indignation, which all good Men must conceive against it; and that virtuous Roman thought it so horrid and impious, as to wish Pyrrhus and the Samnites might maintain it so long as they were Enemies to the Romans; that they might thereby be depriv'd of the divine Protection. At the same time he desires they may persist in such Sentiments no longer than whilst they are in War against his Country, that they might not always have the Gods for their Enemies, All This favours of the highest Piety, Grandeur, Decency, and Humanity.

(2) This Answer was great, but not arrogant; for I am persuaded there is no Nation whatever so senseless, and so much its own Enemy, as not to make choice of such a Man as Fabricius for their King rather than Pyrrhus.

case the Senate shou'd not consent to Peace they might be remanded back, after they had visited their Friends and Relations, and celebrated the Saturnalia. Accordingly they were sent back after the Holy-days; it being decreed pain of Death for any that staid behind.

The Year following Fabricius being Consul, and at the Head of the Army, an unknown Person came into the Camp, and deliver'd him a Letter from the King's chief Physician, offering to take off Pyrrhus by Poyson, and so end the War without farther hazard to the Romans, if he might have a Reward proportionable to his Service. Fabricius, enrag'd at the Villany of the Man, and disposing the other Consul to the same Opinion, sent Dispatches immediately to Pyrrhus to caution him against the Treason. His Letter was to this effect ;

“ Caius Fabricius and Quintus Æmilius, Consuls of the Romans, to Pyrrhus the King, Health. You seem to have made a very ill Judgment, both of your Friends, and Enemies. You will understand by this Letter which was sent to us, That you are in War with honest Men, and trust Knaves and Villains. We have not discover'd This to you to insinuate into your Favour, but lest your Ruin might bring a reproach upon Us, as if we had ended the War by Treachery when we were not able to do it by our Courage and Virtue. When Pyrrhus had read the Letter, and made strict Enquiry into the Treason, he executed the Physician ; and for acknowledgment of this Civility of the Romans, sent to Rome the Prisoners without Ransom, and again employ'd Cineas to negotiate a Peace for him.

The Romans, who were above receiving from their Enemy a Recompence and Reward for not having been guilty of the vilest Injustice towards him, disdain'd to accept of the Prisoners without returning to him an equal Number of the Samnites and and Tarentines. As for the Peace, they wou'd not suffer Cineas so much as to mention it 'till Pyrrhus had remov'd his Arms and Forces out of Italy, and sail'd back to Epirus in the same Ships that brought him over.

In the mean time the King finding it impossible to avoid a second Engagement, assembled his Army, and march'd and attack'd the Romans near Asculum. There he found himself incommoded in a Country unfit for his Horse, near a River whose Current was very swift, and the Banks so woody and rotten, that the Elephants for want of Room and sure treading cou'd not get up with the Infantry. For this reason he lost many of his Men, and had many wounded; and Night only, which parted the Combatants, saved him from an entire Defeat. The next Day designing to have his Revenge on a Ground more even and open, where his Elephants might have Room to play their Parts, and rush in among the thickest of the Enemy, he sent early in the Morning a Detachment to possess themselves of that incommodious Post, where he had engag'd the day before, he drew up his Army, and disposing a great Number of Archers and Slingers among his Elephants, he march'd in good Order against the Romans.

The Romans, who had not the same Advantages of falling on and retreating when they pleas'd, as they had before, were now forced to fight Man to Man upon even Ground; wherefore hastening to disorder the main Battel of the Enemy before the Elephants could get up, they made bloody work with their Swords among the Macedonian Spears, not sparing themselves in the least; to wound and kill was all their Business, without troubling themselves to ward off, and parry the Blows of their Enemies. After a long and obstinate Fight they were forc'd to give Ground, particularly ticularly in that Part where Pyrrhus fought in Person, so strong was the Impression he made at the Head of his Phalanx. But what chiefly contributed to their Defeat was the irresistible Weight and Force of the Elephants, against Whom the Romans cou'd have no Opportunity of exerting their Valour and Bravery. Wherefore they thought it wiser to give way, as to an outrageous Sea or devouring Earthquake, than to fall in an obstinate and fruitless Opposition, when they cou'd do no Service to their Country, tho' they suffer'd the utmost Extremity. They did not fly far before they gain'd their Camp, for the Battel was fought pretty near it.

Hieronimus saith, the Romans lost six thousand of their Men in the Action, and Pyrrhus, according to the Account in his own Commentaries, no more than three thousand five hundred and five; but Dionysius of Halicarnassus does not tell us that there were two Engagements near Asculum, nor that the Victory was clear on the Side of Pyrrhus: He saith there was no more than one Engagement, which held 'till the Sun was down; that Pyrrhus was wounded in his Arm by a Javelin; that the Samnites plunder'd his Baggage; that the Night coming on the Armies separated with great Unwillingness; and that there were about fifteen thousand Men killed on both Sides.

When both Armies were retired, and Pyrrhus was congratulated on account of the Victory, he reply'd, Such Another will undo us utterly. For indeed he had lost the greatest part of the Forces he brought with him out of Epire, and almost all his particular Friends and principal Commanders: So that there were none left there for Recruits, and he saw the Confederates very slow in their motions. On the other hand, as from a Fountain continually flowing out of the City, the Roman Camp was quickly and plentifully filled up with fresh Men, not at all abating in Courage; (1) but even from their very Losses receiving fresh Force and Resolution to go on with the War. Whilst his Head was full of these Thoughts and Reflections, his Mind was on a sudden possess'd with vain Hopes and Delusions. New Incidents arise, new Opportunities present themselves, and he is at a loss which of them to follow. For at the same time that Ambassadors arriv'd out of Sicily with an offer of surrendering to him Syracuse, Agrigentum, and the City of the Leontines, praying him to drive the Carthaginians out of the Island, and clear it of Tyrants; (2) News was brought him out of Greece that Ptolemy call'd Ceraunus was slain in a Fight, and his Army cut in pieces by the Gauls, and that if he came now in time, the Macedonians were at a great loss for a King. Here he began to accuse Fortune for presenting to him two such glorious, but inconsistent Occasions, both together, and at the same time. It concern'd him extreamly to think that if he laid hold on the One he must of Necessity give over the Other; and that by grasping at Both he shou'd be the better for Neither; so that he was a long time in suspense, and much perplex'd in his Thoughts, before he cou'd come

(1) The Commendation given here by Pyrrhus to the Romans is the same Hannibal gave them soon after, as Horace has explain'd it in the fourth Ode of the fourth Book.

Ducit opes, animumque ferro.*

(2) Ptolemy Ceraunus, the Son of Philadelphus, had been slain during the Consulate of Levinus, three Years before Pyrrhus re-ceiv'd those Letters; and so far were the Macedonians from wanting a King, that they had had Three or Four after that Battel. In the first Place Meleager succeeded Ptolemy, Antipater succeeded Meleager, Sosthenes Antipater, and Antigonus, who succeeded Sosthenes, was then actually in Possession. Plutarch means, without doubt, that Pyrrhus was given to understand, that by reason of his great Reputation the Macedonians wou'd prefer Him to Antigonus.

to any Determination. At last he consider'd that the Sicilian Affairs were (from the nearness of Africa) of greater Importance, and promis'd him a larger Field of Glory. For this Reason he gave that side the turn of the Balance, and instantly dispatch'd Cineas, who was the only Person he employ'd on those Occasions, to discourse the Cities, and prepare them for his Arrival. In the mean time he placed a strong Garrison in Tarentum, much against the Will of the Inhabitants, who required him either to perform what he came for, which was to stay and continue the War against the Romans, or if he wou'd be gone, to leave the City as he found it. He return'd no agreeable Answer to this Remonstrance, but commanded them to be quiet and attend his Time, and so sail'd away.

Being arriv'd in Sicily, what he had design'd in his hopes, was confirm'd effectually, and the Cities frankly surrender'd to him. Where-ever his Arms and Force were necessary, nothing at first made any considerable resistance. But with thirty thousand Foot, two thousand five hundred Horse, and two hundred Ships, he totally routed the Phœnicians, and overturn'd their whole Government. Eryx being the strongest Town they held, and having a great Garrison in it, he resolv'd to take it by Storm: The Army being in readiness to give the Assault, he put on his Armour, and placing himself at the Head of his Men, made a Vow to Hercules of Plays and Sacrifices in Honour of Victory, if he signaliz'd himself in that day's Action before the Greeks that dwelt in Sicily, as became his great Descent and his Fortunes. At the same time he gave the Signal by Sound of Trumpet, drove the Barbarians from off the Walls with a Shower of Arrows, planted his Ladders, and was Himself the First that mounted. There he is in an Instant surrounded by his Enemies, Some of whom are beaten back, Others he flings headlong down on each side, and the Rest lie dead in Heaps round about him. In the midst of this amazing Danger he is not once wounded; but appear'd so terrible to the Barbarians, that they cou'd not stand the Sight of him, and prov'd by his amazing Exploits that Homer well understood the Nature and Properties of Fortitude, when he said, that of all the Virtues She alone was inspired with divine Sallies and enthusiastick Transports. The City being taken, he perform'd a magnificent Sacrifice to Hercules, and exhibited Shews and Combats of all sorts.

Of all the Barbarians, Those who inhabited the City of Messina, and were call'd Mamertines, were most oppressive to the Greeks. For they had made most of them Tributaries, and burden'd them with Impositions, being more potent, more numerous, and withal of a warlike Disposition; for this Reason they were call'd Mamertines, from a Word, which in the Language of the Romans signifies Warlike. Pyrrhus seiz'd their Collectors as they were gathering the Taxes, and put them to Death; after which he engag'd with Them in a pitch'd Battel, overthrew them, and razed all their Fortresses. The Carthaginians, incited by his Fortitude and Success, inclin'd to a Composition, and offer'd him a round Sum of Money, and to furnish him with Shipping, upon Condition a Peace might be establish'd between them; in Answer to which he told them, that the only Terms on which a Peace was to be granted, were for them entirely to abandon Sicily, and consent that the Libyan Sea be the Limit between Them and the Greeks.

He was now heightened with his good Fortune and the Strength of his Forces, and pursuing those hopes, in prospect of which he first undertook this Expedition, his chief aim was at Africk: He had a number of Ships answerable to that Design, but they

they were thinly man'd; and when he began to raise Seamen he observ'd no obliging Measures with the Cities, but forced their Men into the Service, threatening to punish Those very severely who did not provide the Complement demanded of them. This was quite different from his Behaviour towards them at his first Arrival; for then he endeavour'd to gain the Affections of the People; was gracious to All, placed an entire Confidence in them, and gave None of them the least reason to complain of his Conduct. Whereas being now, instead of a mild and merciful Prince, become an insupportable Tyrant, they secretly accused him not only of Ingratitude but Infidelity. However, they supply'd him with what he demanded, for there was an indispensable Necessity for it, tho' they grew very averse to him, especially for his Behaviour to Thonon and Sostratus, two Persons of the greatest Authority in all Syracuse. It was at their Invitation that he first set Sail for Sicily; They were the Men who surrender'd the City to him at his Arrival, and were his principal Agents in every Transaction afterwards; and yet in spite of all these Obligations, his Coolness and Ill-will towards them were very visible, for he wou'd neither suffer them to attend him in his Expedition, nor leave them behind him; for he was grown jealous of them. Sostratus, out of fear of what might happen, withdrew himself; whilst Thonon, who was not so cautious, was seiz'd by order of Pyrrhus, who accus'd him for being of the same Sentiments with Sostratus, and put him to death. This injurious Proceeding quite ruin'd his Affairs, and That not by little and little, but All at once. For the Hatred the Cities had on this account conceiv'd against him was so universal, that Some of them fell off to the Carthaginians, nians, and Others confederated against him with the Mamertines.

In this Nick of Time, when they were revolting on all sides, and a general Insurrection was apprehended, he receiv'd Letters from the Samnites and Tarentines, intimating that they had been beaten quite out of the Field, and were no longer able to secure their Towns against the Romans; wherefore they earnestly beg'd him to hasten immediately to their Assistance. These Letters furnish'd him with an honourable Pretence to quit Sicily, as one not forced from thence, or despairing of Success. Tho' in reality he found it impossible to make himself Master of the Island, and therefore abandon'd it as a Ship distress'd in a Storm, and threw himself once more upon Italy. 'Tis reported that at his going off, he look'd back upon the Island, and said to Those about him, How brave (1) a Field of War do we leave, my Masters, for the Romans and Carthaginians to fight in! which, as he then conjectur'd, fell out indeed not long after.

When he was just ready to Sail, the Barbarians having conspir'd against him, he was forc'd to a Fight with the Carthaginians in the very Road, and after he had lost many of his Ships, he fled with the rest into Italy. Upon his Arrival, he was attack'd by the Mamertines, who to the Number of ten thousand Men had pass'd over before him. They thought it not safe to engage him in a pitch'd Battel, but lying in wait for him where the Passages were difficult, they fell upon him, and put his whole Army in Confusion. He lost two of his Elephants on this

(1) The Word in the Original signifies a Wrestling Place, and conveys to our Minds a high and beautiful Idea of Sicily, being as it were a Stage, or Wrestling Place, wherein the Romans and Cartha- ginians were to exercise themselves. Pyrrhus was sensible that this Island lay very convenient both for the One and the Other, and that they wou'd dispute every Inch of it.

The L I F E of

Occasion, together with the greatest Part of his Rear, which the Barbarians cut in pieces. He immediately advanced in Person from the Van to their Assistance, and behaved himself with surprizing Valour against Men, personally exasperated, and of long Experience in all military Performances; 'till having receiv'd a Wound in his Hand, he was forced to retire a little from the Place of Action.

This serv'd still to heighten the Courage of the Barbarians, so that One of them of an uncommon Size, and remarkable for the Brightness of his Armour, advanced before the Ranks, defy'd the King, and with a loud disdainful Voice challeng'd him if he was alive to come forth and shew himself.

Pyrrhus provok'd and enrag'd at this Challenge, return'd, attended by his Guards, to the Battel, in spite of Those who were about him, and storming with Indignation, and all over besmear'd with Blood, so that he was a Figure terrible to behold, he pierced through his Battalions, rush'd upon the Barbarian, and without giving him time to assault Him, or defend Himself, gave him such a Blow with his Scymetar on his Head, that what with the Strength of his Arm, and the excellent Temper of the Weapon, the Edge passed downward to his very Seat; so that in a Moment his Body was divided, and the Parts fell asunder. This put a Stop to the Course of the Barbarians, who look'd on Pyrrhus with Astonishment and Admiration, and consider'd him as something more than Mortal. After This he continu'd his March all the rest of the way undisturb'd, and arriv'd at Tarentum with twenty thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse; where reinforcing himself with the choicest Troops of the Tarentines, he advanced immediately against the Enemy, who then lay encamp'd in the Territories of the Samnites, whose Affairs were extreamly shatter'd, and their Councils broken, having been in many Fights beaten by the Romans. There was also a Discontent among them at Pyrrhus, for his Expedition into Sicily, so that not Many came in to join him: Notwithstanding which he divided his Army in two Parts, and commanded the First into Lucania, to oppose One of the Consuls there, and hinder Him from assisting his Collegue, whilst He march'd in Person against Manius Curius the Other, who had posted himself very advantageously near Beneventum, where he lay in Expectation of Reinforcements from his Collegue. And forasmuch as the Augurs had warn'd him against engaging for the present in any Enterprize, he resolv'd to abstain from Action. But Pyrrhus being eager to engage Him before the Other cou'd join him, made a Draught of the best Men out of all his Troops, and chusing the bravest and most couragious of his Elephants, he march'd in the Evening, as it began to grow dark, towards the Roman Camp, in order to surprize him; but as he was forced to go round about, and traverse a woody Country, his Flambeau's fail'd him, and his Soldiers lost their Way in the dark, which obliged him to halt for some time, in order to rally them. In the mean time Day began to appear, and his Approach was discover'd by the Enemy as he was coming down the Hills, which put the whole Camp into much disorder and tumult; but the Consul finding the Sacrifices auspicious, and the Time absolutely obliging them to fight, he drew a detach'd Party out of the Trenches, and fell in with their Van-guard, and having routed them, all the Army was in a Consternation, so that a great many were cut off, and some of the Elephants taken.
Affairs

This Success encourag'd Manius to draw out his whole Army, and engage the Enemy in a pitch'd Battel. He had the Advantage in the Beginning of the Engagement, and one of His Wings defeated One of the Enemy's; but the Other was born down by the Elephants, and forced back to the Trenches. In this Condition he sent for the Assistance of those Troops he had left behind to guard the Camp, who were a strong Body, All fresh Men and well arm'd. These rushing down upon them from their advantagious Stations, gaul'd the Elephants with their Darts, and made them turn Tail and fall upon their own Battalions, which occasion'd such a Confusion and Disorder, that in the End it secur'd the Victory to the Romans, and with the Victory the universal Empire; for now having got the Fame of Invincible, both for their Conduct and Courage, and Glory as well in this Action, as in a great many Others, they soon over-run Italy, and not long after Sicily too.

Thus fell Pyrrhus from his Italian and Sicilian Hopes, after he had consum'd six Years in these Wars; and though unsuccessful in his Affairs, yet he preserv'd his Courage unconquerable among all these Misfortunes; and was held for Military Experience, and Personal Valour, and Undertaking, much the Bravest of all the Princes of his Time; but what he got by great Actions, he lost again by vain Hopes; for his eager Desire and Pursuit after what he had not, hinder'd him from keeping what he had; which made Antigonus compare him to One who at Dice threw excellently well, but knew not how to make the best of his Game. He return'd into Epirus with eight thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, and for want of Money to pay them, was fain to look out for a new War to maintain the Army. Some of the Gauls joining him, he fell into Macedon, where Antigonus, Son of Demetrius, govern'd, designing to plunder

der and waste the Country; but after he had made himself Master of several Towns, and two thousand Men came over to him, he began to hope for something greater, and adventur'd upon Antigonus Himself, and meeting him at a narrow Passage, call'd the Straits, put the whole Army in disorder; but the Gauls who brought up Antigonus's Rear were very numerous, and stood firm, and a brisk Fight hap'ning, the greatest part of them were cut off. They who had the charge of the Elephants, being surrounded every way, deliver'd up both Themselves and the Beasts: Pyrrhus taking this Advantage, (1) and advising more with his good Fortune, than his Reason, boldly set upon the main Body of the Macedonian Foot, already surpriz'd with Fear, and troubled at the former Loss. When he perceiv'd that they declin'd any Action or Engagement with him, he held his Hand out both to the superior and under Officers, and calling them aloud by Name, he won over to him that entire Body of Foot from Antigonus, who was thereupon forced to fly, and endeavour to retain some of the maritime Towns in their Obedience.

Pyrrhus, among all these kindnesses of Fortune, thinking what he had effected against the Gauls

(1) I do not understand why Plutarch shou'd say that Pyrrhus on this Occasion advis'd more with Fortune than Reason, when after he had beaten Antigonus's Rear, and taken his Elephants, he went to attack the Main Body, which he had already cast into some Fear and Consternation. On the contrary, he seems herein to follow the Rules of Prudence, and he was justified in it by the Event. In all Appearance Plutarch thought that Pyrrhus, in the weak Condition he was in, and weaken'd still more by the late Action, ought to have been satisfied with the first Advantage, and not expose himself to the Hazard of losing All he might reap from it in presuming to attack the Macedonian Phalanx, which, if it had resolv'd to make a Stand, wou'd have put him in great Danger. We meet in Our modern Histories with Examples that justify this Judgment of Plutarch.

the most advantageous for his Glory, hung up their richest and goodliest Spoils in the Temple of Minerva (1) Itonis, with this Inscription.

*These Shields of the brave Gauls, Great Goddess! I Offer to Thee, gain'd in full Victory
Over Antigonus. 'Tis no strange thing
For Pyrrhus, who from Æacus does spring.*

After this Defeat in the Field, he quickly took in the Cities; and having got Ægis into his Power, beside other hardships put upon the Inhabitants, he left in the Town a Garrison consisting of some of those Gauls that had serv'd him in his Army. These Gauls are the most covetous and insatiable of all Men, and were no sooner put in Possession of the Place, but they instantly dug up the Tombs of the Kings that lay buried there, seized on all the Wealth that had been interred with them, and with a sacrilegious Contempt dispers'd their Ashes in the Wind. Pyrrhus seem'd not in the least offended at this ignominious Insult, either deferring to call the Authors of it to Account for the present, having at that time other Affairs of greater Moment upon his Hands, or intending wholly to pass it by, for fear of punishing those Barbarians. However this Connivance lost his Credit with the Macedonians; and tho' his Interest was still doubtful, and in an unsettled Condition, he notwithstanding entertain'd new visionary Hopes, and in Raillery call'd Antigonus Impudent, because he had not put on the Habit of a private Person, but still presum'd to wear the Purple.

About this time Cleonymus the Lacedæmonian arriv'd in his Court, and earnestly pressing him to march with his Army to Sparta, Pyrrhus very readily embraced the Overture. Cleonymus was of the Royal Blood, but seeming too Arbitrary and Absolute, had no great Respect nor Credit in Sparta, where Areus reign'd peaceably in his stead. This was the occasion of an old and publick grudge between him and the Citizens. Cleonymus in his old Age had married a young Lady of great Beauty, and of the Royal Family, call'd Chelidonis, Daughter of Leſtichydes. This Woman falling desperately in love with Acrotatus, Areus's Son, a Youth gay and airy, render'd this Match both uneasy and dishonourable to Cleonymus; for there was not a Man in Sparta who did not very well know how much his Wife slighted him; so these Domestic Troubles, added to his publick Discontent, provok'd him to fly to Pyrrhus, who, at his Intigation, march'd against Sparta with an Army of twenty thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, and twenty four Elephants; but so great a Preparation made it evident to the whole World, that he came not so much to gain Sparta for Cleonymus, as to take all Peloponnesus for Himself: Yet he expressly denied This to the Lacedæmonian Ambassadors, that came to him to Megalopolis, affirming he came to deliver the Cities from the Slavery of Antigonus, and signifying that if he might be permitted, he intended to send his youngest Sons to Sparta, there to be instituted in the Manners and Discipline of the Lacedæmonians, that they might receive from their Education in that illustrious School an Advantage over all the other Kings and Princes.

With these Pretensions he amused Those who came to meet him in his March, but as soon as ever he enter'd Laconia, he began to plunder and waste the

The L I F E of

Country; and when the Ambassadors complained that those Acts of Hostility were committed when no War was proclaim'd, or declared, Very true, he reply'd, and do not We know that You Lacedæmonians never make publick Proclamation of your Intentions? At which a Spartan who was present, named Mandracides, answer'd him in the Laconic Dialect, If Thou art a God thou wilt do us no Harm, because We have done Thee None, and if Thou art but a Man we may find some Other as stout as Thyself.

In the mean time he continued his March towards Lacedæmon, and was advised by Cleonymus to give the Assault as soon as he arriv'd, which was in the Evening; but Pyrrhus, as we are told, fearing lest the Soldiers shou'd plunder the City if they took it by Storm in the Night-Season, forbore, and put off the Assault 'till the Morning: for he knew there were but few Soldiers in the Town, and Those unprovided, by reason of his sudden Approach, and that Areus the King was not there in Person, but gone into Crete to the Succour of the Gortynians. (1) To This principally was owing the Safety of the City; the Contempt She was under with Pyrrhus on account of her Weakness, which made him vainly imagine that no One wou'd be so hardy as to move a Hand in her Defence; in Confidence of which, and instead of attacking her that very Instant, he contented himself with encamping under the Walls, tho' the Ilotes and Cleonymus's Friends had been at the Pains to prepare every thing in his House for the Reception and Entertainment of Pyrrhus, not doubting but they should have him there at Supper.

(1) This is a remarkable Example of the reasonable Use Men of Courage and Resolution make of a short Respite or Delay, which their Enemies give them unadvisedly from the mean Opinion they entertain of their Strength and Condition. This Oversight in Pyrrhus has often happen'd to many Others since his time, and always with the same Success.

Night

Night being come, the Lacedæmonians determin'd in Council to send the Women over into Crete; but They unanimously oppos'd it; and One of them, call'd Archidamia, took a Sword, and entering the Senate with it in her Hand, demanded of them, in the Name of the Rest, What cou'd make them entertain so ill an Opinion of the Women, as to think they were so much in love with Life as to be able to outlive the Loss of Sparta?

It was next resolv'd to draw a Trench in a Line directly over-against the Enemy's Camp, and at each end of it to sink Waggon's in the Ground, as deep as the Naves of the Wheels, that so being firmly fix'd, they might obstruct the passage of the Elephants. When they had just begun the Work, both Maids and Women came to them; Some with their Cloathes truss'd up in their Linnen, and Others in their Shifts only, to assist the Elder sort of Men. When they had exhorted Those who were of an Age fit to bear Arms, and were to engage the next Day, to go and repose themselves in the Night, that they might be the better prepared for Action in the Morning, they measur'd the intended Length of the Trench, and took upon themselves a Third Part of it, which they engag'd to finish before it was Day. This Trench was in breadth six Cubits, four in depth, and eight hundred Foot long, as Phylarchus says. Hieronimus makes it somewhat less.

As soon as the Day began to break, the Enemy were in Motion, whereupon the Women arming the Youth with their own Hands, gave them Charge of the Trench, enjoining them to defend it to the last Extremity, and representing to them in the most lively terms, How delightful it must be to them to conquer in the View of their whole Country, or how glorious to die in the Arms of their Wives and Mothers, falling as became Spartans. As for Chelidonis, she retired with a Halter about her Neck, resolving to die so, rather than fall into the Hands of Cleonymus, if the City were taken. Pyrrhus himself, in Person, laboured with his Foot to force through the Shields of the Spartans ranged against him, and to get over the Trench, which was scarce passable, because the looseness of the fresh Earth afforded no firm footing for the Soldiers. At the same time Ptolemy, Pyrrhus's Son, with two thousand Gauls, and some choice Men of the Chaonians, surrounded the Trench, and endeavoured to force a Passage where they had planted the Waggon; but they were wedged so deep in the Ground, and placed so close together, that they did not only obstruct their Passage, but hinder'd the Spartans from coming up, and making a closer Defence. In the mean time the Gauls having with much difficulty forced the Wheels out of the Earth, were drawing the Chariots towards an adjacent River.

Young Acrotatus first of all perceiv'd the Danger, and passing with great Expedition through the City at the Head of three hundred chosen Men, and taking the advantage of some hollow Ways, he on a sudden surrounded Ptolemy, and falling upon his Rear forced him to face about, and stand upon the Defensive. In this Disorder Ptolemy's Soldiers ran foul upon one another, and fell most of them into the Trench, or under the Waggon, 'till after a long Dispute, and great Slaughter, they were repulsed and put to Flight. The old Men, and most of the Women, were all this while on the other side of the Trench, from whence they beheld the Action; and when they saw Acrotatus returning back into the City to repossess himself of his former Post, all covered with Blood, and fierce and elate with Victory, he seem'd

to the Spartan Dames more gallant and beautiful than ever, and they envied Chelidonis so worthy a Lover. And some of the old Men followed him, crying aloud, Go on, Acrotatus, enjoy Chelidonis, and get brave Boys for Sparta. Where Pyrrhus himself fought, was the hottest of the Action, there the Spartans did gallantly, particularly Phyllius signaliz'd himself, and killed most of Those that pressed upon him, in order to force a Passage; and when he found himself ready to sink with the many Wounds he had received, he called to the Officer who had the Command in that Attack, gave him his Post, and retiring backward, fell dead in the midst of his own Party, that the Enemy might not carry off his Body. The Fight ended with the Day, and Pyrrhus in his sleep dream'd he threw Lightning upon Lacedæmon, and set it all on fire, and seem'd to rejoice at the sight. In this transport of Joy he awaked, and commanded his Officers to get all things ready for a second Assault; and interpreting his Dream among his Friends, that he should take the Town by Storm, several assented to it with admiration; but Lysimachus was not pleased with the Dream, and told him (1) he feared, lest as Places struck with Lightning are held Sacred, and not to be enter'd; so the Gods might by this let him know the City should not be taken. Pyrrhus, who without doubt was sensible of the Force and Reasonableness of that Explication, reply'd, Such sort of Visions, and

(1) This Explication is so pat and natural, that it might almost justify Those who maintain that the Interpretation of Dreams is founded upon unerring Rules of Art; tho' at the same time it is most certain that nothing can be more vain and illusory than that Art. It is true that the Heathens, whose Heads were full of those their Interpretations, are things full of Uncertainty, and only fit to amuse the Vulgar; but That, my Friends, which is most certain is that every Man ought to arm, and say to himself,

(1) *'Tis the only good Prefage,
That for Pyrrhus you engage.*

At these Words he arose, and by break of Day began the Attack.

The Lacedæmonians defended themselves with a Courage and Resolution above their Strength; nor wou'd the Women forsake them, but were constantly at hand to supply them with Arms, and administer Bread and Drink to Those that wanted it, and carry off Such as were disabled. The Macedonians attempted to fill up the Trench, bringing huge quantities of Materials, and throwing them upon the Arms and dead Bodies that lay there all covered over: While the Lacedæmonians opposed this with all their Force, Pyrrhus on a sudden appeared on their side of the Trench, where the Waggon had been planted to stop the passage, pressing on in full Career towards the City; at which the Soldiers who had been placed at that Post made a great Noise, and were answer'd by the Women, who shriek'd out with all their Might, and took to their Heels. Pyrrhus in the mean time push'd on with great Violence, overthrowing All that had the Courage to oppose him. He was now advanced near the City, when his Horse receiv'd a shot in the Belly, with a Cretan Arrow, and flouncing as he died, threw off Pyrrhus on slippery and very steep Ground; at which All about him being in Confusion, the Spartans came boldly up, and making good use of their Arrows, forced them off again. This caused Pyrrhus to retreat a second time, thinking the Lacedæmonians would abate of their Vigour, when almost All of them were wounded, and very great numbers killed outright : But the good Fortune of the City, either for that she had already experienced of her self the Fortitude of her Inhabitants, or that the World might see on this occasion how great a Power she has in the most desperate and critical Circumstances, then when the Lacedæmonians began to be in the utmost despair, she brought to their Relief from Corinth Ameinias the Phocean, one of Antigonus's Officers, with an Army of Strangers ; and they were no sooner receiv'd into the Town, but Areus their King arriv'd there himself too from Crete, with two thousand Men more : The Women upon this went all home to their Houses, finding it no longer necessary for Them to meddle in the business of the War ; all the old Men likewise, who notwithstanding their Age had in that Exigence been forced to take Arms, were sent home, and their places were supply'd by the new Comers.

These two Reinforcements, which arriv'd both in the same day at Sparta, serv'd only to animate Pyrrhus the more, and spur up his Ambition ; but his Designs not succeeding, and receiving fresh Losses every day, he gave over the Siege, and fell to plunder the Country, determining to Winter thereabout. But Fate is unavoidable. At that time a great Feud happening at Argos between Aristeas and Aristippus, Two of the principal Citizens, and when Aristippus had resolv'd to make use of the Friendship of Antigonus, Aristeas to prevent him invited Pyrrhus thither. He always revolving hopes upon hopes, and taking advantage from his good success, when he had it, to embrace occasions of more ; and when things went unprosperously, to make

make up those defects by new Enterprizes; never suffer'd his Losses or Victories to put an end to the Troubles he brought on Others, and in which he involv'd Himself. He had therefore no sooner receiv'd this Invitation from Aristeas, but he immediately march'd for Argos. Areus by frequent Ambushes, and lining the Hedges where the Ways were most unpassable, cut off many of the Gauls and Molossians that brought up the Rear. It had been told Pyrrhus by one of the Priests, who had found the Liver of the sacrificed Beast without a Head, that some of his near Relations would be lost; notwithstanding which, in this Tumult and Disorder of his Rear, forgetting the Prediction, he commanded out his Son Ptolemy with some of his Guards to their assistance, whilst He continu'd his March, and got clear of those dangerous Passes. In the mean time the Fight grew very warm where Ptolemy was engaged, for the stoutest of the Lacedæmonians, under the Command of Evalcus an experienc'd Officer, were Those who had made that Attack upon the Rear.

In the Heat of the Action a Cretan of Aptera named Oræsus, a stout Man, and swift footed, flank'd the young Prince, as he was fighting with great Valour, wounded him in the Side, and flung him dead upon the Spot. He was no sooner down, but Those who had follow'd him turn'd their Backs, and fled. The Lacedæmonian Horse pursuing them and cutting many of them off, were got into the open Field engaged with the Enemy before they were aware, and at a great distance from the Infantry, who cou'd not keep pace with them.

Pyrrhus, who had receiv'd the ill News of his Son's Death, and was most bitterly afflicted at it, drew out his Molossian Horse against them, and charging in the Head of his Men, satiated himself with the Blood and Slaughter of the Lacedæmonians; always indeed appearing an invincible Hero, and mighty in Arms, but now exceeding all he had ever done before in Courage and Force. He search'd every where for Evalcus, and having found him out, he push'd his Horse full drive at him; but Evalcus being aware of him inclin'd on one side, and made him miss his Aim, at the same time he gave him such a stroke on the Bridle Hand with his Sword, that he imagin'd he must have cut it off; but the Blow lighting on the Reins cut Them only, without doing Pyrrhus any further Damage, whilst He seizing the favourable Moment run him through with his Javelin. Then springing from his Horse he fought on Foot, and made a terrible Havock of all those brave Lacedæmonians who endeavour'd to protect the Body of Evalcus. This Loss, which was no inconsiderable one on the side of the Spartans, was purely owing (1) to the headstrong Ambition of their Commanders, for the War was at an end before the Engagement; but Pyrrhus having thus offered so many of his Enemies as it were in Sacrifice to the Ghost of his Son, and made this Fight a kind of Funeral Show, converting much of his Grief into Rage and Fury, continu'd his march to Argos. At his Arrival he had Intelligence that Antigonus kept the high Grounds, wherefore he encamped near the City of Nauplia; the next day he dispatched an Herald to Antigonus, calling him Perfidious, and challenging him to descend into the plain Field, and fight with him for the Kingdom. Antigonus answer'd, that He made War not with his Arms only but with Time, and that if Pyrrhus was weary of Life there were ways enow to Death that lay direct before him. To both the Kings also came Ambassadors from Argos, desiring each Party to retreat, and not suffer that City to fall into the hands of Either of them that had a great honour for Both. Antigonus was persuaded, and sent his Son as an Hostage to the Argives; Pyrrhus at the same time promis'd to retire, but sending no Hostage, he was much suspected.

(1) In Reality Sparta was reliev'd, and the War ended. What a silly Ambition therefore was it to pursue a flying Enemy, who had given over his Enterprize? The least Loss sustained on such Occasions is to be regretted; since the Hazard is not only unnecessary but unprofitable. It was not said without Reason that one ought to lay a silver Bridge for a flying Enemy.

In the mean time Pyrrhus was alarm'd by a very extraordinary and tremendous Prodigy, for the Heads of the sacrificed Oxen lying apart from the Bodies, were seen to thrust out their Tongues, and lick up their own gore. And in the very City of Argos, a Priestess of Apollo Lycius ran about the Streets, crying, (1) She saw the City full of Carcasses and Slaughter, and an Eagle joining in the Fight, and immediately vanishing. In the dead of Night Pyrrhus approaching the Walls, and finding the Gate called Diamperes set open by Aristeas, was undiscover'd 'till such time as all his Gauls had enter'd, and taken possession of the Market-place; but the Gate being too low to let in the Elephants, they were fain to take down their Towers, and put them on again, which cou'd not be done in the Dark, and in that confusion, without a Noise, and loss of Time, which occasion'd their Discovery. The Argives, seeing the Enemy in their City ran to (2) Aspis, the chief Citadel,

(1) Here we find History using the same Language with Poetry. In the twelfth Book of Homer's Odyssey the Pursuers meet with such sort of Signs as These.

(2) There was a Feast observ'd annually at Argos in Honour of Juno call'd Ἡραία, Junonia, at which time they offer'd

a Sacrifice of a hundred Oxen, for that reason call'd Hecatombæa, the Feast of the Hecatomb. At this Feast all the Youth exerted their Strength for the obtaining a Prize propos'd on that Occasion. There was a Quarter above the Theatre strongly situated, where in the most difficult part they nailed a brazen

Citadel, and other Places of Defence, and sent away to Antigonus to hasten to their Assistance. Antigonus advanced near the Walls, but wou'd not enter the City, chusing rather to be upon the Watch without, and act as Occasion offer'd. However he sent in some of his principal Commanders, and his Son with a very considerable Force.

At the same time Areus arriv'd at Argos with a thousand Cretans, and the most resolute of the Spartans. All these Troops being join'd, fell at once upon the Gauls, and put them in great disorder. Pyrrhus entring in with a mighty Noise and Shout at a place called (1) Cylarabis, when the Gauls were to return the Salute, their Cry was not the Shout of Men in full Courage and Confidence, but of People hard put to it, and in Distress. Therefore Pyrrhus in haste pushed on the Van of his Horse that marched but slowly and in Danger, by reason of the Drains and Sinks, of which the City was full. In this Night-Engagement, there was infinite confusion both in Those that acted, and Those that commanded; mistaking and stragling in the narrow Streets; it was impossible to make use of Conduct or Order in that brazen Buckler in such a manner that it was very hard to pluck it off. All the Youth try'd their utmost Strength on that Occasion, and He who prevail'd was declared Conqueror, and in acknowledgment of his Victory was presented with a Myrtle Garland, and a Brazen Buckler. From hence the place where this Contest was held was called Aspis, that is the Buckler. This Prize was not proposed to the Youth of Argos alone, but Strangers were admitted into the Dispute, as it appears from the seventh Ode of Pindar's Olympionicks, where Diagorus of the Isle of Rhodes is commended for having obtain'd that Prize.

“Ο τ' ἐν Ἀργεὶ Χαλκῆς ἔγνω μιν.

The brazen Buckler of Argos knew him; that is. He bore off the Prize of the brazen Buckler at Argos.

(1) Cylarabis was a Place of Exercise near one of the Gates of Argos, mention'd by Pausanias, who saith it was so call'd from a Son of Sthenelus: He adds that in this Place was a Statue of Minerva, Surnamed Pania.

darkness and variety of Noises and strait Passages; so both sides continued without doing any thing, still expecting Day-light. At the first Dawn Pyrrhus seeing the great Citadel Aspis full of Men, was under great Consternation, especially when among the many Figures of excellent Workmanship erected in the Market-place, he beheld That of a Wolf and Bull cast in Brass, that seem'd ready to attack each other. This Sight brought him to remember an Oracle he had formerly receiv'd, foretelling him that he was fated to die when he shou'd see a Wolf encountering with a Bull. The Argives say these Figures were erected in Memory of an Accident which fell out long ago in their Country. For they tell us that when Danaus first invaded their Territories, as he passed by a Place called Pyramia, in Thyreatis, leading to Argos, he espied a Wolf fighting with a Bull, (1) and imagining the Wolf to represent Him, (for this Stranger fell upon a Native as He designed to do) he stay'd to see the Issue of the Fight, and the Wolf prevailing, after he had offer'd his Devotions to Apollo Lycius, he assaulted and carried the Town, Gelanor, who was then King, being displac'd by a Faction: And this was the Cause of dedicating those Figures. Pyrrhus quite out of heart at this Sight, and seeing none of his Designs succeed, thought best to retreat; but fearing the strait Passage at the Gates, he sent to his Son Helenus, who was left without the Town with a great Body of Forces, commanding him to break down part of the Wall, and assist the Retreat if the Enemy press'd hard upon them. But the Person whom he sent with this

(1) Nothing is more natural or usual, than for a Man in his Imagination to make what he sees bear some Resemblance to his own present Circumstances of Fortune. The Wolf he consider'd as a Foreigner, and the Bull as a Native. Such Stories as These are invented and applied after the Thing is over.

Errand, mistaking the Order, which was given in great haste and confusion, deliver'd it in a quite contrary Sense; so that the young Prince taking with him the best of his Men, and the remaining Elephants, marched strait through the Gates into the Town, to assist his Father. Pyrrhus was now making good his Retreat, and while the Market-place afforded them Ground enough both to Retreat and Fight, frequently repulsed the Enemy that bore upon him; but when he was forced out of that broad place, into a narrow Street leading to the Gate, he fell in with Those who came the other way to his assistance. It was in vain for him to call out to them to fall back and clear the Streets; he cou'd not be heard in that Noise and Tumult; and if They who were the most advanced, and most dispos'd to obey his Orders, had heard him, they wou'd have been hinder'd by Those who continually pressed upon them from the Rear, and pushed them forwards. Besides, the largest of the Elephants falling down on his Side, in the very Gate, and terribly braying, lay in the way of Those who would have got out. Another of these Elephants already in the Town, called Nicon, striving to take up his Rider, who, after many Wounds received, was fallen off his Back, bore forward upon Them that retreated, and thrusting as well Friends as Enemies, tumbled them all confusedly upon one another, 'till having found the Body, and taking it up with his Trunk, he carried it on his Tusshes, and returning in a great Rage, trod down all before him. Being thus pressed and crowded together, not a Man could do any thing singly, but wedged so close, as it were one Mass, the whole Multitude rolled and swayed this way and that all together; they did very little Execution upon the Enemy, either in their Front or Rear, but very much harm to one another. If any Man had watch'd the favourable Opportunity, and drawn his Sword, or levell'd his Pike, he could neither recover the One, nor put up the Other, but they Both wounded their own Men, as by chance they were thrust together, and so fell dead one amongst another. Pyrrhus seeing the mighty Storm and Confusion of things, took off the Crown he wore upon his Helmet, by which he was distinguished, and gave it to one nearest his Person, and trusting to the goodness of his Horse, rid in among the thickest of the Enemy, and being wounded with a Lance through his Breast-plate, but not dangerously, nor indeed very much, he turned about to Him that struck him, who was not a Man of Note, but the Son of a poor Woman in Argos. She was looking upon the Fight among other Women, from the top of an House, and perceiving her Son engag'd with Pyrrhus, and affrighted at the danger he was in, took up a large Tile with both Hands, and threw it at Pyrrhus, which falling on his naked Head, and bruising the Vertebres of the lower part of the Neck, his Eye-sight was taken away, his Hands let go the Reins, and sinking down from his Horse, he fell just by the Tomb of Lycimnius. The common Soldiers knew not who it was; but one Zopyrus, that served under Antigonus, and two or three others running thither, and knowing it to be Pyrrhus, dragg'd him to a Threshold hard by, just as he was recovering a little from the blow; Zopyrus drawing out an Illyrian Sword, was ready to cut off his Head, when Pyrrhus gave him so fierce a Look, that he confounded him with Terror, and sometimes his Hands trembling, and then again endeavouring to do it, full of Fear and Confusion, he could not strike him right, but cutting him over the Mouth and Chin, it was a long time before he could get the Head off.

The Report of this Action was soon noised about, and Alcyoneus, the Son of Antigonus, hast'ning to the place, desired to look upon the Head, and see whether he knew it; then taking it in his hand, he rid away full speed with it to his Father, whom he found discoursing with some of his particular Favourites, and laid it at his Feet. Antigonus looking upon it, and knowing it, thrust his Son from him, and struck him with his Cane, calling him wicked and barbarous, and covering his Eyes with his Robe, fell a weeping, when he reflected upon the Death of his Grandfather Antigonus, and That of his Father Demetrius, two domestick Instances of the Instability of Fortune. At the same time he caused the Head and Body of Pyrrhus to be burned with all due Solemnity: After This, Alcyoneus discovering Helenus under a mean disguise, in a poor thread-bare Coat, used him very respectfully, and brought him to his Father: When Antigonus saw him, This, Son, (said he) was done much more Nobly than before; but yet You are still deficient, in that you have not taken off that Old Coat, which is a Scandal to Us who have got the Victory: And then treating Helenus with great kindness, and as became a Prince, he restored him to his Kingdom of Epirus, and gave the same obliging Reception to all Pyrrhus's principal Commanders, after he had reduced the whole Army under his Obedience.

WE are altogether ignorant of the third Name of Caius Marius; as likewise of that of Quintus Sertorius that possessed himself of Spain; and of Lucius Mummius that destroyed Corinth: Though this Last was surnamed Achaicus, from his Conquests, as Scipio was called Africanus, and Metellus Macedonicus. (1) Hence Posidonius draws his chiefest Argument

(1) Posidonius had condemn'd Those who believ'd the Third to be the proper Name among the Romans, and for this reason only did he condemn them, because it wou'd follow from thence that They who had only Two cou'd have no Name proper, because they had no Third Name, which according to Them was the only proper Name. Here Plutarch in his turn condemns Posidonius, because if the First was the proper Name, as he maintains it to be, the Women would have no proper Names, because They were never distinguish'd by the First of those Three Names which are usually attributed to the Men. But I doubt if what Plutarch advances here be true; for I think we may meet in Antiquity with Women call'd Caia, Lucia, Publia; and Valerius Maximus saith in plain terms, Antiquarium

Argument to confute Those that hold the Second to be the Roman proper Name, as Camillus, Marcellus, Cato ; for so They that had but two Names would have None Proper; and he did not foresee, that by the very same reason he must rob the Women absolutely of their Names, for None of them have the First, which Posidonius imagines the proper Name with the Romans. Now of the other Names, One was common to the whole Family, as the Pompeii, Manlii, Cornelii, (and with Us Grecians, the Heraclidæ, and Pelopidæ) the Other Titular, adopted to them either from their Natures, Actions, Affections, or Shapes of their Body; as Macrinus, Torquatus, Sylla ; such also is Mnemon, Grypus, and Callinicus among the Grecians. (1) But of the variety of Names, wou'd we insist upon it, the Irregularity of Custom might furnish us with Discourse enough.

As for Marius's Shape and Air, we have seen his Effigies in Stone at Ravenna in Gaul, very agreeable to the roughness and sowerness of his Behaviour, remarked by all Authors; for being na-

(1) This is very true, for as Rualdus observes, the usage of the first times during the Republick differs very much from That under the Emperors. Posidonius was in the Right as to the Age He lived in, for then the First of the Three was the proper Name, and Plutarch may be justified from the Usage of His times when the Third had that Distinction. This Subject of the Roman Names and Surnames has employ'd the Pens of several learned Persons; and They who have a mind to dive deeper into that Matter, which will prove more troublesome than profitable, may consult Sigonius, Robertellus, Brodæus, Politian, and Others. For my own part I always was of Opinion that of these Three Names Marcus Furius Camillus the Second was the Name general of the Family, the Family of the Furii; the First the Name proper, which distinguish'd the Branches, and Those of whom they were composed; and the Third the Surname, design'd to mark out the personal Distinction, and which in time became the proper Name of that Person to whom it had been affixed.

turally valiant and warlike, more acquainted also with the Discipline of the Camp than of the City, he could not moderate his Passion, when in Authority. He is said, neither to have much studied Greek, nor ever to have made use of that Language in any matter of consequence ; as thinking it ridiculous to bestow time in that Learning, the Teachers whereof were little better than the Slaves of the Romans. That after his second Triumph, when at the Dedication of a Temple, he presented the People with Shews after the manner of the Greeks ; he came indeed into the Theater, and sat down, but immediately rose up again, and departed. Wherefore, as Plato often used to say to Xenocrates the Philosopher, who was seemingly of a more than ordinary rigid Disposition, Pr'ythee, good Xenocrates, sacrifice to the Graces ; so if Marius cou'd have been persuaded to (1) pay his Devotions to the Greek Muses and Graces, he had never brought those his incomparable Designs, both in War and Peace, to so unhappy a Conclusion, or plunged himself into a turbulent and unpleasant old Age through his Passion, ill-tim'd Ambition, and insatiable Avarice ; but This will farther appear in the Sequel, from his Actions.

He was born of Parents altogether obscure and indigent, and who supported themselves by their daily Labour ; his Father of the same Name with Himself, his Mother called Fulcinia. He came but late into the City, so that he had passed a considerable part of his time before he became acquainted with that sort of Life. At first he

(1) Plutarch does not in this place pass a Compliment upon the Grecian Muses and Graces out of any Partiality to his Country. It is certain that They only are capable of polishing the Mind, and that no Man can make any Figure in the Civil, or Learned World without them. There are some indeed of so happy a Genius as to stand in no need of Rule, or Discipline.

lived in (1) Cirreaton, a Village in the Territory of Arpinum; a Life, compared with the City Delicacies, harsh and rustical; yet temperate, and much resembling the ancient Roman Severity. He first served in the War against the Celtiberes, when Scipio Africanus besieged Numantia, where he soon signaliz'd himself to his General, by his Courage, very far above his Comrades; and particularly by his so chearfully complying with Scipio's Reformation of his Army, before almost ruined by Pleasures and Luxury. 'Tis reported also, that he challenged, or at least encounter'd and vanquish'd, an Enemy in his General's fight; wherefore he had several Honours conferred upon him; and Scipio shew'd him a particular Respect; especially once at an Entertainment where Marius had the Honour to sup with him, when the Discourse at Table turn'd upon the Great Commanders then in being, One of the Company, either out of Complaisance to the General, or that it really was a doubt with him, asked Scipio, where the Romans should find such another General when He was gone, Scipio gently clapping Marius on the Back, who sat next him, replied; Here, perhaps. Such was the happy Genius of those two great Men, One of which in his very Youth gave those early Promises of his future Greatness, and the Other cou'd from such Beginnings clearly foresee that long Series of Glory and Renown which was to follow.

(1) In all probability this Word has been corrupted, and ought to be read Cernetum, as Xylander has corrected it upon this passage in Pliny, lib. 3. cap. v. where in describing the first Region in Italy he speaks of Cernetum, and adds, Cernetani, qui Mariani cognominantur, "The Inhabitants of Cernetum, who are firnamed Mariani." It is not unlikely but they were so call'd to denote that they were Marius his Countrymen. It is something astonishing that the Place wherein a Person who made so great a Figure in the World as Marius was born shou'd be unknown to Posterity.

Marius fired with this Speech of Scipio, as with a Divine (1) Oracle, took the Courage to apply himself to the management of Publick Affairs, and by the assistance of Cæcilius Metellus (on whose Family, He, as well as his Father, had continual dependance) obtained the Office of Tribune of the People. In this Office he proposed a Law to be passed for regulating the manner of voting, which was opposed by Cotta the Consul, who saw it tended to lessen the Authority of the Patricians in matters of Judicature, wherefore he persuaded the Senate to declare against it, and summon Marius to appear, and give an account of his Actions. Cotta having obtained a Decree for that purpose, Marius came into Court, and behaved himself not like a young Man, newly and undeservedly advanced to Authority; but taking as much (2) Courage as his future Actions would have inspired into him, threaten'd Cotta, unless he recalled the Decree, to clap him in Prison. Cotta addressing himself to Metellus ask'd his Opinion, and Metellus rising from his Seat voted with the Consul. Whereupon Marius calling for an Officer, commanded him to take Metellus into Custody; and when Metellus appeal'd to the other Tribunes, and not one of them offer'd to assist him, the Senate found it the safest way to comply, and so repealed the Decree. Marius, elevated with this Victory, went in Triumph out of the Senate, and pro-

(1) This Comparison is very proper. The Words of so great a Man as Scipio might well have the same Weight with Marius as an Oracle.

(2) A great Genius does not only receive Courage and Assurance from the Actions he has already perform'd; but even from Those which are still behind, and are not yet ripe for Performance. The Reason of This is clear; for the Principle which is in due time to give Life to those Actions is within him, and as it were borrows from them that modest Assurance and Confidence in himself, which he exerts before-hand.

ceeding to the Forum had his Law confirm'd in an Assembly of the People.

He was from henceforth esteemed as a Man of an undaunted Courage and Assurance, as well as a vigorous Opposer of the Senate in favour of the Commons. But he immediately lost their good Opinion of him by a contrary Action; for when a Law concerning the distribution of Corn was proposed, he very vigorously opposed it, and carried it against the People, thereby making himself equally honoured by both Parties, in gratifying Neither contrary to the Publick Interest.

When the Year of his Tribuneship was expired he stood Candidate for the Office of chief Edile; for there are two Orders of that Magistracy; One called Curulis, from the Chair with crooked Feet in which the Edile sits in the execution of his Office; the Other, of a much inferior Nature, is called the Edileship of the People. The Ediles Curules are first chosen, and when that Election is over they immediately proceed to the Choice of the Other. When Marius found he cou'd not carry the First, he drop'd his Pretensions there, and put in for the Second. But as this Proceeding seem'd too bold and obstinate, he miscarried in That also. And though he was thus in one Day twice frustrated of his desired Preferment (which never happen'd to any Man before) yet he was not at all discouraged; but a little while after stood for the Pretorship, and had like to have been repuls'd again; and then too, tho' he was returned last of all, was nevertheless accused of acquiring it by indirect means.

Cassius Sabaco's Servant, who was observed within the Rails among Those that voted, chiefly occasioned the suspicion. Now this Sabaco was an intimate Friend of Marius, for which reason he was summon'd to appear before the Judges, and interrogated. He alledged in his Defence That being thirsty by reason of the heat, he call'd for cold Water, and that his Servant brought him a Cup, and that as soon as he had drank, he departed; however, he was excluded the Senate by the succeeding Censors, and (1) not undeservedly (as was thought) either for his false Evidence or Intemperance. Caius Herennius was also cited as Evidence against Marius, but He pleaded that it was not customary for a Patron (for so the Romans call their Advocates) to witness against his Clients, and that the Law excused Them from that disobligement: Now both the Family of Marius, and Himself, had ever been Clients to That of the Herennii, and when the Judges seem'd willing to accept of this Plea, (2) Marius himself opposed it, and told Herennius, that when he was first created Magistrate, he ceased to be his Client; which was not altogether true: For it is not every Office that frees Clients and their Posterity from the observance due to their Patrons, but only That to which the Law has assigned a Sella Curulis. Notwithstanding, though at the beginning of the Suit it went somewhat hard with Marius, and he found the Judges no way favourable to him; yet at last their Voices being equal, he was acquitted beyond Expectation, but did nothing worthy Notice in his Pretorship.

At the Expiration of the Office the Province of the farther Spain fell to his Lot, which he is said

(1) For if what he had advanced concerning his Slave, who he said came to bring him a Glass of Water to allay his Thirst, and return'd immediately, was a Lye, he deserv'd to be turn'd out of the Senate for his false Evidence; and if it was true, he deserv'd it for his Intemperance, in not staying to gratify his Appetite till the Election was over.

(2) He chose rather to run the Hazard of having the Accusation of Bribery made good against him than allow himself to be in the Condition of a Client, which he look'd upon as ignominious.

to have cleared of Thieves, when as yet it was not thoroughly settled in Peace, and much wasted by the late Wars; and the Spaniards in those Days thought Robbery a piece of Valour. At his return to Rome, where he was eagerly desirous to have a share in the Administration, he trusted neither to Riches nor Eloquence, the two powerful Baits which the leading Men in those times laid for the People; but the Citizens having his fierce Disposition, indefatigable Pains, and popular way of living in high esteem, he was soon advanced to the highest Honours and Offices in the Government, by the means of which he acquired great Wealth and Power; so that he made a very honourable Match with Julia, of the Renowned Family of the Cæsars, to whom that Cæsar was Nephew, who was afterwards so great among the Romans, and who, by the Relation he had to Marius, was (1) zealous for his Honour; as in his Life we have observed. They attribute to Marius both Tempe-

(1) Plutarch's Words are καὶ τοῖς κατὰ οἰκότητα ζῆλῶσας Μάριον, which some Interpreters have tender'd who on Account of this Alliance and Affinity between them seem'd in some things to imitate Marius; which cannot be Plutarch's Meaning. It is ridiculous to say Cæsar imitated Marius through the Relation there was between them. Besides it is false to say Cæsar pretended to imitate Marius; Plutarch saith no such thing in the Life of Cæsar. They thought that ζῆλον in this place signified to imitate, whereas it signifies what we call to be zealous for one, to appear warm in his behalf, and endeavour to procure to him new Honours, or restore the old ones; and this Passage ought to be explain'd by That of Plu- tarch in the Life of Cæsar, where he saith that at the Funeral of his Aunt Julia, the Wife of Marius, He was so bold as to bring forth the Images of Marius, which 'till then no body durst produce since the Government came into Sylla's Hands; and that the People were taken with the Action, and admir'd him for his Courage, in having reviv'd in the City those Honours of Marius, which for so long time had been buried. He mentions the same thing a little after; so that Plutarch had good reason to add in this place, as in his (Cæsar's) Life we have observed. This Passage therefore ought to be explain'd so as to agree with the two other Passages in the Life of Cæsar, in neither of which is it to be found that Cæsar imitated Marius.

rance and Patience, of which latter he gave a pregnant Instance, in an operation of Surgery; for having (as it seems) both his Legs full of great Tumours, called Varices, and being troubled at their deformity, he determined to put himself into the hands of an Operator: Where, without being tied, he stretched out one of his Legs, and silently, without changing Countenance, endured most excessive Torments in the cutting, never either flinching or complaining; but when the Surgeon was preparing to cut the Other, he suffered him not; saying, I see the Cure is not worth the Pain.

(1) About this time Cacilius Metellus the Consul was declared General in the War against Jugurtha, and took with him Marius for one of his Lieutenants. Marius, who saw he had now a favourable Opportunity of performing great things, and making himself known, did not, like his Collegues, accommodate his Actions to the Interest of Metellus, and direct them to the Increase of his Reputation and Glory. He thought of nothing but his own Grandeur, flattering himself with a Conceit that it was not Metellus, who had made him his Lieutenant, but that (2) Fortune had brought him in that critical Conjuncture into Africk, placing him as it were upon a conspicuous Theater, where he had an Opportunity of shewing what he was; and in that belief he gave many manifest Proofs of his Courage, Valour, and all his other military Qualities. For as that War was always attended with extream Difficulties, and Dangers infinite, he

(1) Plutarch means Q. Cacilius Metellus, who was Consul with M. Junius Silanus the fourth Year of the hundred and sixty seventh Olympiad, a hundred and seven Years before the Birth of our Saviour, and who in this Expedition acquired the Surname of Numidicus.

(2) A Man possess'd with this fine Principle will with ease shake off all the Obligations of Gratitude and Respect, which are unseasonable Restraints upon an Ambitious Person, who is for assuming All to Himself, and will owe nothing to Others.

neither out of Fear declin'd the most perillous Service, nor out of Pride the most Servile; but surpassing his Equals in Counsel and Conduct, and matching the very common Soldiers in Labour and Abstemiousness, he strangely gain'd the Affections both of the One and the Other; for the voluntary partaking with them in their Labour seem'd to ease and refresh them; removing from it the Load of Constraint, it gave it the Air of free Choice and Liberty. It is the most obliging sight in the World to the Romans to see their Commander (1) publickly eat the same Bread with his Soldiers, lie upon an ordinary Bed, and assist in drawing a Trench or raising a Bulwark; for they do not so much admire Those that confer Honours and Riches upon them, as Such as partake of the same labour and danger with Themselves; and love Him better that will vouchsafe to forward their work, than Those who encourage them in Idleness.

(1) I cannot but offer the Reader my Sentiments upon this Passage. The Word publickly seems to Me to be a Corruption; to see the Commander is saying every thing, and I do not find what Use publickly can be of. Instead of these Words ἐδίων ἐν ὄψει κοινὸν ἄρτον, I fancy Plutarch wrote it ἐδίων ἐν ὄξει κοινὸν ἄρτον, eating the same bread as They did, the most common bread. That which was dipt in Vinegar. That was a great Mark of Marius his Temperance and Frugality, to eat the common Bread, and instead of other Meats or Sauces, to temper it only with Vinegar. It appears from several Passages in Antiquity that the Soldiers, the Slaves, and Those that labour'd in the Fields had generally no other Food than Salt, Bread, and Vinegar in which they dipt it. The Holy Scriptures furnish us with an Example of this kind. Ruth ii. 14. And Boaz said unto her, at Meal time come thou hither, and eat of the Bread, and dip thy Morsel in the Vinegar. Plautus has a Passage very much to the same purpose in the fourth Act and second Scene of the Rudens.

Sed hic Rex cum aceto pransurus est, & sale sine bono pulmento.

“ But this doughty King with “ all his Bravadoes will have no “ other Sauce to his Supper but “ a Corn or two of Salt, and a

Whilst Marius was thus employed, and thereby won mightily upon the Soldiers, he immediately filled both Africk and Rome with his Fame. Inſo-much that Some belonging to the Army in their Letters to their Friends at Rome told them, they wou'd never ſee an End of that War 'till Marius was Conſul, and had the chief Command. Metellus cou'd not but be highly touch'd at all This, but he was moſt ſenſibly ſo at what beſel Turpilus. The Right of Hoſpitality had time out of mind been eſtabliſh'd betwixt this Man's Anceſtors, and the Houſe of the Metelli, and He having attended the Conſul in the War, he was by Him made Overſeer of the Workmen, and Governour of Vacca, a large and conſiderable City; where truſting too much to the Inhabitants, becauſe he treated them civilly and kindly, he unawares fell into the Enemy's hands; (1) for they received Jugartha into the City; yet nevertheleſs at their requeſt Turpilus was diſmiſſed ſafe, and without receiving any Injury; whereupon he was accuſed of betraying it to the Enemy. Marius, being one of the Council of War, was not only violent againſt him Himſelf, but alſo incenſed moſt of the Others, ſo that Metellus was forced (much againſt his Will) to put him to death. Not long after (2) the Accuſation proved falſe; and when Others were comforting Metellus, who took heavily the loſs of his Friend, Marius rather inſulting and arrogating it to Himſelf, boated in all Companies that he had lodged a (3) vengeful Fury in Metellus's Breſt, which wou'd be continually torment- ing him for having put to death his intimate Friend, and hereditary Guest.

Henceforward they were at open variance ; and 'tis reported, that Metellus should one day say to Marius in an insulting manner, Oh sweet Sir, you design then to leave us, and go home and stand for the Consulship; would not you be well enough contented to stay, and be Consul with this Boy of mine? Now Metellus's Son was very young. Notwithstanding This Marius persisted, and continu'd his Sollicitations for leave to be gone, whilst Metellus still put him off with new Pretences. At last, (1) when there were but twelve days before the Election, he dismiss'd him. Marius with incredible Diligence perform'd that long Journey from the Camp to Utica in two Days, and a Night. At his Arrival there he perform'd a Sacrifice before he embark'd, and the Priest assur'd him, that Heaven promised him some incredible good Fortune, and such as was beyond all expectation. Marius not a little proud of this Promise began his Voyage, and in four Days with a favourable wind pass'd the Sea : he was extreamly welcome to the People, and being brought into the Assembly by one of the Tribunes, he sued for the Consulship, mightily inveighing against Metellus, promising either to slay Jugurtha, or take him alive.

He was elected with great Applause ; but presently levied Soldiers contrary both to Law and Custom, (2) lifting several Slaves and poor People without House or Home ; whereas former Commanders never accepted of Such, but bestowed Arms, like other Favours, with Honour on deserving Persons; esteeming the Wealth of the Soldier as a Pledge for his good Performance. These were not the only Prejudices against Marius; but some haughty Speeches, utter'd with great arrogance and contempt, grieved the Nobility extremely; for he had the Confidence to declare publickly that he took the Consulship as a Prey from the Effeminacy of the wealthy and nobler Citizens; and that he gloried more in the Wounds he received in the Service of his Country, than Others did in the Monuments of the Dead and Images of their Ancestors. Often speaking of those Commanders, Bestia and Albinus, that were unfortunate in Africk, he said, that they were indeed Men of very good Families, but unfit for War, and such as miscarried through want of Courage, and Capacity; then with a haughty Air he ask'd the People that were near him, if they did not think that their Ancestors had not much rather have left a Posterity like Him, since They themselves grew famous, not by Nobility, but by their Valour and great Actions? This he did not say merely out of Vanity and Arrogance, or that he were willing without any advantage to reproach the Nobility; but the People always delighting in Affronts and scurrilous Contumelies against the Senate (whereby they measure Greatness of Spirit) continually encouraged him in it, and instigated him not to spare the most worthy Persons, so that he might thereby gratifie the Multitude.

Upon his Return into Africk, Metellus was no longer able to bear up under the violence of Envy, and vehemence of his Passion; but deeply concern'd that having in a manner finish'd the War, (of which nothing remain'd to be done but securing the Person of Jugurtha) Marius grown great merely through his Ingratitude to Him, should bereave him both of his Victory and Triumph, he could not stand the Interview, but retir'd, whilst Ruti- his his Lieutenant surrendered up the Army to Marius. But before the End of this very War divine Vengeance retaliated upon Marius his Injustice to Metellus; for Sylla came in the very nick of time to deprive Him of the Glory of the Action, as He had wrested it out of the Hands of Metellus. I shall in a few Words recount the manner of this Transaction, having more particularly insisted upon it in the Life of Sylla.

Bocchus King of Mauritania was Jugurtha's Father-in-law, and if he did not assist him in the Course of this War so effectually as might have been expected from the Alliance between them, it was partly, as he Himself gave out, because he knew him full of Treachery and Falshood, and more truly because he was afraid of his Increase of Power; but after Jugurtha had lost All, and in distress came to Him as to his last Sanctuary, he receiv'd him more out of Shame as a Suppliant, than out of Affection as his Son-in-law; and when he had him in his power, he openly intreated Marius on his behalf, vigorously interceded for him, giving out that he would by no means deliver him; yet privately designing to betray him, he sent for L. Sylla, Questor to Marius, and who had some time before befriended Bocchus in the Army. When Sylla relying on his Word came to him, the African began to repent of his purpose, and often changed his Mind, being for several days unresolv'd with himself, whether he should deliver Jugurtha, or retain Sylla; at length he fixed upon his former treachery, and put Jugurtha alive into Sylla's possession.

This gave the first rise to that sad and deplorable Civil War, which almost ruined the whole Roman Empire; for Many that envied Marius, attributed the Success wholly to Sylla; and Sylla Himself, to give the better Credit to the Report, caused a Seal to be made, wherein was represented Bocchus delivering Jugurtha into the Hands of Sylla, and with This he constantly sealed all his Letters. By these means he provoked Marius to the last degree, who was by nature extreamly ambitious, and far from suffering any One to put in for a share with Him in that Renown and Glory, which he thought due to His Exploits, and Performances. Sylla was push'd on and instigated by the Enemies of Marius, who ascribed the Beginning, and most successful Actions of the War to Metellus, and the last Exploits, and the Honour of finishing it, to Sylla; to the end the People might be wean'd from their superstitious Opinion of Marius; and no longer extoll Him above all the other Commanders. (1) But all this Envy, Detraction, and Calumny vanish'd in an instant, and was dissipated upon the Report of the imminent Danger wherewith Italy was menaced from the West. The City then had great need of a good Commander, and was at a Loss whom to place at the Helm, and when None of the most Noble and Potent Families offer'd themselves in that time of Distress, and put in for the Consulate, Marius, tho' absent, was with an unanimous Voice named to that Office.

An account of Jugurtha's Defeat, and Seizure, had hardly reach'd Rome, when News was brought of the Invasion of the Teutones and Cimbri. At first it exceeded all credit, as to the Number and Strength of the approaching Army; but at length that Report proved much inferior to the Truth, for they were three hundred thousand effective fighting

(1) This is a most lively Image of the People. They hate, revile, and censure a great Man; but the Moment any Danger is at hand which makes him necessary, then they run to him, then they put themselves into his Hands, and place him at the Head of their Armies.

Men ; besides a far greater number of Women and Children. Their Pretence was the seeking New Countries to sustain their great Multitudes, and Cities where they might settle and inhabit ; as they had heard the Celtæ before them had expelled the Tyrrheni, and possessed themselves of the best part of Italy. Now These having had (1) no Commerce with the Southern Nations, and coming from Countries far remote, no Man knew what People they were, or whence they came, that thus like a Cloud hovered over Gaul and Italy ; yet by their grey Eyes, and the largeness of their Stature, they conjectured them to be some of those Germans that dwell by the Northern Sea ; besides, the Germans in their Language call Thieves and Robbers Cimbri.

There are Some who say, the Country of the Celtæ, through its prodigious largeness and extent, reacheth from the Western Ocean and Northern Climes, to the Lake Mæotis Eastward, and to that part of Scythia which bordereth upon Pontus ; and that there the two Nations mingle together ; that they make regular Draughts out of their Country not all at once, or on a sudden, but at the Spring season every Year ; and that by means of these annual Supplies they have gradually swarm'd over the greatest part of the European Continent : That tho' they are separately distinguish'd by different Names according to the different Sets or Clans of which the Body is compounded, yet their whole Army is comprehended under the general Name of Celto-Scythæ.

(1) These People were so little known that they have given ground to a multitude of Fables. Strabo in his seventh Book approves Posidonius's Conjecture, who thought these Cimbri were a vagabond People, a parcel of Banditti that roved up a d down for Plunder, and had by force of Arms extended their Settlements as far as the Palus Mæotis, and gave the Name of Cimmerian, as if you shou'd say Cimbrian, to the Bosphorus ; for the Greeks call the Cimbri Cimmerii.

Others say that they were a small parcel of the Cimmerii, anciently well known to the Grecians; and that quitting their native Soil, or being expell'd from thence by the Scythians on account of some Sedition among them, they passed from the Palus Mæotis into Asia, under the Conduct of one Lygdamis, whom they had chosen for their Leader; but the greater and more warlike part of them still inhabit the remotest Regions lying upon the farther Ocean. These, they say, live in a dark woody Country, hardly penetrable by the Sunbeams, by reason of their many high and spreading Trees; which also reach inward as far as the Her-cinian Forest; that they are under that part of Heaven where the Pole is so elevated, that by the Declination of the Parallels, the Zenith of the Inhabitants seems to be but little distant from it; and that their Days and Nights being equal They serve to divide their Year into two parts. (1) This dismal Country gave Homer occasion for the Fiction, that when Ulysses would call up the dead, he retired into the Country of the Cimmerians; as conceiving it either Hell it self, or a place nearest to it.

From hence therefore these Barbarians began their March, when they came into Italy. They were anciently call'd Cimmerii, and in process of time Cimbri, by corruption of the Word probably, and not that their Customs or Manners gave any occasion to that Appellation. But these things are built rather upon Conjecture, than any Warrant or Authority from History. However This is certain, and herein most Historians agree, that the number of this Rabble, instead of being less, was greater than had been reported. They were of an invincible strength and fierceness in their Engagements, and came on with the same irresistible violence as a devouring flame; nor could Any withstand their fury in their march, but All that came in their way were trodden down, or driven before them, like so many Sheep of whom they had made a Prey.

(1) It is true that the dark Country of the Cimmerii gave Homer the Hint for his Fable of the Infernal Regions, such as they are represented by him in the eleventh Book of his Odyssy, but he does not place them in the Country of the Scythian Cimmerians, but in Campania near the Lake Avernus.

Many Roman Armies, and many Officers of great Reputation, who had the care of the Transalpine Gaul committed to their Charge, were defeated, or fled ignominiously before them. And indeed the faint Resistance these Barbarians met with in their first Efforts, chiefly encouraged them to bend their march towards Rome. For having vanquished All they set upon, and being well laden with Plunder, they resolved to settle themselves nowhere 'till they should have razed the City, and wasted all Italy. The Romans being from all Parts alarmed with this News, immediately sent for Marius to be their Commander in that War, and nominated him the second time Consul; though the Law did not permit any one that was absent, or that had not stay'd a certain time from his first Consulship to be again created; yet the People rejected all Opposers; for they considered this was not the first time, that the Law had given place to the Common Interest, nor the present occasion less urgent than That, when contrary to Law they made Scipio Consul, who was then named to that Office by the Romans, not from a fear of losing their own City, but from a desire of destroying That of Carthage.

This Consideration prevailed, and Marius bringing over his Legions out of Africk on the very first day of January (which the Romans reckon the beginning of their Year) he received the Consulship, and then also entred in Triumph, shewing Jugurtha a Prisoner to the People; a Sight as agreeable to their Wishes as it was beyond their expectation; for no one could hope to see an end of that War whilst He lived; so various was the Character of that Man, so capable was he of accommodating himself to every turn of Fortune, and temporising with Chance; so much was his Valour season'd with Subtlety and Craft. 'Tis said, that when he was led in Triumph, he fell distracted, and after the Ceremony was over he was thrown into Prison, where whilst they were all in haste to strip him, Some of them tore his Robe off his back, and Others catching eagerly at his Pendants pull'd the Tips of his Ears off with them. After This, as they were casting him naked and full of Horror into a deep Dungeon, he forced a Smile, and cry'd out, O Heavens! How intolerably cold is this Bath of yours? There struggling for six days with extream hunger, and to the very last minute seeming fond of Life, he in the end received the just reward of his Villanies. In this Triumph was brought (as was reported) of Gold three thousand and seven pound weight, of Silver Bullion five thousand seven hundred and seventy five, of Money in Gold and Silver Coin seventeen thousand and twenty eight Drachmas. After the Solemnity was over Marius assembled the Senate, where either through inadvertency, or a course ill-bred Ostentation, he enter'd in his (1) triumphal Robe; but as soon as he perceiv'd the Senate was offended at it he withdrew, and putting on his ordinary Purple Habit, he return'd immediately, and took his Place.

(1) Which had never been done before. It was a Mark of insupportable Pride, and seem'd to be done on purpose to insult the Senate, and triumph over the Senators as he had done over Jugurtha.

ercises while they marched, using them to labour and weariness, to long and tedious Journies, and compelled every Man to carry his own Baggage, and provide his own Victuals; insomuch that for a long while after Such as were very laborious, silently without grumbling doing their work, were called Marius's Mules. But Some give another Reason for this Proverb; and say that when Scipio besieged Numantia, he being careful to inspect not only their Horses and Arms, but their Mules and Carriages too, and see how well equipped, and in what readines every one was, Marius brought forth his Horse, which had fed extreamly well, and a Mule in better case, stronger and gentler than Those of Others; whereupon the General was very well pleased with, and often mentioned Marius's Beasts; insomuch that when they would droll in the praise of a continually drudging, laborious Fellow, they called him Marius's Mule.

Fortune seems very much to have favour'd Marius on this Occasion. For the Barbarians like a sudden (1) Ebb turning the Tide, and falling first into Spain, he had thereby time to exercise his Soldiers, and confirm their Courage; and, which was most considerable, to shew them what He himself was. For that fierce humour of his in Authority, and Inexorableness in punishing, proved both just and advantagious to Those that did not use to do amiss, and were not stubborn in their Faults; and his turbulent Spirit, stern Voice, and sower Aspect, which were in a little while grown familiar to them, they esteemed terrible not to Themselves, but only to their Enemies. But his Uprightness in judging did more especially please the Soldiers, whereof this is a remarkable instance. One C. Lucius, his own Nephew, had a Command under him in the Army, who was a Man in other respects not notoriously debauched, but much given to the unlawful Love of young Men; he particularly loved One that was under his Command called Trebonius, with whom, notwithstanding his many solicitations, he could never prevail; at length one Night he sent a Messenger for him, and Trebonius, who knew a Subaltern Officer was by Law subject to the Commands of his Superior, obey'd the Summons, and being brought into his Tent, as Lucius endeavoured to force him, he drew his Sword and ran him thorough. This was done whilst Marius was absent; who, when he returned, appointed Trebonius a time for his Tryal; where whilst Many accused him, and not One appeared in his Defence, the Defendant himself with an undaunted assurance related the whole matter, and brought witnesses to prove that he had often resisted Lucius's importunity; and that though he had offer'd him considerable Presents, he always rejected them. Marius, full of Admiration, and in a sort of Rapture, commanded a Garland to be brought, such as the Romans bestow on Those who have perform'd any worthy Exploit, wherewith he Himself crowned Trebonius, as One who had performed a galant Action, at a time that very much wanted such good Examples.

This being told at Rome, proved no small help to Marius towards his third Consulship. Besides they expected the Barbarians in the Spring, and the People were unwilling to trust their Fortunes in that Exigency under the Conduct of any other General but Him; however their arrival was not so sudden as was imagined, so Marius's third Consulship expired, without a fight of the Barbarians. The Election coming on, and his Colleague being dead, he left the Command of the Army to Marius Aquilius, and hastened to Rome, where several eminent Persons being Candidates for the Consulship, Lucius Saturninus (who more than any of the other Tribunes, swayed the Populace, and of whom Marius himself was very observant) made an Harangue to the People, advising them to chuse Marius Consul; but He seeming to decline the Office, as one pretending never to be ambitious of it, Saturninus called him Traytor to his Country, that in such apparent danger would desert the War. And though it was not difficult to discover that He had been employ'd by Marius to put this Sham upon the People, yet they considering that the present Juncture very much required his rough Discipline, and his good Fortune too, voted him the fourth time Consul, and made Catulus Lutatius his Collegue, a Man very much esteemed by the Nobility, and not unacceptable to the Commons.

Marius having notice of the Enemy's approach, with all expedition passed the Alps, and pitching his Camp by the River Rhone, he took care first for plentiful Supplies of Victuals, lest at any time he should be forced to fight at a disadvantage for want of Necessaries. But as the Carriage of Provisions by Sea was long, hazardous, and expensive, he found a means of rendering it more easy and expeditious. The Mouth of the Rhone was at that time choak'd up with Mud and Sand, left there by the ebbing Tides, insomuch that Ships of Burden could not pass in without much difficulty and hazard. Hither therefore bringing his Army, then at leisure, he caused a deep and wide Cut, or Ditch to be dug, into which he turn'd a great part of the River, and drew it to a convenient Haven, deep and fit to receive Ships of considerable Burthen, as also having a calm and easy easy opening to the Sea. This Ditch retains his Name, and is call'd Marius's Ditch to this Day.

The Enemy dividing themselves into two Bodies, One of Them, which were the Cimbri, were appointed to march the upper way through the Country of the Norici, and force the Passes there, which were guarded by Catulus, whilst the Teutones and Ambrones march'd against Marius along the Sea-coast through Liguria. The Cimbri took up more time in their Preparations, and delay'd their March; but the Teutones and Ambrones were more expeditious, and having with long Marches passed the Alps, and traversed the whole Country of Liguria, they soon came up with Marius, and presented to his View an incredible Number of Enemies, terrible in their Aspect, whose ordinary Voice differ'd from That of other Men, and whose Shouts were enough to strike the most Resolute with Terror and Amazement. They took up a great part of the Plain on which they encamped, and then challeng'd the Consul to Battel. Marius, nothing moved with their Bravadoes, restrain'd his Soldiers within the Lines, and sharply reprehended Those that were of too forward and eager a Courage, and who were impatient to be fighting, calling them Traytors to their Country; and telling them that they were not come thither in pursuit of Triumphs and Trophies, but their Business now was to dissipate (if possible) the dreadful Storm that was ready to burst over them, and save Italy from Destruction.

This he represented in private to his Officers and Equals, but placed the Soldiers by turns upon the Bulwarks to survey the Enemy; to accustom them to bear their frightful Shape and Voice, and behold without concern their Arms and their way of using them; so that in a little time what at first

first appeared terrible to their apprehensions, by often viewing became familiar; for he very rationally imagin'd, that in Things terrible the Novelty of them imposeth very much upon the Imagination, and makes it start at Shadows; and that Familiarity on the contrary lessens the Terror even of That which is really in itself shocking and frightful. Now this daily converse did not only diminish the Soldiers Fears, but their Indignation was warmed, and their Courage inflamed when they heard the Threats and insupportable Insolence of their Enemies, who not only plundered and depopulated all the Country round, but also with great Contempt and Resolution threatned to storm their Trenches.

This put the Soldiers out of all Patience: they complain'd loudly of it, and their Complaints came to Marius's own Ears. What Effeminacy does Marius see in us, that he should thus keep us under Lock and Key like so many Women, and hinder us from encountering our Enemies? Come on, let us shew ourselves Men, and ask him if he expects any Others that must fight for our Liberty: Shall he always employ us in servile Offices, when he would draw Trenches, cleanse places of Mud and Dirt, and turn the course of Rivers? In such Works as These, it seems, he will exercise us, then return home, and brag of these great performances in his Consulships to the People. Or does the defeat of Carbo and Cæpio, who were vanquish'd by the Enemy, afright him? Surely they were much inferiour to Marius both in Glory and Valour, and commanded a much weaker Army; at the worst it is better to be in Action, though we suffer for it like Them, than to sit idle Spectators of the destruction of our Allies and Companions. Marius, not a little pleas'd to hear this, gently appeas'd them, by assuring them that he did not distrust their Valour, but that he was to follow the Directions of an Oracle, cle, who pointed out to him the Time and Place which were to secure to him the Victory. For he constantly carry'd up and down with him a Syrian Woman call'd (1) Martha, who pass'd for a great Prophetess. He caus'd her to be born in a Litter; paid her all imaginable Reverence and Respect, and never sacrific'd to the Gods but by her Direction. She had formerly address'd herself to the Senate, offering to communicate her Predictions to Them, but they refus'd to hear her. Upon This she betook herself to the (2) Women, whom She easily wrought into a Belief of her great Skill and Insight into Futurity. It happen'd one Day as she was sitting at the Feet of Marius's Wife in the Amphitheater, to behold a Tryal of Skill between two celebrated Gladiators, She luckily foretold to her which of the Two should Conquer. Marius's Wife, charm'd with this Instance of her Science, sent her with Recommendations to her Husband, who was at that time at the Head of the Army; and He receiv'd her with the utmost Veneration. After This she was every day born up and down the Camp in her Litter; and when she went to Sacrifice, she wore a Purple Robe lined and buttoned up, and had in her hand a little Spear trimmed with Ribands and Garlands.

(3) This Farce made Many question whether Ma-

(1) We learn from the Gospel that Martha was a Name for Women of that Country, and almost all Ages and Nations furnish us with Examples of these sort of Impostures, which great Men have at times made use of to create a Respect for them in the Opinion of the People, by persuading them that they are under the particular Care of the Deity. On these Occasions a Lie when it is once swallowed, proves as efficacious as the Truth.

(2) These Conjurers, Star-gazers, Fortune-tellers, and Others of the same Stamp, begin first with the Women, and by their means get into Credit, before they can play their Tricks with Success. The Reason of This is very obvious.

(3) They had great Reason to question it. On the one hand, Marius's rius did really give any credit to her Himself, or only play'd the Counterfeit when he shewed her publickly to impose upon the Soldiers.

But what Alexander Mindus relates about the Vultures, does really deserve admiration; that always before his Victories there appeared (1) Two of them, and accompanied the Army. They were known by their brazen Collars (for the Soldiers, when they took them, put them about their Necks, and so let them go, whereupon they in a manner knew and saluted the Soldiers) and whensoever These appeared in their Marches, they very much rejoiced, as at an Omen of good Success in that Expedition. About this time there happen'd many Signs and Prodigies, most of them of the ordinary Stamp; but it was reported that at Ameria and Tudurtum, two Cities in Italy, there were seen one Night in the Sky, flaming Darts and Shields, now waved about, and then again clashing against one another, resembling those postures and motions Soldiers use in their fighting; that at length one Party retreating, and the other pursuing, they all disappeared Westward. Much about the same time arriv'd from Pessinuntum, Batibaces, the chief Priest of Cybele, the Mother of the Gods, affirming Marius's Credulity and Opinion of Divination, his excessive Superstition and Confidence in Omens and Prognosticks, might incline one to believe that he was in good earnest the Dupe of the Syrian Impostor, and that he really took her for a Prophetess. We have seen Men, otherwise of excellent Sense, who have been imposed upon by such sort of Cattle. On the other hand, the Tale he invented to keep up the Spirits of his Companions, of the Eagle's Airy with seven young Ones, which fell upon his Robe, and the tame Vultures, of which he made such excellent Use, as Sertorius did not many Years after of his Hind, gives the Whole a strong Tincture of Cunning, and Political Knavery. For my part I am inclin'd to believe that Marius was both a superstitious Person and a Trickster.

(1) It is very likely that Those were tame Vultures, which Marius fed privately, and let 'em loose upon Occasion, to hearten his Soldiers.

that the Goddess had declared to him that the Romans shou'd obtain the Victory, and all the glorious Advantages arising from it.

The Senate giving credit to this Report, decreed a Temple to be built in Thanks to the Goddess for the Victory. But when Batibaces was going to communicate the same thing to the People, (1) Aulus Pompeius a Tribune prevented him; calling him Impostor, and ignominiously pulling him out of the Rostrum: But this very Action made the thing to be more confidently and universally credited; (2) for Aulus had scarce dissolved the Assembly, and returned home, when so violent a Fever seized him, that it was notoriously known, and in every body's Mouth, that he died within a Week after.

Whilst Marius lay quiet, without attempting any thing upon the Barbarians, they ventured to attack his Camp; from whence being encountred with showers of Darts, and losing several of their Men, they determined to march forward, hoping to recover the other side of the Alps without opposition; wherefore packing up their Baggage, they passed securely by the Camp of the Romans, to whom the greatness of their Numbers appeared in a clearer Light than it had done before, from the time they took up in their March; for it is

(1) This was a very hardy Action in a Tribune, after what had been resolv'd upon and decreed in the Senate. In all probability this Tribune was an Enemy to Marius, and desir'd to have Another appointed to succeed him.

(2) Plutarch relates This in such a manner as if he verily believ'd the Tribune wou'd not have died at that time without the Interposition of the Goddess, who did it in Revenge of the disrespect paid to her Fore-telling Knowledge, and the Affront put upon her Chief Priest. But This is what is usual. Any natural Accident which happens to fall out in an extraordinary Conjunction is judged by the common People to proceed from some present Circumstances, which, generally speaking, have no manner of Share in it.

said they were six Days a filing off, and moving in a successive Order by the Retrenchments. They passed so near the Romans, that Some of them as they march'd along call'd out, and in an insulting manner ask'd them if they had any Recommendations to their Wives, for they should be shortly with them?

As soon as the Barbarians had all passed by, and were in full March, Marius rais'd his Camp, following them leisurely in the Rear, and constantly halted when They did, at some small distance behind them; chusing always convenient places for his Camp, which he strongly fortify'd, that he might quarter with the greater safety. Thus they marched 'till they came to Aquæ-Sextiliæ, whence the Alps were but little distant, whereupon Marius put himself in readiness for the Encounter.

He chose a place for his Camp of considerable Strength, but where there was scarcity of Water; designing, as was reported, by this means to put an edge on his Soldiers Courage. For when several of them seem'd dissatisfied at his Choice of the Ground, where they were in danger of perishing for want of Water; He pointing with his Hand to a large River which ran near the Enemy's Camp, There, says He, you may have Water, but you must purchase it at the Expence of Your Blood. And why therefore, reply'd They, do you not lead us thither, whilst we have any Blood left in our Veins? To which he answer'd them in a softer Tone, I will lead you thither, but first let us fortify our Camp. Tho' This did not hinder the Soldiers from murmuring, yet they all readily obeyed. Now the Grooms and Sutlers belonging to the Army being in great want of Water, both for themselves and Those they had the Care of, they ran in great Crowds towards the River, Some with Hatchets, Some with Axes, Others with Swords and Javelins velins in one Hand, and All with Pitchers] in the Other, being resolv'd to have Water, tho' they were oblig'd to fight for it. These were at first encountred only by a small Party of the Enemies; for it was then about Dinner-time, when Some having bathed were sitting at Table, and Others were still a bathing; the Country in those Parts abounding with hot Springs; which gave the Romans an Opportunity of surprizing a great many of them, who being much taken with the Delightfulness of those Baths, thought of nothing but regaling themselves, and indulging their Appetites. But the Exclamations of Those who were first attack'd having given the Alarm, and drawn Others who were nearest them into their Assistance, Marius cou'd no longer restrain the Impatience of the Soldiers, who were in pain for their Servants. Besides the best of the Enemies Troops, They who had already defeated Manlius and Cæpio, the Ambrones, to the Number of thirty thousand Men, and upwards, were drawn out, and stood to their Arms.

These, though they had sufficiently filled their Bellies, yet retained their Minds undisturbed; and though they had indulged themselves even to Intemperance, yet their Wine serv'd only to render them more daring, and chearful; so that they advanced, not in a disorderly manner, rushing on like Madmen, or rending the Air with a confused Noise, and inarticulate Yellings, but in a sober manner striking on their Armour in regular Intervals, and moving all together as to a Tune or Measure, continually repeating their own Name, Ambrones, Ambrones! either the better to encourage one another, or to strike the greater terror into their Enemies. Of all the Italians in Marius's Army, the Ligurians were the first that charg'd; and when they understood that the Enemies confused Shout, was calling themselves themselves Ambrones, They also ecchoed the same word, which was an Ancient Name of their Country. This Acclamation, bandied from one Army to the other before they joined, the more incensed the Germans; so that their Officers on either side encouraging them, they strove with all possible vehemence the one to over-shout the other, taking it mutually for an Omen of Victory, and a great Incentive of their Courage.

But the Ambrones had the River to pass, which broke their Order; so that before they cou'd form again on the other side, the Ligurians attack'd the Van, and began the Charge. At the same time the Romans hasten'd up to support the Ligurians, and pouring down upon the Enemy from the higher Ground, they prest them so hard, that they were soon put into disorder. A great number of them were slain upon the Bank of the River, where they fell foul upon One Another, and the River it self was filled with Blood, and the Bodies of the Barbarians. Those who were got safe over not daring to make head, the Romans slew (1) as they fled to their Camp and Carriages; where the Women meeting them with Swords and Halberts, and making an hideous Out-cry, set upon Those that fled as well as Those that pursued; the one as Traitors, the other as Enemies; and mixing themselves with the Soldiers, with their bare Arms pulling away the Romans Shields, and laying hold on their Swords, endured the wounds and flashing

(1) How can This be? the Ambrones had pass'd the River, and been defeated by the Romans, who pursued Those that fled to their Camp, and Carriages. Those Troops who had been thus attack'd as they were passing the River had no Camp on this side. It is certain this Passage is not to be understood of the Camp of the Ambrones, but of the Teutones, which was on this side, tho' Plutarch makes no mention of it. This is so evidently true that the next moment, he tells us the Teutones went to attack the Romans on an Eminence where they had been posted by Marius.

of their Bodies to the very last with undaunted Resolution. Thus the Battel is said to have hapned upon the Banks of that River rather by accident than by any Appointment or Design of the General.

The Romans, after having thus put to the Sword the greatest part of the Ambrones, retired as it began to grow dark ; but the Army was not carested, as it used to be, with Songs of Victory ; there were no Rejoycings, no mutual Entertainments in their Tents. Sleep it self, that welcome and necessary Refreshment to Spirits exhausted with Labour and Fatigue, was that Night a Stranger to the Romans, who passed it under the greatest Trouble and Perplexity. Their Camp was unfortified ; there still remained many thousands of the Barbarians, who as yet had never charged ; Those of the Ambrones who had escaped from the late Defeat being mingled with them, filled the Air with hideous Out-cries, not like the Sighs and Groans of Men, but like the howlings and bellowings of wild Beasts, attended with Threats and Lamentations, which proceeding from such an innumerable host of Barbarians, resounded through the neighbouring Mountains, and shook the hollow Banks of the adjacent River. This horrid din echoed through the whole Plain : The Hearts of the Romans were seized with Terror, and Marius himself struck with Amazement at the Apprehensions of a tumultuous Night-Engagement, expecting every moment to be set upon by the Enemy. However the Barbarians made no Motions either that night, or the day following, but spent that time in consulting how to dispose and draw themselves up to the best advantage.

In the mean time Marius, well knowing that there hung over the Enemy's Camp some Cliffs, and Hollows cover'd with Wood, detach'd Claudius dius Marcellus with three thousand Men to lye there in Ambuscade, and fall on the Enemy's Rear when the Fight was begun. He order'd the remainder of his Troops to refresh themselves in good time, and take their Rest. The next Morning as soon as it was day he drew up before the Camp, and commanded the Horse to march into the Plain, which the Teutones perceiving, they could not contain themselves, nor stay 'till the Romans likewise were come down into the Plain, where they might encounter them upon equal terms; but arming themselves in haste, and with great vehemence, they inconsiderately run, and attack'd them upon that rising Ground. Marius dispatch'd his Officers with proper Orders to all Parts, commanding his Men to stand still, and expect the Enemy without stirring, and as soon as they were advanced within reach then to let fly at them with their Darts, join their Shields, and with Sword in Hand repel the Enemy; for he knew that the steepness of the Ground would render the Enemy's Charge infirm, and abate the force of their Blows; nor could their Shields be joined close together, where the Declivity of the place wou'd be continually forcing their Bodies upon an unequal Poise.

This Counsel he gave them, and was Himself observed to be the first that followed it; for he was inferior to None in the Agility of his Body, and far excelled them All in Resolution. Wherefore the Romans vigorously opposed them, and stopping them short as they were ascending the Hill, they bore hard upon them, and forced them back into the Plain, where the foremost Battalions began to rally, and form again, when the Rear was in the utmost Disorder and Confusion. For Marcellus was upon the Watch, and as soon as he was assured from the Noise and Clamour which reached those Cliffs and Hollows, wherein he lay

conceal'd, that the Fight was begun, he rose on a sudden, and falling impetuously and with loud Shouts upon the Enemy in the Rear, he soon put them into Disorder. The Romans prest them with such Vigour that they push'd them upon Those that were in the Front, who were thereby forced to face about, and cover them. By this means the Barbarians being attack'd both in Front and Rear, and unable to make Head against Both at once, were in a moment broken, and put to flight.

(1) The Romans pursuing them, slew and took Prisoners above a hundred thousand, and possessing themselves of their Tents, Baggage, and Carriages, voted as many of them as were not plunder'd as a Present to Marius. This indeed was a magnificent Recompence, but in reality far short of the important Service he had done his Country in that imminent Danger. There are some Authors who differ from this Account relating to the Disposition of the Spoils, and Number of the slain. They only say that after this Battel the Messilians made an Inclosure for their Vineyards with the Bones of Those who fell in it, and that the Soil, enriched by the moisture of the putrefied Bodies (which was soaked in with the Rain of the following Winter) yielded at the Season a prodigious Crop; which seems to confirm Archilocus's Assertion, who said, that nothing fattens a Soil so much as Blood. Now it is a common Observation, that extraordinary Rains usually fall after great Battels; whether it be, that some Deity washeth and cleanseth the (2) polluted Earth with showers from above, or that Blood and Corruption steaming forth a moist and gross Vapour, thicken the Air, which by reason of its tenuity is subject to alterations arising generally from the smallest causes.

After the Battel, Marius chose out from amongst the Barbarians Spoils and Arms, Those that were whole and handsome, and that would make the greatest shew in his Triumph; the rest he heaped upon a large Pile, and offer'd them in a splendid Sacrifice to the Gods. The Army stood round about the Pile crown'd with Laurel, and himself (1) array'd in his Purple Robe, and girt after the fashion of the Romans, taking a lighted Torch, and with both Hands lifting it up towards Heaven, was going to put it to the Pile, when some of his Friends were espied coming in all haste towards him on Horse-back; whereupon every one remained in great silence and expectation: When they came near, they alighting, saluted Marius, and bringing him the News of his fifth Consulship, delivered him Letters to the same purpose. This gave the addition of no small joy to the victorial Solemnity, which the Army expressed in a warlike kind of Shouts and Acclamations, and whilst the Officers were placing new Crowns on the Head of Marius, He set fire to the Pile and finished his Sacrifice.

(2) But whatever it be, which permits us not the enjoyment of Prosperity pure and sincere, but still interchanges humane Affairs with the mixture of good and bad, whether (3) Fortune, or divine Vengeance,

(3) There is neither Fortune, nor natural Necessity that has any

Vengeance, or the unalterable Nature of things, within a few days after this joyful Solemnity, Marius receiv'd News of an Event, which rais'd a new Cloud in the midst of this Calm and Serenity, and threatned Rome with another Storm and Tempest. For Catulus, who had been sent to oppose the Cimbri in their march, and defend the Passes on the Tops of the Alps, thinking it impossible to do it without making so many Detachments as wou'd necessarily weaken his Army, march'd back into Italy, and posted his Army behind the River Atbesis; where blocking up the Passages on both sides with strong Fortifications, he made a Bridge over it, that so he might be in a condition to succour the Garrisons on that side, if the Enemy, having forced the narrow Passages, should attempt to storm them. The Barbarians came on with such Insolence and Contempt of their Enemies, that to shew their Strength and Courage, rather than out of any necessity, they expos'd themselves quite naked to showers of Snow, climb'd up to the tops of the Mountains through heaps of Ice and Snow, and from thence, placing their broad Shields under their Bodies, let themselves slide from the Precipices along their vast slippery Descents.

When they had had pitched their Camp at a little distance from the River, and survey'd the passage, they began to cast up their Banks, Giant-like, tearing up the neighbouring Hills; and brought Trees pulled up by the roots, and heaps of Earth to the River, therewith damming up its course, and with great heavy Materials rolled down the Sometimes it works by second Causes, and then the Rubs that fall in our way, are the Effects of our own Folly and Weakness, and the Calamities we suffer are brought upon us by Our selves. Was either Fortune, or natural Necessity the Cause that Catulus's Soldiers prov'd Cowards?

Stream

Stream and dashed against the Bridge, they forced away the Planks which supported it; whereat the greatest part of the Roman Soldiers, very much affrighted, left their Camp and fled. Here did Catulus shew himself a wise and prudent General, in preferring the Glory of his Country to his own private Honour and Reputation. For when he found he could not prevail with his Soldiers to stand to their Colours, but saw how cowardly they all deserted them, he commanded his own Standard to be taken up, and running to the formost of Those that fled, he led them forward, chusing rather that the Disgrace should fall upon Himself than his Country; and that they should not seem to Fly, but follow their Leader. The Barbarians assaulted and took the Fortress on the other side of the Arthesis; where admiring at the few Romans there left, who had shewn themselves of an extraordinary Courage, and had fought boldly in defence of their Country, they dismissed them with an easie Composition, swearing them upon (1) their Brazen Bull; which was afterwards taken in the Battel, and, as they say, carried to Catulus's House, as the chief Trophy of the (2) Victory.

Thus falling in upon the Country, destitute of defence, they wasted it extreamly; whereupon Marius was presently sent for to the City; where when he arrived, every one supposing he would triumph, the Senate too unanimously voting it, he

(1) I have no where met with any Account of this brazen Bull used by the Cimbri in the Administration of an Oath; tho' Plutarch speaks of it here as a thing common, and well known. It may be the Cimbri worship'd a Bull.

(2) That is of the Victory gain'd afterwards in the Battel, of which Plutarch is going to give us the Description. The Manuscript in the St. Germain Library has μάχης instead of νίκης, which I take to be a fault of the Transcriber, who not comprehending that Plutarch speaks here of the following Victory has very injudiciously put Battel instead of Victory.

Himself

Himself did not think it convenient; whether it was, that he was unwilling to deprive his Officers and Soldiers of their share in the Triumph, or that to encourage the People in this juncture, he would (3) intrust the Glory of his former Exploits with the Fortune of the City, deferring it now to receive it afterwards with the greater Splendor. Having left such Orders as the occasion required, he hasten'd to Catulus, whose drooping Spirits he very much raised, and sent for his Army out of Gaul. As soon as it had join'd him he pass'd the Po, endeavouring to drive the Barbarians out of that part of Italy which lies to the South of that River.

But they pretending they were in expectation of the Teutones, and wondering they were so long in coming, deferred the Battel; either that they were really ignorant of their Defeat, or at least were willing to seem so (for they very much abused Those that brought them such News) and sending to Marius, required some part of the Country for them and their Brethren, and Cities fit for them to inhabit. When Marius enquired of the Ambassadors who their Brethren were, and they answering that they were the Teutones, they set the whole Assembly a laughing; but Marius scoffingly answered them, Do not trouble your selves for your your Brethren, for we have already provided Lands for them, which they shall possess for ever. The Ambassadors perceiving the Jeer, railed at him, and threatned that the Cimbri would make him smart for it, and the Teutones too when they came. And they are not

(1) This is a judicious Thought. Nothing cou'd tend more to reanimate the People than to see Marius defer his Triumph, and to leave it as in Trust with the Fortune of Rome, as a faithful Guardian, who wou'd not fail to keep it safe, and restore it at a proper

far off, replied Marius; it will be very unkindly done of you to go away before you have saluted, and embraced your Brethren. At the same time he commanded the Kings of the Teutones to be brought in loaden with Irons; for they had been taken by the Sequani, as they were endeavouring to escape over the Alps.

As soon as the Ambassadors were return'd, and had made their Report to the Cimbri, they march'd immediately against Marius, who lay still, and remain'd within his Trenches. It is said that on this occasion, he contriv'd a new Fashion for their Javelins; for 'till then the way was to fasten the Shaft to the Iron with two Iron Pins; now Marius let one of them remain as it was, but pulling out the other, put a weak wooden Peg in its place; contriving it so, that when it was stuck in the Enemy's Shield, it should not stand right out; but the wooden Peg breaking, the Iron should bend, and so the Pile sticking fast by its crooked point, should weigh down the Shield. Now Boiorix, King of the Cimbri, came with a small Party of Horse to the Roman Camp, and challenged Marius to appoint the Time and Place, where they might meet and determine Whose shou'd be the Country. Marius answered, That the Romans never consulted their Enemies when to fight, however he would gratifie the Cimbri so far; and so they pitched upon the third day after; for the Place, the Plain near Vercelle; which was convenient enough for the Roman Horse, and afforded room for the Enemy to display their Numbers.

They Both observed the Time appointed, and drew out their Forces. Catulus had under his Command twenty thousand three hundred, and Marius thirty two thousand who were placed in the two Wings, leaving to Catulus the Main Battel.

Battel. (1) Sylla, who was present at the Fight, gives this Relation, saying withal, that Marius drew up his Army in this Order, out of Malice to Catulus; for it being customary, in that manner of embattelling, that the Army should represent a Crescent; the two extream Points much advancing, and the main Battel remaining behind; Marius hoped to fall upon the Enemy with his two Wings thus advanced, and rout them, and thereby secure to Himself the Honour of the Victory, before Catulus cou'd have time to come up to the Charge with the main Body under his Command. Catulus himself alledg'd This in vindication of his Honour, and complain'd loudly of Marius for the malicious Trick he had play'd him. The Infantry of the Cimbri marched quietly out of their Trenches, having their Flanks equal to their Front; insomuch that their Battel was square, every side taking up thirty Furlongs. Their Horse were fifteen thousand in Number, and made a very splendid Appearance. They wore Head-pieces form'd like open Jaws, and Muzzles of all sorts of wild Beasts, which they rais'd with Plumes shap'd like Wings of a prodigious Height, which altogether made them seem still larger than they were. Their Breast-plates were of polish'd Iron, and their Shields shin'd as bright as Silver. For their offensive Arms, every one had two-edged Darts, and when they came hand to hand, they used great and heavy Swords.

In this Engagement they did not fall directly upon the Front of the Romans, but wheeling to the Right, they endeavoured to enclose them by

(1) Sylla wrote several Books, or Commentaries of his own Actions; for we find Citations out of the twenty first. The Work was imperfect, for he died before he had finish'd it. Plutarch makes mention of it in the Life of Sylla, and in That of Lucullus.

little and little, and get the Enemy between Them and their Infantry, who were placed in the left. The Roman Commanders soon perceiv'd the Design; but could not contain the Soldiers: For one of them happ'ning to cry out, that the Enemy fled, they all hasten'd to pursue them; whereupon the Barbarian Foot came on moving like a great Ocean. Here Marius, having washed his hands, and lifting them up towards Heaven, vowed an Hecatomb to the Gods; and Catulus too in the same posture solemnly promised to consecrate a Temple (1) to the Fortune of that day. They say that Marius no sooner saw the Victim which they shewed to him, as he was sacrificing, but he cried out with a loud voice, the Victory is mine.

However when the Battel was joined an Accident happen'd, which, as Sylla writes, (2) seem'd an instance of the divine Vengeance upon Marius; for a great Dust being raised, which (as it might very probably happen) (3) almost covered both the Armies, He moving with his Troops first to the Charge, had the misfortune to miss the Enemy in that general obscurity, and having passed by their Army, wander'd up and down in the Plain without knowing where he was. In the mean time it was the good Fortune of Catulus that the Enemy fell upon Him, so that contrary to the intention of Marius, He only and the Soldiers un-

(1) This Temple was accordingly dedicated to Fortune under this Title, Fortunæ hujus diei; which seems very remarkable.

(2) The truth is, Marius had so maliciously drawn up the Army as to have a Pretence to lay claim to all the Glory of the Success, and deprive his Collegue of his share. And now we see Catulus withstanding the whole Power of the Enemy, whilst Marius is upon the Ramble.

(3) Homer had good Reason to feign so often that Night cover'd the Combatants, and hinder'd them from seeing one another. That Poet always paints after Nature. Here Plutarch seems to vie with him in the Description he gives of this Battel; so noble, and poetical are his Images, tho' they are at the same time true, and actual.

der his Command, among whom was Sylla, bore the whole Brunt of the Battel. The Heat of the Weather, which was very excessive, and the Sun which shined full upon the Cimbri, prov'd of great Advantage to the Romans. For the Cimbri, by nature capable of enduring the severest Cold, having been bred in frozen Climes, and shady Countries, were not able to support the excessive Heat, but drop'd with Sweat like Water, panted for want of Breath, and had hardly Strength enough left to hold their Shields up before their Faces, and skreen them from the piercing Beams of the Sun; for this Battel was fought not long after the Summer Solstice; or, as the Romans reckon, about the third of the Calends of August, then called Sextilis. At the same time the Dust prov'd as serviceable to the Romans as the Sun, giving no small addition to their Courage, in as much as it hid the Enemy, for they could not afar off discover their number; but every one advancing to encounter Those that were nearest to them, they were come to fight hand to hand before the sight of so vast a multitude had struck terror into them.

The Romans were so much used to labour, and so well exercised, that in all the heat and toil of the Encounter, not one of them was observed either to sweat, or to be out of breath; and This, they say, (1) was recorded by Catulus himself, in Commendation of his Soldiers. Here the greatest part and most valiant of the Enemies were cut in pieces; for Those that fought in the Front,

(1) Catulus wrote a History of his Consulship, and of all his own Performances. Cicero commends it in his Brutus, where he saith that he imitated Xenophon's Style, and dedicated it to a particular Friend, the Poet Furius. To our great misfortune this Book is lost. This Catulus was likewise a very elegant Poet, and two of his Epigrams, which still remain, shew the agreeable Turn of his Wit, and at the same time the Depravity of his Manners.

were (1) fast tied to one another with long Cords put through their Belts, to hinder them from breaking their Ranks, or falling into Disorder. As they pursued Those that fled to their Camp, they met with a most horrid Tragedy; the Women standing in Mourning by their Carriages, slew all that fled; some their Husbands, some their Brethren, others their Fathers; and strangling their little Children with their own hands, threw them under the Wheels, and Horses feet, and last of all killed themselves. They tell us of one that was hanging on the very top of a Waggon, with her Children tied dangling at her Heels; the Men for want of Trees, tied themselves, Some to the horns of the Oxen, the Necks of Others were fastned to their Legs, that so pricking them on, by the starting and springing of the Beasts, they might be torn and trodden to pieces. Yet tho' they thus massacred themselves, above sixty thousand were taken Prisoners, and Those that were slain were said to be twice as many.

The ordinary Plunder Marius's Soldiers forcibly took away; but the other Spoils, as Ensigns, Trumpets, and the like, they say, were brought to Catulus's Camp, which He used as an Argument that the Victory was obtained by Himself and His Army. Hereupon a hot dispute arose betwixt His Troops, and Those of Marius; and Ambassadors from Parma, who happen'd to be then present, were chosen Arbitrators, and Judges of the Controversy. Catulus's Soldiers led them into the Field of Battel, carry'd them among the dead, and manifestly proved that they were slain by their Piles, which were known by the Inscriptions, having Catulus's Name cut in the Wood: nevertheless the whole Glory of the Action was ascribed to Marius, by reason of his former Victory, and under colour of his present Authority. The Populace more especially styling him the third Founder of their City, as having diverted a Danger no less threatening than was That when the Gauls sacked Rome; and every one rejoicing at home with his Wife and Children, (1) sacrificed to the Gods and to Marius; and would have had Him solely to have the honour of both the Triumphs. This he wou'd not consent to, but triumphed together with Catulus, being desirous to shew his Moderation even in so great Circumstances of good Fortune; besides, he was not a little afraid of the Soldiers in Catulus's Army, lest if he should wholly bereave their General of the Honour, they should endeavour to hinder him of his Triumph.

Thus did he pass through his fifth Consulate, and courted the Sixth with more heat and earnestness, than any Man before him had shewn for the First; he took the People by the hand, and ingratiated himself with the Multitude by such servile Condescensions, as were not only below his Dignity, but even contrary to his natural Temper and Inclination. It is said of him that his excessive Ambition had made him exceeding timorous in any Affairs, which related to the Government, or were handled in Publick Assemblies; and that undaunted Presence of Mind he always shewed in Battel against the Enemy, forsook him when he was to harangue the People, from whom the least breath of Applause or Dislike had such an effect upon him, as to put him besides himself. However it is reported of him, that having enfranchised all at once no less than a thousand Men of the City of Camerium, who had behaved themselves well in the Wars, when This was represented to him as a thing contrary to Law, he reply'd, (1) that the Law spake too softly to be heard in such a noise of War: However he himself appeared to be more concerned and astonished at that noise which was made by the Assemblies. The need they had of him in time of War procured him his Wealth and Dignity; but in Civil Affairs, when he despaired of getting the first place, he was forced to betake himself to the favour of the People, never regarding to be a Good Man, so that he were but a Great one.

By this Behaviour he set all the Nobility against him, but he dreaded none of them so much as Metellus, who had been so ingratelously used by him; and who, being truly virtuous, was naturally an Enemy to Those who by Flattery and Corruption practised upon the People. This made Marius very desirous to get him out of the way, for which purpose he contracted a familiar Acquaintance with Glaucias and Saturninus, a couple of daring resolute Fellows, who had all the scum of the Indigent and Seditious constantly at their Beck. By the assistance of these Tools he got several Laws, which wou'd answer his Ends, to be enacted, and secretly planting several of his Soldiers up and down in the Assemblies, he rais'd a powerful Faction against Metellus. faithful and authentick Historian, but indeed privately an Enemy to Marius, tells us that he obtain'd his sixth Consulship by distributing vast Sums of Money among the Tribes, that he bought their Votes to put by Metellus, and to elect Valerius Flaccus, his Instrument rather than his Collegue in the Consulship. The People had never before bestowed so many Consulships on any one Man, except on (1) Valerius Corvinus only; and He too, they say, was forty five years between his First and Last; but Marius from his First ran through Five more with one push of his good Fortune.

In the last of which especially, he contracted a great deal of hatred, by openly abetting Saturninus in all his Actions, particularly receiving him into his Protection after the Murder of Nonius, whom Saturninus slew because he stood in competition with him for the Tribuneship. After This, when Saturninus was declared Tribune of the People, he offer'd a Bill, which had been prepared by Marius, for a Division of the Lands, in which there was a Clause expressly providing, (2) that the Senate should Exile six or seven Years after this sixth Consulate of Marius. Sylla wou'd have recall'd him, but he refused to return. Cicero reproaches him somewhere for taking it mortally to Heart that his Brother was refused the Consulate.

(1) This Valerius Corvinus obtain'd his first Consulate when he was twenty three Years of Age, the second Year of the hundred and eighth Olympiad, the four hundred and sixth Year of Rome, three hundred and forty five Years before the Birth of Christ; and he was declared for the sixth time Consul; the fourth Year of the hundred and nineteenth Olympiad; the four hundred and fifty second Year of Rome, two hundred and ninety nine Years before the Incarnation. Thus there passed forty five Years between his first, and last Consulship.

(2) Nothing cou'd be more unreasonable than such a Law; it was to subject the Senate to the People, and render the People absolute. There is an admirable passage upon This in Tully's first Book de Oratore. Crassus had said in a full Assembly of the People, Nolite sinere nos cuiquam servire nisi vobis universis, quibus & possumus, & debemus. Upon which Antonius said,

Should come and swear in full Assembly to confirm whatever shou'd be enacted by the People, and not oppose them in any thing. Marius pretended to be much offended at this Article in the Senate, declaring openly that for his Part he was determin'd never to take an Oath so unreasonable, and he believ'd every Man that was wise wou'd be of his Opinion; (1) for if the Law was not bad in it self, and of a pernicious Tendency, it wou'd be an Affront to the Senate to compel them to swear to a thing, which they ought rather to do voluntarily, and of Choice. This he said, not that it was agreeable to his own Sentiments, but that he might thereby entangle Metellus in an unavoidable snare; (2) for making a great part of his Virtue and Gravity to consist in Deceit, he made very little account of what he had openly professed to the Senate; on the other hand, knowing Metellus to be a Person of a fixed Resolution, and (as Pindar has it) one that esteemed Truth the greatest Principle of Heroick Virtue, he hoped that His refusing to take the Oath wou'd draw Him into a refusal likewise, and he did not doubt but when he had once declared himself he wou'd stand firm to his Resolution, which wou'd infallibly expose him to the implacable hatred of the People. The of as much Honour, and Virtue as Rutilius, and Marius knew very well that he wou'd never give his consent to such a Law, or take an Oath so unjust, and unreasonable.

(1) Indeed if the Law was a good Law there was no necessity for swearing, and if it was a bad one they were obliged in honour not to swear.

(2) This has been the common Vice of Politicians in all Ages, I mean of those false Politicians, who will not be persuaded that Truth and Virtue are the most solid Foundations of a Government.

The L I F E of

Event answer'd his Expectation; for as soon as Metellus had declared that he would not swear to it, the Senate adjourned; and a few days after Saturninus summoning the Senate to appear in Court, and take the Oath, Marius made his Appearance among the rest.

As soon as He appear'd the Court was in a profound silence, and the Eyes of All were fixed upon him; when he bidding farewell to those fine smooth Speeches he had before made in the Senate, which were only from the Teeth outwards, declared freely that he was not so (1) stiff-neck'd, as to be tied down to any Declaration he might have made upon an Affair of so much Weight before he had thoroughly consider'd it, but was ready to swear, and having sworn wou'd punctually observe the Law, when once it became a Law. (2) The last Words he artfully added, to put a plausible Colour upon his shameful Impudence, and without more ado took the Oath. The People extreamly pleased at this mightily extolled and applauded him; but the Nobility were very much ashamed, and in their Hearts detested such bare-faced Double-dealing. However they were over-aw'd by the People, and swore in their Order, 'till it came to Metellus. But He, though his Friends entreated him to take the Oath, and not to plunge himself irrecoverably into those Penalties which Saturninus had provided for Them that refused, would not flinch from his Resolution; but, according to his usual custom, being ready to suffer any thing rather than do a base unworthy Action, left the Forum, telling Them that were with him, That to do ill was shameful; to do well where it might be done with safety was common; but to do well even in the Face of Danger That was the Property of a good Man.

Immediately upon his Refusal Saturninus put it to the Vote, that the Consuls should declare Metellus banished, and that None should entertain him: Nor were there wanting among the Dregs of the People Some who were ready to kill him. But All of the better sort were concern'd for him, and gathering about him were determin'd to defend him to the last Extremity; but he wou'd by no means suffer them to raise a Sedition on his Account, but left the City with this sage Reflection. Either the Face of Affairs will change for the better, and the People repent, in which Case I shall be recall'd, and restor'd with Honour; or they will remain in the present Posture, and then it will be best to be absent. But how great Favour and Honour Metellus receiv'd in his Banishment, and after what manner he spent his time at Rhodes in the Study of Philosophy, we shall more opportunely shew when we come to write his Life.

Marius found himself so highly obliged to Saturninus for this last piece of Service, that he was forced to connive at him, and suffer him to commit what Acts of Violence and Injustice he pleased, with Impunity. Like a Monster let loose, he stop'd at no Outrages, or Massacres, so that every thing tended to Tyranny, and a total Subversion of the Government. All this while Marius acted a double Part; he was willing to keep fair with the Nobility, and at the same time cajole the People. This put him upon an Action the most vile, and detestable. One Night when Some of the chief of the Nobility came to him, and prest him to declare against Saturninus, Saturninus came to his Houle at the same time, and was let in at a back Door unknown to the Senators. Then pretending an indisposition of Nature, under that Colour he ran from one Party to the Other, and staying one while with Them, and another with Him, he instigated and exasperated Both. 'Till at length the Senate and Equestrian Order uniting together, and testifying their Resentments, he found himself obliged to send a party of Soldiers to the Forum to suppress the Sedition, which he secretly favour'd, but cou'd protect no longer. Saturninus, and Glaucias, and the rest of their Crew fled to the Capitol, where they were besieged, and at length forced to yield for want of Water, for they had cut off the Pipes. Wherefore when they could hold out no longer they surrender'd themselves to Marius upon the publick Faith; and He endeavour'd all he cou'd to save them, but to no purpose, for they were no sooner brought down to the Forum, but (1) they were all murder'd. Hereupon He became equally odious both to the Nobility and Commons, so that when the time was come to create Censors, though he were the most likely Man, yet he did not petition for it; but fearing the disgrace of a repulse, he permitted Others his Inferiours to be elected: yet he pleas'd himself in giving out, that he was not willing to disoblige too many, by a severe inspection into their Lives and Conversations.

There was now an Edict preferred, to recall Metellus from Banishment; This He vigorously opposed, both in his Discourse and Actions; but seeing it was to no purpose he at length desisted: But being not able to endure the sight of Metellus, he made a Voyage to Cappadocia and Galatia, giving it out that he went to perform some Sacrifices,

which he had vowed to Cybele the Mother of the Gods. This indeed was his Pretext, but there was another Reason for this Voyage, which was not to be discover'd to the People. Being by Nature unapt for Peace, and unfit for the management of civil Affairs, deriving all his Grandeur and Advancement from the Wars, and foreseeing that a state of Inaction wou'd fully all his Glory, and by degrees make his Laurels wither, his Business was to cut out new Work for the Romans; and he hoped by stirring up the Kings against them, particularly by exasperating Mithridates, who seem'd the most disposed to quarrel, He himself shou'd be chosen General in the War, and by that means furnish the City with new matter of Triumph, and enrich his own House with the Plunder of Pontus, and the Spoils of its King. Wherefore, though Mithridates had receiv'd and entertain'd him with all imaginable Civility and Respect, yet he was not at all wrought upon or softned by it; but told him very bluntly, O King! either endeavour to be indeed more potent than the Romans, or else quietly submit to their Commands. With which Mithridates was almost astonished. He had indeed often been told of the Liberty, or rather Licentiousness of the Romans in their Speech, but that was the first time he had ever heard it.

When Marius returned to Rome, he built an House close by the Forum, either (as he himself gave out) because he was willing to ease his Clients of the Trouble of going far, or that he imagined it would make his Levees the more numerous, and that the Remoteness of his Habitation was the Reason he had not (1) so great a Concourse at his Gates as Others;

(1) This in my Opinion is the true Sense of the Passage, which has been corrupted in the Original,

είπε γὰρ το αἴτιον οἰόμενος εἶναι
τῶ πλείονας ἄλλως ἐπὶ θύρας αὐτῆ φοιτᾶν, which Words have

Others ; but in This he was mistaken: the true Reason was because being inferior to Others in obliging Conversation and the Arts of Courtship, like a meer Tool and Implement of War, he was thrown aside in time of Peace. He was not so much concern'd to see his Glory and Reputation eclipsed by That of Others, as he was to see Sylla agrandise himself at his Expence ; to receive his Rise from the Hatred which the Nobility bore Him ; and make his Disagreement with Him the first step to his Preferment. Bocobus King of Numidia, after he had been declared an Ally to the Romans, dedicated in the Capitol some triumphal Trophies of Sylla's Victories, and placed near them several golden Statues, representing the History of Jugurtha, and how he was deliver'd by Him into the Hands of Sylla. This made Marius almost distracted with Rage and Ambition, as if Sylla had hereby robb'd Him of the Glory of his Exploits. Wherefore stung to the quick with Rage and Jealousie, he was resolv'd by force to pull down a Monument so injurious to his Honour : Sylla, on the other hand, put himself in a Condition to oppose him.

When this Sedition was just upon the point of breaking out, (1) the Confederate War interposed, and put a stop to it. Now the most warlike and best-peopled Countries of all Italy conspired toge-neither Sense, nor Reason in them. Without doubt the following were the Words of Plutarch ἡ πλείονας ἄλλων ἐπὶ δόξας ἢ αὐτῶν φοιτᾶν. Men of Ambition cannot bear to see greater Court made to Others than Themselves. That was the Reason made Marius desire to have a House near the Forum, that the Conveniency of his Habitation might draw greater Crouds to his Gate every Morning.

(1) It was likewise called the Marsian War, and broke out the third Year of the hundred and seventy second Olympiad, in the six hundred and sixty second Year of Rome, and eighty eight Years before the Incarnation. The Reader may find in the eighteenth chap. of the third Book of Florus a good Comment upon this Passage in Plutarch.

This War, so various as to its Encounters, and so uncertain as to its Success, what Glory and Power it conferred upon Sylla, of so much it deprived Marius, who seemed not to be very brisk in his Charges, but was, for the most part, guilty of Delays, Retreats, and almost Cowardice: whether it were, that his Age had quenched that Heat and Vigour he was formerly Master of (for he was now above sixty five Years old;) or that, as he Himself said, having some Distemper in his Nerves, and his Body unfit for Action, he underwent the Fatigues of the War, which were in truth beyond his Strength, meerly out of Shame, and upon a point of Honour. Yet for all This, he came off Victor in a considerable Engagement, wherein he slew six thousand of the Enemies, and never gave them any advantage over him. Nay, he suffer'd himself to be surrounded by the Works of the Enemy, to be insulted, braved, and challenged, without being in the least concerned, or provoked at it. There goes a Report, that when one Popedius Silo, a Man of the greatest Worth and Authority among the Enemies, said to him, If thou be'st that great Captain, Marius, come down into the Plain, and fight us; he answer'd, If Thou art that great Captain, Popedius, force me to come down and fight. And another time, when the Enemy gave them a good opportunity of a Battel, and the Romans, through fear, durst not charge, so that both Parties retreated, he called an Assembly of his Soldiers, and told them, It is no small question whether I should call the Enemies or you the greater Cowards, for neither dare They face your Backs, nor You theirs.

At length, pretending to be worn out with the Infirmity of his Body, he laid down his Command. Afterwards, when the Confederates had been worsted in many Engagements, and every one saw there was an end of that War, several of the chief Men in Rome made their Interest to have the Command of the Army against Mithridates, when Sulpitius, Tribune of the People, a bold resolute Fellow, contrary to every body's expectation bringing in Marius, declared Him Pro-consul, and General in that War: whereupon the People were divided; Some were on Marius's side, Others voted for Sylla; and jeeringly bad Marius go to his Baths at Baie to cure his Body, worn out, as Himself confessed, with Age and Catarrhs. Now Marius had indeed near Misenum, a Villa, more effeminately and luxuriously furnished than became a Man who had been at the Head of so many Armies, and been employed in so many Wars and Expeditions. This same House Cornelia bought for seventy five thousand Denarii, and not long after Lucius (1) Lucullus for two hundred and fifty thousand, to such a height did Luxury, Effeminacy and Expence increase at Rome in so short a time. Notwithstanding all This, Marius very ambitiously and childishly affecting to shake off his Age and Weakness, went into the Field of Mars, where in the most robust Exercises with the Youth, he shewed himself still nimble in his Armour, and expert in Riding; though indeed he were grown less active in his Age by reason of his great Belly, and his inclining to Fatness and Corpulency.

(1) It is confessed on all Hands that Luxury knows no Bounds, and that all on a sudden it can raise any thing up to an excessive Price; of This we meet with frequent Examples every day. But that this House of Marius shou'd in so short a time advance from seventy five thousand Denarii to two hundred and fifty thousand, seems incredible. Perhaps there may have been some mistake in the Numbers.

These Actions of his pleased Some that went to see his Vain-glory in those Justs and Exercises; but the better sort pitied his Avarice and Ambition, that from a Beggar growing so extreamly Rich, and from Nothing becoming so Great, he knew not how to set bounds to his good Fortune, nor be content with being admired, and quietly enjoy what he had already got; but, as if he still were in extream Poverty, should at so great an Age leave Glory and Triumphs to go into Cappadocia and the Euxine Sea, to fight Archelaus and Neoptolemus, Mithridates's Generals. The Reason Marius alledged in Justification of this step was very ridiculous; for he said he had a mind himself to train up his Son in that War.

Rome was now upon the very brink of Destruction; She had been in a sickly Condition for a long time, and Marius had now found out a Cure for all her Maladies in the Person of Sulpicius. This Fellow in all other respects admired and imitated Saturninus; only found fault with his Cowardice, and Backwardness in his Designs: he therefore made no such foolish Delays, but got six hundred Horse about him as his Guard, which he named his Anti-Senators. One Day whilst the Consuls Sylla and Pompey were holding an Assembly in the Forum, Sulpitius came upon them with his Assassines. The Consuls immediately fled, but he seiz'd on Pompey's Son, and slew him on the Spot. Sylla being hotly pursued, took into Marius's House, which being the last thing to be suspected by Those that sought him, they hurried by, and ran on upon a wrong Scent. It is said that Marius Himself convey'd him to the back Gate, and dismiss'd him, so that he got safe to the Camp. But Sylla in his Memoirs positively denies his flying to the House of Marius, and saith he was carry'd thither to debate upon some Matters, which Sulpitius would have him pass against his Will; that he was surrounded with drawn Swords, and hurried forcibly to Marius's House; that at last he was taken from thence, and carry'd to the Forum, where they forced him to revoke (1) the Order of Vacation, which had been appointed by Him and his Colleague.

Sulpitius in this manner carrying All before him, decreed the Command of the Army to Marius; who making preparations for his March, sent two Tribunes to receive the charge of the Army from Sylla. But He, instead of resigning his Charge, led his Army, consisting of thirty thousand Foot and two thousand Horse, directly to Rome, having by the way incensed his Soldiers, and prepared them to resent the Injuries that had been done him. They first murder'd the two Tribunes that had been sent to demand the Army of Sylla. Marius did as much for several of Sylla's Friends in Rome, and by Sound of Trumpet proclaim'd Liberty to as many Slaves as wou'd take up Arms in his Behalf; whereof they say there were but Three that answer'd his Expectation; wherefore after a weak Resistance, as Sylla was entering Rome at one Gate, he was forced to fly out at Another.

As soon as he was got out of Rome all Those who had accompanied him in his Flight separated and dispersed, and Night coming on, he got to a small House he had near Rome, call'd Salonium. Hence he sent his Son to some neighbouring Farms of his Father-in-Law Mutius, to provide Necessaries,

(1) If that had not been revoked Sulpitius could not have decreed the Command of the Army against Mithridates to Marius. There is a Fault in the Text, which ought to be corrected; τὰς πράξεις ἔλυσε. It ought to be read as in the Life of Sylla τὰς ἀπράξιας ἔλυσε.

whilst He himself went to Ostia, where a Friend of His, called Numerius, had prepared him a Ship, and without staying for his Son, he took with him Granius, his Wife's Son by a former Husband, and weighed Anchor.

As soon as young Marius was got upon his Grandfather's Estate, he made all the haste he could to provide himself with such Things as he wanted, and to pack them up; but the Day-light overtaking him, he had like to have been discover'd by the Enemy; for there came thither a Party of Horse upon a Supposition that Marius might be lurking thereabouts. Mutius's Bailiffe, who had the good Fortune to spy them at a great Distance, immediately hid the young Gentleman under a Cart-load of Beans; then putting to his Team, he drove up towards them, as if he was going with his Cart to Rome. This Stratagem sav'd young Marius, and convey'd him to his Wife, who supply'd him with some Necessaries; and as soon as it grew dark, he made to the Sea-side, where finding a Ship bound for Africk, and ready to sail, he immediately got aboard.

In the mean time Marius, the Father, with a favourable Gale coasted Italy, but was in no small apprehension of one Geminus, a leading Man at Terracina, and his sworn Enemy; and therefore directed the Sea-men to keep clear of that place: they were indeed willing to obey him, but the Wind shifting on a sudden, and blowing hard at Sea, they were afraid the Ship would not be able to weather the Storm, Marius too being indisposed and Sea-sick, they with great difficulty made Circaum.

The Storm now increasing, and their Victuals failing, they put to Shore, and wandered up and down, they knew not whither, as it usually happens with People in Distress; who always shun

the present Evil as the greatest, and relie upon the Hopes of uncertainties: The Land and Sea were both equally unsafe for Them; to whom it was dangerous to meet with People, and it was no less so to meet with none, by reason of the extream Want to which they were reduced.

Towards the Evening they met with some Cowherds, who had not wherewithal to relieve them; but knowing Marius, advised him to depart as soon as might be, for they had seen a little beyond that place a Party of Horse that were in search of him. This News threw him into the utmost Despair, especially when he saw that Those who attended him were ready to die for want of Sufenance, so that he was at his Wit's-Ends. In this Extremity he turn'd out of the high Road, and hid himself in a thick Wood, where he passed the Night very uncomfortably. The next Day, pinched with Hunger, and willing to make use of the little strength he had left, before it was all exhausted, he travelled by the Sea-side, encouraging his Companions not to desert him in the last of his hopes, for which he reserved himself, relying on the credit of some old Prophecies.

He told them that one Day when he was but very young, and whilst he lived in the Country, an Eagle's Airy with seven young Ones in it fell upon his Robe; that his Father and Mother being much surpriz'd at the Accident, consulted the Augurs upon it; that the Augurs answer'd, the Child wou'd become the First of Men, and that the Fates had decreed he should seven times be possessed of the Supream Power and Authority in his Country. Some are of Opinion that this really happen'd to Marius after the same manner we have related it; Others say, that Those who were then with him, and heard him relate it on that occasion, and often repeat it during his Exile, took it upon Trust, and committed it to writing, tho' it was no better than a Fable invented by him to keep up their Courage; for an Eagle never hatches more than two at a time; wherefore they give even Museus the Lie, for saying That the Eaglet lays three Eggs, hatches two, and nourishes but one. Whatever it be, it is certain that Marius in his Exile and greatest Extremities would often say, that he had still a prospect of a Seventh Consulship.

When Marius and his Company were now about twenty furlongs distant from Minturnæ, they espied a Troop of Horse making up toward them with all speed, and by chance also at the same time two Ships under sail; whereupon they ran every one with what speed and strength they could to the Sea, and plunging themselves into it, swam towards the Ships. Those that were with Granius seized upon one of them, and passed over to an opposite Island called Ænaria; Marius himself, whose Body was heavy and unwieldy, was with great pains and difficulty born above the Water by two Servants, and put into the other Ship. The Soldiers were by this time come to the Sea-side, and from thence commanded the Seamen to put to Shore, or else to throw out Marius, and then they might go whither they would. Marius besought them with tears to the contrary; and the Sailors, after some consultation, which inclined first to one side, then to the other, resolved at length to answer the Soldiers, that they would not throw out Marius. Upon This they went off in a great Rage, and as soon as they were gone, the very same Sailors on a sudden changing their resolution, came to Land, and casting Anchor at the Mouth of the River Liris, where it overflows, and makes a great Marish; they advised him to Land, refresh himself on Shore, and take some care of his discomposed Body, 'till the Weather became more favourable, which, say they, will

will happen at such an hour, when the Wind from the Sea will calm, and That from the Marshes rise. Marius following their advice, did so; and when the Sea-men had set him on Shore, he laid himself down in an adjacent Field, suspecting nothing less than what was to befall him. They, as soon as they had got into the Ship, weighed Anchor and departed, as thinking it neither honourable to deliver Marius into the Hands of Those that sought him, nor safe to protect him.

Being thus deserted by All, he lay a good while silently on the Shore: at length, recollecting himself, he travelled very disconsolately through By-ways, till wading through deep Bogs and Ditches, full of Water and Mud, he stumbled upon the Old-man's Cottage that looked after the Fens; and falling at his Feet, he besought him to assist and preserve a Man, who, if he escaped the present Danger, would make him Returns beyond his expectation. The poor Man, whether he had formerly known him, or was then moved with his venerable Aspect, told him, that if he wanted only Rest, his Cottage would be convenient; but if he were flying from any body's search, he would hide him in a more retired place. Marius desiring him to do so, he carried him into the Fens, and bad him hide himself in an hollow Cave by the River side; where he laid upon him a great many Reeds, and other things, that were light, and would cover, but not oppress him. But within a very small time he was disturbed with a noise and tumult from the Cottage; for Geminus had sent several Troops of Horse from Farracina in pursuit of him; One of which coming that way, frightened and threatened the poor Old-man for having entertained and concealed an Enemy of the Romans. Marius, who heard what they said, thinking himself no longer in Safety there, arose out of his lurking hole, hole, strip'd, and plunged into the Bog where the Water was most thick and muddy, and by this very means discovered himself to the Soldiers. They immediately halled him out naked, but all over dirty, and in that pickle carried him away to Minturnæ, and delivered him into the Hands of the Magistrates; for there had been a Proclamation through all those Towns, to make publick search for Marius, and if they found him to kill him; however, the Magistrates thought convenient to consider a little better of it first, and sent him under Guard (1) to the House of one Fannia.

This Woman was supposed not very well affected towards him, upon an old account. She had formerly been married to one Tinnius, from whom she was afterwards divorced, and demanded her Portion, which was very considerable: But her Husband, who had no mind to return her Fortune, accused her of Adultery; and so the Cause was brought before Marius, in his sixth Consulship. Upon a full Inquiry into the whole Matter, it appeared that Fannia had been guilty of Incontinence before Matrimony, and that it was not unknown to Tinnius, notwithstanding which he marry'd her, and had cohabited with her for a considerable time. Upon hearing both Parties, Marius condemned Both. He order'd the Man to return the Fortune, and laid a small Fine upon the Woman by way of Disgrace. Notwithstanding This, (2) Fannia did not now behave herself like a Woman that had been provok'd; for instead of resenting past Offences, as soon as She had Marius in her keeping, She took care of him ac-

according to her Ability, and did all She could to comfort and encourage him. Marius in return highly commended her Generosity, told her he did not despair, for he had met with a very favourable Omen, which he related to her, and which is as follows: When he was brought to Fannia's House, as soon as the door was open, an Ass came running out to drink at a Spring hard by; and looking very brisk and lively upon Marius, first stood before him, then brayed aloud, and pranced by him. (1) Upon which Marius making his Observation, said, That the Fates designed his Safety to be procured rather by Sea than Land, because the Ass neglected his dry Fodder, and turned from it to the Water. Having told Fannia this Story, he commanded the Chamber-door to be shut, and went to Rest.

Mean while the Governors and Senators of Minturnæ consulted together, and determined not to delay any longer, but immediately to kill Marius: and when none of their Citizens had Courage enough to do it, a certain Soldier, a Gaul, or Cimber (the Story is told of Both) undertook it, and with his Sword drawn went into the Room where they had lodged him: the Room itself was not very light, That part of it especially where he then lay was dark, from whence Marius's Eyes, they say, seemed to the Fellow to dart out flames at him, and a loud Voice to say, Fellow, darest thou kill C. Marius? The Ruffian in a terrible Fright dropt his Sword, and rush'd out into the Street uttering these Words only, I cannot kill Caius Marius. At which they were all at first astonished, afterwards they pitied him, and reversed their Sentence, and were even angry at themselves for making so unjust and ungrateful a Decree against One who had preserved Italy, and whom it was base not to assist to their utmost. Let him go, say they, where he please to Banishment, let him find his Fate somewhere else; we beg Pardon of the Gods for thrusting Marius distressed and naked out of our City.

When they had thus conferred among themselves, they crouded into his Chamber, remov'd him from thence, and conducted him towards the Sea-side. Now tho' they All strove who shou'd be the most officious, and every One lent his helping hand to forward him in his Flight, an Accident fell in their way which retarded them: In the Road leading from Minturne to the Sea-side, was a Grove (1) sacred to a Nymph, whom they called Marica. All the Inhabitants thereabouts had a singular Veneration for that Grove, and they take a particular Care not to suffer any thing to come back, or be removed out of it, that was once within it. To pass through it therefore was, they thought, impossible, and to go round about wou'd take up too much of their time. Whilst they were in this perplexity an old Man among them cryed out, (2) there was no Place so sacred, but be suffer'd to go out, that was once got within that holy Grove, which without doubt was intended as a Token of sympathizing with Circe in her Grief for Ulysses, who had forsaken her.

they might pass through it for Marius's preservation; and thereupon every one taking up some of the Baggage that they were carrying for his accommodation to the Ship, He first enter'd the Grove, all the rest immediately with the same readiness accompanying him. Upon his Arrival at the Sea-side, he found a Ship provided for him by one Belæus, and embark'd immediately. Some few Years after This he caus'd the whole Adventure to be represented in a large Piece of Painting, and hung it up in the Temple of this Marica.

The Wind serving for Ænaria, he had the good Fortune to make that Island, where meeting with Granius and his other Friends, he sailed with them to Africk. But their Water failing them in their Passage, they were forced to touch at Erycine in Sicily. A Roman Questor, who was appointed there to guard the Coast, had like to have seiz'd on Marius, and did actually kill Sixteen of his Retinue, who were got ashore to fetch Water. Whereupon Marius with all expedition loosing from thence, passed over to an Isle called Meninx, where he first heard the News of his Son's escape with Cethegus, and that they were gone to implore the assistance of Hiempsal King of Numidia.

With this News being somewhat comforted, he ventured to pass from that Isle to Carthage. Sextilius, a Roman, was then Pretor in Africk, One who had never received either Injury or Kindness from Marius, yet he hoped he would out of meer Pity lend him some help. But He was scarce got ashore with a small Retinue, when an Officer was sent to him, and meeting him, said, Sextilius the Pretor forbids thee, Marius, to set foot in Africk; if thou doest, he says, he must put the Decree of the Senate in execution, and treat thee as an Enemy to the Romans. When Marius heard this this he wanted Words to express his Grief and Resentment, and for a good while held his peace, looking sternly upon the Messenger, who asked him what he should say, or what Answer he should return to the Pretor? Marius answer'd him with a deep sigh; (1) Go tell him that thou hast seen the exil'd Marius sitting on the Ruins of Carthage: by which noble Answer he plac'd in a proper Light the Fortunes of that once celebrated City, and his Own, as terrible Examples of the Vicissitude of all human Affairs.

In the mean time, Hiempsal, King of Numidia, irresolute, and undetermin'd what part to act, treated young Marius and Those that were with him very honourably; but whenever they talk'd of departing, he still found out some pretence or other to detain them; and it was manifest he made these delays upon no good design. Whilst he was playing these Tricks with them, they ow'd their Safety to a natural, but at that time very seasonable Adventure. The young Marius was very handsome and well-made. His Distress first touch'd one of the King's Concubines with Pity for him, and that Pity was the Fore-runner of Love. She discover'd her Passion to him, but the Youth declin'd her Solicitations; 'till at last perceiving that there was no other way of escaping, and that there appeared more of Generosity than Wantonness in her Caresses, he receiv'd the Ten-

(1) What a Nobleness, Grandeur and Strength of Mind is there in this Answer! Nothing whatever cou'd serve more effectually to make an Impression on the Mind of Sextilius than this Image, which represents to him the Vicissitude of human Affairs in the Person of Marius, who had been Six times Consul; Marius, who had been called the third Founder of Rome; Marius, to whom the Romans in their Houses made their Libations as to the Gods the Saviours; and now Marius an abandon'd Fugitive reposing himself on the Ruins of a City; of what City? of Carthage, that once so powerful, so celebrated a City! a City that for many Years rival'd imperial Rome Herself.

ders of her Affection, and She furnish'd Him and his Friends with means for their Escape.

He found his Father in the Place where he had just landed; and after mutual Salutations, as they were consulting together upon the present Situation of their Affairs, they saw some Scorpions fighting, (1) which Marius took for an ill Omen, whereupon they immediately went on board a little Fisher-boat, and made toward Cercina, an Island not far distant from the Continent. They had scarce put off from Shore when they saw some Horse sent after them by the King, with all speed making toward that very place from which they were just retired; so that Marius thought that in all his Life he had never escaped a greater danger.

During these Occurrences in Africk, and whilst Sylla was engaged in the War against Mithridates's Lieutenants in Bœotia, (2) the Consuls Octavius and Cinna fell out, and had recourse to Arms. Octavius prevailing, drove Cinna out of Rome, as a Person of tyrannical Principles, and made Cornelius Merula Consul in his stead; but Cinna levying Forces in all the Other Parts of Italy, raised a formidable Army, and marched against them. As soon as Marius heard of this, he resolved with all expedition to put to Sea again, and having levied in Africk some Maurusian Horse, and a few Others that came to him out of Italy, (which all together were not above one thousand) he with this handful began his Voyage. Arriving at Te-

(1) Marius's Head was always full of Signs and Prognosticks Here he is shock'd at the Combat of two Scorpions, from which he draws sinister Interpretations, and, what is pleasant enough, the Event seems to justify his Fears and Conjectures.

(2) Cn. Octavius Nepos, and L. Cornelius Cinna were Consuls in the Year of Rome 666, eighty five Years before the Birth of Christ. Cinna was for recalling the Exiles, and Octavius was against it.

Amone, a Haven in Hetruria, and coming ashore, he made several of the Slaves free; many of the Country-men also, and Shepherds thereabouts, at the name of Marius came flocking to him to the Sea-side, among whom he made choice of as Many as he thought were fit for Service; and in a small time got together a competent Army, wherewith he filled forty Ships. When it came to be consider'd which Party he shou'd declare for, he reflected that (1) Octavius was an honest Man, and One that was for governing according to Law; and that on the contrary, Cinna was a Person suspected by Sylla, and at that time in open War against the Government. From this Consideration he concluded that Cinna was his Man, and for that Reason determin'd to join him with all his Forces. Accordingly he sent a Message to him, to let him know, that he submitted himself to Him, as Consul, in whatsoever he should command him. Cinna receiv'd him with open Arms; declar'd him Proconsul; sent him the Fasces and other Ensigns of Authority. But Marius declin'd them, alledging that those Marks of Grandeur did not suit with his present Distress: So that he continu'd to wear a poor ordinary Habit, and to let his Hair grow, as it had done from the first day of his Exile, walking slowly and heavily like a Man stricken in Years, being then above Seventy. All this was done to excite Compassion; tho' under this Mask of Submission and Humility, there still appear'd that Air of Fierceness which was so natural to him. The Nastiness of his Person and Garb added to his innate Roughness, and made him look like one more to be fear'd than pity'd; and it was very evident that his Mind was not so much dejected as exasperated, by the Change of his Condition. As soon as he had paid his Respect to Cinna, and harangu'd the Soldiers, he immediately prepared for War, and soon made a considerable alteration in the posture of Affairs. He first cut off all Provision from the Enemy's Ships, and plundering all the Traders, possessed himself of their Stores; then coasting along with his Fleet he seiz'd on all the Sea-port Towns; took Ostia itself by Treachery; pillaged the Town, slew a Multitude of the Inhabitants, and making a Bridge over the Tiber, he took from the Enemy all hopes of Supply from the Sea; then marching with his Army toward the City, he posted himself upon the Hill called Janiculum.

(1) In Marius's present Circumstances, Octavius, who was a good Man, was by no means for his Purpose; he had opposed the Revocation of the Exiles, and in That was become his declared Enemy. Whereas Cinna, who stood up for that Revocation, and, what was more, was well known to be opposite to Sylla, was much fitter for his Designs, and the Work he had in Hand; so that there was no room for Hesitation. Such are the unhappy Steps human Policy forces Men upon, when once they are engaged in unjustifiable Actions.

All this while the Publick Interest did not receive so much damage from Octavius's Unskilfulness in his management of Affairs, (1) as from his too strict observance of the Law; for when among other things he was advised to enfranchise the Slaves, that the Publick might have the Benefit of their Assistance in that Exigency, he answer'd, He wou'd not make Slaves free of that City, from which, in Maintenance of the Laws, he was driving away Marius.

But as soon as Cecilius Metellus, Son of Metellus Numidicus, who had the Command of the Ar-

(1) This Observation is full of good Sense. In times of Exigency a scrupulous adherence to Justice in all its Forms, may be prejudicial; in which Case we are not to sacrifice the Profitable to the Letter of the Law, but sacrifice the Letter of the Law to the publick Utility. Octavius's Answer was fine, but it was at that time unseasonable.

my in Africk against Jugurtha, and was supplanted by Marius, as is before observed, arriv'd at Rome, where he was esteemed a much better Officer than Octavius, the Soldiers deserting the Consul, came to Him, and desired Him to take the Command upon him and preserve the City; adding, that when they had got a brave experienced General at their Head, they shou'd have some Heart to fight, and did not doubt of conquering when they were led on by One who knew how to command them. But Metellus, highly offended at their Desertion, reprimanded them severely for it, and sent them back to their Consul; instead of which they persisted in their Mutiny, and revolted to the Enemy. At the same time Metellus himself withdrew, when he saw it was impossible to save the City.

As for Octavius, a parcel of Chaldeans, Fortune-tellers, and Fellows who pretended to interpret the Books of the Sibyls, persuaded Him to remain at Rome, where they assured him Things would soon take another Turn in his Favour. He was indeed a Man of good Sense and Understanding, and supported the Dignity of his Office with a becoming Majesty, without suffering himself in the least to be impos'd upon by Flatterers, but adhering inviolably to the Laws and Customs of his Country, as to a Rule from which the least Deviation would be dangerous. And yet he fell, I know not how, into some Weaknesses, which inclin'd him to place too great a Confidence in the Art of Divination, and (1) to spend more of his time among Prognosticators, Fortune-tellers, and other Impostors of the same Stamp, than with Men skill'd in Military Affairs, and the Administration of a Government. Before Marius enter'd Rome he sent some of his Body Guard, who seiz'd on Octavius, forced him from off the Tribunal, and kill'd him upon the Spot. (1) It is reported that a Scheme of his Nativity, cast by one of those Pretenders, was found upon him after he was slain. Now it is a thing very remarkable, that of two such famous Generals, (2) Marius should be often preserved by Confidence in Divinations, and Octavius ruined by the same means.

Whilst Affairs remained in this posture, the Senate assembled, and sent Ambassadors to Cinna and Marius, desiring them to come into the City peaceably, and spare the Citizens. Cinna as Consul received the Embassy sitting on his Tribunal, and returned a gracious Answer by the Messengers: Marius stood by and said nothing, but gave sufficient testimony by the sowness of his Countenance, and the sternness of his Looks, that he would in a short time fill the City with Massacres. As soon as the Messengers were dismiss'd they march'd on, and Cinna enter'd the City with a strong Guard. Marius stop'd short at the Gate, and said with a sort of Irony, dictated to him by his Indignation, That He was a banished Man, and was debarr'd by the Laws from entering; that therefore

(1) These Casters of Nativities are of a very antient Standing: Ignorance grafted upon the Desire implanted naturally in Man to search into Futurity, and to foreknow what is to happen to him, betrays him into an imaginary Superstitious Science, founded upon nothing solid, or rational.

(2) This Reflection is very judicious. Octavius and Marius were both equally addicted to Divination. Octavius was ruin'd by placing too much Confidence in her, for, relying upon the Hopes she gave him, he remain'd in Rome; and Marius ow'd his Safety to the like Confidence, which wou'd not suffer him to give himself up to Despair, and serv'd to keep his Followers in Heart. Thus we see Things, however frivolous and false in themselves, can by the Power of Persuasion produce very different Effects.

if they had any Occasion for his Service, they must repeal that Law which drove him into Exile. As if He was a religious Observer of the Laws, and Rome a City free, and independent.

To this End the People were summon'd to an Assembly in the Forum; but before three or four of the Tribes had given their Suffrages, he threw off the Mask, and without waiting for the Formality of a Repeal, enter'd the City, environed by his Guards chosen from among the Slaves that had flocked to him, and which he call'd his (1) Bardieans. These Villains at the least Word, or Sign given them by Marius, murder'd without Distinction all Those he had doom'd for the Slaughter; infomuch that when a Senator call'd Ancharius, One who had been Pretor, came up to Marius, and saluted him, and Marius did not return the Salute, or deign to look upon him; They without any more ado slew him before Marius's Face: and henceforth This was their token, immediately to kill all Those who met Marius in the Streets, and saluted him, and were not answered with the like

(1) I am at a loss to know how Marius came to give his Guards that Name. It appears by a Note in the Margin of Thuanus's Plutarch, that That great Man thought there was a fault in the Text, and that instead of Bardieans it ought to be Bardyetes, or Bardyates. For the Bardyetes were a most barbarous and savage Nation in Spain. This might very naturally induce Marius to call his Guards by that Name, on purpose to frighten the People, and make 'em tremble at the Fierceness of their Nature. There is a good deal of Reason for this Conjecture; however I will presume to offer Another. Plutarch tells us in the Sequel, that the greatest Grievance of the People was the abominable Licentiousness of those Guards, who made nothing of violating Women and Children. It may therefore not absurdly be conceiv'd that Marius on that Account call'd them not his Bardieans, but Bardeans, from the Greek Word Βαρδάν, which in the Ambracian Language, or Dialect, signifies to ravish Women. Βαρδάν, saith Hesych, τὸ βιάζεσθαι γυναῖκας. But after all, This may be refining too much upon the Matter. Instead of Βαρδάν why might not Plutarch have written Μαρτιαν the Marians, to signify the Life-Guard of Marius?

Courtesie :

The L I F E of

Courtesie: so that his very Friends cou'd never come near him without terrible Forebodings and mortal Agonies.

When they had now butchered a great number, Cinna grew more remis and cloy'd with Murders; but Marius's Rage was still keen, and unsatisfied, being determin'd to sacrifice every Roman that was any way suspected by him. All the Towns, all the Highways swarm'd with Assaffins, who like Blood-Hounds hunted and imprison'd the miserable Wretches that fled, or hid themselves. It was a melancholly Reflection to observe on that occasion, that the sacred Ties of Friendship and Hospitality cannot stand the Tryal in the Days of Adversity; for how few were there then that did not betray their Friends who had fled to them for shelter! We have therefore just Reason to admire and commend the Slaves of Cornutus for their Fidelity to their Master in that general Defection; They having conceal'd him in the most unfrequented part of the Horse, took up in the Streets the Body of One who had meen murder'd, carry'd it home, hung it by the Neck, put a Gold Ring on the Finger, shew'd it in that Condition to Marius's Butchers, who were sent to dispatch Cornutus, and then buried it with the same Pomp and Solemnity as if it had been their Master; by this Trick, which was perceiv'd by no body, they sav'd Cornutus, and convey'd him into Gaul.

Marcus Antonius the Orator, tho' He likewise fell into the Hands of a faithful Friend, was not so fortunate as Cornutus. His Friend was a Plebeian, and in low Circumstances, however being proud of having one of the greatest Men in Rome under his Roof, he was resolv'd to stretch his Purse, and make as much of him as he was able. Accordingly he sent his Servant to the next Tavern for some of the best Wine; when the Vintner perceiv'd ceiv'd the Fellow nicer than ordinary, tasting of several Sorts, and not satisfied but with the very best, he ask'd him what made Him so hard to please? He that used to take up with the common Draught, and now no Wine wou'd go down with him but the choicest and the dearest. The Servant without any Preamble told him in confidence as his trusty Friend and Acquaintance, that the Wine was for Marcus Antonius, who lay conceal'd in his Master's House. As soon as he was gone the Villain of a Vintner went Himself to Marius, who was then at Supper, and being brought into his Presence, told him, he could deliver Antonius into his Hands; as soon as he heard it, it is said he gave a great shout, and clapped his Hands for joy, and was for rising from the Table, and going to the Place Himself; but being detain'd by his Friends, he sent Annius and some Soldiers with him, and commanded him to bring Antonius's Head to him with all speed. Now when they came to the House, Annius stay'd at the Door, and the Soldiers went up Stairs into the Chamber; where, seeing Antonius, they endeavoured to shuffle off the Murther from one to another; for so great it seems were the Graces and Charms of his Oratory, that as soon as he began to speak and beg for his Life, None of them durst touch, or so much as look upon him; but hanging down their Heads, they All fell a weeping. When their stay seem'd something tedious, Annius followed after, saw Antonius discouraging, and the Soldiers astoished and quite softned by his Eloquence, for which he checked them severely, and with his own Hands cut off his Head.

Catulus Lutatius, who was Collegue with Marius, and his Partner in the Triumph over the Cimbri, when Marius had told Those that interceded for him and begged his life, that he must die, shut himself up in a room, and making a great fire, imothered smothered himself. When maimed and headless Carcasses were now frequently thrown about and trampled upon in the streets, People were not so much moved with Compassion at the sight, as struck into a kind of Horrour and Consternation. But the greatest Grievances of All were the Outrages committed by those infamous Wretches the Bar-dians, who after they had murder'd Those who had been their Masters in their own Houses, they proceeded to abuse their Children, and ravish their Wives; nor was there any Bounds to their Dissoluteness, Cruelty and Avarice; 'till at last Cinna and Sertorius having concerted Measures, surprized them one Night as they lay asleep in the Camp, and killed every Man of them.

In the interim, as by a certain turn of Fortune, there came News from all Parts, that Sylla having put an end to the War with Mitbridates, and taken possession of the Provinces, was returning into Italy with a great Army. This gave some small respite and intermission to these unspeakable Calamities, when they thought a War hung over their Heads; whereupon Marius was the seventh time chosen Consul. As he was coming out of his House on the Calends of January, which is the first day of the Year, to be installed according to custom, in his Office, Sextus Lucinus unhappily fell in his way, and was by his Order flung down the Tarpeian Rock. This untoward Beginning was look'd upon as a sure Sign and Presage of all the Calamities that were ready to fall upon their Party and the City. Marius himself, now worn out with Labour, and sinking under the burthen of his Cares, could no longer bear up his Spirits flagging under the apprehension of a New War, and fresh Encounters, which his own Experience represented to him wou'd be full of Care and Dangers. He considered that he had not now to do with Octavius, or Merula,

Merula, at the head of an undisciplin'd licentious Rabble; but that Sylla himself was approaching, the Same who had formerly banished Him, and by new Victories had been driving and confining Mithridates to the Banks of the Euxine. Being, as it were, devoured by such Thoughts as These, and calling to mind his Banishment, the tedious Wanderings and Dangers he underwent both by Sea and Land, he fell into great Troubles, nocturnal Frights, and broken Slumbers, every Moment fancying that he heard a Voice telling him, (1) That the Den, though of an absent Lion, is dreadful; above all things fearing to lie awake, he gave himself over to drinking and frotting a-nights, very unagreeable to his Age and Dignity, by all means provoking Sleep, as a diversion to his Thoughts. At length there came an Express from the Sea, giving him such an account of Affairs as overcharged him with fresh Cares and Frights; on the one Hand the Fear of the Future, and on the Other the Burden and Oppression of the Present, reduced him to such a State of Health, that the least Accident was capable of throwing him into that Distemper of which he died. He fell into a Plurisie, as Possidonius the Philosopher relates, who says, he went to him, and discoursed with him as he lay sick, about some Affairs relating to his Embassy at Rome. But (2) Caius Piso, another Historian, tells us, that Marius walking one Night after Supper with some of his Friends, entertain'd them with a Recital of all his Adventures; and after having observ'd to them the Inconstancy and

(1) By this Proverb Marius represented to himself, that tho' Sylla was absent, there was no Safety for Him in Rome, the Place of Sylla's Nativity.

(2) Vossius was of Opinion that the Historian here mention'd might be Caius Calpurnius Piso, who was Consul twenty Years after the Death of Marius. Cicero speaks of that Piso in his Brutus, but then, as Vossius observes, he speaks of him only as an Orator, and not as an Historian.

Vicissitude

The L I F E of

Vicissitude of Fortune, he concluded with saying it did not become a wise Man any longer to trust to so fluctuating a Deity; and that after he had embraced and taken his Leave of them, he went home, took to his Bed, lay sick seven days, and then died.

Some say he very much betrayed his Ambition, even in his Sickness, and fell into an extravagant Frenzy, fancying himself to be General in the War against Mitbridates, acting such Postures and Motions of his Body, as he used to do when he was engaged in Battel; with so strong and invincible a desire of being employed in that Service, had his Pride and Emulation possessed him. He, tho' he had now lived threescore and ten Years, and was the first Man that had ever been chosen seven times Consul, possessed of such a Palace, and Riches so immense, as were sufficient for many Kings, yet complained of his ill Fortune; that he must now die, before he had attained what he desired. Plato was of another Opinion, for when he saw Death approaching, he thank'd his good Genius and Fortune, First, that he was (1) born a Man, and not a Brute; Secondly, that he was born a Greek, and not a Barbarian; and in the Last place, that he happen'd to live in the days of Socrates. And so indeed they say Antipater of Tarsus, in like manner, at his Death, recollecting what Prosperity he had enjoyed, did not so much as omit his happy Voyage to Athens; thus accounting for every Favour of his indulgent Fortune with the greatest ac-

(1) This is a very merry sort of Thanksgiving, as if it was possible for a Man ever to be born a Brute. But This ought to be understood figuratively, and according to the Doctrine of the Pythagoreans. Plato thank'd God for that he was born with a Soul capable of Understanding, and not with the stupidity of a Brute; for there are Some so stupid, that they have more of the Brute than Man; and This is what Pythagoras meant when he taught that the Soul of Man might pass into the Bodies of Brutes.

knowledgments, and retaining it to the very last in his Memory, than which a wise Man hath not a more secure Treasure. But on the contrary, Persons foolish and ungrateful to God and Nature, lose the enjoyment of their present Prosperity, by fancying something better to come; whereas by Fortune we may be prevented of the One, but the Other can never be taken from us. Yet they despise what they have in present, as though it did not concern them, and do nothing but dream of future Uncertainties; and in This they have but what they deserve, for they greedily hunt after external Acquirements, before they have by Reason and Judgment prepar'd their Minds to receive and entertain them as they ought; and This is the Cause that they never can sufficiently gratify their craving Apperites, which are unbounded and unsatiabable.

Thus died Marius on the seventeenth Day of his Seventh Consulship, to the great Joy and Content of Rome; which thereby was in good hopes to be delivered from the Calamities of an insolent, bloody, and fatal Tyranny; but in a small time they found, they had only changed an old feeble Master for Another young and vigorous; so much Cruelty and Savageness did his Son Marius shew in murdering the Nobility. At first being esteemed resolute and daring in Action, he was named the Son of Mars, but afterwards his Actions betraying his contrary Disposition, he was called the Son of Venus. At last he was besieged by Sylla in Præneste, where he endeavoured by all means to save his Life, but in vain; for when the City was taken, there being no way of escape, he slew himself.

The Comparison of Pyrrhus with Marius.

HAVING thus drawn together what seem'd most remarkable in the Lives of Pyrrhus and Marius; it is now time to proceed to a Comparison, and shew wherein thy differ and agree, and the Advantages the One has over the Other.

The Difference with respect to their Birth is so infinitely great, that there does not appear the least room for any Comparison. How can a Man born of obscure indigent Parents, who were forced to get their Bread with the Sweat of their Brow, brought up in a little Country Village, with no better than a home-spun clownish Education; How can such a one, I say, be compared with a Prince like Pyrrhus, born on a Throne, and consequently a Son of Jupiter by a double Title; by his Character of King, for Kings are so call'd, and by his Birth, being descended from that God in a long Series of Royal Progenitors.

But this great and sensible Difference which Nature has rais'd between them, may be said to be effaced by Fortune, who has crown'd Marius with greater Honours, and a larger Share of Power, than She had ever granted to any Roman before him; and This makes not a little on the side of Marius. It is no strange thing for a Prince dignified with so many Titles to recover his Right, and add other Possessions to his hereditary Dominions; Kings seldom sink so low, but some time or other Means are found to restore them; the Title of King appears so holy and venerable in the Eye of the World, that their Calamities seem to challenge Pity and Assistance, especially from Those who are vested with the same Sacred Character. But for a Man issuing from the Dregs of the People, from Beginnings so weak and miserable, for such a Man to raise himself up to that Pitch of Grandeur, as to merit so many honourable Employments, and the Command of such invincible Armies, This indeed is wonderful. It cannot be but Fortune must discover in this Man some notable Qualities, some uncommon Talents, otherwise she would not have made him even to his dying day the Object either of her Favour, or Caprice.

Neither is it Fortune only that has set Marius upon a Level with Pyrrhus; Nature puts in for her Share in those Favours, as if she had a Mind to make him some Compensation for the Injury she had done him on account of his Birth.

Pyrrhus had all the Qualities both of Body and Mind, which are necessary in a great Commander, Such as Prudence, Temperance, Fortitude, and Vivacity. He was constant, patient, and laborious; of a Constitution fit to encounter with the greatest Fateigues; and with all This he had an Air of Majesty, but such an Air as was rather terrible than venerable.

Marius likewise was by Nature lively, frugal, laborious, constant, patient, indefatigable, and of such a Presence of Mind, as kept him as cool and undisturbed in the Heat of Action and Danger, as in times of Repose. He likewise had an Air of Majesty, but an Air still more austere and terrible.

Pyrrhus came behind no Prince whatever in Valour, Courage, and Intrepidity. To see him in Battel, one wou'd think we beheld in him the Vivacity, the Intrepidity, and that Heroick Valour of Alexander, which seemed not so much the Effect of the rapid Emotions of the Spirits, as a Transport, and divine Impulse. And no Person was superior to Marius in those very Qualities.

The Comparison of

They Both gave early Proofs of their Valour and Intrepidity. Pyrrhus, when he was but Sixteen Years old, signalized himself at the Battel of Ipsus, where so many Kings were engaged; and Marius, when he was much about the same Age, gave distinguishing Marks of his Valour at the Siege of Numantia, where he acquired a great Reputation.

It must be confessed that Marius never gave such a Handy-Blow as did Pyrrhus, when, wounded as he was in the Head, he cleft in two with one stroke of his Cymetar a Captain of the Mamertines, completely armed, and as remarkable for his Stature, as the Brightness of his Armour.

Neither did Marius ever perform any personal Action so signal as was That of Pyrrhus, when at the Siege of Eryx, in Sicily, he was the First that mounted the Wall, sustain'd Alone for a long time all the Efforts of the Barbarians, dispersed Some, cast Others down headlong, and killing the most obstinate outright, entrenched Himself as it were within a Rampart of the Dead. Such was Alexander on the Walls of the City of the Oxydracæ.

But it is neither from those manual Executions, nor those inconsiderate Transports, which subject Reason to Fortune, that we are to judge of a General. Those Exploits are fit only for common Soldiers, or Subalterns; and as Such, the first Action of Pyrrhus may be matched by the Combat of Marius, a fresh Soldier, in his first Campaign, wherein he kill'd his Enemy under the Walls of Numantia, in the Presence of his General. And what Instances of his Valour may we not reasonably imagine he gave in the Course of that Siege, to deserve this Commendation from Scipio, That it was likely He might one day supply his Place?

Being

Being Both born with an equal Passion for War, Peace was insupportable to them Both, tho' they lay in the Bosom of Prosperity, and when their Ambition ought to have been satisfied. But if it be a Fault in a King to be an Enemy to Peace, tho' it be the most desirable thing in the World, much more must it be so in a private Person. We cannot without Horror think upon the Man, who never satisfied, is for raising himself up to a still higher Pitch of Reputation and Glory upon the Ruins of his Country.

Pyrrhus had so great a Knowledge and Capacity in the Art of War, especially in the leading of Troops, and ranging them in order of Battel, that he did not think it sufficient to give a Testimony of it in all his Engagements, but left behind him Rules and Memoirs upon that Subject.

Marius was no ways inferior to him in that Article. In all the Battels wherein he was concerned, one may clearly discover his great Prudence and Capacity, whether in the Disposition of his Troops and Choice of the Ground, or in making his Advantage of every Thing, and weakning, or defeating That of the Enemy. What he did before the Battel with the Ambrones, to accustom his Soldiers by degrees to bear the Sight of the Enemy, is in itself a sufficient Proof of a great Captain. The Change he introduced in the Soldiers Javelins, is an Instance of his great Foresight and Penetration. And if he has left nothing behind him in Writing relating to the Art of War, he has however left a lasting Monument of his great Prudence and Capacity in his Works at the Mouth of the Rhone, which were designed for the Service of his Convoys.

There is another Circumstance which, in my Opinion, gives Marius the Advantage over Pyrrhus. In all the Wars, in all the Engagements wherein Marius had the Command, it does not appear that he ever made one false Step, much less any one like That of Pyrrhus before Lacedæmon. He found the City in a defenceless Condition, and yet instead of attacking it immediately, as he might have done with great Ease, he spent his time in encamping, and so gave the Citizens a whole Night to provide for their Defence. Nothing can be a stronger Instance than This, of what great Importance it is in War to make use of the present Opportunity, and not to delay till to-morrow what may be put in Execution this very Moment. An Opportunity once lost is not only irretrievable, or at least very difficult to be repaired, but is often attended with very fatal Consequences. One Night's Respite gave the Lacedæmonians time to fortify themselves, which did not only make Pyrrhus miscarry in his Enterprize, but open'd a door to all the Calamities that succeeded, as well on his March towards Argos, wherein he lost his Son, as in Argos itself, where he was unhappily lost Himself; all which might have been avoided, had he once made himself Master of Sparta.

As for their military Exploits, and the Actions wherein they were engaged, it will require the Knowledge of an experienced General to weigh them exactly, and determine which of them were the most difficult; which were attended with the greatest Dangers, and consequently which of them were the most glorious. This indeed may be said in general, that in all the Exploits of Pyrrhus nothing appears so great and illustrious as in That of Marius against the Ambrones, the Teutones, and the Cimbri. Never had Italy, nor Rome itself, been menaced with so imminent a Ruin before; when three hundred thousand Men did like an impetuous Torrent over-run the Country, nothing cou'd resist their Fury; formidable not only for their Numbers, and the amazing Strength of their Bodies, their Assurance, Fierceness, and Obstinacy; but still more so by the Success with which their Arms had been crowned in their first Undertakings. They had already defeated several Roman Armies, and Commanders of great Reputation, so that Rome had no Pilot left but Marius to conduct her through the frightful Tempest which then hung over her.

If we examine into the Conduct of Marius on this important Occasion, with what Constancy he supported the Insults and Bravado's of the Enemy when they dared him to the Combat, and the Murmurs of his own Soldiers, who were impatient to engage; in how prudent and cautious a manner he follow'd them when they decamped; the Orders he gave when an Accident had brought on an Engagement with the Ambrones, causing the Ligurians to charge First, and ordering the Romans to support them; the Prudence and Valour he exerted the Day following in the Battel with the Teutones, whose Overthrow was entirely owing to his singular Courage and Conduct: We must confess that in no Action whatever all the Qualities requisite to a great Commander can appear in a more perfect Light.

To This perhaps may be opposed the Victory obtain'd by Pyrrhus over the Romans, commanded by the Consul Lævinus; for to make a right Judgment of two Exploits, we must compare the Enemies, against which they were Both performed. Now the Army of the Romans overthrown by Pyrrhus, did not consist of an innumerable Swarm of Barbarians, conducted by a blind headstrong Fury, which often proves pernicious to itself; it was composed of Troops well train'd and disciplin'd; it was not a lifeless Lump, giving Ground at the first Shock, and when once broken unable to rally and recover itself; it was a firm Body, well compacted and united, where all the Parts concurred to the mutual Support of each other, and tho' broken and driven back seven times together, it as often returned to the Charge, and repelled the Enemy; so that the Romans were just upon the point of carrying the Day, when Pyrrhus, who had been thought dead, returning into the Field, restor'd the Fight, let his Elephants loose upon them, and having put them into Disorder, charged them so seasonably with the Flower of his Cavalry, that he entirely defeated them, and obtain'd the Victory; a Victory so much the more glorious for that it had been disputed with great Obstinacy, and the Romans Themselves confessed that it was entirely owing to his good Sense and excellent Conduct.

It may be said of Marius that he was never beaten, whereas Pyrrhus was twice defeated by those very Romans he had just before overthrown; the first time near Asculum, which was occasion'd by the ill Choice he had made of his Ground; and yet I know not whether That may be called a Fault in a General, which is as soon mended as committed. The very next day he had his Revenge, he defeated the Romans, and obtain'd a second Victory as glorious as the First. He was not able to give so good a Turn to his second Defeat near Beneventum, where he was totally routed by Manius Curius, and the Victory on the side of the Romans was so considerable, that it oblig'd him to quit Italy, and give over all those ambitious Designs that had carried him thither. However it may be said on this Occasion, that Fortune had a mind it shou'd appear that She sometimes knows how to triumph over Wisdom and Prudence. Nothing cou'd be better undertaken, or concerted, than than the Design of Pyrrhus, to go and attack One of the Consuls before the Other cou'd have time to join him. The unlucky Accidents that happen'd in the Night during his March, were the sole Cause of the fatal Blow he receiv'd on that Occasion.

But Marius had the Favour of Fortune attending him in all his Expeditions, as if she had made it a Point to have the Honour of that continued Success which he secured to himself by his great Skill and excellent Understanding.

After he had defeated the Ambrones and the Ten-tones, he marched to the Succour of his Collegue Lutatius Catulus, repaired the Fault He had committed in quitting the Passes of the Mountains, animated him by his Presence, passed the Po, defeated the Cimbri in a pitch'd Battel, and by this finishing Stroke provided for the Safety of Rome effectually.

But what still exalts the Victories of Marius above Those of Pyrrhus, is the Benefit that flowed from them. None of Pyrrhus's Conquests ever turned to the Advantage of his Country; if he gained Macedonia, he was oblig'd to share it with Another, and at last he entirely lost it. His most important Expeditions were undertaken for the Succour of the Tarentines, the driving the Cartaginians out of Sicily, or for re-establishing a deprived King in Sparta, and in all These he miscarried. On the contrary, Marius, by his Exploits, deliver'd Rome from the Terror of Jugurtha, the most formidable Enemy She ever had, next to Hannibal, and preserved all Italy from the Inundation of the Barbarians. It is indeed glorious in a Prince to relieve the Oppressed; but he owes much less to his Neighbours than his own Subjects, whose Safety and Prosperity ought to be his supreme Law. Pyrrhus was unable to restore the Affairs of Those he undertook to assist, and at the same time ruin'd his Own entirely.

If the Exploits of Marius had the Advantage over Those of Pyrrhus in the Ends obtained by them, they had it still more so by the Honours they procured him. All the Elogies, all the Reputation Pyrrhus acquired by his Atchievements, the pompous Inscription he caused to be put up in the Temple of Minerva, are not to be compared to the least of Those obtain'd by Marius.

Had Pyrrhus succeeded in all his Undertakings, what Honours cou'd have been render'd Him equal to the glorious Title given to Marius of the Third Founder of Rome? And yet even This is not the highest pitch of Glory to which he was advanced. That inward Sense of Gratitude which obliged the Romans when at home, among their Wives and Children, to associate him with their Gods in their domestick Repasts, and make their Libations to Him as well as Them, is without Contradiction the highest, and most desirable Honour that can be attained by Mortals.

But if, in order to pass a right Judgment upon Men's Actions, we are not to consider them either in Themselves, or in their Effects, or the Honours that have attended them, but in the Motives by which they have been produced, it is certain that neither the Exploits of Pyrrhus nor Those of Marius are worthy of much Commendation, being destitute of That which can give them the only true Merit; I mean, a just and honourable Motive, the very Life and Soul of all noble Actions. No Actions, no Exploits whatever, unless undertaken for the sake of Justice, and the Good of Mankind, are truly laudable. But This was what neither Pyrrhus nor Marius ever had in View. Neither the One nor the Other ever did any thing, but purely to gratify their private Ambition, and that insatiable insatiable Desire of Glory, that possessed them. Pyrrhus eagerly pursuing every shadow that flatter'd his Ambition, fed Hope with Hope, lost what he had by catching at what he had not, always in Motion, incapable of Rest, and when Fortune offer'd him at the same time two Fields for the performance of great Actions, he was more afflicted at the loss of the One than satisfied with the possession of the Other.

Marius's Ambition was altogether as excessive, and unwarrantable. By Birth poor, and of obscure Parentage, neither the immense Riches he had acquired, which might have been sufficient for Sovereign Princes, nor the Gain of so many Battels, nor two Triumphs, nor seven Consulats, which were more than any Man had obtained before him, nor in short those divine Honours which were paid to him in private, and were the more sincere, as they were remote from Ostentation, and consequently from Flattery, all These cou'd not satisfy him; he thought himself as naked as if he had obtained nothing of what he had desired. When he was seventy Years old he cou'd not bear with Patience to have another General named for the War against Mithridates; he was for wasting the Dregs of Life in Asia, and entering the Lists against the King's Lieutenants. His Mind was so possessed with this Thought, that in the Deliriums of his last Sickness That was uppermost, and he died raving in an imaginary Combat with Mithridates.

It might be said perhaps in his Justification, that having so lately, when he was sixty five years old, gain'd a signal Victory over the Confederates, and made it appear in the course of that War, that the weakness of his Body, of which he complain'd, had not impair'd his Understanding, or lessened the Vigour of his Mind, it ought not to appear

strange that he shou'd in so little a time after think himself still capable of serving his Country, and in a Condition to march against Mithridates, especially since at that Age he was able to undergo the Fatigues of the Campus Martius, and cou'd shew a Body agile, and proper for the Feats of Arms. How many Commanders have there been who served their Country profitably, and in an Age more advanced performed many gallant Actions! But This wou'd be a frivolous Excuse. For if Marius had had nothing else in View but to devote his Age to the Service of his Country, he ought to have waited 'till he had been named by the People, and not have enter'd into Cabals, much less used the destructive Offices of a bold seditious Tribune, and by clashing with Sylla, push Rome upon the brink of Ruin.

This unmeasurable Ambition, which was the Spring of all Marius's Actions, as well as Those of Pyrrhus, makes it clearly evident that the Moral Virtues belonged neither to the One, nor the Other. However it may be said that in This Marius came infinitely short of Pyrrhus. That Prince had several amiable Qualities; he was grateful, never forgetting any good Office that had been done him, but impatient 'till he had returned it; and when the unexpected Death of Those who had served him had taken out of his Power the means of acknowledgment, he looked on it as a loss never to be recovered. It is true, he is charged with Ingratitude, and Infidelity towards the Cities in Sicily, which had received him, and towards those two Officers Sostratus and Thonon, who had done him such signal Services, and it is a difficult point to justify him, for he used those Cities like a Tyrant. He put Thonon to death, and had done the same by Sostratus; if He, perceiving his Coldness towards him, had not secured himself by Flight.

But

But These Actions must be consider'd as flowing not so much from the Spirit of Ingratitude as an Excess of Ambition. The violent desire he had of conquering Africa had stifled in his Mind the Remembrance of all the Services he had receiv'd from those Cities, and those Friends; for in the Heart of an ambitious Person every Virtue is subordinate to that unbounded Ambition. This is the only Instance wherein Pyrrhus can be accused of Ingratitude; in all Others he made it appear, that he had a Mind truly grateful. But That which is most remarkable, and includes a profitable Admonition to all Princes and Governors, is, that this Ingratitude alone lost him Sicily, to drive him out of which the Sicilians confederated with the Carthaginians, with the very People against Whom they had called for his Assistance.

But we meet with nothing like This in Marius, who never gave any Instance of Gratitude; his Behaviour to his Patron Herennius, who in order to serve him refused to witness against him, as against his Client, and his Usage of Metellus the very next day after Metellus had laid for him the Foundation of his Fortune, by chusing him for his Lieutenant, are undeniable Testimonies of his Ingratitude.

Pyrrhus was gentle, and not easily provoked, Marius was passionate and inexorable. It is true, Pyrrhus murder'd Neoptolemus at a Feast in his own Palace, after he had associated him in the Kingdom; but in This he was only beforehand with Neoptolemus, who was in a Plot against him. Whereas Marius was always ready to destroy not only his Enemies, and Competitors, but the most Unknown, and even the most Innocent. Lutatius Catulus had been his Collegue in the Consulate, had commanded the Army, and triumphed with him; besides This he was a good Man, and had sacrificed his his own Honour to That of his Country. Marius never cou'd forgive him his good Fortune, in having contributed more than Himself to the Defeat of the Cimbri; he resolv'd he shou'd dye, and he must put an end to his own Life. His Behaviour in the case of Turpilius, who was accused of delivering up the City of Vacca to Jugurtha, is still more execrable; he was One of the Judges at his Tryal when he was condemn'd to die, and it appearing afterwards, when it was too late, that he was innocent, the other Judges were struck with Remorse for what they had done; Marius was the only Man who rejoiced at it, boasting of it as of a brave Action, and bragging every where that He was the Person, who had obliged the Consul Metellus to pronounce an unjust Decree, and had thereby fastned on his Conscience an avenging Fury that wou'd be every Moment tormenting him. Fool that he was! to think an avenging Fury haunted Metellus, who, as Consul, had done no more than pronounce a Decree, which had been carried against his Opinion; and not apprehend One more dreadful in his own Bosom, who had been the Author, and Promoter of that Decree.

Soon after This enormous Action he did Another of a contrary Nature, which can never be too much admired. Trebonius had killed his Nephew; and there was not a Man but believed that to kill the Nephew of such a General as Marius, a Person so passionate, so revengeful, and unjust, tho' done upon never so strong Provocations, was of all Crimes the most capital; and yet Marius did not only acquit Trebonius, but honour'd him with a Crown, which he presented him with his own Hands in Approbation of the Action. Happy had he been if he had thus sacrificed his own Life, not to his ambitious and self-interested Views, but to Wisdom and Virtue.

There

There is not to be found in the Life of Pyrrhus any Act of Justice so signal and exemplary, as was This in Marius; but we find in it many Instances of a strong regard for Virtue and Prudence, and it is no common piece of Merit in a Prince to distinguish and countenance Men of Virtue. The Esteem Pyrrhus expressed for Fabricius, the Distinction wherewith he always treated him, and the generous Offers he made him when he invited him into his Service, plainly show how much he was taken with Virtue, Magnanimity, and Wisdom, Qualities in no esteem with Marius.

If we wou'd inquire into the Cause of this difference between them in that respect, it is very obvious, it was their Education. Pyrrhus had been well trained in his Youth, he had been at Athens; and it is not doubted but Philosophy, which, generally speaking, had open'd the Eyes of Mankind, had in some degree enlightned Him. Of This his Conversation at Table with Cyneas, and Fabricius, is a sufficient Proof; whereas Marius passed the Stage of Life which is most proper for Education, and Instruction, in a rustick Obscurity, without any sort of Breeding, which implanted in him such an utter Aversion to the Greek Language that he cou'd never be brought to endure it. Now it is a certain Rule that an Aversion to the Muses never passeth with Impunity. He was like a rank Soil, which for want of Culture produces more unwholsome Herbs than Useful. That Rusticity, that Fierceness, that Ignorance of what was good and beneficial, which stuck to him through the whole Course of his Life, were the effects of that unhappy Aversion. This was the Source of that unbounded Licentiousness in Authority, that low and timorous Spirit in the popular Assemblies, where he always sacrificed Virtue to Fortune, on purpose to make his Court to Those who cou'd

either advance, or debase him, and all those other Vices, which made him unhappy even in the highest pitch of his Elevation.

Imposture was his favourite Quality. In This he made the greatest share of Virtue and Ability to consist; nay, he prophaned even the Sanctuary of Justice with it; what he did in full Senate on purpose to entrap Metellus was an Action of so vile a Nature as wou'd suffice to blacken the Character of a Man wise in all other respects, if Wisdom is any where to be found without Justice.

It is true Pyrrhus was not entirely clear of this Vice. He may justly be reproached with what he said to the Spartan Ambassadors, when upon his entring at the Head of his Army into Peloponnesus he assured them that he was only come to set those Cities free that had been seized by Antigonus, and that he had a Design to send his younger Children to Lacedæmon for the benefit of their Education. So downright a Lie as This admits of no manner of Excuse. Plato was in the right when he said that a Prince, or General, might be allowed to lie to their Enemies, but to Enemies so declared. He is not to be understood but of such Lies, as War authoriseth. He tells us likewise that a Man may lie and impose upon his Fellow-Citizens, but it must be in such a manner as a Physician imposeth upon his Patient.

Of all the wicked Actions charged upon Marius the most criminal and abominable was That of going into Asia on purpose to excite the Kings against Rome, and draw new Wars upon her, to the end she might in that pressing Danger be obliged once more to chuse Him for her General. All other Crimes are included in This alone. What an unhappy Thirst of Glory, what a Madness is it for a Man to sacrifice his Country to his Ambition!

It is not therefore to be wonder'd at if a Man so passionate, so fierce, so totally possess'd with a desire of Rule, shou'd plunge himself in the close of Life into all sorts of Cruelty and Injustice. Men of his outrageous Temper, when once they have broke thorough the Bounds and Obligations of Justice, grow too headstrong for any other Ties; the greatest excess of Iniquity becomes necessary, for they cannot assure to themselves Impunity for their first Transgressions without the help of the Latter. To This was owing that Deluge of Blood, with which Rome was overflowed towards the end of Marius his Life; And of what Blood! the chief of the Senate, Persons of the greatest Worth fell Victims to his unbounded Fury; the Swords of the Cimbri wou'd not have been so cruel.

We find nothing like This in the Life of Pyrrhus: if, notwithstanding his personal Courage, he was inferior to Marius in warlike Exploits, he was infinitely superior to him in every thing relating to civil Life. In other Respects the Conformity between them is very great, with this difference that One begun, and the Other ended his Life in Misery.

Pyrrhus was in a manner born a Fugitive, carry'd for Refuge to the Court of a foreign Prince, where his Enemies demanded him to be deliver'd up to Destruction. Marius met with this Reverse in his later Days, after his sixth Consulate.

Twelve Years after Pyrrhus was restored to the Throne of his Ancestors, and five Years after That he lost it again through his own Folly, going out of his Dominions upon a frivolous Occasion. Marius, tho' not so well educated as Pyrrhus, wou'd never have committed an Error so contrary to good Policy.

It may be said that all Men are fond of Dreams and Omens, that is in a word, of Divination. It is a Weakness rooted in Nature, which is ever inquisitive, and desirous to look into Futurity. But this Fondness appears more conspicuous in Persons of the first Rank, who act in the highest Spheres, either because they are really touched with this Infatuation as well as Others, or pretend to it out of Policy for the better carrying on of their Designs. Pyrrhus found himself much encouraged by a Dream, wherein he fancied Alexander appeared to him, and promised him his Assistance. At another time he dreamt he was darting Thunderbolts upon Lacedæmon, and verily thought he shou'd take it the next day by Assault. But this Dream contain'd a quite different Interpretation, as appeared by the Event. On the other hand, he was alarmed at the Omen before Argos, when the Heads of the Oxen that had been sacrificed, and which lay on the Ground, thrust out their Tongues, and licked up their own Blood. And in the City of Argos he no sooner beheld the brazen Wolf and Bull encountering each other, but recalling to mind an antient Oracle, which threatned him with approaching Death whenever he saw those two Animals engaged in Fight, he thought of retiring, and dropping his Enterprize.

Marius was touch'd with the same Credulity. He carried up and down with him a Syrian Prophetess, for whom he exprest the highest Esteem and Veneration. The two Vulturs that appeared to the Army every time he was to obtain some important Victory, flatter'd him agreeably. To comfort him in the greatest of his Misfortunes he remember'd the Explication the Diviners had given to a Prodigy which had happen'd to him in his Childhood, when an Eagle let fall into his Robe an Airy, wherein were seven young ones; and on the Coast of Africa the sight of two Scorpions fighting seem'd to foretell him that the Way he was in wou'd prove dangerous. For this Reason he quitted it, and got very seasonably on board a Fisherman. It was not therefore without reason said that Marius his Confidence in Divination had preserved him. Pyrrhus, who reposed the like Confidence in it, had been saved too, if he had had time to withdraw, as he intended, upon sight of the Brazen Wolf, and Bull. But those Signs were too decisive, and cou'd not be eluded, for as he said Himself on another Occasion Destiny is unavoidable.

That terrible Air which Nature had imprinted in both their Countenances was most discernable in Both on almost the same Occasions, but with very different Effects. The Gaul sent to kill Marius as he lay in his Chamber at Minturne saw as it were Lightning sparkling from his Eyes, whereupon he flung away his Sword, and fled.

Pyrrhus recovering out of the Swoon occasion'd by a Wound which he receiv'd from the Fall of a Tile flung upon him, with one Look so terrified the Soldier, who that Moment had rais'd his Sword in order to cut off his Head, that he cou'd not take a right aim, so that it was with much Terror and Difficulty he executed his purpose.

Their End was very different. Pyrrhus fell unhappily in a Fight in the middle of the City of Argos, wounded by a Woman, and killed outright by a Soldier, who cut off his Head. But Marius, notwithstanding all the Cruelties he had exercised, still thirsting after Blood, died in his Bed. But this Death, which appear'd compos'd and natural, was in reality more tragical than That of Pyrrhus; for he passed the last days of his Life under such Anxieties and Terrors, that he cou'd enjoy no Rest either by Day or Night. He died equally tormented with the Remembrance of the Past, the Sense of the Present, and the Fear of the Future.

The Comparifon, &c.

That avenging Fury, which he wou'd have delivered over to Metellus, began to punish Him in this Life, and call him to a fevere Account for all the Blood he had spilt. So true is what Plato faith, that the Impious and Wicked at the Approach of Death begin to fear every thing, of which they had made a Mock before: Then does Dread and Distrust feize them, Remorse torments them, and their only Companion, whether afleep or awake, is Defpair. Whereas that Person who can reproach himfelf for nothing, and who has fpend his Life in Innocency, is always full of comfortable Hope, which Pindar calls the tender Nurse of old Men. They, faith he, who have walked in the Ways of Purity and Juftice, are always poffeffed with that comfortable Hope, which rejoiceth the Heart, that comfortable Hope which is the tender Nurse of Age, and more efppecially governs the fickle Mind of Mortals. For it is an incontestable Truth that a happy old Age is a Crown of Glory, and is no where to be found but in the Paths of Juftice.

IN a Treasury of the Acanthii at Delphi, this is one of the Inscriptions, BRASIDAS AND THE ACANTHII TOOK THIS FROM THE ATHENIANS. From hence Many are of Opinion, that the Marble Statue within the Temple Door (1) was design'd for Brasidas; but 'tis rather Lysander's, whom it represents exactly (2) with his Hair in its full growth, and

(1) This Opinion is founded upon the Inscription just before mentioned. This Brasidas, General of the Lacedaemonians, persuaded the Acanthians to revolt from Athens, and receive the Spartans into their City, of which we have a full Account in the 4th Book of Thucydides. Brasidas, in Conjunction with the Citizens of Acanthus, consecrated to Apollo an Offering consisting of the Spoils of the Athenians, and in the Chapel where this Offering was deposited at Delphi was a Marble Statue, which very probably was the Statue of Brasidas, tho' Plutarch contradicts that Tradition.

(2) I must confess I cannot comprehend the Weight of this Reason, and a long comely Beard, Both after the old Lacedæmonian Fashion. The account of this Custom is not to be placed so low, as some People would have it; (1) it not being true, that the Argives shav'd themselves for Grief, after a great Overthrow; and that the Spartans, on the contrary, flush'd with Victory, let their Hair grow beyond its usual length; neither can we allow, that because the (2) Bacchiadæ, when they fled from Corinth to Lacedæmon, seem'd mean and despicable, upon account of their being shav'd, the Lacedæmonians for that reason began to esteem long Hair. For this Custom may be trac'd very easily from Lycurgus, who us'd to say, That long Hair made handsome Men appear more beautiful to the Eye, and the Unhandsome more terrible.

Reason, for long Hair might as well suit Brasidas as Lysander, since they Both lived at the same time, for Lysander was made General of the Lacedæmonians thirteen or fourteen Years after the Death of Brasidas; and sure the Fashion cou'd not change in so short a time.

(1) This is particularly levell'd at Herodotus, who in his first Book gives us a full Account of this Matter, and saith in plain terms, that the Argives in token of their Sorrow for the Victory the Lacedæmonians had got over them, and which secured to them the Possession of the Territories of Thurium, caus'd their Heads to be shaved; whereas 'till then they had worn their Hair very long, and pass'd a Law with an Imprecation tack'd to it, that they wou'd not suffer their Hair to grow, nor their Wives to wear either Gold or Silver, 'till they had recover'd Thurium. And that on the contrary the Lacedæmoni-

ans decreed that for the future they shou'd wear their Hair long, tho' till then they had never worn Any. Plutarch fully contradicts this Relation by the Institution of Lycurgus, and it is something extraordinary that Herodotus shou'd be thus misled by a Fable relating to a Particularity, which happen'd so near the Times wherein He lived.

(2) Herodotus tells us in his fifth Book, that the Oligarchy prevail'd at Corinth, and that the Government was in the Hands of the Bacchiadæ, who in order to keep it among themselves never married out of their own Family. These Bacchiadæ, who were so called from Bacchis, the Son of Prumnis, who made himself Master of Corinth, and govern'd there for five Generations; or, as Strabo writes, for the Space of two hundred Years. Cypselus, a Son of a Woman of that Family, dispossest'd them, and made Himself Tyrant.

'Tis

'Tis generally agreed, that Aristoclitus, Lysander's Father, though he was not immediately descended from Royal Ancestors, was, however, some way related to the Family of the Heraclidae. As for Lysander, he was bred up under much hardship, and behav'd himself all along with a due respect to the Discipline and Manners of his Country. He was Brave, and above all sorts of Pleasure, That alone excepted which arose from a Sense of Honour, and the Applause that attends just and generous Actions; and to indulge this Pleasure was very excusable at Sparta, where their Youth was fir'd with an early desire of Glory, taught to be dejected under Disgrace, and rais'd by Commendation. And He that was insensible of These, was look'd upon as one of a mean Spirit, and uncapable of aspiring to any thing that's Great or Manly. That Emulation then and thirst after Fame, which appear'd in the whole course of Lysander's Life, we have no reason to blame Him for; it came from his Country and Education: But another Fault he had which was purely his own; He paid too servile a deference, and more than became a Spartan, to Great Men; and where his Interest was concern'd, bore the Frowns of Men in Authority something too patiently. (1) Which, however, by Some is reckon'd no small part of Policy.

(2) Aristotle, where he observes that great Wits are generally enclin'd to Melancholy (instancing in

(1) It cannot be denied that an easy pliant Temper is highly necessary in a Statesman; but it is a great Mistake in Those who consider it as the most essential Part in his Character. For if he is not Master of Other much more useful Qualities, That alone will prove of a dangerous Tendency, and do more Mischief than a positive Obstinacy.

(2) The Passage alluded to here by Plutarch is in the 30th Section of his Problems, where Aristotle seems to contradict the Opinion of Those who wou'd make Lysander pass for a Man of an easy pliant Temper, because Persons in Socrates, Plato, and Hercules) says too, that Lysander, though not in his Youth, was in his declining Age subject to it. But That which peculiarly distinguish'd his Character, was the way he had of making Poverty sit well upon him, and of keeping his Mind steady and untainted under the greatest affluence. For he reserv'd nothing for Himself out of all those Spoils of Gold and Silver that he brought from the Attick War, but liberally dispers'd them among his Country-men, who upon this increase of Riches began to value them as much as they despis'd them before. Another Instance of his generous Disposition was This: when Dionysius the Tyrant wou'd have presented his Daughters with some Garments of a rich Embroidery, he refused them, with that handsome Excuse, That they were fit only to make unhappy Faces more remarkable: But this Temper wore off by degrees; for being sent Ambassador some time after to the same Tyrant, who offer'd him two Vets, and desired him to make choice of That he liked best for his Daughter, he reply'd, My Daughter knows better how to chuse than I do; and so modestly took them Both.

After a long continuance of the Peloponnesian War, when the Athenians had receiv'd a great Blow in Sicily, and were under fearful Apprehensions of a total Overthrow both by Sea and Land, Alcibiades being recall'd from Banishment, managed the War with such Success, that he quickly changed the whole Scene of Affairs, and after some Engagements, made the Athenians equal in Naval inclin'd to Melancholy are not of it was for the Interest of his so complaisant a Humour. But Ambition. Besides, Lysander, as This does not hold throughout, Aristotle has very well observed, for Lysander, tho' naturally of a did not fall into that Disposition sullen melancholy Cast, might of Mind 'till he was advanced in sometimes brighten up, and dispel Years, and then indeed it was no that dark unfociable Gloom, when Wonder.

Power

Power to the Lacedæmonians, who now began to be sensible of their dangerous Condition, and were resolved to exert themselves more vigorously. They knew this Design requir'd greater Preparations, and a bold Commander. After the strictest enquiry, they found None of more ability for this Service than Lysander.

In discharge of this new Office he went to Ephesus, and found that City particularly well inclin'd to him, and withal wholly in the Interest of the Lacedæmonians, though at that time in a very uncomfortable Situation; for it was in danger of being over-run with the barbarous Customs of the Persians, by reason of their frequent Commerce with them, being situated opportunely enough to invite the great Officers of that Kingdom often to reside there. This kind reception he met with from the Ephesians, engag'd him to pitch his Tents among 'em. He commanded all Victuallers to be brought into their Harbour, and built a Dock for his capital Ships; and by this means their Ports were frequented by Merchants, their Exchange was full of business, and their Shops had a plentiful Trade; so that this City is so far obliged to Lysander, (1) that it ought to date from that time the hope and rise of the greatness and splendor with which it now flourishes. But hearing that Cyrus was now at Sardis, he went thither chiefly to acquaint him with the Treachery of Tissaphernes, who though he had a Commission to assist the Lacedæmonians against the Athenians, upon some solicitation from Alcibiades (as it was suspected) acted remissly, and by neglecting to pay his Soldiers, had occasion'd the ruin of his Fleet. Cyrus was easily persuaded to believe the truth of this Accusation, for he had before heard an ill Character of Tissaphernes, and was Himself particularly disoblig'd by him. Lysander, by these means, and the opportunities he had of being familiar with the young Prince, entirely gain'd his Affections, and by affable Conversation, and due Respect, engag'd him strongly on his side. Cyrus, to shew how great a kindness he had for Lysander, after he had splendidly entertain'd him, desir'd him to deal freely, and assur'd him, whatsoever he ask'd should be granted. Lysander was so modest as only to ask a small addition to the Sea-men's Pay. Cyrus was taken with this generous Answer, and made him a Present of ten thousand Pieces of Silver. Lysander manag'd this to the best advantage, and out of his own Stock liberally encreas'd their Wages; by this Encouragement to his Soldiers, in a short time he quite wast'd the Enemy's Fleet, for many of the common Soldiers were glad to go over to that Party where the most Money was stirring; and those few that staid behind behav'd themselves with a great deal of Indifferency to their Officers, and often mutiny'd. Though he had thus drain'd and weaken'd his Adversaries, he durst not engage 'em, because Alcibiades, who was their Admiral, had the advantage of him in the number of Ships, and had been better experienc'd, and hitherto more successful in whatever Enterprize he undertook either by Sea or Land.

Alcibiades having occasion to go from Samos to Phoea, left Antiochus his Vice-Admiral, who to upbraid and provoke Lysander, sail'd to the very Mouth of the Harbour at Ephesus, and impudently pass'd by him with a great deal of noise and scorn. Lysander, who was too high-spirited not to resent this open Affront, with two or three Ships immediately pursu'd him; but when he saw

fresh Supplies come to the relief of Antiochus, he call'd up more to his assistance, and in a little time the whole Fleet was engaged. Lysander soon got the better, took fifteen of their Ships, and set up a Trophy. The People of Athens were highly displeas'd at Alcibiades, and turn'd him out of their Service, who being now disrespected and slightly spoken of by the Soldiers in Samos, left the Army, and withdrew into the Thracian Chersonese. This Fight was no farther considerable than as Alcibiades's Misfortune made it so.

Lysander, while he had a little respite, sent a choice number of bold and prudent Men to Ephesus, with Instructions to form themselves into Companies, and apply themselves to Policy and Business, upon promise, that as soon as the Athenian Government was broken, their Democracy shou'd be dissolv'd, and They made Governours in their respective Cities; by this Contrivance he secretly made way for the Decemviri, and all other Innovations which afterwards succeeded in that Commonwealth: For he kept his word with his Friends, and Those who had been of Service to him, whom he promoted to the highest Honours and Preferences, by which he did in a manner (1) make Himself an Accomplice with them in all their Injustice and Oppression. So every body endeavour'd to ingratiate himself with Lysander; to Him only People made their Court and Application, and promis'd themselves all that was Great or Honourable, while the chief Power of the Republick was lodg'd in Him. Wherefore as soon as he left 'em they were very uneasy under his Successor Callicratidas, whose Actions indeed shew'd him to be Great and Just; yet the People were all along discontented with his Conduct, which favour'd too much of (1) Dorick plainness, as they call'd it, that is, true Honesty and Sincerity. 'Tis true, they admir'd his Virtue as Men do (2) the Beauty of some Hero's Statue, but their Desires all this while were bent upon Lysander, the loss of whose Favour and Benevolence they were so sensible of, that some of 'em express'd their Concern with Tears. Nay, he drew off their Affections yet more from Callicratidas, for he sent back to Cyrus the residue of that Money he had receiv'd from him for the Soldiers Pay, and scornfully said, Let us see now how you, Callicratidas, can support the Charges of the Army. I have resign'd that Fleet to you which commands the whole Ocean. This empty and affected Vanity, Callicratidas thus handsomely reprov'd. If it be so, steer with that Fleet which commands the whole Ocean, to the left, and passing by the Athenian Navy at Samos, meet Me at Miletus, and there resign your Command. For if it be that victorious Fleet You represent it, You have nothing to fear from the Enemy in your Passage. No, says Lysander, I have done with it now, 'tis wholly under your Conduct; so he sail'd off for Peloponnesus.

(1) Plutarch in this Place compares Callicratidas's Government to the Dorick Musick, which was Masculine, having nothing soft and effeminate on the one hand nor forced and vehement on the Other. For this Reason Socrates prefer'd it to all other Musick, and saith in his Laches, that That alone deserv'd the Name of Greek Harmony. And Aristotle in the last Chapter of his Politicks, tells us, that all the World allow'd the Dorick Tone to be compos'd and manly, and that it was a Mean between all other Compositions, and was for that reason the fittest to be learn'd by Children. So that Plutarch had good Reason to compare Callicratidas's Government to the Dorick Harmony, intimating thereby that it was sedate and full of Dignity, without being too remiss on the one hand, or too stiff on the Other.

(2) For this Sort of Admiration which fills the Mind, excites nothing in the Heart, which is unmov'd either by Affection, or Desire. The Art is admired, and that is all.

Callicratidas

Callicratidas was left in great perplexity, for he had brought no Money from home with him, neither cou'd he raise Any; for the People had been too much oppress'd already, to endure another Tax. The only refuge he had was to beg Supplies, as Lysander had done, from some foreign Prince. And he was the most unqualified of any Man for this employ, for he was of so Noble and Generous a Spirit, that he cou'd sooner brook Slavery under a Grecian Enemy, than bring himself to flatter and carefs a Barbarian, who had nothing to value himself upon but his Gold. However Necessity forc'd him to Lydia, and when he came to Cyrus's Palace, he bid one of the Attendants tell him, Callicraditas the Grecian Admiral was come to wait upon him. The Servant reply'd, The King is not at leisure now, he's drinking. Well, says Callicratidas, I'll stay 'till he has done. (1) The Lydians upon this Answer took him for some ill-bred Clown. So when he saw himself laugh'd at, and slighted by the Barbarians, he withdrew a-while, but upon his return not gaining admission, he resentedit so highly, that he went immediately to Ephesus, reflecting with indignation (2) upon those mean Wretches that first cring'd to Barbarians, and encourag'd 'em to be proud, only because they were rich; he farther protested to some of his Friends, that as soon as he arriv'd at Sparta, he wou'd make it or their Gold, which is the real Cause of the Pride of such wealthy Barbarians, it is the Meanness of spirit of Those who stoop and cringe to them for the sake of that Silver and that Gold. If such Purse-proud Fools were but left to Themselves, and were despised as they deserve, their Pride, like the Snuff of a Candle, wou'd soon go out for want of Nourishment.

(2) It is neither their Silver,

his business to reconcile the differences among the Greeks, and unite 'em against the Barbarians, or at least persuade 'em so far, as never to accept Assistance from their hands against one another. These resolutions indeed were worthy of Callicratidas, whose Virtue and Bravery were not inferiour to the greatest of the Grecians, but he was unhappily taken off, after he had lost the Victory at Arginusa, before he cou'd put 'em in execution.

The prospect of Affairs looking now very dimly, the Confederates sent an Ambassy to Sparta to desire that Lysander might be chosen Admiral, expressing very earnestly the great confidence they had of Success under his Conduct. Cyrus too dispatch'd Letters thither to the same effect. Now there was a Law among the Lacedaemonians that oblig'd 'em never to confer that Command twice upon the same Person, yet they were desirous to gratifie their Allies; (1) so they gave one Acacus the Title, but Him the Power. This News was receiv'd with great satisfaction by the most forward and leading Men in the several Cities: For he had long since rais'd their expectations, and given 'em hopes, that the Democracy shou'd soon be put down, and the whole Government devolve upon Them.

Whoever takes an impartial view of these two Generals, will find in Callicratidas an open and sincere Carriage, in Lysander Craft and Cunning, for he ow'd most of his success in War to some underhand trick, and never scrupled to prefer Interest to Honesty; he thought Nature had fix'd no difference between Truth and Falshood, and so made Advantage the measure of both. When he was told,

(1) This was a fine way of evading the Law, and might seem strange, at least in the Lacedaemonians; but They also cou'd temperise, and were glad to find their Ambition gratified at once with the Friendship of Cyrus, and Condescension of their Allies.

It was below the character of one descended from Hercules, to rely upon Stratagems in War, he turn'd it off with a Jest, and said, When the Lion's strength fails, we must take in the Fox's subtilty. He gave a remarkable instance of his disposition this way at Miletus. For when his Friends whom he had promis'd to help in subverting the present Government, had chang'd their Opinions, and sided with the contrary Party, he pretended openly to be much pleas'd with their proceedings, and to desire a reconciliation, but secretly thus contrived their ruin. First he provok'd 'em to set upon the Multitude, and as soon as they had rais'd a tumult he Himself came up to the Head of 'em, and in the Ears of the common People gave 'em a severe reprimand, but privately fomented the disturbance, and assur'd 'em of his assistance. This treacherous management of his encourag'd the Rebels to stay in the City, where they were all kill'd just as he had design'd. Androclides takes notice that this deceitful temper ran thorough the whole course of his Life; and it is said it was a Maxim of His, that Children were to be cheated with Cockals, and Men with Perjury. In which he follow'd the Example of Polycrates of Samos; (1) though it is inexcusable in a General to imitate a Tyrant, and very disagreeable to the Character of a Spartan to use his Gods more contemptibly than he does his Enemies; (2) for He that over-reaches his

Adver-

(1) Here is much Matter included in a few Words. The Character of a Tyrant is as much opposite to That of a General as to That of a King. A General sacrifices his own Interest, Ease, and even Life it self for the Good of his Soldiers, whereas a Tyrant on the contrary sacrifices the Interests, Tranquility, and Lives of his Subjects to his Own. So that there can be a greater Difference in nothing.

(2) This is an undeniable Truth, and ought to be engraven in the Heart of every Man. To deceive by a false Oath is to stand in Fear of Men, and despise God. For God is the Band of the Oath, and a faithful observance of it arises

Adversary by a false Oath, declares he fears Him, and despises the Gods.

Cyrus having sent for Lysander to Sardis furnish'd him with a round Sum of Money upon the Spot, and promis'd him a great deal more, assuring him that if his Father shou'd refuse to advance any he wou'd plentifully supply him out of his own Fortune, rather than he shou'd want, and when every thing else fail'd, he wou'd melt down the Throne, on which he sate to execute Justice, and which was all of massy Gold, and Silver. And before he left Sardis to attend his Father in Media, he assign'd him all the Customs and Revenues of the Cities, entrusted him with the Government of the Provinces, and taking him in his Arms conjur'd him not to engage with the Athenians 'till his return, promising to bring with him a powerful Fleet out of Phœnicia, and Cilicia.

When the Prince was gone, Lysander thought he had too few Ships to encounter the Enemy with, and too many to lie still; so he cruis'd about some neighbouring Islands, and surpriz'd Ægina, and Salamis, from whence he steer'd his course to Attica, where he waited upon Agis, who was come down from Decelea to the Coast to shew his Land Forces what a galant Navy he had, which made him Master of the Sea beyond his Expectation. But Lysander hearing that the Athenians pursu'd him, made off, not without some confusion, towards Asia, and finding the Hellepont open without any guard, he attack'd Lampsacus by Sea, arises from the religious Honour we pay Him, and is the inseparable Companion of true Piety, as Hierocles has well explain'd it in his Notes upon the second Verse of Pythagoras Καὶ σέβει ὄρκιον, perform thy Oath most religiously.

The whole Chapter of that Philosopher is admirable, and well worth reading. Even the Heathens taught what Notion was to be had of an Oath, and the inviolable respect with which it was to be observed.

whilst Thorax at the same time besieg'd it by Land, and as soon as the Town was storm'd, he gave his Soldiers the plunder of it. In the mean while the Athenian Fleet, consisting of an hundred and eighty Sail, were shaping their Course for Eleus a City of Chersonesus, but having intelligence that Lampsacus was taken, they alter'd their measures and put in at Sestos; whence after they had taken in Provisions, they went to the River Egos Potamos, where they were just opposite to the Enemy, who still lay at Anchor near Lampsacus. Amongst the Athenian Commanders Philocles was One, the same who once persuaded the People to make an Order to cut off the Right Thumb of every Prisoner taken in War, to the end they might be disabled from managing any Weapon, and yet be serviceable to 'em in handling the Oar. The two Navies were now in sight, and every Body expected an Engagement the next Morning; but Lyfander had quite other designs; he commanded all the Seamen on board, as if they were to fight by break of day, and gave 'em a strict charge to be in readiness upon the first signal; he gave the same orders to the Land-Forces who lay upon the shore: About Sun-rising the Athenian Fleet drew up in a line directly before the Lacedæmonians, and gave the challenge; but Lyfander, tho' his Ships had had all their Complement aboard the whole Night, and stood facing the Enemy, wou'd not accept of it, but on the contrary sent Orders by his Pinnaces to those Ships which were in the Van not to stir, but remain in the same Posture without making the least Motion.

Towards the Evening, when the Athenians retir'd, he wou'd not suffer one Man to land, 'till two or three Gallies that he had sent to look out were returned, and had reported that they saw the Enemy disembark. The next day the same Game was play'd over again, and so for three or four days together. This made the Athenians very confident, and presumptuous; they look'd on their Enemies with Contempt, as a parcel of Cowards that dar'd not peep out of their Hole for Fear.

During these Transactions Alcibiades came on Horseback out of Chersonesus to the Camp of the Athenians, and shew'd to their Generals two material Oversights. The First was, that they had station'd their Ships near a naked Shore, without Cover, or Shelter; the Other, that they were at too great a distance from Sestos, from whence they were forced to fetch all their Provisions; he represented to them that their only way was to sail thither without loss of time, for besides that they cou'd then be supply'd plentifully from thence with whatever they wanted, and without running the least Hazard, they wou'd be at a safer Distance from the Enemy, whose Army being under the Command of a single General, was so obedient, and so well-disciplin'd, that at the first signal they were prepared, and in a Condition to put their Orders in execution, whatever they might be. The Athenian Generals made no Account of these Representations of Alcibiades; on the contrary Tydeus, who was one of them, told him in a contumelious manner, He was not General, but the Power was with Them, who knew best how to make a right use of it. Alcibiades suspecting by this Answer that they meant him no good, retir'd.

When he was gone they offer'd Battel as they had done several times before, but to no purpose; Lysander, when he saw 'em returning with disdain, and (as they thought) security to their Harbours, dispatch'd some few light Vessels to observe their motion, and bid the Captains row back as soon as ever they saw the Athenians land, and lift up the Golden Shield from the fore Deck, upon which Sign he would immediately make up to them. After-wards wards he gave orders to the Officers in the Fleet diligently to look after the Soldiers and Mariners, and take care they shou'd be all ready to run in briskly upon the Enemy, at the first sight of the Shield. By that time he had given his instructions, the sign immediately appeared, and the Trumpet from the Admiral sounded to Battel, the Ships set sail, and the Land-men marched up along the shore to the Promontory. The distance between the two Continents was fifteen Furlongs, but the Sea-men were so eager and industrious, that they soon reach'd the opposite shore. Conon the chief Captain of the Athenians was the First that descry'd them, and made what haste he cou'd, to get his Soldiers on board. He was very sensible of the Danger wherewith they were threatned, wherefore Some he commanded, Some he perswaded, and Others he forc'd into the Ships; but all his endeavours were in vain, his Men, not in the least suspecting any Surprize, were dispers'd; one Party was walking in the Fields, another slept in their Tents, a third was gone to Market. All This was owing to the Inexperience of the Commanders, who did not trouble themselves with thinking what might happen, and so keep upon the Guard against all Events. When the Noise and Cries of the Lacedemonians drew very near, and the Enemy were just upon their Backs, Conon made his Escape with eight Ships to Evagoras King of Cyprus. The Peloponnesians fell upon Those that remain'd, and either took or disabled 'em All. Those Soldiers that came to the relief of the Navy were slain in the attempt, Those that thought to make their escape by flight, were pursu'd and taken. Lysander took three thousand Prisoners with their Commanders, and seiz'd the whole Fleet, except the Admiral Gally, and those few Ships that convey'd Conon to Evagoras. Thus after he had compleated this famous Victory by his own Counsel and Conduct, and in the space of an Hour, with such unexpected success, put an end to that War which had been so long depending, and in which more Grecians lost their Lives, than in all the Former, he return'd in Triumph to Lampsacus.

For which Reason this Action, consider'd in all its Circumstances, was so surprizing that it was thought a particular Providence was concerned in it. Some say Castor and Pollux placed themselves on each side Lyfander's Ship, and attended this affair with extraordinary influence. (1) Others fancy'd a Stone, that seem'd to fall from Heaven, to be an Omen of this overthrow. It was of a vast bigness, and fell by the River Egos. The Inhabitants of the Chersonese hold it in great Veneration, and shew it among their Curiosities to this Day. (2) It is farther said that Anaxagoras had foretold that One of those Bodies which are fixt to the Vault of Heaven shou'd one day be loosened by a violent Shock, or Convulsion of the whole Machine, and fall to the Earth. For he taught that the Stars were not now in the same Places, where they had been first form'd; and that being of a stony substance, heavy, and of a smooth Superficies, the Light they seem'd to give was not their Own, but a Reflection, and Refraction from the Æther, or elementary Fire; that they were kept aloft by the rapid Motion of the Heavens, which at first thrust them out, when the Violence of the fourth Year of the ninety third Olympiad, four hundred and three Years before the Incarnation. And it is pretended that Anaxagoras had deliver'd this Prediction the eleventh Year of the seventy eighth Olympiad, sixty two years before that Action. Plin. 11. 58.

(1) Such pretended Miracles are receiv'd with an easy Faith by People naturally credulous, and superstitious. There were shewn at Troy two heavy Lumps, to which Homer saith Jupiter had once upon a time fastned the Feet of Juno.

Primitive

Primitive general Whirl separated the cold ponderous Bodies from the other Substances, and still hinder'd them from falling back to the Centre.

But some Philosophers maintain an Opinion more likely, and credible than That of Anaxagoras. They hold that the Stars which are seen to fall, are not the Emanations, or Effluxes of the elementary Fire, which go out the very Moment they are kindled, or lighted; much less a Blaze, or Inflammation of several Particles of Air bursting out from under a too close and narrow Compression, and darting into the upper Region; but that they really are Some of those heavenly Bodies, which from a momentary Relaxation of the rapidity of the Vortex, or some extraordinary excentrical Motion, are shook, as it were, out of their Sockets, and fall to the Earth, not always upon Places inhabited, but generally into the vast Ocean, which is the Reason we do not see them.

However this Opinion of Anaxagoras is confirm'd by the Testimony of (1) Damachus, who in his Treatise of Religion tells us that for seventy five days together before the Fall of that Stone, there was seen in the Heavens a large Globe of Fire, not fixt and immoveable, but like an inflamed Cloud agitated this way and That by Motions contrary and irregular, but so rapid that with the Violence thereof several fiery Fragments were forced from it, impell'd some one way and some Another, darting like Lightning, or so many falling Stars. So soon as the Globe had lighted on that Place, and the Inhabitants recover'd from their Fright had ventur'd towards it, they cou'd find no inflamable Matter, or the least sign of Fire, but a real Stone, which tho' of an extraordinary Size, yet was nothing in comparison to that fiery Globe, which appear'd at first, but seem'd no more than a Bit as it were crumbled from it. But They must have a good Opinion of the Veracity of Damachus, who can swallow this Account. If it be true, it overthrows the Assertion of Those who tell us that this Stone was a great Rock rent from the Ridge of some Mountain, and born for some time through the Air by the violence of the Wind, and that it settled in the first Place where that Force and Violence began to abate, and leave it. But why may We not in short conclude that That which appear'd for so many days together was really a Globe of Fire, and that when it became extinguish'd and dissipated it produced a thorough Change in the Air, and raised such a violent Storm or Whirlwind as to force this Stone from its native Station, and carry it to the place where it afterwards settled? But these are Subjects proper for Inquiries of another nature.

Theophrastus tells us that Lysander, when the three thousand Athenians, which he took Prisoners, were condemned by the Council, call'd Philocles and asked him what Punishment he thought that Man deserved, who advis'd the Citizens to proceed so severely against the Grecians? Philocles not at all daunted in his Adversity, reply'd, You are no Judge in this Case, but do You use Your Prisoners as I wou'd have us'd You, if You had been Mine. After this bold answer, with all gayety and cheerfulness he led on his Country-men, as if he had been going rather to a Triumph, than his Execution.

When this Tragedy was over, Lysander visited all the neighbouring Cities, and commanded all the Athenians he found, upon pain of Death, to repair to Athens. His design was This, that the City being thus thronged might soon be reduced to Famine, and glad to surrender upon discretion, as soon as he open'd the Siege. Where-ever he came he chang'd the present Government of the place, and put in a Lacedæmonian as Chief, with ten other Assistants. Thus he dealt not only with his Enemies, but his Allies, and by this means had in a manner engross'd to Himself the whole Empire of Greece. He did not employ the Nobility or the wealthy Citizens in any part of the Government, but put it into the Hands either of private Friends or Strangers, and entrusted Them with full power of Life and Death. Many were executed whilst he was present, and whoever express'd any dislike of his Friends proceedings were sure to meet with very hard usage. This management gave the Greeks an ill Opinion of the Lacedæmonian Government. (1) So that Theopompus was a little out in his mark, when by way of drollery he compar'd the Lacedæmonians to Vintners, who whilst they pretend to entertain us with sweet Wine give it a dash of Vinegar; for Lysander at the very first setting out intolerably oppress'd them by his Ambitious and Tyrannical Offices.

Having settled Affairs here according to his mind, and dispatch'd Messengers to tell the Lacedæmonians, that he shou'd return to them with two hundred Sail in a very short time, he appear'd be-

(2) Plutarch's Censure of that Poet is very just. It is the Custom with Vintners, and was even of Those who entertain'd at their Tables, as we learn from the Gospel, to serve up good Wine at first, and when the Guests have drunk to a pitch, and lost the Faculty of discerning Good from Bad, then to put them off with a worse sort. But it was quite contrary with the Lacedæmonians in their manner of Government; they fed their new Subjects immediately with bad Wine, with Wine that was eager, in taking from the Cities the Administration, and subjecting them to the Power of the most Insolent, and Seditious.

fore Attica, with such assurance, as if he thought of nothing less than the immediate surrender of the City. But when he found the Athenians made a vigorous defence beyond his expectation, he retreated into Asia, and made the same alteration in other Cities as he had done in Those we mentioned before, putting Some to death who did not submit to his Tyranny, and forcing Others to quit their Country. He expelled all the natural Inhabitants of Samos, and gave the Exiles possession of the City. He us'd the same Barbarity to the Inhabitants of Sestos, which was then in the hands of the Athenians, and divided it among his Seamen. The Lacedæmonians themselves were displeas'd at these inhumane proceedings, though against their Enemies, and re-establish'd the Sestians. But in all other Respects the Grecians were well satisfy'd with Lysander's Conduct, for by his means the Æginetes were restor'd to their own Cities, of which the Athenians had unjustly possess'd themselves, as were the Melians, and Sicyonians, whose Cities had been taken from Them, and given to Strangers. By this time Lysander had intelligence that there was a Famine in Athens, upon which he sail'd to the Piræum, and had no sooner began his Siege, but the City surrendered, submitting to whatever Terms he demanded.

'Tis reported among the Lacedæmonians, that Lysander wrote to the Magistrates thus, Athens is taken: To which they return'd this Answer in the same way; You say 'tis taken, we are satisfied. But this was recorded rather as Laconick than true, for the Decree of the Ephori, in which were compriz'd all the Articles of Capitulation, was conceiv'd in these Terms: Know, this is the Decree of the Lacedæmonians; Pull ye down the Pyræum, and the long Wall; quit all the Towns you are now possess'd of, and keep your selves within your own Territories.

vitories. We grant you Peace upon these Conditions, provided you yield to what shall be farther thought reasonable, (1) and restore the Fugitives. As for the Number of Ships you are to keep, you must observe the Orders we shall give in that behalf. When these Orders came to the Athenians, they submitted to them by the Advice of Theramenes the Son of Ancon; which made Cleomenes, one of the young Orators, ask him why he acted contrary to the Intention of Themistocles, and gave those Walls into the hands of the Lacedæmonians, which he had built in defiance of 'em. Young Man, said he, I am not acting contrary to the Sentiments of Themistocles. He rais'd these Walls for the Preservation of the City, and I for the very same reason wou'd have 'em destroy'd; and if Walls only secure a City, Sparta, which has None, is in a very ill condition.

Lysander, as soon as all the Ships except twelve, and the Fortifications of the Athenians were deliver'd into his hands, made his Entrance into the City, which happen'd to be on the sixteenth of Munychion (May) the very day on which they had formerly overthrown the Barbarians in the naval Fight near Salamis. He propos'd to them a change of their Government, and was for introducing the same alteration among Them, as he had made in the other parts of Greece; but finding them more stubborn than he expected, he by his Messengers gave the People to understand that they had violated the Capitulations; that the Walls were yet standing, tho' the time prescrib'd for the demolishing of them was expired; and now since they had broke their first Arti- cles he declared he wou'd refer it to the Council, where the Consideration of the Whole shou'd be reassum'd, and they were not to expect such favourable terms from their future Resolutions. And to make good his Menaces it is reported that he did really propose in a Council of the Allies, that the Athenians shou'd be reduced to a State of Slavery; and that a Theban Commander call'd Erianthus at the same time perswaded them to rase the City, and turn the Country into Pasture Ground for the grazing of Cattle.

Soon after this Council, when all the General Officers were met together at an Entertainment, a Musician of Phocis began to sing the following Verses out of the Electra of Euripides,

(1) *Unhappy Daughter of the great Atrides,
To thy wild Habitation low I come.*

This touch'd them All on a sudden with a Sense of Compassion, and gave 'em occasion to reflect, how barbarous it wou'd appear to lay that City in ruin, which had been renown'd for the Birth and Education of so many famous Men. However, Lysander finding the Athenians entirely at his Discretion, sent for the City Band of Musick, and having join'd them with Those belonging to the Camp, he pull'd down the Walls, and burn'd the Ships, to the sound of their Instruments, at which his Associates dancing, and crown'd with Garlands, express'd as much Joy, as if the end of other Mens Happiness, had been the beginning of their Own. After this, according to his usual way of dealing

(1) The Auditors all at once apply'd these Verses to the State of Athens, which after her Walls were razed was no better than a poor Cottage, or Hovel, and her Circumstances nearly resembled

Those of Electra, who after she had beheld her Father assassinated found her self in the Power of her Enemies, reduced to the utmost Misery.

with conquer'd People, he alter'd their Government, appointed thirty Rulers over the City, and ten over the Piræum, plac'd a strong Garrison in the Tower, and made Callibius, a Spartan, the Governour, who upon some slight occasion offer'd to strike Autolycus (a famous Wrestler, the same whom Xenophon mentions in his Symposiacks) but the young Gentleman avoided the Blow, and gave Callibius a Fall. Lysander, though this reflected upon one of his Officers, seem'd not to be much disturb'd at it, on the contrary he reprov'd Callibius, telling him he was to consider that they were Free-men not Slaves, over whom he had the Government. But Autolycus cou'd not carry it off so, for soon after the thirty Rulers caus'd him to be slain, on purpose to ingratiate themselves with Callibius.

Lysander, when he had settled his Affairs, sail'd to Thrace. All the Money and Presents which he had receiv'd (and in all probability a Man in his Station must have receiv'd many) he sent to Lacedæmon by Gylippus, whom he had made Captain over the Troops in Sicily. This Gylippus ripp'd up the Bottom of every Bag, and when he had taken out of each as much as he thought fit, sew'd 'em up again; but This was not manag'd so cunningly as he imagin'd, for in every Bag it seems there was a Bill that gave a particular account of its Sum;
so that when he came to Sparta, having first se-cur'd, as he thought, under the Tiles of his House what he had taken for his own use, he deliver'd up his Charge to the Magistrates, and with a good assurance shewed them the Seals, as a mark of his Fidelity. But when they examin'd the Money, and found it fall short of the Accounts express'd in the Bills, not suspecting any Cheat in the Messenger, they were something surpriz'd at the difference, 'till Gylippus his Servant betray'd the Secret, and told 'em, by way of Riddle, *that he had ob-

serv'd a great many Owls to roost in the Ceramicus. The Ephori soon found out that by Owls Pieces of Money were to be understood, because most of the Coin then bore the Impression of an Owl in respect to the Athenians, and that the Ceramicus, a place in Athens, so called because of a Tile-kiln that had been there, signified likewise the Roof of a House, by reason of the Tiles called Ceramoi. Thus the Mystery came to be understood, and Gylippus having stain'd his former Reputation with this mean Action, was asham'd to appear anymore at Lacedæmon.

Some of the Wisest among the Spartans, probably upon this occasion, being sensible what an ill influence Money had over most Mens Manners, and how easily the Best were corrupted by it, were very warm in their Reflections upon Lysander, and earnestly press'd the Magistrates to send away all their Treasure of Gold and Silver. This Debate was referr'd to a Council, and a Decree passed immediately, of which Theopompus saith Scirophidas was the Author, but Ephorus attributes it to Pblogidas, containing in Substance, That no Money, whether of Gold or Silver, shou'd be receiv'd in Sparta, where None shou'd pass but the current Coin of the Country. This Coin was of Iron dipp'd in Vinegar whilst it was Red-hot, to make it hard and unpliant, that it might not easily be cover'd with Counterfeit Brass, or apply'd to any other Service. It was moreover very heavy, and That which was much in weight, was but little in value, so that 'twas very troublesome to carry any considerable Sum. This Party that voted against keeping the Money was over-power'd by Lysander's Friends, and at last it was decreed, that it shou'd be employ'd upon Publick Occasions, and that it shou'd be a Capital Crime to convert any of it to Private Uses. But This did not at all answer Lycurgus's gus's Design, who by a scarcity of Money intended to prevent Covetousness, which is generally the ill consequence of Riches. Now This was not so much prevented by forbidding the use of Money in Private, as it was encourag'd by allowing it in Publick; and it cou'd not be imagin'd, that People who manag'd Wealth to so general an Advantage of the Republick, shou'd think it of no concern to Themselves; nay, (1) it is much more reasonable to conclude, that the common Custom of a Nation shou'd influence particular Men, than that the whole Nation shou'd be corrupted by the Actions of some Few, who upon any Misdemeanor may be call'd to account, and reduc'd to a better sense of their Duty, by sound Laws and strict Discipline. So that the Order of State which we just now mentioned, was of no benefit to the Commonwealth; for though the fear of Punishment was a pretty secure guard upon Men, not to hazard their Lives in treasuring up Money, yet the Prohibition only heighten'd their Desires, and if their Actions did not break out, at least their Affections were tainted. But I shall say no more of this Matter here, because I have reflected upon it in another place. *

Lysander, as we observ'd before, being much enrich'd with Plunder and Presents, rais'd his Own, and several of the chief Commanders Statues in Brass at Delphi, and caused two Stars to be made of Gold, representing Castor and Pollux, (2) which disappeared some time before the Battel of Leuctra. But this account is not agreeable to the latter circumstances of his Life.

It must be own'd, that never any Lacedemonian General had so absolute an Authority as Lysander, yet his Pride and Haughtiness of Spirit still carried him beyond it, insomuch that (2) Douris says, the Grecians rais'd Altars to his Honour, and sacrificed to him as a God. He was the First that was complimented with Songs of Triumph, one of which begun thus,

*To the brave Leader of our Bands
Begin the Song, which Gods inspire;
With Tuneful Voice, and Artful Hands:
Io Pœan! touch the Lyre!*

And the Samians decreed, (3) that the Feasts which were celebrated in the Honour of Juno, shou'd now be transferr'd to Lysander. Cherilus (4) a Poet was with a golden Vineyard, or Garden, valued at five hundred Talents. A Galley of Gold and Ivory was a very proper congratulatory Present for a Naval Victory. The Galley was consecrated in the Temple at Delphi, and the Vineyard in That of Jupiter the Olympian.

(1) This Alexandrides, or rather Anaxandrides, wrote a Book intitled, The Offerings stoln from the Temple at Delphi.

(2) This was related at large in a Book written by Douris, concerning the Samian Borders. As we learn from Athenaus, Lib. xi.

(3) Instead of Ἡραϊα, Junonia, they were called Λυσάνδρια, Lysandria. This is a flagrant Example of that Excess of Impiety to which Men are frequently betray'd by Flattery. They degrade their Gods to advance Men, nay often Monsters in their Room.

(4) It is in the Text τῶν δὲ πολιτῶν Χοίριλον, Chœrilus one of the Citizens, but in the Sr. German Manuscript it is τῶν δὲ ποιητῶν Χοίριλον, which is the true Reading. There must have been three Poets of this Name. The First of Samos, who celebrated was always one of his Retinue, and ready upon all occasions to celebrate his Actions. Antiloebus presenting him with a Panegyrick, which he was much pleas'd with, was very splendidly rewarded. There was a great emulation between (1) Antimachus of Colophon, and Niceratus of Heraclea, who shou'd write the best Poem in Lysander's Praise. The Laurel was given to Niceratus, which Antimachus taking ill, suppress'd his Verses. Plato, who was then a young Man, and an admirer of Antimachus's Poetry, desir'd him to bear this little Misfortune with more Courage, telling him, (2) that Ignorance had the same Effect upon the Intellectual Eye, as Blindness had upon the Corporeal, and that consequently this Affront was not so much His unhappiness as Theirs, who were not able to judge of his Excellencies. Aristonous, the Musician, who had six times won the Prize of the Pythian Games, openly declar'd, that if ever he had the fortune to be Conqueror once more, he wou'd declare himself Lysander's Disciple, or even his Slave.

Lysander's Haughtiness and Ambition was alike uneasy to his Superiors and his Equals; he had so many Creatures follow'd him, that he look'd upon brated in Verse the Victory gain'd by the Athenians over Xerxes, towards the seventy fifth Olympiad. The Second was this Gharillus of Sparta, who was always at Lysander's Heels, and lived about Seventy Years after the First. The Last was the Gharillus of Alexander, who flourish'd upwards of Seventy Years after this Battel gain'd by Lysander. This has been an unlucky Name in Poetry; for we have not one Line of these Authors in being; Plutarch alone has done more Honour to the Athenians, Lysander, and Alexan- der, than those three Poets all together.

(1) This Antimachus, according to Others, was of Claros; but those two Cities were very near Neighbours. He was in such Reputation, that he was reckon'd next to Homer in the Heroick way. However, his Style was said to be a little too verbose and bombastick.

(2) This is the only reason to be alledged now-a-days to our modern Criticks, who judge as ill of the Ancients, and would bring them into Contempt.

every Body with careless Disdain, and was so regardless of other Peoples Opinions, that he made his own Humour the measure of all his Actions. To his Friends and those Strangers that humbly attended him, and sided with his Party, he was too liberally grateful, and rewarded their Services with unlimited Commissions, to govern Cities as absolutely as they pleas'd: But an Enemy seldom escap'd his Revenge, and That was never satisfy'd but with the death of the Offender. To compass This he stuck at nothing that was base or treacherous, as it is plain from his dealing with the Milesians. They had appear'd too forward in maintaining the Rights of the People, and when they found their Designs discover'd, he was afraid they might secure themselves by flight. To prevent this he solemnly swore, not a Man of them should suffer. Upon This they were all so credulous as to rely upon his Word; nay, Many who upon apprehension of Punishment had before absconded, appear'd abroad again; so that when he had got 'em all in his power, he order'd eight hundred of 'em to be slain at one execution. In every City he exercis'd Cruelties of this nature, and no Man cou'd be safe who was suspected of any inclinations to popular Government. He did not only sacrifice Men to his own private Caprices, but with the same barbarity gratify'd either the Malice or Covetousness of his Friends. From whence Eteocles's Saying became famous; That Greece cou'd never bear two Lysanders. Theophrastus says, that Archi-stratus apply'd the same thing to Alcibiades; but This was not, strictly speaking, so applicable to Alcibiades. He was indeed vain, insolent, and luxurious, which made him disagreeable, but the Soreness of Lysander's Temper, and his Cruelty, made Him insupportable.

Pharnabazus,

Pharnabazus, after he had been plunder'd and very ill used by him, sent Informers against him to Sparta. The Magistrates took this Complaint into consideration, and put some of his Friends to death, amongst which was his Fellow-Captain Thorax, who against the late Law was found with Silver in his possession; neither did they stop here in punishing his Accomplices, but commanded him home by their Scytale. The nature and use of which was This; When the Magistrates gave their Commission to any Admiral or General, they took two round pieces of Wood, both exactly equal in breadth and thickness, One they kept themselves, the Other was deliver'd to their Officer, so that when they had any thing of moment which they would secretly convey to him, they cut a long narrow scrawl of Parchment, and rowling it about their own Staff, one Fold close upon another, they wrote their business on it; when they had wrote what they had to say, they took off the Parchment and sent it to the General, He apply'd it to his own Staff, which being just like That of the Magistrates, the Folds fell in with one another, exactly as they did at the Writing, and the Characters, which, before it was wrap'd up, were confusedly disjoin'd, and altogether unintelligible, appear'd now very plainly.

Lysander, who was then in the Hellepont, was startled at the Scytale, and being conscious how ill he had used Pharnabazus, thought this Message was chiefly upon his Account, so he took all the care imaginable to have a speedy Conference with him, and hoped by a little Discourse to compose all Differences between them. When they met, he desir'd him to give another Information to the Senate, and to contradict what his Messengers had told them before. Pharnabazus seem'd to comply with these Proposals, but, as it is in the Proverb,

(1) He put the Bite upon the Biter; for he wrote a Letter in Lysander's Presence according to His Directions, but had contriv'd to have Another by him, which was to a quite contrary effect; so when they came to seal the Letter, he put That upon him which he had writ under-hand. Lysander return'd boldly to Lacedæmon, and attending the Magistrates, as it is their Custom, at the Palace, he deliver'd Pharnabazus's Letter to them, which he was pretty confidently assur'd wou'd take off his greatest Accusation, for he knew Pharnabazus was much valu'd by the Lacedæmonians, as being an expert Soldier, and a Favourite of Artaxerxes. The Magistrates read the Letter, and shew'd it Lysander. He was much surpriz'd to meet with what he had not in the least suspected, and in great confusion left the Palace.

Some Days after he went to the Magistrates, and told them he was obliged to go to Ammon's Temple, and pay that Sacrifice which he had Vow'd to him before the Battel; and it is indeed reported, that Ammon appear'd to him in a Dream, when he besieged the Aphygeans; upon which, as the God had directed, he rais'd the Siege, and bid the Aphygeans sacrifice to Ammon, and that for the same Reason He hasten'd to sacrifice to the God in his Temple in Libya: But it is generally believ'd, that This was only a Pretence, and that the true occasion of his retiring was a suspicion, that the Magistrates would call him to an Account for having rul'd so long without controul: his haughty Spirit cou'd not brook Submission to any Body; like an Horse, that after he had been free a great

(1) It is in the Original Κρη-τιζων απὸς Κρητα, put the Cretan upon the Cretan, for the Cretans pass'd for the greatest Cheats and Lyars in the World; so that κρητιζων, to Cretize, or play the Cretan, and ἑδὲ to lye, were consider'd as one and the same thing.

while, and ranged in open Pasture, is very unwilling to be confin'd again to the Stable, and submit to the manage of his Rider. Ephorus gives another Account of his retiring, which I shall mention by and by. Whatever the occasion was, he found it very difficult to get the Magistrates leave, and when with much ado they had given their consent to his Voyage, the Kings of Sparta considering that most of their Cities were in the possession of his Friends, that He consequently must needs have a great sway among 'em, and be likely to be receiv'd by 'em with all the respect due to their great Commander and Patron, which Interest made him in effect Master of all Greece, attempted to dispossess them, and replace the Government in the Hands of the People.

These Proceedings rais'd every where new disturbances; and first of all the Athenians having possess'd themselves of the Castle of (1) Phyle, took Arms against the Thirty Tyrants, and defeated them. Immediately upon This Lysander return'd in great haste to Sparta, and perswaded the Lacedaemonians to stand by the Oligarchy which He had establish'd, and repress the forwardness of the People. To this end they remitted an Hundred Talents to the Thirty Tyrants to enable them to continue the War, and declared Lysander Himself chief Commander. But the two Kings envying his Greatness, and afraid lest he shou'd be Master of Athens a second time, resolv'd that One of them shou'd be present in that Expedition. Accordingly Pausanias march'd into Attica, in Appearance to support the Tyrants against the People, but in reality to put an end to the War, and prevent Lysander from having Athens once more at his Mercy. This design he compass'd very easily, for he wrought the Athenians into a good Understanding among Themselves, compos'd the Tumults, and so put a stop to Lysander's Ambition. However, the Athenians flying out again soon after, (1) the whole Blame was charged upon Pausanias. It was said, that taking out of the Peoples Mouth the Curb of the Oligarchy, he had by that means made them headstrong, and encouraged them to grow insolent and licentious. At the same time it gave Lysander the Reputation of an upright Man, who never employ'd his Arms either for the gratification of his Friends, or his own Fame, but purely for the Glory of Sparta.

Lysander's Courage and Spirit appear'd in his Expressions, no less than it did in his Actions. Once when the Argives contended about their Bounds, and thought they cou'd make a better Plea than the Lacedæmonians, he held out his Sword, and said, (2) He that is Master of This will best make out his Title. At another time when a Megarean talked big in a Conversation, he gave him this Reprimand, (3) By Your Leave, Friend, those Words of Yours require a Place of Strength and Safety. When the Bœotians stood wavering whether they should engage on his side, or his Enemies, he told 'em

(1) This is a flagrant Instance of the Injustice and Capriciousness of the People. Pausanias had just gain'd his Ends at Athens, and done as he was desired by the Spartans, in restoring the Government of the People, and by that means clipping the Wings of Lysander's Ambition. Some time after This the Athenians making an ill use of that very Government, make an Insurrection, and immediately Pausanias is condemn'd for it. He is accused for having abolished the Oligarchy, and Ly-

(2) This Maxim is of a very antient Date, and I may venture to say, unjust as it is, it will never want Abettors. In many Cases a Man's Right is measured by his Sword.

they must come to some resolution, for he wou'd be with 'em speedily, and bad 'em consider whether they had rather be visited in a friendly or hostile manner. When the Corinthians had deserted the League, he march'd to Corinth at the Head of his Army, in order to assault it; but whilst the Lacedæmonians were in a Quandary, and seem'd afraid to begin the Attack, a Hare happen'd to start out of the Trenches, whereupon he ask'd them, if they were not ashamed to fear those Enemies, whose laziness is such, that the very Hares sleep under their Walls?

After (1) Agis's Death, Agefilaus his Brother, and Leotichides his supposed Son, were the Pretenders to the Crown. Lysander, who had been Agefilaus's Lover, persuaded Him to claim his Right to the Kingdom, as being legitimately descended from Hercules, whereas it was very much suspected that Leotichides was the Son of Alcibiades, who had been observed to be familiar with Agis's Wife Timea, during the time of his Exile in Sparta, and Agis computing the time, concluded that he Himself cou'd not be the Father, so openly disown'd him, and neglected him as a Bastard; yet afterwards when he fell sick, and was carried to Herea, by the importunity of the Youth himself, and his Friends, just before he died he declar'd before many Witnesses that Leotichides was his lawful Son, and desired them to testify these his last words to the Lacedæmonians; which accordingly they did. Every Body respected Agefilaus as a very deserving Man, and Lysander's Interest and Authority serv'd very much to strengthen his Party, so that he began to think he could not fail, when Diophites, a great Dealer in Prophecies, oppos'd him on Ac-

(1) Xenophon, Lib. 11. tells us, that Agis fell sick at Herea, a City of Arcadia, whither he was count of his Lameness, and for that purpose cited the following Oracle:

*Proud as thou art, Sparta, beware
How thou obey'st a limping Heir!
War and Discord without end,
Shall on that luckless Hour attend;
Every Labour, every Fate,
That can waste, or sink a State.*

(1) Many believ'd the Interpretation, and began to favour Leotychides's Party. But Lysander said, that Diopithes had mistook the Sense of the Oracle, that it was not meant the Lacedæmonians would be unhappy under a lame King, but that they would be a lame People if they suffer'd the Posterity of Hercules to be govern'd by illegitimate Princes. Having thus put a plausible Construction upon the words of the Oracle, and being otherwise one that had got a great interest among the People, he prevailed with them to make choice of Agefilaus. As soon as He was settled in his Kingdom, Lysander pressed him very earnestly to make War upon Asia, putting him in hopes of raising himself to a great reputation by the Conquest of Persia: to further this design he writ to his Friends in Asia, and desir'd they wou'd petition Agefilaus to accept the Command of their Forces against the Barbarians. They comply'd with his request, and sent Ambassadors to Lacedæmon for that purpose.

(1) Indeed the Oracle seem'd very clear and expressive; it declared against a lame Reign, and Agefilaus was lame. But Lysander's Explication, by which he made it appear that the Expression was figurative, is very ingenious and plausible. Why must a Prince's Lameness exclude him from the Throne to which he had a legal Right? But the Oracle had another Sense, very different from Both of These, as we shall see when we come to the Life of Agefilaus.

(1) Agefilaus

(1) Agésilas thought himself no less obliged to Lysander for this favour, than he had been before for his Kingdom. (2) But ambitious Spirits, however otherwise qualified for Government, are hindered in their way to Glory by that Envy which they generally bear to their Equals, and so make Them the chief Opposers whom they might make the greatest Promoters of their Heroick Actions. Thus Agésilas at first chose Lysander for his particular Favourite, made him one of his Cabinet Council, and consulted him upon all Affairs of moment; but when they came into Asia, having little acquaintance there, the People seldom address'd themselves to Him, but made their greatest Court to Lysander, Some upon the account of a former Familiarity and Friendship, Others out of a servile Compliance. Thus, as it often happens in Plays, a chief Actor represents one of a mean Character, yet is much taken notice of, while He that personates the King has but a small part, and is little regarded by the Spectators; so here the Councillor had all that was really valuable in Government, and left the King only the empty name of Power. Indeed Both of 'em ought to have moderated their Ambition: Lysander was too forward in accepting those honours which ought first to have been paid Agésilas: On the other side Agésilas did ill, so unhandsomely to discard a Friend that he had been

(1) It was certainly a greater Honour for Agésilas to be invited to the Command of all Greece against the Persians, than to sit on the Spartan Throne, which was his Own of right.

(2) This Reflection contains in it a Lesson very necessary for Princes, and All such as aim at being considerable, in laying before them the mischievous Effects of Envy, which often leads them to look on Those as their Enemies and Rivals, whose Councils might be highly useful and necessary to them in promoting their Designs. Of This Agésilas is an evident Instance. and modern History is able to supply us with Examples of the same Nature, and no less instructive.

so much obliged to. For first of all he never gave him any opportunity of appearing with reputation, never put him in any post of Command; besides, whoever he engaged for, was sure to miscarry, and to be thought Lysander's Friend, was fault enough to deserve the King's Displeasure.

Lysander was so unsuccessful in every thing he undertook, and found so often that what he designed as a kindness was prejudicial to his Friends, that he desired them to forbear their Addresses, and take no publick notice of Him; that they shou'd either speak to the King himself, or to those Favourites who had more interest than He at present to prefer 'em. Upon This many gave him no farther trouble with their concerns, but still continued their respects to him, and waited upon him in all places of publick entertainment. This griev'd *Agésilau*s yet more, when he saw all his endeavours to call off the People's Affections from Lysander were in vain; so to shew his resentment, when he prefer'd even common Soldiers to the highest Posts in the Army, and made them Governours of Cities, He affronted Lysander so far as to make him Overseer of his Provisions, and then by way of derision, and to insult the Ionians, he said, let them now go, and make their Court to my Butcher. Lysander cou'd brook this usage no longer, and resolv'd freely to tell the King his mind: Their discourse was very short and Laconick. In good truth, *Agésilau*s, says Lysander, you know very well how to lessen Your Friends. Yes, says he, when they affect to be greater than myself, and 'tis just They shou'd have the greatest share in my power who most endeavour to promote it. Lysander reply'd very modestly, Sir, This is rather what you please to Say, than what I ever Did; but I beg of you, for the sake of those Strangers here, who have their Eyes upon us, to allow me such a Post under You, wherein I may be least suspected, suspected, and most useful to you. This favour was granted him, and he was sent Ambassador to the Hellepont: and tho' He did bear some secret grudge to the King, yet That did not hinder him from a very faithful discharge of his Duty. He persuaded Mithridates the Perfian, who had fallen out with Pharnabazus, to revolt with all the Army under his Command, and brought him over to Agefilaus: However, he was not employ'd upon any other service, but returned in disgrace to Sparta, not only highly incens'd against Agefilaus in particular, but displeas'd more than ever with the whole frame of the Government.

Things had been a great while ripe for Change, and People were ready to break into Rebellion; he resolv'd therefore not to miss the opportunity, but set it on foot as soon as possible. His stratagem was This; Some of the Heraclidæ who came into Peloponnesus, and mix'd with the Dorians, were now grown very numerous and powerful in Sparta. Of These, two Families only cou'd claim any Right to Succession in the Kingdom; Those were the Eurytionidæ and the Agidæ; the Rest, notwithstanding their high Extraction, had no greater share in the Government than what was common to the meanest Citizen. For They only who cou'd plead most Merit, had the best Titles to the common Reward of Virtue. Lysander was one of These, and when he had gain'd so great a Reputation by his Actions, had many Friends, and much Power, he was uneasy to see That City which ow'd its encrease chiefly to Him, rul'd by Others no better descended than Himself. So he contriv'd to alter the Settlement which confin'd the Government to two Families only, and give all the Heraclidæ an equal right to it; nay, Some say not to the Heraclidæ only, but to all the Spartians, and make it a reward not so much of Hercules's Posterity, as of Those

Those who bravely imitated that valour which gave Him a place among the Gods. He had great hopes that when the Kingdom was thus to be dispos'd of, no Spartan cou'd appear with those advantages that He cou'd: Upon which prospect first he endeavour'd to insinuate the reasonableness of this change into private People, and learn'd by Heart a fine Oration which Cleon of Halicarnassus had made for him upon that Subject. But when he came to reflect on the Difficulties of this Undertaking, which was not to be effected by ordinary Means, he had Recourse to Extraordinary. For as in Tragedies, when any thing of great importance is to be effected, the assistance of some God is made use of, so He to promote his Designs with more colour of Authority, had recourse to Oracles, presuming he should prevail upon more Citizens by the Terror of Those, than he could persuade by Cleon's Eloquence. Ephorus says, that after he had in vain endeavour'd to corrupt the Pythian Oracle, and as unsuccessfully sent Phericles to corrupt Dodona, he went himself to Ammon, and proffer'd the Priests prodigious Sums of Gold, who with great indignation rejected his Bribes, and sent People to accuse him at Sparta; where he met with such favourable Judges that he was easily clear'd from their Impeachments; upon which the Libyans took their leave of the Spartans in this manner, (1) When you come to live among us in Africa you'll find us more impartial Judges. Now there was an antient Prophecy which foretold that the Lacedaemonians should some time or other inhabit Africa. Lyfander's Designs in this matter were very subtile and intricate, and managed by very great Politicians, so in order to clear the whole intrigue we must trace it as we do Mathematical Demonstration, up to its first Principles; I shall therefore at large explain it as it is related by (1) Ephorus, a great Historian as well as Philosopher.

There was a Woman in Pontus who being with Child, pretended Apollo was the Father. Many with a great deal of reason suspected it, Others were so credulous as to believe it. Wherefore when she came to be delivered of a Son, several of the greatest Quality in the Country took peculiar care of its Education, and for some reason or other gave it the Name of Silenus. (2) Lysander taking hold of This Occurrence, made it the Ground of his whole stratagem, and chose such Confidants to assist him in it, whose Character might bring the story into reputation without the least suspicion of forgery. To make the best advantage of This, they spread abroad another Story, that there were very ancient Oracles closely conceal'd in the Custody of the Priests at Delphi, and it was upon record, that they were not to be profan'd by vulgar hands, neither was it lawful for any Man to read them, 'till in some future Age One should arise who could manifestly prove himself the Son of Apollo, and challenge to Himself the Interpretation of these Mysteries. When the credit of this report was well established among the People, Silenus was to come and demand the Prerogative of his Birth. The Priests who

(1) Polybius, and after Him Strabo, put a great Value upon Ephorus, as a very good Historian; and yet they cou'd not forbear blaming him in many Cases; Strabo particularly condemns him for having mingled, or rather inserted nothing but Fables in what he has written concerning Delphi, tho' he had promis'd to avoid all fabulous Accounts, especially in that particular Point. This does not favour much either of the Historian, or Philosopher.

(2) It is very likely that the Whole was of his Contrivance, and that He had taught the Woman her Lesson.

were Confederates in this Plot, were strictly to examine into every circumstance and particular of his Nativity, and afterwards being fully convinced that he was the true Son of Apollo, were to deliver up their charge to him: and then the Son of the God was to unfold in publick all those Oracles, especially That, for the sake of which the whole Plot had been contriv'd, relating to the Government of Sparta, wherein it was to be declared, that it would be more for the Honour and Interest of Sparta to break the present Succession, and for the future chase their Kings out of the most deserving Men in the Commonwealth. But when Silenus was grown up, and every thing ready for Action, the whole business miscarry'd by the Cowardice of One that was an Agent in it, whose Heart failed him just at the time of Execution. However nothing of This was discover'd while Lysander liv'd, for he died before Agefilaus return'd out of Asia, after having unfortunately embark'd his Country in a War against the Bæotians, or rather involv'd all Greece in it, for the thing is related both ways, Some laying the Blame upon Him, Others upon the Thebans, and Others charging them Both with it. (1) To the Thebans it is objected that they overturn'd the Altar, and prophan'd the Sacrifice Agefilaus was offering in the Town of Aulis, and that (2) Androclidas and Amphiteus having been corrupted

(1) Xenophon gives a full Account of This in the third Book of his Grecian History; He saith the Lacedæmonians gladly laid hold of the first Opportunity of arming against the Thebans, to whom they bore a Grudge of a long standing; for that they had claimed to Themselves a Tenth of the Treasure taken at Decælea; for their refusing to attend them in their Expedition against Pireus, and advising the Corinthians to do the like; and lastly, for their hindering Agefilaus from sacrificing at Aulis, overturning the Altar, prophaning the Sacrifices, and refusing to follow him into Asia.

(2) Plutarch in this Place too slightly skims over some Circumstances;

rupted by the King of Persia, they set upon the (1) Phocians, and laid waste their Country, to draw upon the Lacedæmonians this confederate War of the Grecians. They who make Lysander the Author of this War, say He was offended that the Thebans alone, of all the Confederates, should lay Claim to a Tenth of the Spoils taken from the Athenians at Decelea, and that they complain'd of his sending Money on his own Account to Sparta. But what provok'd him most against the Thebans was that They should be the First to furnish the stances not well known, and of which a more perfect Account may not be unwelcome to the Reader. This shall be supply'd out of Xenophon, who writes that when Tithraustes perceived Agésilans, who had conceiv'd a thorough Contempt for the King of Persia, had no thoughts of quitting Asia, but on the contrary was in great Hopes of surprizing the Prince, was at a loss what course to take in that Extremity, and after he had thoroughly consider'd of it, resolv'd to send Timocratus the Rhodian with Fifty Talents to be distributed among the several Governours in the Cities of Greece. That Timocrates gave part thereof to Androclidas, Ismenias, and Galaxidorus at Thebes; to Timolaus and Periantbus at Corinth, and at Argos to Cyclo, and his Adherents. That thereupon these Cities began to cry out against the Lacedæmonians, and that from thence sprung the Combination of Greece against Sparta. Xenophon does not name Amphiteus, but Pausanius designs him with only a small change in his Name, for he calls him Amphitemis.

(1) This likewise wants a farther Explanation. These Men, especially the Thebans, thus bribed by the King of Persia, wisely considering that the Lacedæmonians wou'd not be the First to break with their Allies, if Some of Them did not begin the War by some Act of Hostility, persuaded the Locrians to pillage a Tract of Land that was in dispute betwixt the Phocians and Thebans, not doubting but the Phocians wou'd immediately, by way of Reprisal, enter Locris with an Army. They were right in their Conjecture. The Phocians fell into Locris, and raised great Contributions. Hereupon Androclidas and his Adherents persuaded the Thebans to March to the Assistance of the Locrians. The Thebans without any more ado invade Phocis, and ravage the Country. The Phocians send for Succours to Sparta, declaring that They had not begun the War, but that they had been forced to enter into the Territories of the Locrians in their own Defence; the Lacedæmonians very readily lay hold of this Occasion to declare War against the Thebans.

Athenians with Means to recover their Liberty, by breaking the Yoke of the Thirty Tyrants which He had establish'd at Athens; and for the maintenance of which the Lacedæmonians had publish'd an inhuman Decree, importing that Those who fled out of Athens should be apprehended where-ever they should be found, and forced back into the City, and that Whoever endeavour'd to rescue them shou'd be treated as Enemies to Sparta. The Thebans gave out a Counter-Order to this Decree, which was generous, and becoming the Posterity of Hercules and Bacchus, for They proclaim'd that every House and City in Bœotia should be open and free for any Athenian that desir'd protection, and that Whoever did not assist a Fugitive that was in danger of being seiz'd, shou'd be fin'd a Talent; besides, if any one shou'd march Arm'd through Bœotia to the Relief of the Athenians, he shou'd find a safe passage, without being in the least molested. Neither did they stop here, for as their Decree was hospitable and friendly, so their Actions were agreeable to it. For Thrasibulus with several other Fugitives was so far aided by them secretly, with Money and Arms, that he made an assault upon the Castle of Phile, and possess'd himself of it. Lysander cou'd not but resent these affronts, which the Thebans had so openly offer'd both to Him and the Lacedæmonians. His Anger grew very fierce, and was encreased by a Splenetick humour which he was troubled with in his old Age. This urged him to importune the Magistrates to imploy Him once more in their Service; so he marched out with an Army under his Command, and Pausanias follow'd him with Another. Pausanias went round by Cytheron, with a design to invade Bœotia: Lysander pass'd through Phocis in order to meet him: As he march'd along he took by Surrender the City of the Orchomenians, storm'd Lebadia, and plunder'd it. From whence he sent Letters to Pausanias, that he shou'd remove from Platea, and make haste to join Forces with him at Haliartus, where he Himself wou'd certainly meet him by break of Day. These Letters fell into the hands of the Enemies Spies, and were brought to the Thebans. Upon the opening of them they entrusted their City with the Athenians, who were come to their Assistance, then falling out at the first Watch arriv'd at Haliartus, and put part of their Forces into the City, just before Lysander was come up with His. Lysander had at first resolv'd to pitch his Tents upon the side of an Hill, and wait for Pausanias, but Day drawing on he grew impatient, and led his Soldiers out in a direct Line along the Road to the Walls of the City.

There is a Fountain call'd (1) Cissusa, in which, they say, Bacchus was wash'd immediately after his Birth; for the Water is like Wine, of a bright Colour, and a pleasant Taste. Not far off grows the Cretan (2) Canes, of which Javelins are made, by which the Haliartians guess (3) Radamanthus dwelt there, and the rather because his Sepulchre too,

(1) I have not read in any other Author of a Fountain near Haliartus, called Cissusa. Pausanias mentions the Fountain Tilphusa, which he places fifty Furlongs from that City. It is the same with That which Strabo calls Tilphosa, under Mount Tilphosion in the Neighbourhood of Haliartus; and I make no doubt but this Passage in Plutarch ought to be corrected by Those in Pausanias and Strabo.

(2) This Passage confirms Hesychius's Explication of the Word $\sigma\upsilon\rho\alpha\xi$, which he saith does not only signify the Bottom of the Iron at the end of the Pike, which they fix into the Ground, $\sigma\alpha\rho\upsilon\pi\tau\eta\rho$, but likewise the Wood of the Pike, and of the Javelin too. Strabo, speaking of Haliartus, tells us it was destroy'd by the Romans in the War against Perseus, and that it stood near a Lake, or marshy Pool, which produced Canes, not for making of Javelins, as Plutarch saith here, but Pipes or Flutes. And we shall find a Passage in the Life of Sylla; wherein Plutarch speaks in the same Manner with Strabo.

too, which they call Alea, is seen in this place. The Monument of Alcmena is hard by, where they pretend she was bury'd, when after Amphitryon's Death she marry'd Radamanthus. It was hereabout, on the left side of Haliartus, that those Thebans who had not entred the City were placed, from whence with great fierceness they fell upon the Enemy's Rear. In the mean time, Those within the City putting themselves into one Body with the Haliartians kept their Order in quiet; but as soon as Lyfander appear'd with his Van-Guard before the Gates, they rush'd out, killed Him, and one of his Priests that attended him, with some few more; for the greater part made their escape to the main Army, but the Thebans pursu'd 'em so closely that they all soon dispers'd and fled to the Hills. A Thousand of them were kill'd in this Pursuit, and Three Hundred of the Thebans fell by chasing 'em too rashly into craggy and dangerous places. These Three Hundred had been suspected of Correspondence with the Lacedæmonians, which made them so rash and desperate, that they were resolv'd to wipe off this Disgrace, though with the loss of their Lives. The news of this Defeat came to Pausanias, in his March from Platea to Thespias. He presently put his Army in order, and made towards Haliartus, where about the same time Thrasylbulus was arriv'd with a Party of the Athenians under his Command. Pausanias wou'd have articed with them upon terms for the Dead, but the more Aged among the Spartans in the Army cou'd not think of it; they murmur'd at it among themselves, and at last went in a Body to the King, telling him Lyfander's Body was not to be redeem'd by Conditions, but if they fought it out, and conquer'd, they might then carry it off honourably; if they happen'd to be overcome Themselves, it would however be glorious to die upon the Spot with their Commander. Notwithstanding these Men carry'd it thus high, Pausanias, who was more calm, saw it was too difficult a matter to think of routing the Thebans, who were just now flush'd with Victory; besides, if This cou'd have been done, the Body lay so near the Walls, that it could not easily be bore off without a Truce; so he immediately dispatch'd an Herald, obtain'd a Treaty, carried off the Dead, and retreated with his Army; and as soon as they had passed the Confines of Bœotia they inter'd Lysander in the Territories of the Panopæans, the Friends and Confederates of the Spartans. His Monument is still to be seen in the Road from Delphi to Cbaronea, where the Lacedæmonians for some time took up their Quarters; and while they staid there, one of Phocis giving an account of the Battel to a Friend of His who had not been at it, said, The Enemy fell upon them, after Lysander had passed Oplites. A Spartan, Lysander's Friend, that stood by, asked him what he meant by Oplites, for he had never heard of the Name before, I mean the Place, said the Phocian, where the Enemy cut off our Vanguard; the River that runs under the Walls of the City is called Oplites. The Spartan immediately wept, and broke out into this Expression, O how unavoidable are the Decrees of Fate! For it seems the Oracle had pronounced this to Lysander.

Some indeed say, Oplites doth not run to Haliartus, but is a River near Coronea, which mix'd with the River Philarius, passes along to that City. It was formerly call'd Oplias, but now it is known by the Name of Isomantus. Now the Person who killed Lysander was an Officer of Haliartus, call'd Neochorus, and bore a Dragon in his Shield, and it is probable that This was the Thing signified by the Oracle.

It is reported, that soon after the Peloponnesian War, the Thebans also received an Oracle from Apollo Ismenius, which foretold the Battel at (1) Delium, and This at Haliartus, though This happened thirty Years after. The Oracle runs thus:

Don't follow in your Chase the eager Hound
Upon the Confines, fly th' Orchalian Ground, That Den of Foxes.

This Place about Delium he calls the Confines, where Bœotia borders upon Attica; by the Orchalian Ground, is meant a Hill called Alopece, on that side of Helicon which looks towards Haliartus. It was called Alopece from the many Foxes that kennel in it.

led by a Man who bore a Dragon in his Shield, and in a Charge of the Thebans, who attack him in the Rear, whilst the Haliartians and some other Thebans charge him in Front. These were very ingenious Oracles.

(1) The Battel at Delium, in which the Athenians were overthrown by the Thebans, happen'd in the first Year of the eighty ninth Olympiad, four hundred and twenty two Years before the Birth of Christ; and the Battel at Haliartus where Lysander was killed, was fought in the second Year of the ninety sixth Olympiad, three hundred and ninety three Years before the Incarnation, so that there were twenty nine Years compleat between the One and the Other.

The

The Lacedæmonians looked upon Pausanias's Proceedings as so dishonourable to a Spartan General, that they would have tried him for his Life, but he durst not venture to appear, so fled into Tegæa, where he devoted himself to a recluse Life in the Temple of Minerva.

Lysander's Poverty, which was discovered at his Death, made his Virtue more admired, when it appeared that from so much Plenty and Power, such rich Presents from so many Cities, which were under his Government, he had not at all encreas'd the Wealth of his own private Family. This is observed by Theopompus, whom we may sooner believe when he Commends, than when he finds Fault, for Men are more apt to Discommend than Praise. Ephorus says, that upon some dispute between the Confederates with Sparta, when Lysander's Writings were to be examin'd, Agefilaus was order'd to make the search, who finding a Discourse of Lysander's concerning the Government, where he endeavoured to shew how advantageous it would be to the Commonwealth, if the Right of Succession, which the Family of the Eurentiontidæ and Agiadæ pretended to, was broke, and the Kingdom made Elective; This Discourse Agefilaus design'd to publish, and discover by that means (1) what sort of Man Lysander was at the bottom. (2) But Lacratidas, a wise Man, and at that time President of the Ephori, prevented him, telling him, It would be dishonourable to disturb Lysander now at Peace in his Grave; that he ought rather to bury that Discourse with him, as a dangerous Piece that might

(1) Agefilaus's design was to ruin Lysander's Reputation, and let the Spartans see that they had been mistaken in his Character, and that he had been in reality a very dangerous Person.

The Spartans bestowed many Honours on him after his Death, amongst which This was none of the least; There were Some who had engaged themselves to Lysander's Daughters, while every thing about him appeared Rich and Splendid; but when they saw how poor and honest he died, they broke off their Contract. These, in respect to Lysander's Memory, the Spartans severely fin'd: For there was, it seems, in Sparta a Law which punished as well Those that broke off, or deferr'd a promis'd Marriage, as Those who engaged in an ill one; and this Law laid hold (1) on Those chiefly who endeavour'd to marry into Rich, rather than Good Families. L*Ucius Cornelius Sylla* was descended of a Patrician or Noble Family. They say One of his Ancestors, called Rufinus, had been Consul, but that his Honour was sullied by a most (1) signal Disgrace : For being found possessed of Plate, to the value of above ten Pounds more than the Law allowed, he was thereupon expelled the Senate.

(1) This was P. Cornelius Rufinus, who indeed had been twice Consul. The first time was in the Year of Rome 463, two hundred and eighty eight Years before the Birth of our Saviour, and the second thirteen Years after, that is the four hundred seventy sixth Year of Rome. He was expelled the Senate two Years after his second Consulate, when Q. Fabricius Luscinus, and C.

Æmilius Papus were Censors. Velleius Paterculus tells us Sylla was the sixth in Descent from this Rufinus. Sextus a Cornelio Rufino; qui bello Pyrrhi inter celeberrimos fuerat Duces. This Computation is very rational, for there were one hundred and eighty Years between Rufinus his first Consulate, and the first Campaign of Sylla.

(2) To This was owing the Obscurity in which his Posterity lived for a long time after. Sylla himself had but a mean Education, which was perfectly agreeable to the Scantiness of his Fortune. In his younger Days he dwelt in hired Lodgings, for which he paid but a very small rate, insomuch as in after-times it was upbraided to him as One who was grown too wealthy for a Person of his Extraction. For as he was one day boasting and magnifying himself for his Exploits in Libya, a Person of Worth and Ingenuity made answer; And how canst thou be an honest Man, who tho' thou hadst not a Groat left thee by thy Father, art now Master of such large Possessions? For tho' in the days of Sylla Men were degenerated from that Innocence, and Integrity, for which the preceding Ages had been renown'd, and a Door was open to Luxury and Expence, yet it was even then as great a Reproach to a Man not to have persever'd in the Poverty of his Ancestors, as to have run out a fair Estate. And a long time after This, when he was become absolute, and proscrib'd and murder'd as he thought fit, as they were leading a Person who had been infranchis'd to the Tarpeian Rock to be thrown headlong from thence, for having conceal'd a Friend of his that was in the Proscription, he upbraided Sylla for dealing so severely by an old Acquaintance, recounting how they had lived long together in familiar Converse under the same Roof, where He paid two thousand Sesterces for the upper Apartment, and Sylla three thousand for That under him; so as the difference be-

(1) This is what Paterculus means in the following Words, cum familia ejus (Sylla) claritudo intermissa esset. And it is something remarkable that a Fault, which in our Age wou'd be con-

sider'd as a very trivial one, shou'd in those days keep, as it were, under the Hatches, the Descendants of a Person who had been twice Consul, and had been honoured with the Dignity of Dictator.

tween their Fortunes then was no more than one thousand Sesterces, which in Attick Coin givetwo hundred and fifty Drachma's. And thus much of his Original.

As for his Air, and the Shape of his Body, the best Judgment to be made of Them must be from his Statues, only his Eyes cou'd not be represented by them. They were of a lively Blue, quick, and churlish, and were render'd still more so by his Complexion. For his Face was full of red fiery Pimples, intermixt here and there with Spots of White. Hence, by report, he was surnamed Sylla, in allusion to which an Athenian Droll cast out this Scoff in Verse, Sylla's a Mulberry drudg'd o'er with Meal.

Nor is it improper to make use of such Remarks as These, in the decyphering of a Person, who by Nature was so addicted to Raillery, as in his youthful obscurer Years he would converse freely with Mimicks and Jestors, and accompany them in all their Debauches. And, when he was Lord of All, he wou'd often send for the most impudent Stage-Players and lewd Buffoons of the Town, to drink with, and play Prizes of Wit, without any regard had to his Age, or the Dignity of his Place; so that many times Affairs of the greatest Importance and Consequence, which requir'd his whole Thought and Application, lay neglected. At Hours of Refreshment it was not in Sylla's Nature to admit of any thing that was serious, and though at other times he was a Man of Business, and austere of Countenance, yet would he alter so, all of a sudden, at his first entrance upon Wine and good Fellowship, that he put himself upon a level with those Minstrels, Buffoons, and Dancers, who govern'd him just as they pleased. To this dissolute Converse with such sort of Cattle was owing that Contagion of Libertinism which always stuck close to him, that Propensity to libidinous Desires, which never left him even when he was stricken in Years. In his Youth he fell in Love with Metrobius a Player, and preserv'd a Tang of that infamous Passion all his Life after. In his first Amours he met with this remarkable Adventure. He happen'd to make Court to a Lady call'd Nicopolis, who though she was no better than a common Mistress, yet was she very wealthy, and so taken with his Address, and the Gracefulness of his Youth, that she became doatingly fond of him, and when she died left him her Heir; he likewise inherited the Estate of his Mother-in-law, who loved him as her own Son; and these Windfalls much advanced his Fortunes, so that he grew very wealthy.

He was chosen Quæstor to Marius in his first Consulship, and attended him into Africa in the War against Jugurtha. When he was arrived in the Camp he soon acquired a great Reputation for his Courage, and Valour, and having made a right use of a favourable Opportunity, which fell in his way, he purchased the Friendship of Bocchus King of Numidia, whose Ambassadors having made their escape out of the Hands of some Numidian Robbers, Sylla entertain'd them, treated them with much Kindness and Generosity, dismiss'd them with handsome Presents, and sent them on their Journey under the Protection of a safe Convoy.

Bocchus had for a long time born a secret Grudge to his Son-in-law Jugurtha, whose Person he hated, as he had been jealous of his Power. That vanquished vagabond Prince was then in the Court of Bocchus, whither he had betaken himself for Protection. The Numidian having him in his Power was resolv'd to betray him, for which purpose he privately sent for Sylla, chusing rather to let Him seize him, than deliver him up Himself. Sylla having first communicated the Secret to Marius, marched with a small Force, and threw himself into imminent danger; for confiding in a Barbarian, and One who had been unfaithful to his own Relations, out of desire to apprehend Another Man's Person, he made surrender of his Own. Bocchus, having Both of them now in his Power, was necessitated to betray the One or the Other, and after long debate with himself, at last resolved on his first Design, and gave up Jugurtha into the hands of Sylla.

Marius indeed triumphed for this Action, but his Enemies ascribed the whole Glory of it to Sylla, which he inwardly resented, especially when Sylla, who was naturally vain-glorious, and saw himself advanced on a sudden from a private Condition to such a high Degree of Honour and Esteem in the World, came Himself into it, and was so overborn with Vanity and Ambition that he caused a Representation of this Adventure to be engraved on a Signet with which he ever after constantly sealed his Letters. The Device was Bocchus surrendring Jugurtha, and Sylla taking him into Custody. This touched Marius to the quick, however judging Sylla to be too inconsiderable a Person to be envied by him, he continued still to employ him under him in the Army, making him one of his Lieutenants in his second Consulate, and in his Third he gave him the Command of a thousand Men in the Infantry, in which Posts Sylla perform'd many signal Services on several important Occasions. Among other of his Exploits he took Copillus, Chief of the Tectosages, Prisoner; and compelled the Marsians, a great and warlike People, to become Friends and Confederates of the Romans. But when he perceiv'd Marius began to bear a jealous Eye over him, and would no longer afford him opportunities of Action, but rather opposed his Growth, he applied himself to Catulus, Marius his Collegue in the Consulate.

This Catulus was a worthy brave Man, but naturally slow and indolent in time of Action. For this Reason he was glad to have an Officer of Sylla's Vigour and Activity under him, and accordingly employ'd him in Affairs of the greatest Trust and Difficulty. By this means Sylla's Power encreased with his Reputation. He subdued most of the Barbarians that inhabited the Alps; and in a time of Scarcity, when the Army was in great want of Provisions, he took that Province upon Himself, and brought in such Stores as were not only more than sufficient for the Forces under Catulus, but the Surplus served to supply Those commanded by Marius.

This serv'd only to make Marius still the more exasperated against him. So slight and childish was the first beginning and rise of that Enmity between them, which, nourished with civil Blood and endless Divisions, grew up to Tyranny, and the Confusion of the whole State. This argues Eurypides to have been a wise Man, and well skilled in the Distempers of the Body Politick, when he forewarned all Men (1) to beware of Ambition, as the most destructive and pernicious Goddess to Those who consult her.

(1) The Passage alluded to here by Plutarch is in the Phenissa v. 534. The Verses are so fine that I believe they will not be unacceptable to the Reader.

Sylla

Sylla by this time thinking that the Reputation of his Arms abroad was sufficient to entitle him to a Share in the Civil Administration, betook himself immediately from the Camp to the Assembly, and fell a canvassing for a Prætorship, but lost it. The fault of this disappointment he wholly ascribed to the People, who knowing his intimacy with King Bocchus, and for that Reason expecting, that if he was made Ædile before his Prætorship, he would entertain them with fine Game, and the Encounters of Libyan Beasts, chose other Prætors, on purpose to force Him on the Ædileship. The vanity of this Pretext was sufficiently disapproved by matter of Fact. (1) For the Year following, partly by stroaking the People with fair Words, and partly by Money, he got himself elected Prætor. This made (2) Cæsar reply one day with a Smile, when Sylla was reprimanding him, and threatening to make use of his own Authority against him, Thou dost well to call it thy own, for thou hast bought it. At the Expiration of his Prætorship he was sent over into Cappadocia, with a specious pretence, to re-establish Ariobarzanes in his Kingdom, but in reality to give check to the growing Power of Mithridates, who had enlarged his Dominions by new Conquests and Acquisitions equal to his paternal Inheritance. He carried with

(1) He was chosen Prætor in the six hundred and fifty seventh Year of Rome, ninety eight Years before the Incarnation, without serving the Office of Ædile. This is brought as a Proof that the Reason Sylla alledg'd for his first Repulse was without any Foundation; but it may be answered that Those who first refused to chuse him Prætor on purpose to oblige him to serve as Ædile, and give him an Opportunity of entertaining them with magnificent Shows, suffer'd themselves at last to be gain'd upon by his Money, which was more acceptable to them than his Shows.

(2) This cannot be understood of Julius Cæsar, who was but four Years old when Sylla was Prætor. The Person meant here must undoubtedly be Sextus Julius Cæsar, who was Consul four Years after Sylla's Prætorship.

him few Troops out of Italy, but found the Allies very chearful, and ready to supply him; so that having defeated a great Body of the Cappadocians, and a still greater of the Armenians, who came to their Assistance, he displaced Gordius, and confirm'd Ariobarzanes in the Kingdom.

During his stay on the Banks of the Euphrates there came unto him Orobazus, a Parthian, in quality of Ambassador from King Asaces, whereas there had as yet been no Correspondence between the two Nations. And This we may lay to the account of Sylla's Felicity, that He should be the first Roman to whom the Parthians made address for Alliance and Friendship. At the time of Reception, having ordered three Chairs of State to be set, One for Ariobarzanes, One for Orobazus, and a Third for Himself, he placed Himself in the midst, and gave Audience: For which the King of Parthia afterwards put Orobazus to Death. Some People commended Sylla for his lofty carriage towards the Barbarians: Others again accused him of Arrogance and unseasonable Ambition. It is reported, that a certain Chalcidian, of Orobazus his Retinue, looking Sylla wistfully in the Face, and observing judiciously the Motions both of his Soul and Body, according to the Rules of Art, should say, That it was impossible for Him not to be the greatest Man, or rather a wonder how he could even then miss being Head of all.

At his return Censorinus impeach'd him of Extortion, for drawing a vast summ of Money from a well-affected and associate Kingdom. However, Censorinus appeared not at the Tryal, but let fall his Accusation. The Quarrel between Sylla and Marius began to break out afresh, receiving new life from the Officiousness of Bocchus, who to curry favour with the People of Rome, and ingratiate himself with Sylla, caused several Statues to be erected in the Capitol, representing Sylla's Victories, and near them the Figure of Bocchus himself in Gold surrendering Jugurtha into the Hands of Sylla. Marius impatient of this affront resolved to pull them down, and Sylla's Friends were prepared to hinder it; so that the City had like to have taken fire by that violent Commotion, had not the Confederate War, which lay long a smothering, blaz'd forth at last, and respited the Seditious.

In the course of this War, which was great in it self, diversified with many notable Events, and often reduc'd the Romans to the last Extremity, Marius made it appear that military Virtue is of no consequence unless accompanied with a strong and vigorous Constitution: Whereas Sylla on the other hand having perform'd Actions worthy of eternal Memory (1) got the Name of a great Commander among his Citizens, of the Greatest among his Friends, and the most Fortunate among his Enemies. However he did not behave himself on that Occasion like Timotheus the Son of Conon the Athenian, who when his Enemies, and Those that envy'd his Success, attributed it All to Fortune, and had pictured Him asleep, with Fortune by his side, casting her Nets over Cities, and catching them for him, could not stand the Satyr, but complain'd that he was robbed of the Glory due to his Performances. And upon his Return

(1) This is a very judicious Distinction, which Plutarch makes in this Place, to denote that the same Actions can produce different Effects in the Minds of People, as they stand differently affected. Sylla is reputed a great General by his Fellow-Citizens who do him Justice in giving him that Character. He is cry'd up for the Greatest among his Friends; it being natural for one Friend to extoll the Actions of Another; and is allowed to be a fortunate General by his Enemies; for it is the Quality of Enemies to lessen, and disparage the Advantages of Him with whom they are at Enmity, and chuse to attribute his Success to Fortune rather than to his Experience, and Courage.

once from an Expedition wherein he had been successful, after he had given the Athenians an account of what he had done, he clos'd All with this Saying, In This at least, O ye Men of Athens, Fortune has no share. This Ingratitude in Timotheus (1) rais'd in the Goddess a Jealousy of her Power. From that time forward she forsook him; never would suffer him to accomplish any thing great or glorious; baffled him in all his Undertakings; so that in the end he fell into discredit with the People, and was banish'd.

Sylla took a quite contrary Course. He did not only suffer Others to cry up his good Fortune, but He Himself in a manner (2) deified his Actions by ascribing them to the immediate Influence of that Deity; but whether This was done out of Vanity, or that he was really in earnest, is a Question. He tells us Himself in his Memoirs, that of all his Actions, though All undertaken upon the greatest Deliberation, and regulated according to the justest Measures, Those which he had been forced to execute in a quite different Manner, than what had been at first projected, (3) and on which he had adventur'd on a sudden, had been always the most successful. And what is still stronger, he confesseth, That he was born for Fortune rather than War, by which it is plain he

(1) Plutarch in this Place speaks gravely of Fortune as of a real Deity offended at the Ingratitude of the Son of Conon. This is fit only for a superstitious Heathen. Fortune is nothing but an empty Name. The Fortune of a General consists in his grand Capacity, his Vigilance, and Experience, as has been well proved by Polybius.

(2) He did, as it were, deify them in making them pass for the Favours of Fortune, whom he esteemed, or at least our of Vanity seem'd to esteem, as a great Goddess.

(3) That might very well be without the Intervention of his imaginary Goddess Fortune. The Occasion, the Place, the Time, the Disposition of the Enemy, all these Circumstances may concur to oblige a General to alter the Measures he had taken; in which Case the Success attending that Alteration ought rather to be imputed to his Wisdom, and Valour, than to Fortune.

attributes more to Fortune than Valour. In short he makes himself entirely the Creature of Fortune, accounting even his unanimous agreement with Metellus his Fellow-Consul, and afterwards his Father-in-law, as a Blessing from Heaven. For expecting to have in him a turbulent Man in Office, he found a quiet and obliging Colleague. Moreover, in those Memoirs of His which he dedicated to Lucullus, he admonisheth him to esteem nothing more certain than what the Gods should advertise him of in a Vision by Night. He further tells us, that at a time when he was sent at the Head of an Army against the Confederates, the Earth open'd all on a sudden near a Place called Laverna, from whence issued much Fire, and a Flame shooting up to the Heavens, and that the Southsayers being consulted thereupon return'd for Answer, (1) That a Person of uncommon Courage and Beauty shou'd take the Reins of Government into his Hands, and suppress the Tumults, and Seditions, with which Rome was at that time agitated. He added that He was that Man of uncommon Courage, and Beauty. For as for his Beauty That was evident from the Colour of his Hair, which was brighter than Gold; and as for his Courage, he thought he might without shame attest it openly, after so many great and glorious Performances. And thus much of his Trust and Confidence in the Gods.

As to the rest of his Character, he was an irregular sort of Man, inconsistent with himself; much given to Rapine, to Prodigality much more; in promoting or disgracing whom he pleased, alike unaccountable; cringing to Those he stood in need of, and domineering over Others who stood in need of Him ; so that it was hard to tell, whether his Nature had more in it of Disdain or Flattery. As to his unequal distribution of punishments, when upon slight grounds he would put to the torture, and again bear gently with the greatest Crimes, and receive into grace the most hainous Transgressors upon easie terms, but small and inconsiderable Offences chastise with Death, and Confiscation of Goods ; one might from hence judge, that in Himself he was really of a bitter revengeful Nature, which however he could qualify when his Interest requir'd it. In this very Confederate-War, when the Soldiers with Stones and Clubs had kill'd a chief Commander, his own Lieutenant, Albinus by name, he passed by such a horrid indignity without taking Cognizance of it ; on the contrary, he made it turn to his own Advantage, alledging that he should hereafter have the Soldiers more under Command, and more enterprizing, on purpose to expiate their Crime by their Valour ; nor was he in the least concern'd at the Reproaches flung upon him for that Omission ; but employing all his Thoughts how to crush Marius, and seeing the Confederate-War almost at an End, he did all he could to recommend himself to the Army, as a means to be declared General of the Forces against Mithridates.

At his return to Rome he was chosen Consul with Quintus Pompeius, in the fiftieth Year of his Age, and made an advantagious Alliance the same Year, marrying Cæcilia, the Daughter of Metellus the High-priest. The common People made Sonnets on this Wedding, and many of the Nobility were disgusted at it, esteeming him, as Livy writes, unworthy of the Lady, whom before they thought worthy of a Consulship. This was not his only Wife, for first in his younger days he was joined to Ilia, by whom he had a Daughter ; after Her to Ælia, and then to Cælia, whom he dismissed as Barren, but with great Respect and a fair Character, sweetening her at the same time with some handsome Presents. But forasmuch as in a very few days after he espoused Metella, so precipitate a Match made it believed that Barrenness was not the real Cause, for which Cælia had been repudiated. As for Metella, he loved and honoured Her as long as he lived; and She was known to have so great an Interest in him, that at a time when the People were desirous to have Those of Marius his Faction recall'd, who had been banished, and Sylla refus'd to consent, they all unanimously called out upon Metella, desiring Her to intercede for them. And after he had made himself Master of Athens, it is thought he treated the City more severely than he would otherwise have done, because Some of the Citizens during the Siege had among other Bravadoes from the Walls dropped something injurious to the Character of Metella. But of This more hereafter.

Sylla being now Consul, thought the Dignity of that Office a Trifle, in Comparison to his future Views and Expectations. He longed impatiently for the chief Command in the War against Mithridates, but in This he was oppos'd by Marius, who out of a mad affectation of Glory, and thirst of Empire, those never-dying Passions, though he were broken in Body, and insufficient for the Service by reason of his Age, yet still thirsted after foreign Wars, and naval Expeditions, and watching his time whilst Sylla was absent in the Camp, sat brooding at home, and at last hatched that execrable Sedition, which wrought more Mischief to Rome than she had received from all her former Wars put together. This the Gods had foretold by many Signs and Prodigies. For a Flame broke forth of its own accord, from under the Staves of their Ensigns, and was hard to be extinguished. Three Ravens brought their Young into one of the Streets of Rome, and devoured them in publick View, carrying the Fragments back again to their Nests. Some Mice having gnaw'd the consecrated Gold in one of the Temples, the Aediles of that Temple caught One of them (a Female) in a Trap, where she brought forth five young ones, and eat up Three of them. But what was most astonishing, one day in a calm and clear Sky was heard the found of a Trumpet, but with a Blast so sharp, shrill, and doleful, that it struck Terror and Amazement into the Hearts of the People. The Hetruscan Sages affirmed, that this Prodigy betokened the Mutation of the Age, and Revolution of the whole Universe. For according to Them, there are to be in all eight Ages or Generations of Men, All differing One from the Other in their Lives and Customs; that to each of These God has allotted a certain measure of Times, determined by the Circuit of the great Year; that when one Age is almost run out, and Another approacheth, the Heavens or the Earth give Notice of it by some wonderful Token. Inſomuch that They who have ſtudied theſe Matters, and carefully examin'd them, do find that at certain Periods a Generation of Men ariſes, differing in Customs, and Manners, and more or leſs regarded by the Gods than the Preceding. They add, that among other mighty Changes which happen in this Succeſſion of Ages, or Generations, That which attends the Art of Divination is not the leaſt obſervable; That it is highly eſteem'd in one Race, and ſucceeds in all its Predictions, which are ſupported by clear and evident Tokens ſent from Above; and that in Another it ſhall be deſpiſed, and vilified;

(1) founding

(1) founding its Predictions not upon the Certainty of Science, but forming them at Random and by Conjecture, looking into Futurity through dim and imperfect Opticks. This was the Mythology of the Tuscan Sages, who were thought to be more knowing than other People. Whilst the Senate was assembled in the Temple of Bellona to consult the Diviners upon these Prodigies, a Sparrow came flying in before them all, with a Grasshopper in her Mouth; dividing it into two Parts, One of which she let fall, and flew away with the Other. Upon This the Diviners declared (2) that they apprehended a dangerous Sedition, which would break out between the Inhabitants of the City, and Those dwelling in the Country; for, said They, (3) the Citizens are noisy and clamorous,

(1) This is the only Passage in all these Accounts from whence may be drawn a useful, and important Lesson. In all Explications relating not only to the Art of Divination, but to every thing else, we are to found what we say not upon the Caprice of Opinion, but upon the Certainty of Science; without which we shall be able to come at nothing fixt, and firm; nothing but vain delusory Conjectures. But this Principle at once destroys the whole Fabrick of the Divination of the Heathens; which was entirely founded upon random Conjectures, without any the least regularity of Science.

(2) Here is an Instance of what we were saying in the foregoing Remark. What is This but a random Conjecture founded upon the Caprice of Opinion, and not upon the Regularity of Science? How can a Sparrow with a Grasshopper in his Bill, one Half of which he lets fall down into the Temple, and flies away with the Other into the Fields, denote a Sedition that is to ensue between the Inhabitants of the City, and Those of the Country? Upon what Rule of Divination is This founded? We shall see Plutarch's Reason for it in the following Remark.

(3) Here is a very considerable Fault in the Text. Instead of ἀγροπαύς, which proceeds from the Word ἀγροπαῖον in the preceding Line, it ought to be read ἀρροπαύς, as we find it in the St. Germain MS. But by what Rules did the Diviners give that Accident of the Sparrow and Grasshopper this Interpretation? By the Grasshopper ought rather to be understood the Inhabitants of the Country, and Those of the City by the Sparrow. For a Grasshopper is never to be found

rous, like the Grasshopper, whereas the Country People keep at home, and never come to Rome, but upon days of Assembly, as did this Sparrow.

About this time Marius associated to him Sulpi-tius, a Fellow second to None in the most exquisite Villanies; so that we are not to inquire what other Villains he excell'd in Wickedness, for he excell'd them All, but wherein he out-did Himself. He was a Compound of Cruelty, Impudence and Rapine, all which he exercised to that degree, that whatever was in it self most criminal and enormous, That he committed with the greatest Confidence and Unconcern. He sold by publick Outcry the Roman Freedom to Libertines, and Foreigners, telling out the Purchase-Money on Counters erected for that purpose in the Forum. He kept three thousand Sword-men in constant Pay, and had always about him a company of young Gentlemen of the Equestrian Order, ready on all occasions to execute his Commands, whom he styled his Antisenatorian-band. Having caused a Law to be enacted, that no Senator should contract a Debt of above three thousand Drachmas, He himself after his Decease was found indebted three Millions. This was the Man whom Marius let in upon the Common-wealth, and who (1) ordering in the City, where on the contrary we frequently meet with Sparrows. The Reason for this doughty Decision is in my Opinion as follows. Homer has compar'd the old Men in Troy to Grasshoppers; and the first Athenians wore Grasshoppers of Gold in their Hair. Upon This these Diviners pretended that the Grasshoppers represented the Citizens, who spend whole days in cavilling, and disputing in their As-

dering all things even of the highest Importance by Force and the Sword, made several Ordinances of dangerous Consequence, and amongst the rest, That which gave to Marius the Conduct of the Mithridatick War. Upon This the Consuls decree a Vacance, or Cessation of all publick Business; but as they were one day holding a Senate in the Temple of Castor and Pollux, he let loose his Antisennatorian Band upon them, and amongst many Others, slew Pompey the Consul's young Son, in the Forum, Pompey himself hardly escaping in the Crowd. But Sylla being closely pursued into the House of Marius, was brought back into the Forum, and forced to dissolve the Cessation; for this cause Sulpitius deposed Pompey, but condescended to continue Sylla in his Consulship, at the same time confirming to Marius the chief Command in the War against Mithridates.

Immediately upon This two military Tribunes were dispatched to Nola, to take the Charge of Sylla's Army, and resign it to Marius. But Sylla had been too nimble for them; he got first to the Camp, and told the Soldiers what Errand the Tribunes were sent upon, so that without any Ceremony they seized upon them, and stoned them. Marius in requital put the Friends of Sylla in the City to the Sword, and plunder'd their Houses. The People were all in Commotion, shifting and hurrying to and fro, Some from the Camp to the City, Others from the City to the Camp. The Senate, now no longer it self, was wholly governed by the Dictates of Marius and Sulpitius; wherefore being informed that Sylla was advancing at the Head of his Troops towards the City, they sent two of their Prætors, Brutus and Servilius, to forbid his nearer Approach. When the Soldiers understood that they had deliver'd their Message to Sylla in Terms a little too haughty, they had like to have slain them in their first Transports, but considering better of it they satisfied themselves with breaking their Rods, and stripping them of their purple Robes; after which they dismissed them, having first treated them with the highest Outrage and Insolence.

When the Romans saw them return in that Condition without their Ensigns, and Marks of Authority, this Sight flung them into the utmost Consternation; they saw the Storm ready to break, and that a Sedition was unavoidable. Marius put himself in a Readiness to repel Force by Force, and Sylla with his Collegue Pompey marched at the head of six Legions compleat from his Camp near Nola. He found the Army ready, and impatient to advance directly to Rome; but He was himself wavering, and undetermined, doubtful of the Event in so hazardous an Enterprize. As he was sacrificing, Posthumius the Sooth-sayer having inspected the Entrails, stretched forth both his hands to Sylla, and required to be bound and kept in Custody 'till the Battel was over, voluntarily submitting himself to the severest Punishment, if his Expectations and Desires were not immediately crown'd with Success. It is said that the Night following there appeared to Sylla in a Dream (1) that Goddess, whom the Romans worship according to the Cappadocian Ritual, whether it

(1) I do not find in any of the Authors I have consulted the least mention of this Fact, that the Romans had received from the Cappadocians the Worship of the three Goddesses, Luna, Minerva, or Bellona. Those Goddesses had received divine Honours at Rome long before the Romans became acquainted with Cappadocia.

That to his thinking this Goddess stood at his Head, (2) and deliver'd him her Thunder-bolt; nam'd to him his Enemies One by One, and bid him discharge upon them; and that thereupon they immediately fell, and disappeared. Encouraged by this Vision, which he related the next Morning to his Colleague, he led on towards Rome: (3) About Picina he was met by an Embassy, beseeching him not to come in that hostile manner against the City, and assuring him that the Senate had decreed to grant him every thing that was just and reasonable. He seemingly submitted to their Request, promised to encamp in that very Place, and ordered the Ground to be marked out accordingly.

The Ambassadors believing him to be in earnest returned to Rome in great Confidence. But they were scarce out of sight before he sent a Party, under the Command of Lucius Bassus and C. Mom-

(1) M. de la Grive, a Gentleman well skilled in the Greek, is of Opinion that instead of σελήνη the Moon it ought to be read Σεμέλην Semele; but how could the Romans be under any Doubt with respect to that Goddess, so as to take her for the One, or the Other of those three Goddesses so very different? I believe Plutarch was not well instructed in the Religion of the Romans as it related to this particular Article.

(2) I am pretty confident that neither the Greeks nor the Romans ever attributed the Thunder either to the Moon, Semele, or Bellona. That Circumstance cannot suit any but Minerva, of whom the Heathens believed that she enjoy'd the same Honours and Privileges with Jupiter. The Goddess therefore who appeared to Sylla in this Vision must be Minerva.

(3) This Place must necessarily have been between Nola, and Rome. But as it is a Place unknown, Father Lubin is of Opinion that the Word has been corrupted, and that instead of περὶ Πινας it ought to be read περὶ Πινίας, for Pinna was an Inn or Place of publick Reception and Entertainment in the Latin Ways about two hundred Furlongs, that is twenty five Miles, from Rome. Strabo in his fifth Book makes mention of this Place, καὶ Πινίας πανδοκεία. It is likewise mentioned in Antoninus his Itinerary. This Situation renders this Conjecture highly probable, and agrees perfectly well with the March of Sylla.

marius, to secure one of the Gates and the Wall on the side of the Æsculine Hill; following them Himself close upon the Heels with his whole Army. Basilus having possess'd himself of the Gate, got into the City, whereupon the unarm'd Multitude taking the Alarm got up to the Tops of their Houses, from whence pelting him with Stones and Tiles, they made him halt, and at last forced him back to the Wall. Sylla by this time was come up, and seeing what was done, called aloud to his Men, bidding them set fire to the Houses; and He himself with a flaming Torch in his Hand led the way, and commanded his Archers to make use of their Fire-darts, and to let fly at the tops of the Houses: This he did without the least consideration, all enraged, and yielding the Conduct of that day's work to Passion; as if All he saw were Enemies, without respect or pity either to Friends, Relations, or Acquaintance, the Word was Fire, which knows no distinction betwixt Friend or Foe, Guilt or Innocence.

In this dispute Marius being driven into the Temple of Mother-Earth, would from thence have drawn in the Bondmen by Proclamation of Freedom; but the Enemy coming on, he was overpowered, and fled the City.

Sylla having called a Senate, had Sentence of Death pass'd on Marius, and some few Others, amongst whom was Sulpitius Tribune of the People. Sulpitius being betray'd by one of his Slaves was immediately seized, and executed. (1) Sylla enfranchis'd the Slave who had betrayed him, but at the same time ordered him to be thrown

(1) A Slave who could in this manner betray his Master richly deserv'd that Punishment; but it was something astonishing to see Sylla inflict such a Punishment on a Traytor, at a time when his Affairs required the Assistance of such Cattle. headlong down the Tarpeian Rock. As for Marius, he set a Price on his Head by Proclamation, which was an Action consisting neither with Gratitude, nor Policy, if we consider into whose House He himself had fled not long before, where he was at the Mercy of his Enemy, who notwithstanding dismissed him in Safety. If Marius had then given way to Sulpitius, who was for dispatching Sylla, he might now have been Lord of All, but he chose rather to spare his Life, and release him, for which Sylla when it came to his turn to be uppermost, made him a very ungrateful and ungenerous Acknowledgment.

By these Proceedings Sylla highly offended the Senate, who could not with safety express their Repentment; but the displeasure and indignation of the Commonalty shewed it self plainly by their Actions. For they ignominiously rejected Nonius his Nephew, and one of his Friends called Servius, who put in for the first Posts in the Government, and stood upon his Interest, and Recommendation. And to make this Affront still the more sensible, they named two Others in their stead, whose Promotion they thought would give him the greatest Uneasiness. Sylla had the Address to seem well pleased with all This, saying, He with Joy saw the People by his means restored to their full Liberty of acting just as they pleased. And to pacify the publick Odium, he created Lucius Cinna Consul, one of the adverse Party, having first bound him under Oaths and Imprecations, to be true to his Interest: For Cinna ascending the Capitol with a Stone in his Hand, took a solemn Oath in the Presence of the People, to which he added this Imprecation, that in case he did not punctually observe the Oath in its fullest Extent, he might be thrown out of the City in the same manner as he then threw that Stone out of his Hand; at which Words he threw it on the Ground in the sight of the whole Assembly.

Notwithstanding all this, Cinna had no sooner entered upon his Charge, but he fell upon undoing all that had been done by Sylla, against whom he commenced a criminal Suit, and suborn'd Virginus, one of the Tribunes, to be his Accuser; but Sylla leaving Him and the Court of Judicature to themselves, set forward against Mithridates.

About the time when Sylla was ready to sail with his Forces from Italy, Mithridates, who was then at Pergamus, was disturbed by many Omens and Prognosticks, among which was the Following. It is reported that a Victory, which by means of a certain Engine contriv'd by the Pergamenians was to descend with a Crown in her Hand and place it upon the Head of Mithridates at his first Entrance into the Theater, fell asunder when she had almost reached his Head, and that the Crown tumbled down, and was broke to pieces. This Prodigy had a wonderful effect upon the Minds of the People, and Mithridates himself was so discouraged at it, that he began to distrust his Fortune, tho' his Affairs had hitherto succeeded beyond Expectation; for having wrested Asia from the Romans, and driven Nicomedes and Ariobarzanes out of their Kingdoms of Bitbynia and Cappadocia, he made Pergamus his Royal Seat, and from thence conferred on his Friends Riches, Principalities, and Kingdoms. Of his two Sons, the Eldest reigned peaceably in Pontus, and Bosphorus, which were the antient Domains of his Predecessors, and extended as far as the Defarts confining on the Palus Meotis. His other Son Ariarathes was at the Head of a powerful Army, making a Conquest of Thrace and Macedon, whilst his Generals at the Head of other Forces were fighting victoriously for him in other Quarters. Among These the most considerable was Archelaus, who having a large Fleet under his Command, was become absolute at Sea, and having subdued the Cyclades, with all the other Islands lying under the Promontory of Malea, and even Eubœa it self, at last made himself Master of Athens. From thence, as from a place of Arms, he made his Excursions, causing all the Cities in Greece to revolt from the Romans, without meeting any Rub in his way, 'till he came to Cheronea. There Brutius Sura, Deputy to Sentius Governor of Macedon, a Man of excellent Sense and undaunted Courage, oppos'd himself to this impetuous Torrent, which had laid wast all Bœotia, and having defeated him in three Engagements drove him out of Greece, and forced him back to Sea. However having received Lucullus his Orders to give place to Sylla, who had been appointed his Successor, he quitted Bœotia, and returned to Sentius, at a time when the Roman Interest was thriving to a Miracle under his Administration, when his Successes had exceeded the Hopes of All, and Greece was ripe for a Change, being at once charm'd with his Valour and Conduct. These were the Exploits of Brutius.

Sylla at his arrival received by their Ambassadors the Compliments of all the Cities of Greece, except Athens, which was forced by the Tyrant Aristion to hold for the King: whereupon Sylla marched thither with all his Forces, and investing the Haven Pyreus, laid formal Siege to it, erecting Batteries of all kinds, and trying all manner of Assaults. If he had forborn never so little, he might have taken the upper City without striking a stroke, for it was reduced by Famine to the last Extremity. But being in haste to return to Rome, and in daily fear of some Innovations there, he spared neither Dangers, Combats, nor Expences, so he might but once put an End to that War; for besides his other warlike Preparations, and Equipage, he had no less than ten thousand Yoke of Mules daily employed in the Service of his Machines, and Batteries. At last he grew in want of Timber, which had been all consumed in making those Machines, and keeping them in Repair; for many of them had been crushed by their own enormous Weight, and as many ruined by the Fire of the Enemy. In this Want he made bold with the sacred Groves, and cut down the stately Walks in the Academy, and Lyceum, two famous Inclosures in the Suburbs. And forasmuch as Money was wanting to answer the Expence of the War, he had Recourse to the Sacred and Inviolable Treasures of the Temples, and accordingly sent for the richest and most precious Offerories in Epidaurus, and Olympia. He likewise wrote to the Amphyctions assembled at Delphi, requiring them to send the Treasures of the God to Him, with whom they would remain in safer Custody; or if he should be obliged to make use of them they might be sure he would return the Value when the War was ended. At the same time he sent to Delphi one of his Friends called Caphis a Phocean, who had orders to receive it all by Weight.

When Caphis arrived at Delphi his Conscience would not suffer him to lay sacrilegious Hands on holy things, so that with Tears in his Eyes he bewailed to the Amphyctions the necessity he was under. In that very instant Some among them pretended to hear the sound of Apollo's Lyre in the Sanctuary; so that Caphis, either really believing it to be true, or else desirous to strike a religious Awe into Sylla, sent away an Express with an account of what had happened; but Sylla laughing at his Simplicity return'd for Answer, That it was Matter of Wonder to Him that Caphis should not understand that Musick was a sign of Joy, and not of Displeasure; that therefore he had nothing to do but go boldly, and take the Treasure; which the Gracious and Bountiful God would be so far from resenting, that he even invited him to come and receive it.

Whereupon all this inestimable Mass of Treasure was conveyed away, whilst the greatest Part of Greece knew not of what it consisted; only there was a Tun of Massy Silver, which of the many Royal Donations had 'till then remained untouched. This being too weighty and cumbersome for any one Carriage, the Amphyctions were forced to cut it in Pieces; and so That was a part of the Treasure which could not be secreted. This made the miserable Grecians recall to their Memory some time Flaminius, and Manius Acilius, and sometimes Paulus Æmilius, of whom One having driven Antiochus out of Greece, and the other Two overthrown the Kings of Macedon, were so far from violating the Temples, that they express a high Veneration for them, and enriched them with new Donations. Those indeed were Generals duly elected according to Law; they were Leaders of Men well disciplined, and taught to yield ready Obedience to Command. (1) These, in the Worth and Dignity of their Minds, were Sovereign Princes, though their Equipage and Expence was That of private Persons; for they scorned to receive more from the Publick, than the established Allowance, and thought it more ignominious for a General to flatter his Soldiers than fear the Enemy; whereas the Commanders of these times,

(1) This is a Saying full of profound Sense. A Man may be a King by the Grandeur and Dignity of his Mind, and at the same time a private Person by his Equipage and Expence. Nothing is more worthy in a Prince than when he knows how to match and unite Modesty and Simplicity with true Grandeur. Such were the greatest Heroes of Antiquity.

attaining to Superiority by Force, not Worth; and having need of Arms One against Another, rather than the Enemy, were constrained to temporize in Authority, and hiring the Soldiers Labour at the price of Luxury, rendered their whole Country Mercenary, and were themselves Slaves to the vilest of Wretches, that they might Lord it over their Betters. These Practices cast out Marius, and again brought him in against Sylla. The same caused Cinna to be the Assassin of Octavius, and Fimbria of Flaccus. Sylla may not unjustly be said to have been the chief Author of all these Evils: For He, in order to entice over to his Party Such as were under the Command of Others, was profusely bountiful to Those under his Own; so that what by bribing the One to revolt, and encouraging the Other in all the Excesses of Luxury and Intemperance, he soon emptied his Coffers, and came to want Money, especially for the carrying on of that Siege.

He had indeed an impatient restless Desire to be Master of Athens. Whether he was led by a senseless Emulation to fight as it were against the Shadow of that once celebrated City; or provoked at the bitter Jest and Scurrilities which the Tyrant Aristion vented daily from the Walls against Him and Metella, on purpose to vex and gaul him.

This Aristion was a Compound of Lewdness and Cruelty, (1) the very Sink of all the vicious Humours and ill Qualities of his Master Mitbridates. Thus this poor City, which had survived so many Wars, escaped so many Tyrannies, and got the better of so many Seditions, was now reduced to the last Gasp by this Tyrant, who hung upon her like a mortal and incurable Distemper. At the time when a Medimnus (i. e. Six Bushels) of Wheat was Sold for a thousand Drachmas, and the Inhabitants were forced to live on the Herbs and Roots which they found about the Citadel, and, what is worse, feed on Shoe-Leather and sodden Oyl-Bags; in the midst of this publick Misery did that profligate Wretch wallow in Luxury and Debauch, spending his whole time in revelling and dancing, or from the Walls flinging his bitter Jests at the Enemy; and whilst He and his Crew abounded in all manner of Excess, he suffered the holy Lamp of the Goddess to expire for want of Oyl; and when the High-Priestess sent to him for half a Measure of Wheat, he sent her so much Pepper. The Priests and Senators went to him in a Body, and on their Knees entreated him to have compassion on the City, and obtain a Capitulation for her. These venerable Supplicants were forced from his Presence by a Flight of Arrows. At length being driven to his last Hold, he was with much ado persuaded to dismiss two or three of his drunken Companions to treat with Sylla; who perceiving that they offered nothing to the Purpose, nor made any Overtures to an Accommodation, but that they ran on in a florid way, crying up Theseus, Eumolpus, and the Exploits of the Athenians against the Medes, he soon grew weary of such stuff, and taking them short told them, My merry Friends, You may pack up your Speeches, and be gone. I was not sent hither by the Romans to listen to your old Wives Tales, but to chastise the Rebellious.

In the mean time News came to Sylla, that some old Men discoursing in the Ceramicum, were overheard to blame the Tyrant, for not securing the Passages and Avenues on the side of the Gate Hep-tachalcos, tachalcòs, where only the Enemy might easily get over. Sylla neglected not the Report, but going in the Night, and discovering the Place to be assaultable, set freight to work: Sylla himself makes mention in his Memoirs, that Marcus Teius was the first Man who scal'd the Wall, and that meeting with an Adversary, and striking him on the Head-piece a home stroke, broke his Sword, however he shrunk not from his ground, but withstood and held him fast. The City was taken on that part, as it is recorded by the most ancient of the Athenians.

When Sylla had levelled that part of the Wall which stood between the Pyrean, and holy Gate, he entered the Breach about dead of Night in a most dreadful manner, to the Sound of an innumerable Company of Trumpets and Cornets, which however was lost in the more terrible Shouts and Menaces of a licentious Army, let loose to Rapine and Murder. We have no Account of the Number of the Slain, only from the space of ground overflowed with Blood, we may even now make some Calculation of it; for to pass by the Execution done on other Quarters of the City, the blood spilt in the Forum only covered the whole Ceramicum, as far as the Gate Dipylus: Some say it forced its way through the Gate, and overflowed the Suburb. Nor did the People which fell thus in such vast heaps, excel the number of Those, who out of pity and love to their Country, then at the point of destruction, slew Themselves; the Best of them despairing and dreading to survive, as not expecting either Humanity or Moderation in Sylla. At length, partly by the good Offices of Midias and Callipon, two Athenian Exiles, who threw themselves at his Feet, and besought him to spare the miserable Remains of Athens, partly at the Intercession of some Senators who had followed his his Camp, and seconded their Request, and for that he had by this time glutted himself with Revenge, he put a stop to his Cruelty, and making honourable mention of the ancient Athenians, I forgive (said he) the Many for the sake of a Few, the Living for the Dead. He took Athens, according to his own Memoirs, on the Calends of March, which fall out exactly on the first of Anthesterion, (1) which Day the Athenians distinguished by many Ceremonies, observed in Memory of the great Waste and Desolation caused by a Deluge, which they say happened about that time of the Year many Ages before.

At the taking of the Town, the Tyrant fled into the Cittadel, and was there besieged by Curio, who had that Charge under his Command. He held out a considerable time, but was at last forced to surrender for want of Water. There seemed something Providential in this Circumstance; for on the very day and hour on which Curio made Aristion his Prisoner, the Sky, which 'till then had been very clear and serene, was over-cast on a sudden; the Clouds gathered, and the Rain fell in such Abundance, that the Castle was overflowed.

Not long after Sylla made himself Master of the Haven Piræus, and set fire to all the Fortifications, especially the Arsenal, which had been built by Philo, and was a Master-piece of Architecture.

In the mean time Taxiles, Mithridates's General, coming down from Thrace and Macedon, with an Army of a hundred thousand Foot, ten thousand Horse, and ninety armed Chariots, sent to Archelaus to join him. Archelaus was at that time

(1) This is a remarkable Particularity. Even in Sylla's time the Athenians observed the First of March, and distinguished it by Ceremonies and Expiations for the Deluge of Ogyges, which fell out in Attica near seventeen hundred Years before.

riding in the Haven of Munichia, with intention neither to quit the Sea, or engage the Romans in Fight, but to draw out the War in length, and cut off the Enemy's Provision; which Sylla perceiving much better than Himself, decamp'd immediately, and quitted a Country so barren and uncultivated, that it was not able to subsist an Army even in times of Peace, and marched with his Forces into Bœotia. In This he was thought by Some to have taken false Measures, when leaving Attica, a rugged Country, and uneasy for the Cavalry to move in, he put himself into the plain and open Fields of Bœotia, knowing the Barbarians Strength to consist most in Horse and Chariots. But, as was said before, to avoid Famine and Scarcity, he was forced to run the risque of a Battel: Moreover, he was in Pain for Hortensius, a Man expert in War, and of a rough Soldiery Constitution, who was marching to join him with a strong Reinforcement out of Thessaly, and was way-laid by the Barbarians in the Streights. But Caphis our Countryman, led Hortensius another way, unknown to the Barbarians. He conducted him by Parnassus, to a Post situate under Fithora, which at present is a large City, but was then no better than a Fort built on the Brow of a steep Precipice, whither the Phœceans fled and secured themselves and their Effects at the time when Greece was invaded by Xerxes. Hortensius encamping here, kept off the Enemy by Day, and at Night descending by difficult Passages, he arrived safe at Patronis, where he joined Sylla who was come with the Legions to meet him. Thus united, they posted themselves on a fertile Hill, in the Plains of Elateia, set round with Trees, and watered at the Bottom: It is called Philobeotus, and is much commended by Sylla for the Fruitfulness of its Soil, and its agreeable Situation.

As

As they lay thus encamped, they seemed to the Enemy a contemptible Number, for they were not above fifteen hundred Horse, and less than fifteen thousand Foot; wherefore, the rest of the Commanders over-persuading Archelaus, and drawing up the Army, covered the Field with Horses, Chariots, Bucklers, and Targets: The clamour and hideous roar of so many Nations, standing thick together in Battalia, seem'd to rend the Sky; nor was the Pomp and Gallantry of their costly Array altogether idle and unserviceable for Terror: For the brightness of their Armour, magnificently embellished with Gold and Silver, and the lustre of their Median and Scythian Cassocks, intermixt with Brass and polished Steel, seemed to kindle the Air with a sparkling Gleam like That of Lightning, whilst the Troops were under a wavy Motion, at which the Romans were so terrified that they kept close within their Retrenchments. It was impossible for Sylla, do all he could, to remove their Fear; and he thought it not safe to force them to fight whilst they were under that Consternation. Wherefore he was obliged to sit down in quiet, and endure, though much against the Grain, the Scoffs and Insults of the Barbarians. However This very thing in the End turned to his Advantage. - The Enemy's Contempt of the Romans was followed by a Disorder among themselves. Their imaginary Superiority made them insolent and ungovernable; they had so many Commanders among them that they obeyed None. Some few of them contained themselves within their Lines; the rest, like ravenous Wolves eager upon their Prey, went prowling up and down in hopes of Plunder, which led them several Days Journey from their Camp. It is said that in these Excursions they demolished the City of Panopea, sacked Lebadia, pillaged the Temple wherein Oracles were delivered, and all This in defiance of military Discipline, without any Orders from their Generals.

Sylla in the mean time chafing and fretting to see the Cities all round destroyed, suffered not his Soldiers to lie idle, but continually kept them to hard Labour. He made them turn the Course of the River Cephisus, and draw deep Trenches, exempting none from Work; but being himself a severe Inspector, punished Those that were remiss with Rigour, to the end that being weary with working they might chuse rather to stand the Hazard of an Engagement. This happened as he designed it; for after they had been slaving for three Days together, as Sylla passed by according to Custom, to inspect the Works, they All cried out to him to lead them against the Enemy. Sylla replied, That this Demand proceeded rather from a Backwardness to Labour, than any Forwardness to fight; but if You are in good earnest, and have really a Mind to fight, go take Your Arms, and possess Yourselfes of that Post. At these Words he pointed to them a Place where formerly stood a Castle of the Parapotamians, which was now, the Town being destroyed, nothing better than the Ridge of a Mountain, sharp and craggy, and separated from Mount Edulium by the River Assus, which runs between them, and at the Foot of the Mountain falls into the Cephisus. The River growing very rapid and impetuous by this Confluence, renders that Ridge a safe and commodious Post for an Encampment. Wherefore Sylla perceiving that the Chalcaspidæ, or Brass Targettiers of the Enemy, were in Motion to post themselves upon it, was desirous to prevent them, as he did by the Vigour and Activity of his Soldiers.

Archelaus being thus repulsed, moved his Camp, and turned his Forces towards Cheronea. Whereupon upon Those of the Cheroneans, who were then in Sylla's Army, entreated him not to abandon their City; upon which Sylla detached thither one of his Legions, under the Command of Gabinus, a Tribune of the Soldiers, and added all the Cheroneans to the Party. They did all they could to arrive at Cheronea before Gabinus, but He had the Speed of them. So zealous was that Officer, and indeed more concerned for the Safety of the City than her own Citizens. Juba the Historian saith, it was not Gabinus, but Hirtius, who was employed in that Service. However, in this Manner did our City escape the Danger which so narrowly threatened her.

In the mean time the Romans were daily encouraged by Reports and Prophecies, which they received from Lebadia and the Cave of Trophonius, promising them mighty Victories. The Inhabitants of that Country report many things relating to those Prophecies; and Sylla himself affirms in the tenth Book of his Memoirs, that Q. Titius, a Man who had considerable Dealings in Greece, came to him after the Defeat of the Enemy near Cheronea, assuring him that Trophonius had foretold to him that in a few days there was to be another Battel, and another Victory on the same Spot; That This Prophecy was seconded by Another from a Soldier belonging to the Army, called Salvenius, who foretold to him the future Success of his Affairs in Italy; that both the One and the Other affirmed that what they spoke was by divine Inspiration; that they Both agreed in This, that the Vision they had seen, and which had spoke to them, perfectly resembled in Majesty, Grandeur and Beauty That of the Olympian Jupiter.

When Sylla had passed over the Assus, he marched up to Edylium, and encamped over-against Arche-laus, who had intrenched himself strongly between the Mountains Acontium and Edylinum, near a Place called Affia: The Post where he encamped being to this Day named from Him Archelaus. Sylla remained one day in that Camp, where leaving Muræna with a Legion and two Cohorts, to harass and alarm the Enemy, who were in some Disorder, he marched with the rest of the Forces to the Banks of the Cephifus, where he sacrificed. The holy Rites ended, he held on towards Cheronea, to receive the Forces there, and view Mount Thurion, where the Enemy had posted themselves. This is a craggy Height, running up gradually to a Point, which we call Orthopagon; at the foot of it is the River Morius, and the Temple of Apollo Thurius: The God had this Surname from Thuro, Mother of Cheron, whom ancient Fame makes Founder of Cheronea. Others assert, that the Heifer which Apollo gave to Cadmus for a Guide, first appeared to him there; and that the Place took its Name from thence; for the Phœnicians call a Heifer Thor.

At Sylla's approach to Cheronea, the Tribune, who had been sent thither to defend the City, went out to meet him at the Head of his Troops, bearing in his Hand a Crown of Laurel. He accepted of the Crown, caressed the Soldiers, and exhorted them to behave themselves like Romans, when there should be Occasion. Whilst he was thus animating the Soldiers, Homoloichus and Anaxidamus, two Men of Cheronea, presented themselves to him, undertaking to dislodge the Enemy from their Post at Thurium, if they might have a small Party to assist them; for that there was a By-way unknown to the Barbarians, leading from a Place called Petrochus, by the Temple of the Muses, and so up to the Top of the Mountain; from whence it was easy for them to charge upon the Barbarians, and either stone them from above, or force them down into the Plain. Sylla, assured of their Faith and Courage by Gabinus, gave them the Party they desired, and encouraged them to proceed. In the mean time he formed his Army, and disposing of the Cavalry in the two Wings, he commanded the Right Himself, and the Left he committed to the direction of Muræna; Gallus and Hortensius his Lieutenants were placed in the Rear, with a Body of Reserve, and possessed themselves of the Hills to watch the Motions of the Enemy, who were observed to extend their Wings, consisting of an infinite Number of Horse, and all their light Infantry, so as to make them pliant, and ready to wind at pleasure, and by a large Circumvolution join in a Point behind the Romans.

In the mean time the two Cæronians having received by Sylla's Appointment such a Party as they desired under the Command of Hirtius, marched unobserved by the Enemy, and gained the top of Tburium, where they formed, and were discovered all on a sudden by the Barbarians, who immediately fell into Disorder at the Sight of them, and fled in such Confusion, that they fell foul on One Another. For they durst not stand a Charge from the Romans who drove furiously at them from the upper Ground, but hurried headlong downwards, whereby Some fell on their own Spears, and Others were overtaken by the Swords of the Pursuers, insomuch that about three thousand of them were slain on the Mountain. Some of the Run-aways fell into the Hands of Muræna, in the Left Wing, and were there cut to Pieces. As many as could gain the Camp flung themselves upon the main Body with such Precipitation and Disorder, that all the Ranks were seized with Terror and Confusion, so that it was no easy Matter for the Officers to restore and compose them; and This was one of the principal Occasions of their Defeat. For Sylla taking his Advantage of the present Confusion, ran full speed upon them with his Right Wing, and came so soon up with them, as to disappoint the Service of their armed Chariots. For those Chariots acquire their Force only from the Length of their Course, which gives an impetuous Rapidity to their Motion; whereas a short Drift cramps them in their Career, and renders them weak and useless, like the Flight of an Arrow from an unbraced Bow. Thus it fared with the Barbarians, whose Chariots in the Front started as it were upon a spurt, and made so weak an Impression in the Charge, that the Romans repelled them with ease, and setting up a loud Laugh called for more of them, as it is customary to do at Rome in their Races in the Circus.

By this time the Gros of both Armies were engaged. The Barbarians, on one side, charged their long Pikes, and with Shields locked close together, like a Roof over-head, strove what in them lay to maintain their Ground; and the Romans, on the other side, threw by their Piles, and with Sword in Hand endeavoured to parry their Pikes, and close them in the first Transports of their Fury, which was exceedingly aggravated at the Sight of fifteen thousand Slaves, whom the King's Officers had debauched from them by a Proclamation of Freedom, and incorporated with their Infantry; whereupon a Roman Centurion made this pleasant Reflection, (1) That he never knew Slaves allowed to play the Masters, unless on the Holy-Days of Saturn. Notwithstanding which these Slaves, contrary to their natural Genius, had so much Courage and Resolution as to stand the Shock of the Roman Infantry. Their Battallions were so close and deep, that the Romans with all their Force and Skill could not break their Ranks, nor force them to give way 'till the light Infantry in the second Line let fligh at them with Showers of Darts and Stones, and at last broke them. As Archelaus was extending the Right Wing to encompass the Enemy, Hortensius with his Cohorts came down amain, with intention to charge him in the Flank; but Archelaus wheeling about suddenly, with two thousand Horse, Hortensius, overlaid with numbers, withdrew himself to the upper Grounds, where he was far from the main Body, and surrounded by the Enemy: When Sylla heard This, he came speeding with some Troops from the Right Wing, which had not yet engaged, to his Succour; but Archelaus guessing the matter by the dust of his Troops, turned on a sudden to the Right Wing from whence Sylla came, in hopes to have surprized it without a Commander: At the same instant likewise Taxiles, with the Chalcaspi-de, assailed Muræna, so as a Cry coming from both places, and the Hills repeating it around, Sylla stood in suspence which way to move; but after a little Consideration, he thought it best to return to his old Post, and support his Right Wing: wherefore he detached Hortensius with four Cohorts to the Assistance of Muræna, and commanding the fifth to follow him, returned on the Spur to the Right Wing, which he found engaged without him, and fighting upon equal Terms with Archelaus. But immediately upon his Appearance, being animated by the Presence of their General, they made one Push for All, routed the Enemy, and pursued them flying in a disorderly manner towards the River and Mount Acontium.

After

After this lucky Stroke, Sylla, without loss of time, hastened to the Assistance of Muræna, and finding that He had likewise on his Part overthrown Taxiles, he joined him in the Pursuit. Many Barbarians were slain on the Spot, and many more cut in pieces as they were making to the Camp: Of such infinite Multitudes, ten thousand only got safe into Chalcis. Sylla writes, that there were but fourteen of his Soldiers wanting, and that Two even of Those returned towards Evening; for which Reason he caused these Words to be inscribed on the Trophies erected on that Occasion, Mars, Victory, Venus: In acknowledgement that he was as much obliged to Fortune for his Success, as to his own Capacity and the Valour of his Troops. There were two Trophies erected; the First, which was for the Victory obtained in the Plain, was raised in that Place where Archelaus first turned his Back, and fled as far as the Banks of the Molus. The Other was erected on the Top of Mount Thurium, where the Barbarians were first surprized in the Beginning of the Engagement, on which was inscribed in Greek Characters, Homoloichus and Anaxidamus Commanders.

In Joy and Acknowledgement for so entire a Victory, he caused Musick Shews to be exhibited at Thebes, where he ordered a Theatre to be built for that Purpose near (1) the Fountain of Oedipus, and sent for the Judges, who were to dispose of the Rewards or Prizes, out of the neighbouring Cities, (2) for he had conceived an implacable Hatred to the Thebans, and ordained that one Moiety of their

(1) Pausanias tells us this Fountain was so called, because it was in those Waters Oedipus washed off the Blood with which he was stained upon the Murder of his Father.

(2) Plutarch adds this as a Reason for what he had been just saying, that Sylla had sent for the Judges, who were to distribute the Prizes out of the neighbouring Cities. He ought in Justice

Territories should be consecrated to Apollo Pythius, and the Olympian Jupiter; and that the Revenue should be applied to make good the Money he had taken out of their Temples.

About this time he was informed that Flaccus, a Man of the contrary Faction, had been named Consul, and that he had crossed the Ionian Sea with an Army, to act in shew against Mitridates, but in reality against himself; wherefore he immediately marched with his Army towards Theffaly, in order to meet him. But he was hardly arrived at the City of Meliteia before he received Advice from all Parts, that the Countries he had just quitted were over-run, and wasted by a royal Army more powerful and numerous than the Former. For Dorilaus arriving at Chalcis with a mighty Fleet (on board of which he brought over with him eighty thousand of the best appointed, and best disciplined Soldiers Mitridates had in his Army) had made a sudden Incurfion into Bæotia, and secured that Coast, in hopes to bring Sylla to a Battel. He would not so much as hear the Reasons offered by Archelaus, who endeavoured to dissuade him; but on the contrary insinuated that it was impossible so Many could have fallen in the late Battel without Treachery.

However, Sylla facing about expeditiously, made it appear to Dorilaus, that Archelaus was a wise Man, and had given Him good Advice, having had sufficient Experience of the Roman Valour; in somuch as Dorilaus Himself, after some small Skirmishes with Sylla at (1) Tilphossion, was the first of All who thought it not advisable to put things to the decision of the Sword, but rather by expence of Time and Treasure to wear out the War. Notwithstanding this Opinion, the Plain of Orchomenus, where they lay encamped, inspired Archelaus with new Courage; he thought it an advantageous Place for an Army to engage in, who were superior to the Enemy in Horse. For of all the Plains in Bœotia, That which begins at Orchomene is the largest and most beautiful. It is all an open Campaign void of cover, and stretches out as far as to the Fens, into which the River Melas discharges itself. Of all the Grecian Rivers, This only which ariseth from under the City Orchomenus, draws with it a deep and navigable Water from the very Head, encreasing about the Summer Solstice like the Nile, and producing the same sort of Plants with that River, only they shoot up higher, are barren and unprofitable. It runs not far before the main Stream loseth itself among those blind and woody Marsh-Grounds, only a small Branch thereof mingleth with the Cephisus, about that place especially where the Lake is thought to produce the best (1) Flute-reeds.

near the City of Alalcomene. He adds that this Mountain is very strong by its Situation, and that at the Foot is the Fountain Tilphosa, and the Tomb of Tiresias, who died there in his Flight. We shall explain this last Particularity by a Passage out of Pausanias, who saith that Tiresias as he was flying with the Thebans, who had been forced out of the City by the Epigones, and were retiring to that Mountain, was quite spent with Fatigues and Thirst, which he endeavoured to quench at that Fountain, and died as he was drinking. They erected a Tomb for him on the very Spot

(1) Plutarch speaking of this very Place in the Life of Lysander, saith, that there it was the Canes grew with which Javelins were made. And here he saith it produced the best Reed for Flutes. This agrees with what Strabo writes in his ninth Book, which may serve to illustrate this Passage in Plutarch. It is said, saith he, that near the City of Orchomenus the Earth opens, and receives into its Bosom the River Melas, which passing through

Now both Armies being posted near each other upon this Plain, Archelaus lay still, but Sylla fell to casting up Ditches athwart from either side, that if possible, by cutting the Enemies from the firm and open Champagne, he might force them into the Fens. The Barbarians on the other hand, resolved to put a stop to that Work, fell upon Those employed in it, and at the same time routed the Forces that had been sent to cover them. When Sylla perceived This, he leaped from his Horse, and snatching hold of an Ensign, rushed through the Fugitive Soldiers upon the Enemy: telling them aloud; For my Part, O ye Romans! I think it glorious to fall here; but as for You, when it shall be demanded of You where You left your General, remember You say at Orchomenus. His Men rallying again at these words, and two Cohorts coming to his succour from the Right Wing, he gave a fierce Onset, and turned the Day. Then retiring some few Paces back, and refreshing his Men, he came on again to block up the Enemies Camp, but They again sallied out in better Order than before. Here Diogenes, Son-in-law to Archelaus, having fought on the Right Wing with much Gallantry, made an honourable End. And the Archers being pressed on hard by the Romans, for want of Space to make use of their Bows, took their Arrows by handfuls, and using them as through the Territories of Haliartus, forms a large Lake or Marsh which produceth the Reed of which they make Flutes, or Pipes. This is the same Lake which he calls afterwards the Copaide Lake, and which he saith Plutarch calls Chephissides, from the River Cephisus, which there mingleth its Waters with it, which agrees with Plutarch in this Place. And he repeats it once more that this Lake produceth the Reed with which they make Flutes. Thus Strabo in two distinct Places takes notice of the Reed fit for Flutes; but in Neither of them mentions Those spoken of by Plutarch in the Life of Lysander, with which they made Darts, or Javelins. If Both of those Sorts had been there, how came Strabo to omit One of them?

Swords,

The L I F E of

Swords, they did great Execution upon the Enemy. At last they were All repulsed and driven back into their Camp, where they had a melancholy Night of it, by reason of the slain and wounded, of which they had Both in great Numbers.

The next day, as soon as it was light, Sylla led his Men again towards the Camp of the Enemy, to continue the Trenches; and falling upon Those who were drawn out to disturb and drive the Romans from the Works, he charged them so hard, that they took up their Heels, and fled. The Run-aways infected Those who remained in the Camp with Fear, so that not a Man of them had the Courage to look the Romans in the Face. Sylla entered Pell-Mell with Those that fled, and made himself Master of All, with little or no Resistance. In a Moment the Marshes were died with Blood, and the Lake filled with dead Bodies; insomuch that even at this day are often found in it Bows, Helmets, broken Cuirasses, Swords, and other Arms of the Barbarians buried deep in the Mud, though it is now near two hundred Years since that Battel. Thus much of the Actions at Chero-nea and Orchomenus.

In the mean time Cinna and Carbo exercised the greatest Violence and Injustice to Persons of the highest Rank and Eminency in Rome; insomuch that most of them, to avoid that Tyranny, repaired to Sylla's Camp, as to a safe Harbour, where in a short space he had about him the Majestick Face of a Senate. Metella likewise having with much difficulty conveyed herself and Children away by stealth, brought him word that his House in the City had been burnt down by his Adversaries, and pressed him to hasten to the Relief and Succour of his Friends in Rome.

Whilst

Whilst Sylla was in dispute with Himself, and undetermined what Course to take; for on the one hand he could not suffer his Country to remain in the miserable Condition to which it was reduced, nor could he on the other resolve to leave unfinished so important a Work as was the War against Mithridates; whilst he was under this Dilemma, a certain Merchant of Delium, called Archelaus, arrived at the Camp with a secret Commission, and some promising Overtures from Archelaus, the King's General. Sylla liked the business so well as to desire a speedy Conference with Archelaus in Person, and had a Meeting at Sea on that side of Delium where the Temple of Apollo stands. Archelaus began first, and proposed to Sylla to quit his Pretensions to Asia and Pontus, and return without delay and extinguish the Civil War which was breaking out in Rome; offering him upon those Conditions on the King's Part to supply him with Men, Money, and Shipping. Sylla interrupting him, proposed to Him to quit Mithridates's Service and Interest, to proclaim himself King in his stead, and become a Friend and Ally to the Romans, and lastly to deliver the Fleet up to Him. When Archelaus professed his Abhorrence of such a Treason, Sylla proceeding said, Dost Thou, Archelaus, who art by Birth a Cappadocian, in Circumstances a Slave, or if thou pleasest the Favourite of a Barbarian Prince, dost Thou start at a Proposition, shameful indeed in itself; but attended with so many Advantages: and dost thou presume so much as to mention Treason to Me, Sylla, to Me who am a General of the Romans! As if thou wert not that Archelaus who at Chæronea ran away with a handful of Men, the wretched Remains of a hundred and twenty thousand; who lay sculking for two days together in the Marshes of Orchomenus, and at last left Bœotia damned up with Heaps of Carcasses. This resolute

Answer made Archelaus alter his Tone, and in a suppliant Manner desire Sylla to consent to a Peace with Mithridates, to which Sylla condescended, and a Peace was concluded upon the following Conditions: That Mithridates should quit Asia and Paphlagonia, restore Bithynia to Nicomedes, Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes, and pay the Romans two thousand Talents towards the Charges of the War, and deliver up seventy of his Ships with all their Rigging: That on the other hand Sylla should confirm to him all the rest of his Dominions, and declare him a Confederate of the Romans.

These Terms and Conditions being thus regulated and agreed to, Sylla retired, marching with his Army through Thessaly and Macedonia, and so on to the Hellepont, taking Archelaus with him, to whom he shewed a particular Respect; insomuch that Archelaus falling dangerously ill at Larissa, Sylla halted there on his Account, and had as much Care taken of him as if he had been one of his own Officers, or his Colleague. This gave People a Handle (1) to reflect upon the Battel at Chæroneæ, as if Archelaus had fought Booty; and That which seemed to justify their Reflections was Sylla's releasing all the Prisoners taken in the War, that were known to be in any degree of Favour with Mithridates, and removing Aristion only by Poison, because he was under the Displeasure of that Prince; to This, and in Confirmation of it, they added the generous Grant of ten thousand Acres of Land in Eubæa, which Sylla conferred on that Cappadocian, honouring him at the same time with the Title of Friend and Ally of the Romans.

(1) For those particular Instances of Respect and Friendship shewed by Sylla to Archelaus looked like so many Tokens of Gratitude and Acknowledgment to that Cappadocian for having betrayed his Master, and been thereby instrumental in Sylla's Success.

But

But Sylla in his Memoirs wipes off all these Aspersions.

Whilst he lay at Larissa there came to him Ambassadors from Mithridates, to tell him that their Master had agreed to, and ratified all the other Articles, but that he could not part with Paphlagonia; and as for the Ships, they insisted that That Article was not in Archelaus's Instructions. Sylla nettled at this Prevarication, replied, Say You so? Does Mithridates pretend to keep Paphlagonia, and does he refuse to ratify that Article relating to the Ships? He who I thought would gladly have come and thanked me on his Knees if I spared him that Right Hand of His, which has been the Death of so many Romans. I am sure he will speak in another tone when once I have set my Foot in Asia. In the mean time let him remain in Safety at Pergamus, and from thence issue out his Orders (1) for the Conduct of a War He never saw.

The Ambassadors stunned with this Answer had not a Word to say for themselves; but Archelaus interceded with Sylla, and seizing on his right Hand, which he washed with his Tears, earnestly conjured him to be pacified. He desired that He might be sent to Mithridates, in Confidence that He should be able to bring him to consent to all the Articles; but if he failed of That, he would put an end to his Life and Negotiation together. Sylla relied upon his Promise, and dispatched him; and without loss of time fell with his Army into Media, where he laid the Country waste, and returned back into Macedonia. Archelaus returned to him at Philippi, and reported that every thing should go as he would have it; only Mithridates

(1) This is a verry cutting Reproach. Sylla meant by it that if he had beheld that War with his own Eyes, and had been in would gladly submit to Articles still more heavy than Those at which he now boggled.

most earnestly desired an Interview. Fimbria having murdered Flaccus the Consul, who was in the contrary Interest, and defeated some of Mithridates's Commanders, was advancing against that Prince himself. This put Mithridates in a sort of Fright, and made him desirous of Sylla's Friendship.

Their Interview was at Dardanus, in the Country of Troas. Mithridates came thither with two hundred Gallies, twenty thousand Foot, six thousand Horse, and a great Number of armed Chariots; whereas Sylla was attended only with four Cohorts and two hundred Horse. As Mithridates came up, and offered his Hand to Sylla, Sylla began first, and asked him if he consented to a Peace upon the Terms and Conditions settled between Him and Archelaus? and when the King made no Reply, Know you not, said he, that it is the Business of Suppliants to speak first, and that the Victorious have nothing to do but to be silent and give Audience? And when Mithridates, entering upon his Plea, began to charge the Cause of the War, partly on the Gods, and partly to blame the Romans themselves, he took him up, saying, He had heard indeed long since from Others, and now knew it himself for truth, that Mithridates was a powerful Speaker, who to set off such foul and unjust Practices, wanted not for handsome Pretences. Then charging him with the many Outrages he had committed, he asked him once more if he was willing or no to ratifie the Treaty? Mithridates answering in the Affirmative, Sylla ran up to him, embraced and kissed him. After which he introduced Ariobarzanes and Nicomedes, the two Kings, and reconciled them to Mithridates; who when he had delivered up to Sylla the seventy Ships, and furnished him with five hundred Archers, set sail for Pontus.

Sylla soon found that this Peace was in no degree acceptable to the Army; the Soldiers could not with Patience see Mithridates, who of all the Kings had been the most bitter Enemy to Rome, and had caused one hundred and fifty thousand Romans to be massacred in one day throughout Asia; they could not with Patience see Him return home laden with Spoils and Plunder, and sail unmolested out of the Ports of Asia, which he had been squeezing and pillaging for four Years together; but he replied in his own Justification, that he had not agreed to the Peace but in Consideration that he was not in a Condition to have withstood Fimbria and Mithridates, if they should have acted in Conjunction against him.

A few days after This Sylla set out in his March against Fimbria, who lay under the Walls of Thyatira in Lydia; and having encamped with his Forces pretty near him, began to intrench himself. Whilst his Men were employed in that Work Fimbria's Soldiers came to them out of their Lines, without their Arms, and only in their Cassocks, saluting them in a friendly manner, and laying Their Hand to the Plough with them. Fimbria observing this Change and Disposition in his Army, and dreading Sylla as his irreconcilable Enemy, laid violent Hands on himself in the Camp.

Sylla laid a Fine of twenty thousand Talents to be levied upon Asia in general, besides which he exceedingly oppressed the Inhabitants in particular, giving them up to the Insolence and Rapaciousness of his Soldiers, who were quartered upon them, and lived at discretion as in a conquered Country. He ordained the Master of the House to allow every Soldier quartered upon him four Tetrachmas a day, and every Night provide a Supper for Him, and as Many as he should bring with him; and that a Centurion should be allowed fifty Drachmas a day, and two Robes, One to be worn in the House, and the Other when he went abroad.

Having thus chastized Asia, he set sail from Ephesus, and the third day after anchored in the Haven of Pyreus. Here he caused himself to be initiated in the grand Mysteries, and seized to his own Use the Library of Apellicon the Teian, wherein were most of the Writings of Aristotle and Theophrastus, which were then known but to a Few. This Library was removed to Rome, out of which it is said Tyrannion the Grammariān made most of his Collections, and that Andronicus the Rhodian having through his means the Command of divers Copies, put out those Heads of Treatises which are now common in every Man's Hands, under the Name of Indexes or Tables. The ancient Peripateticks were of Themselves indeed Men of Polite and Universal Learning: but had not then seen Many of the Works of Aristotle and Theophrastus, and Those Treatises they had seen were neither entire nor Correct; because the Estate of Neleus of Scepsis, to whom Theophrastus had bequeathed his Books and Writings, fell into the Hands of idle illiterate People.

During Sylla's stay at Athens, a painful Numness fell into his Feet, which Strabo calls the first stuttering of the Gout. Whereupon he was conveyed by Sea to a Place called (1) Ædepsus, famous for its hot Waters, where he bathed, and at the same time diverted himself for whole days together in the Company of Musicians, Dancers, and Stage-Players. As he was one day walking upon the Beach, some Fishermen made him a Present of fine Fish they had just then taken. Sylla, taken with the Compliment, inquired of what Country the Fishermen were; and when he was told that they were of the Town of Alææ, What, said he, are any of the Alæans left alive? For after the Battel at Orchomenus, as he was in Pursuit of the Enemy, he had destroyed three Cities in Bœotia, Anthedon, Larymna, and Alææ. These Words put the poor Men into a terrible fright; and struck them quite dumb; which when Sylla observed he fell a laughing, and told them They might go away in Peace and Safety, for they had brought with them Mediators whose Intercession was not to be rejected. From that Moment the Alæans were encouraged, and returned with great Confidence from their Disperſion home to Alææ.

(1) Thus it ought to be read, as Xylander has corrected it, and not Adipsus, as it is in the Text. Strabo mentions the hot Baths in Ædepsus, τὰ τε δέψματα ἐν Αἰδνψῶ, and the hot Baths at Ædepsus, lib. 1.

Sylla having marched through Theſſaly, and Macedon, down to the Sea-coaſt, prepared with twelve hundred Veſſels to croſs over from Dyrrachium to Brundufium. Not far from hence is Apollonia, and near it a ſpot of Ground called (1) Nymphæum, which from among flowry Dales and Meads

(1) Dion has left us a very full Deſcription of this Place in his forty firſt Book. Apollonia, ſaith he, a Corinthian Colony, is extremely well ſituated, not only with reſpect to the Land, but to the Sea, and the Rivers. That which I found the moſt worthy of Remark is that Floods of Fire continually iſſue out of the River Anas, which do not ſpread, nor burn or dry up the Places over which they flow. On the contrary all that part abounds with Herbage, Trees, and Plants, which thrive well, being nourished by the Rains that fall, and make them grow apace. For this Reaſon that place is called Nymphæum. To this he adds a merry ſort of Oracle, which uſed to be delivered in that Place.

He who was to conſult the Oracle took Incenſe in his Hand, and when he had ſaid his Prayers flung it into the Fire, deſiring it to convey his Vows thither. If the Perſon was to obtain what he wiſhed for, the Incenſe was immediately conſumed, and if by chance it fell aſide, and not into the Fire, the Flame purſued, and devoured it. But if he was not to ſucceed in his Wiſhes the Incenſe would not go near the Fire, and if at any time it did chance to fall into the very middle of it, it jumped out, and fled from it. This never failed upon any Queries that were put, unleſs they related to Death, or Marriage; for no one whatever was allowed to ask any Questions

Meads discovers here and there Springs of Fire continually streaming out. (1) Here, they say, was a Satyr, such as Statuaries and Painters represent, found sleeping, and brought before Sylla, where he was asked by several Interpreters, who he was, when with much ado he utter'd a harsh inarticulate Sound like the neighing of a Horse, and bleating of a Goat join'd in Consort. Sylla frightened at the Figure order'd him to be removed as a Monster offensive to fight.

Just as he was ready to embark he began to be apprehensive that his Soldiers as soon as they were landed would disband, and return every Man to his own Habitation. But they All came, and took a voluntary Oath to stand by him to the last, and if they could help it, commit no Waste or Disorders in Italy; and when they found he was in want of a round Sum of Money, they taxed one another in Proportion to their respective Abilities, and brought Him the Collection. Sylla would not receive their Benevolence, but thanked them for their good Will, and when he had exhorted them to behave themselves well he embarked, and put over, as he tells us Himself, against fifteen Generals of the contrary Faction, and four hundred and fifty Cohorts.

But the Gods by plain sensible Omens assured him of Success; for as he was sacrificing at his upon these two Articles. Ælian in his various History has likewise given us a very elegant Description of this Place; and Strabo speaks of it in his seventh Book, where he saith that this Nymphæum is a Rock out of which Fire issueth, and beneath it flows Streams of flaming Bitumen, the Soil being of a hot bituminous Quality. Near it is a Hill where there is a Mine of Bitumen, and whatever is dug out of it is restored in time, all the Soil changing into that Species.

(1) This is all Fabulous. There are no such Monsters in Nature. It happens now and then that Some are found to have a sort of Horn on the Head, of which modern Instances may be produced. This leads the Imagination, which always leans to the Prodigious, to pretend without any other Foundation that there are in Reality Satyrs, Pans and Ægipans.

first landing in Tarentum, (1) the Liver seemed to have impress upon it the figure of a Crown of Laurel, with two Labels pendant. A little before he embarked at Dyrrachium two Goats were seen on the Mountain (2) Hephaeon in Campania encountering one another in broad day-light, and performing like Men in an Engagement. It is true this was but a Phantom, which ascending by little and little, from the Earth, dispersed it self in the Air by degrees, and at last totally disappeared. Not long after This Sylla was attacked in that very Place by young Marius, and Norbanus the Consul, who had brought two powerful Armies against him; when He without drawing up his Men, or forming any order of Battel, overcame them Both, purely by the common Alacrity and Resolution of his Troops, and constrained the Consul to shut himself up in Capua, after the loss of seven thousand of his Soldiers.

(1) It is well known what Artifices the Priests made use of to make the Liver of the Victims carry what Figures or Appearances they pleased. They traced out the Figures upon the Hand: then taking the Liver, and holding it very close, they easily made the Impression upon it whilst it was warm, and pliant.

(2) This Mountain is unknown, there being no mention to be found of it in any of the ancient Writers, and that Book of Livy, wherein is contain'd a Description of Sylla's Victory over Norbanus is lost. But as Sylla compelled Norbanus to retire to Capua, Father Lubm believes Plutarch speaks here of a Mountain in the Neighbourhood of that Place, and upon This conjectures that instead of τὸ Ἡφαίων ὄρος, it should be Τίφαϊον ὄρος, the Mount Tiphæon. For Livy speaks of a Mountain called Ti- fata, which he places near to Capua. Tifata, imminentes Capuae colles quum presidio firmo occupassent; descendunt inde quadrato agmine in planitiem, qua Capuam, Tifataque interjacet. VII. 29. We meet likewise with a mention of it in Festus, who gives us an Explanation of this very Word. Tifata. saith he, iliceta. Roma autem Tifata Curia. Tifata etiam Lucus circa Capuam. " Tifata are " Woods; from whence are cal- " led Tifata Curia, the Woods " that adorn the House of Curius " at Rome; from thence also a " place near Capua is called Ti- " fata". That is, this Mountain was so called from the Woods with which it was covered. This Mountain stretched out towards the South between Capua and Nola, separating Campania from the Country of the Samnites. It is at present called Monte di Capua.

He tells us it was owing to this lucky beginning that his Men did not disband, nor run home, but stuck close to him, and despised the Enemy, tho' infinitely superior in Number.

At Silvium (as he himself relates it) there met him a Servant of one Pontius, a Citizen of Rome, who with an enthusiastick Air told him he brought to him the power of the Sword and Victory from Bellona, the Goddess of War; and that if he did not make haste the Capitol would be burnt; which fell out on the same Day the Man had foretold it, namely on the sixth Day of the Month Quintilis, which we now call July.

Moreover, at Fidentia, Marcus Lucullus, one of Sylla's Commanders, reposed such confidence in the sprightly forwardness of the Soldiers, as to dare to face fifty Cohorts of the Enemy, with only sixteen of his Own; but because Many of them were unarmed, he delayed the Onset. As he stood thus in a doubt, and considering with Himself, a gentle gale of Wind sprung from the neighbouring Meadows, and bearing along with it a great Quantity of Flowers, dropped them upon the Army, where falling casually they rested upon the Shields and Helmets of the Soldiers, in such a manner as made them shew to their Enemies as if they were crown'd with Garlands. This added to their former Sprightliness and Courage; so that they charged fiercely upon the Enemy, defeated them, killed eighteen thousand upon the Spot, and took their Camp. This Lucullus was Brother to the Lucullus who not long after conquered Mitbridates and Tygranes.

Sylla seeing himself surrounded with so many Armies, and such mighty Powers, had recourse to Art, inviting Scipio the other Consul to a Treaty of Peace. The Motion was willingly embraced, and thereupon followed several Meetings and Consultations, sultations, in all which Sylla interposing still matter of delay and new Pretences, in the mean while debauched Scipio's Men by his Own, who in subtile train and all the Methods of Inveigling, were as well practised as the General Himself. For entring into the Enemy's Quarters, and intermixing, they wrought off Some by present Money, Some by Promises, Others by fair Words and Persuasions; so as in the end, when Sylla with twenty Cohorts drew near, they came forth to salute him, leaving Scipio behind in his Tent, where he was found all alone, and dismissed. Thus Sylla having used twenty Cohorts as Stales, to draw in Forty more of the Enemy, led them all back into the Camp. On this occasion Carbo was heard to say, That having a Fox and a Lion in the Breast of Sylla to deal with, he was plagued most with the Fox.

Some time after, at Signium, Marius the younger, with eighty five Cohorts, offered Battel to Sylla, who was extreamly desirous to have it decided on that very day; for the night before he had seen a Vision, which to his thoughts represented Marius the Elder, who had been dead five or six Years, advising his Son Marius to beware of the following Day, which might be of fatal consequence to him. For this reason Sylla, longing to come to a Battel, sent for Dolabella, who had a separate Camp at some Distance from him, to come and join him. The Enemy having posted themselves between the two Camps, and cut off their Communication, Sylla's Soldiers advanced to dislodge them, and open the Passage for their Comrades. They had been pretty well wearied in this Service, when a strong Shower of Rain fell, and still added to their Fatigue. This made the Officers apply to Sylla, and beseech him to defer the Battel, desiring him to consider the Condition the Soldiers were in, quite spent, lying here and there on the bare Ground, or reclining clining on their Bucklers. With much ado he suffer'd himself to be prevail'd upon, and so gave Orders for an Intrenchment to be cast up before his Camp.

The Soldiers had hardly began to break Ground when Marius came up to the very Works at the Head of his Troops, perswaded that now was the time to set upon them, and that he might easily disperse them in their present Disorder. Here Fortune took care to have Sylla's Vision fulfilled. For the Soldiers, stirred up with Anger, left the Works, and sticking their Piles on the Bank, with drawn Swords and a couragious Shout came to hand-blows with the Enemy, who took to their Heels, and were most of them cut off in the Flight. Marius fled to Preneſte, where he found the Gates shut, but fastening himself to a Cord, which had been thrown down to him for that purpose, he was drawn up, and so got into the City.

There are some Authors, of whom Fenestella is One, who say Marius was so far from being in the Battel, that he was not so much as within the Noise of it, but that being spent with hard Duty he was reposing himself under a Tree when the Signal was given, and fell into so sound a sleep that they could hardly wake him when they were upon the Flight. Sylla saith he lost only three and twenty Men upon this Occasion, and that he killed of the Enemy twenty thousand, and took eight thousand Prisoners.

Sylla was no less successful by his Lieutenants Pompey, Crassus, Metellus, and Servilius, who with little or no loss cut off great Numbers of the Enemy; insomuch that the Consul Papirius Carbo, who was the chief support of the contrary Party, stole from his Army by Night, and sail'd over into Libya.

The last of Sylla's Engagements was against Telesinus the Samnite, who entering like a fresh Champion into the Lists to take up the Cudgels against the Conqueror, wanted little of foiling Sylla before the very Gates of Rome. This Man having drawn together a considerable Body by the Assistance of Lampomius a Lucanian, marched with the utmost Expedition to relieve Marius, who was besieged in Preneſte. But perceiving Sylla marching against him to attack him in the Front, and Pompey ready to fall upon his Rear, and that he could not move backwards nor forwards without running a great Risk, like a wary Soldier, and experienced Officer, he decamped in the Night, and marched directly to Rome, which would have been no difficult Matter for him to have entered at once, for it was in no Condition of making a Defence. But when he was got within ten Furlongs of the Collatine Gate he thought it sufficient to remain that Night under the Walls, valuing himself much upon the Thoughts of having outwitted two such Generals as were Sylla and Pompey, and not doubting but the End would be answerable to so glorious a Beginning.

At break of Day all the Youth of the first Rank in Rome sallied out upon him; of whom many were slain, particularly Appius Claudius, a Person of extraordinary Hopes, and One of the first Quality in the City. By this time Rome, as it may easily be imagined, was in the utmost Consternation; a General Fright had seized the Inhabitants, and the Streets were filled with Women shrieking, and lamenting, as if the City was then taken, and They in the Hands of the Enemy. Whilst Affairs were in this Posture Balbus arrived at the Head of seven hundred Horse. He had rid hard, and halted only till the Horses could be rubbed down, and new bridled, so that he came in the nick of Time to give the Enemy a Diversion. At that Instant Sylla himself appeared, and as soon as They who were first advanced had had a little time to refresh themselves he drew up in order of Battel. Dolabella and Torquatus earnestly prest him to a Respite, and not expose his Troops harrassed, and spent as they were, to a desperate Push, where All lay at Hazard. They advised him to consider that he had not now a Marius or a Carbo to deal with, but the Lucanians and Samnites, two of the most warlike Nations in all Italy, and profest Enemies to the Romans. Sylla would not so much as hear them, but commanded the Trumpets to sound the Charge, though it was then late in the day, about four in the Afternoon. In this Engagement, which was the sharpest of any that had happened during the whole Course of the War, the Wing wherein Crassus commanded had the Advantage; but the Left was pushed, and hard put to it; whereupon Sylla hastned thither mounted on a white Courser full of Mettle, and exceeding fleet. Two of the Enemy, knowing him by his Equipage, levelled their Darts in order to lance them at him. This was unperceived by Sylla, but his Querry observed them, and gave his Horse a Lash which made him bounce forwards, so that the Darts just grazed upon his Tail, and fell into the Ground at some Distance from him. (1) It is said that he had a little golden Image of Apollo, which he brought from Delphi, and constantly wore it in his Bosom in all Engagements; that in This Action he kissed it with much Devotion, and addrest himself to it in the Words following: Great Apollo, the Pythian, Thou who hast given Cornelius Sylla the Victory in so many Engagements, and rais'd him to the

(1) This is remarkable. It appears by This that the Heathens used to carry about them little Figures of their Gods, to entitle them to their Assistance and Protection.

highest pitch of Glory, hast thou at last brought him before the Gates of Rome, there to fall ignominiously with his Fellow-Citizens?

Having thus implor'd the Assistance of Apollo, Some of his Men he conjured, Others he threatned, and all to engage them to face about, and look upon the Enemy. But when he found All was to no purpose, and that the right Wing was entirely broken, and put to Flight, He endeavoured among the rest to gain the Camp, after having lost many of his Friends, and Some of the most considerable Officers in the Army. A great many of the Citizens likewise, who were come out to be Spectators of the Fight, were trodden under Foot; so that Rome was given for gone, and they concluded that Those who were left behind to besiege Marius in Preneſte, were upon the Point of raising the Siege, and shifting for Themselves. For several of the Run-a-ways posted thither, and importuned Lucretius Ofella, who commanded there, to pack up, and be gone, for Sylla was certainly killed, and Rome in the Hands of the Enemy. But that very Night when it was late some Messengers arrived in the Camp from Crassus, who desired Sylla to send Him and his Soldiers something for Supper, for that having defeated the Enemy, and pursued them as far as Antenna, whither they had betaken themselves, he was now encamped under the Walls of that City.

Sylla upon this Intelligence, (which was attended with this farther Circumstance, that most of the Enemy fell in the Action, and that the rest were shut up in Antenna) marched thither the next Morning as soon as it was light. Upon his Approach three thousand of the Enemy sent their Heralds to demand Quarter. He answered, they should have all they could ask at his Hands, provided before they surrendered themselves they did some notable
Mischief

Mischief to Those they left behind. They trusting to his Word fell upon their Comrades, so that Many of them fell by the Hands One of Another. But Sylla having assembled All that remained, as well of the three thousand as of the Rest, to the Number of six thousand, confined them in the Circus, and summoned the Senate to meet in the Temple of Bellona. There he began to make them a formal Speech, when his Soldiers, who had Orders for that purpose, massacred those six thousand Wretches, whom he had impounded in the Circus. The Outcries of so many Men butchered in so strait a place must necessarily be exceeding great; it thoroughly alarm'd the Senators, who not knowing what to make of it were in the utmost Confusion, when Sylla continuing his Discourse with the same Unconcern, and Composure in his Countenance that he had begun it, bid them attend to what he was saying, and not trouble their Heads with what was doing without Doors; that the Noise they heard was occasioned only by some naughty People he had ordered to be chastised.

These Words made the most stupid and unthinking of the Romans clearly see that they were still under the Tyranny, though they had changed the Tyrant; but with this Difference, Marius was by Nature of a morose cruel Temper, so that Power did not give him that Disposition, but only aggravated and exasperated it in him. Whereas Sylla, who at first used his good Fortune with Moderation and Humanity, and had given Hopes that in Him the Nobility would find a Friend, and the People a Protector; who from his Youth had been inclined to Mirth, and good Humour, and was of so compassionate a Temper that he had been often seen to weep even upon slight Occasions, was now on a sudden become inhumane, and cruel. This unexpected Change cast a Blemish upon exalted alted Honours and Fortunes, as if They would not suffer Persons who had attained them to preserve their native Candour and Benignity, but engendered in their Minds Pride, Arrogance, Insolence, and Inhumanity. But whether This be a real Change of Nature introduced by a Change of Fortune, or rather a Discovery and Avowance of a natural Corruption and Depravity, which lay concealed 'till it had Countenance and Protection from Honours and Authority, is a Subject proper for Disquisitions of another nature.

Sylla being thus entered, and abandoning himself to Blood, Rome was gorged with Murders without Number and without End. Many there were, who, though they never had any dealings with him, fell a Sacrifice to private Grudge and Resentment, Sylla gratifying his Friends and Domesticks with the Blood of Those they disliked, or hated. Whereupon a young Roman, named Caius Metellus, had the Courage to ask him one day in a full Senate, What End shall we have of our Calamities, and where dost thou intend to stop? We do not intercede for such as thou hast resolved to destroy; we only desire thee to free Those from their Uneasiness, whom thou hast determined to save. Sylla answering, that he knew not yet whom he should spare; Why then, said Metellus, name to us Those thou hast determined to destroy. That I will do, replied Sylla very smartly. Some say it was not Sylla who made that Reply, but Aufidius one of his Sycophants.

Sylla in the first place proscribed fourscore Citizens without communicating it to Any of the Magistrates, and when he saw That gave Offence he took one day's Respite, and the day after proscribed two hundred and twenty more, and an equal Number in a third Proscription the day following. Soon after This he made a Speech to the People, wherein he told them He had proscribed as many many as he could think of at present, and as for Those he had forgot They should be proscribed too as soon as he could recall them to his Memory. If any Man gave shelter to a Person proscribed, Death was the certain Reward for his Humanity, though it had been his Son, his Brother, or his Father. Whereas an Assassin received a Recompence of two Talents, though a Slave had killed his Master, or a Son murder'd his own Father. But what was most unjust of All, he declared the Children and Grand-Children of Those, whom he had proscribed, Infamous, and confiscated their Estates. Nor were these Bills of Proscription posted up in Rome only, but in every City and Town throughout Italy, where the Effusion of Blood was such, as neither the Temples of the Gods, nor Sanctuaries, nor private Houses, escaped clear; Men were butchered in the Embraces of their Wives, Children in the Arms of their Mothers. They who fell thus through publick hatred, or private spleen, were nothing in comparison of the numbers of those who suffered for their Riches. The Assassin might safely say, A fair House killed This Man, a Garden That, a Third his Hot Baths. Quintus Aurelius, a quiet peaceable Man, and One who thought it his Duty to bear a part in the common Calamity, so far as to condole the Misfortunes of Others, coming one day into the Forum, and finding Himself among Those who were set up, cried out, Wee's me, my Alban Manor has inform'd against me. He had not gone far, before he was dispatched by a Ruffian sent on that Errand.

In the mean time Marius, (1) when he saw he was on the point of being taken, killed himself. Sylla, at his first coming to Præneste, proceeded judicially against each particular Person, and put them to Death with some shew of Justice; 'till at last, finding it a Work of too much time, he cooped them up close together in one place, to the number of twelve thousand Men, and gave a general order for their Execution. He was pleased to except One who was his Host out of the Number, and offered him his Life; but the Man with a Bravery, and Magnanimity never to be extolled enough, told him, he scorned to owe his Safety to the Butcher of his Country; and so mixing among the other Victims, he died voluntarily with his Fellow-Citizens. But Sylla's Favour to Catiline was of a strange and uncommon Nature. That profligate Wretch had killed his own Brother before the Conclusion of the Civil Wars, and now in order to screen himself from the Murder, and take the Benefit of the Proscriptions, he intreated Sylla to put his Brother among the Proscribed, to which Sylla readily consented, and Catiline in return for such a Favour went immediately, and murder'd one Marcus Marius, who had been of the contrary Party, and bringing his Head publickly into the Forum presented it to Sylla as he was on the Tribunal. After which he went and washed his bloody Hands (1) in the Holy Water placed at the Gate belonging to Apollo's Temple.

(1) He was not actually taken, but as he was endeavouring to make his Escape through a subterraneous Passage, he found himself encompassed on every side by Sylla's Troops, who were posted to apprehend him, so that finding it impossible to get clear of them, he commanded one of his Slaves that attended him to kill him, which he did accordingly.

(1) The Heathens had Vessels placed at the Gates of their Temples filled with Water, which they called Holy, where such as intended to go into the Temple washed their Hands by way of Purification. They likewise sprinkled it on the Assembly, to cleanse them from their Impurities. An Exclusion from the Use and Benefit of this Lustrale Water was look'd upon by the Greeks as a sort of Excommunication. For this Reason Oedipus in the first Scene of the second Act in Sophocles inhibits Those who had been guilty of the Death of Laius from the Use of it. Here the Profligate Catiline, after the Murder he had committed upon Marcus Marius, goes and washes his Hands in that Lustrale Water, intending by that impious Action to affront and defy Religion.

These Assassinations were not the only subjects of Affliction. He named, and declared Himself Dictator, and so revived an Office that had lain buried for a hundred and twenty Years together. He got an Act of Oblivion to be passed in his own Favour, and Another vesting him for the future with the Power of Life and Death, of Confiscations, Transplanting of Colonies, erecting and demolishing of Cities, taking away and conferring of Kingdoms at pleasure. He put up the confiscated Estates to publick Sale, at which he presided Himself with the utmost Pride and Insolence. He was seated on a Chair of State, attended by lewd Women, Fidlers, Mimicks, Slaves made free, and such like Cattle, on whom he squander'd away the Revenues of whole Cities and Provinces, and married some of them to Ladies of Fashion and Reputation, upon whom he forced them against their Inclinations; so that his Gratuities were much more burthensome and oppressive than his Usurpations. Being resolved at any Price to tye Pompey to him by the Bands of Alliance, he obliged him to divorce his Wife, and marry Emilia the Daughter of Scaurus by his own Wife Metella; and though she was big with Child, he forced her from her Husband Marcus Glabrio; but she died in Child-bed in the House of Pompey her second Husband.

When Lucretius Offella, the Same who had besieged Marius in Præneste, put in for the Consulship, and pushed hard to obtain it, he first ordered him to drop his Pretensions. Notwithstanding which when he saw that, depending much upon the good Will and Inclinations of the People, he still persisted, he commanded One of his Centurions, who were always at hand ready to execute his Orders, to go and kill him, which was done in the Face of the whole World, He in the mean time sitting on his Tribunal in the Temple of Castor and Pollux, and from thence beholding the Execution.

Execution. The Citizens immediately seized the Murderer, and hurried him before Sylla, demanding Justice against him. Sylla commanded them to be silent, and release the Centurion, telling them that what he had done was done by his express Order.

About this time, it being in the beginning of the Year, he triumphed for his Conquests in Asia, Greece, and Pontus. His Triumph, though of itself exceeding stately, and set off with unusual Pomp, and Magnificence of Royal Spoils, was yet further illustrated, and drew after it a goodly Spectacle, the Exiles: For in the Rear followed the most eminent and potent of the Citizens, Crowned with Garlands, and calling Sylla, Saviour and Father, by whose means they were restored to their Country, and again enjoyed their Wives and Children. When the Solemnity was over, and the time come to render an Account of his Actions, in a Publick Assembly, he was as punctual in enumerating the lucky hits of War, as any of his own Military Virtues. And from his Felicity it was, that he made choice to be Surnamed Fœlix. In his Addresses and Answers to the Grecians, he styled himself Epaphroditus, or Beloved of Venus. His Trophies which are still extant with us, bear this Inscription, Lucius Cornelius Sylla Epaphroditus. Moreover when his Wife had brought him forth Twins, he named the Male Faufus, and the Female Faufa; by which Words the Romans understand Success and Good Omen. But the strongest Proof of his placing a much greater Confidence in his good Genius, or Fortune, than in any of his Exploits, is, that after the Murder of so many thousand Romans, after having introduced so many monstrous Innovations and Changes in the State, he had, notwithstanding All This, the Boldness to lay down his Authority, and settle the Right of Consular Elections once more on the People. So that he not only came abroad, but on the Forums exposed his Person publickly to the People, walking up and down as a private Man. In the very first Election after his Resignation, he had the Mortification to see the Votes go contrary to his Inclination, and declare in favour of Marcus Lepidus, an enterprizing Man, and his mortal Enemy. In short he was declared (1) the first Consul, not by any Merit, or Interest of his Own, but by the Power and Solicitation of Pompey, who was extremely gracious with the People. Wherefore when Pompey was coming out of the Assembly overjoyed with his Success, Sylla took him aside, and told him, It is bravely done of You, young Man, to get Lepidus named Consul before Catulus, that is the very worst of Men, before the Wisest and Best of all the Romans. But I advise thee to look to thy self, thou wilt soon find when it is too late that thou hast been nourishing a Snake in thy Bosom. What Sylla foretold to Pompey on this Occasion proved true in the Event. For soon after Lepidus carried himself with the greatest Insolence, and broke out into open Defiance against Pompey.

Sylla consecrated the Tenths of his whole Substance to Hercules, and upon that Occasion regaled the People with most magnificent Entertainments, wherein there was such an Abundance, or rather Profusion of Provisions, that they were every day

(1) There was no Primacy, or Distinction between the two Consuls; They were Both equal in Dignity, and Authority. But it was an Honour to be the First in Nomination; for the People gave stronger Evidences of their Zeal and Affection for Him, than they did for the Other that was only Second. Wherefore Sylla reproacheth Pompey, not only for having got Lepidus to be named Consul, but for having him got to be named before Catulus. The Advantage of the Consul first named was so inconsiderable, that he could not so much as assume the Fasces first, unless he was elder than his Colleague, or had a greater Number of Children, or was entering into his second Consulship.

forced to throw shameful Quantities of the Fragments into the Tiber ; and the Wine he gave them was forty Years old and upwards. In the midst of this Jollity, which lasted many days, Metella died. Now because the Priests had forbidden him to visit the Sick, or suffer his House to be polluted with Mourning during the Solemnity, he sent her a Bill of Divorce, just as she was expiring, and caused her to be removed into another House. In This he, was a most punctual and superstitious Observer of the Law ; but at the same time he broke through an Ordonnance He himself had made for the regulating of funeral Expences, for he spared no Coſts on that Occaſion. He likewise violated his own Sumptuary Laws, which were deſigned to retrench the exceſſive Prodigality of the Romans in their Meals, and to reſtore the antient Simplicity ; for he ſpent his whole time in Drinking and Revelling, as if Luxury and Debauch might adminiſter Comfort to him in his Affliction.

Some few Months after he entertained the People with a Prize-fighting of Gladiators. In thoſe days the Theater was not divided into diſtinct Lodges, or Boxes, but Men and Women ſate promiſcuouſly together. It happened at that time that a young Lady very beautiful, and of the firſt Quality, had placed her ſelf near to Sylla : ſhe was the Daughter of Meffala, and Siſter to Hortenſius the Orator ; her Name was Valeria, and ſhe had juſt then been divorced from her Husband. This Lady came behind Sylla, reſted her Hand gently upon him, took a little of the Nap from off his Robe, and returned to her Seat. When ſhe found Sylla had obſerv'd her, and ſeemed to wonder at ſuch a piece of Familiarity, ſhe ſaid, It is not, Great Sir, out of any want of Respect that I have done This, but because I was desirous to (1) partake a little of your Fortune.

Sylla was not in the least displeas'd with this Answer; on the contrary, he seem'd to be tickled with it; for he sent privately to find out who she was, her Name, Family, Circumstances, and Character; from that Moment they did nothing but Ogle each other, receive and return amorous Glances, and wanton Smiles. In the end, they struck up a Match, and Articles were sign'd between them. In all which Valeria perhaps may be thought to have done nothing unbecoming her; but the same could not be said of Sylla; for tho' the Lady was truly chaste and prudent, and of a very illustrious Family, his desire to marry her arose from Motives not over wise, or honourable. Like a young amorous Coxcomb without Experience or Discretion, he was captivated with a few affected Glances, and coquettish Airs, which usually kindle in the Heart Passions the most ignominious and brutal.

Notwithstanding this Marriage, he still kept company with Actors, Actresses, and Minstrels, drinking with them Night and Day. His chief Favourites were, Roscius the Comedian, Sorex the Arch-Mimick, and Metrobius (2) the Woman Actor,

(1) This Passage seems very remarkable; for from hence it appears that the Superstition by which Men were persuaded that a Commerce with, or Touch of a lucky Person was a means of making Them Partakers of his good Fortune, is of a very antient standing. But there is still a greater Delicacy than appears at first sight in this Circumstance. Sylla had been just divorc'd from Metella, and Metella was dead. Valeria had likewise been very lately divorc'd from her Husband, but He was still living. She therefore wanted the same lucky Hit; she desired either to bury her Husband, or receive Sylla for his Successor.

(2) We learn from Athenens the proper signification of the Word λυσισδός, which Plutarch makes use of in this Place. For he saith that according to Aristoxenus the Greeks called μεγαδόν the

A&tor, for whom, though past his Prime, he ever retained a profest Kindness. He fell by these Courses into a Disease, which grew so leasurely upon him, as of a long time he perceived not his Bowels to fester, 'till at length the corrupt Flesh broke all out into Lice. Many being employed Day and Night in destroying them, the Work so multiplied under their Hands, as not only his Cloaths, Baths, Basons, but his very Meat was polluted with that Flux and Contagion, they came swarming out in such numbers. Wherefore he went often by day into the Waters, to scowr and cleanse his Body, but all in vain; the Course returned so quick, and with such numerous Supplies, as overcame all manner of Riddance. It is said that among the Ancients there died of this Disease Acastus the Son of Pelias, and nearer our own Times Pherecides the Theologian, Callisthenes the Olynthian during the time of his Imprisonment, and Mutius the Lawyer; and if it be fit to add to These a Fugitive Slave, otherwise hardly worth remembering, called Eunus, who was Author of the War in Sicily called the Servile War, and who being taken, and carried Prisoner to Rome, died there of this Creeping Sickness.

Sylla not only foresaw his End, but also writ somewhat concerning it; for in the two and twentieth Book of his Memoirs, which he finished about two days before his Death, he writes, That the Chaldeans foretold him, That after he had led a Life of Honour, he should conclude the last Act in fullness of Prosperity. He declares moreover, That in a Vision he had seen his Son, who had departed not long before Metella, to stand by in the Player who performed Mens Parts in a Woman's Dress, and λυσισιδον Him who acted Womens Parts in a Man's Habit. If mournful Weeds, and beseech his Father to cast off further care, and come along with him to his Mother Metella, to live at ease and quietness with Her. However, he could not refrain intermedling in Publick Affairs; for but ten days before his Decease, he interposed in the Disputes the Inhabitants of Puteoli had among themselves, reconciled the contending Parties, and prescribed Laws for their better Government hereafter. Nay, the very day before he died, upon an Information that Granius the Questor delayed paying the immense Sums due from Him to the Publick, in hopes to be indemnified by Sylla's Death, he sent for him into his Bed-chamber, where he ordered his Servants to strangle him in his Presence; but straining his Voice in the eagerness of his Passion, he broke his Impostume, and voided a great deal of Blood. This Discharge made him so weak, and faint, that he passed the Night in bitter Agonies, and died the day following, leaving behind him two Children very young, which he had by Metella. Valeria was afterwards delivered of a Daughter, named Posthuma; for so the Romans call Those who are born after the Death of the Father.

Many ran tumultuously together, and joined with Lepidus the Consul, to deprive the Corps of the accustomed Solemnities; but Pompey, though offended at Sylla, (for He alone of all his Friends was left out of his Will) having kept off Some by his Interest and Intreaty, Others by Menaces, gave it a secure and honourable Burial. It is said, that the Roman Ladies threw on such vast heaps of Spices, that, beside what was contained in one hundred and ten Vessels, there was sufficient to raise a Statue at length for Sylla, and Another for his Lictor, out of the precious Frankincense and Cinnamon. The Day being Cloudy over-head, they deferred carrying forth the Corps 'till about three

In the Afternoon, expecting it should rain; but a strong Wind blowing full against the Funeral Pile, and setting it all on a bright Flame, his Body was consumed in a moment. As the Pile shrunk down, and the Fire was upon expiring, the Clouds showered down, and continued raining 'till Night; so as his good Fortune was firm even to the last, and did as it were officiate at his Funeral. His Monument stands on Campus Martius, with an Epitaph of his own writing, containing in substance, No Friend of His ever did him so much Good, or Enemy so much Harm, but he returned Both with Usury.

The Comparison of Lyfander with Sylla.

HAVING thus gone through the Life of Sylla, let us now draw a Comparison between the Grecian and the Roman. That which was common to them Both, was, that they were Both Founders of their own Greatness, with this difference, that (1) Lyfander had the Consent of the Citizens in peaceable and sedate Times, for the Honours he received; nor forced He any thing against their good will, or sought to raise himself above the Laws; whereas, In Civil Broils the Slave himself gets Honour; as then at Rome, when the People were distempered, and the Government out of order, so as one or other was still a getting uppermost; no wonder then if Sylla reigned, when the Glaucie and Saturnini drove out the Metelli, when the Sons of Consuls were slain in the Assem-of Peace and Tranquility, than to extort it as Sylla did, during the publick Calamities of his Country.

blies, Soldiers hired, and whole Armies bought and sold with Gold and Silver; and Laws in Defiance of Law established by Sword and Fire.

I do not say This to (1) blame any Man, who in the times of such publick Distraction works himself into Authority, but to shew that in a State where every thing is out of joint, He that is the most Powerful is not always the most Virtuous. But Lysander being employed in the greatest Commands and Affairs of State, by a sober and well-disciplined City, was ever esteemed the best and most virtuous Man, in the best and most virtuous Commonwealth. Wherefore Lysander often returning the Government into the hands of the Citizens, received it again as often; for the Excellencies of his Virtues ever held the first Place. Sylla, on the other hand, when he had once got the Command of the Army, held it for ten years together, being sometimes Consul, sometimes Proconsul, and sometimes Dictator, but always a Tyrant. It is true, Lysander, as we have observed, endeavoured (2) to introduce a new Form of Government,

(1) Plutarch is here highly to be commended for his Prudence and Moderation. He does not blame Sylla for making his Advantage of the Disorders of his Country, and advancing himself in those times of Distraction; for notwithstanding those Distractions, such an Advancement might proceed from a distinguished Merit and exemplary Virtue; and it may likewise be the Effect of Rashness and Presumption.

(2) Plutarch is for justifying Lysander, who endeavoured to alter the Constitution of Sparta, by making not only those Branches of the Royal Family who were by Law excluded from the Crown capable of succeeding, but also Any among all the Spartans, who had distinguished themselves by their Merit and Virtue. But I question whether a wise Man will approve of such an Attempt, notwithstanding the specious Colours with which it is varnished over. It seems indeed at first Sight to be most just and natural that the most Virtuous should preside in a virtuous Community. But as plausible as this Maxim appears, it cannot but open the Door to Disorders innumerable. Lysander had no Recourse to Arms for the Accomplishment of his Undertaking; he was for bringing it about by gentle Means and Persuasion.

vernment, after a milder fashion however, and more agreeable to Justice, than Sylla; not by force of Arms, but Persuasion; not by subverting the whole State at once, but by more orderly directing the Succession of the Kings. And by Nature it seems just, that the most deserving should rule, especially in a City which itself got the leading hand of Greece, upon the account of Virtue, not Nobility. For as the Hunter does not value his Hound meerly for the sake of his Breed, nor the Jocky his Foal, (for what if the Foal should prove a Mule?) but because they Neither degenerate from their Breed, so (1) that Man would be thought extreamly out in his Politicks, who in the choice of a Chief Magistrate should enquire, not what the Man is, but how descended. The very Spartans themselves have deposed several of their Kings, for want of Kingly Virtues, as degenerated and good for nothing. A depraved Nature, though of an ancient Stock, is dishonourable; whereas Virtue without Birth is honourable.

Both of them were guilty of many Acts of Violence and Injustice; but what the One did was for the sake of his Friends; whereas the Other committed His upon his Friends. It cannot be denied but that Lyfander stuck at nothing where his Friends or Creatures were concerned; and that he often dipped his Hands in Blood purely for their sakes, and to make Them Kings, or rather Tyrants of their Country. Whereas Sylla merely out of Spite and Jealousy endeavoured to deprive proper in elective Kingdoms, but very pernicious in hereditary Monarchies, in which Kings owe their Royalty not to any political Considerations, but to the Right of Succession, and let them be Good or Bad the People are bound to submit.

(1) This Maxim is exceeding

Pompey

Pompey of his Command in the Army, and remove Delobella from His in the Fleet, though he had Himself conferred them both on the One and the Other; and because Lucretius Offella, who had done him many Services, put up for the Consulate contrary to His Will and Pleasure, he caused him to be massacred before his own Eyes, raising an inexpressible Dread and Horror in the Minds of all Men when they saw him thus cruel and barbarous to his own Friends and Adherents.

Their different Behaviour with respect to Riches and Pleasure, is in the One That of a good and gracious Prince, in the Other of a Tyrant. For Lysander in his full Range of Power and Authority, did nothing that was intemperate or extravagant, but kept aloof as much as ever Man did from that Proverb, which too often meets with an Application,

So temperate was he, so truly Spartan in his Life and Conversation. Whereas nothing could restrain Sylla, or keep him within Bounds, neither Poverty in his Youth, nor Gravity in his old Age. Whilst he was prescribing to the Romans the best Laws in the World concerning Continnence and Sobriety, he indulged Himself, as Salust writes, in open Lewdness and Debauchery. By these ways he had so impoverished and drained the City of her Treasures, as to be forced to sell her Liberties and Immunities to the associated and well-affected Cities, though at the same time he daily exposed the wealthiest and greatest Families to publick Sale and Out-cry. And yet the vast Sums he wasted in his infamous Pleasures were nothing when compared to what he flung away upon his Buffoons and Flatterers; for what Moderation could there be, what likelihood of Parsimony in his more intimate Conversations and Endearments over ver Wine, when in the face of the People, and in open Court, where he had caused one of the best Estates in Rome to be put up to Auction, and would have passed it over to a Friend for a Trifle, because Another bid higher, and the Officer made Proclamation of the Advance, he broke out into a Passion, and complained to the Citizens, that it was a barbarous Case, and cruel Usage in them, not to allow him the Liberty of disposing of his own Booty as he pleased.

How different was This from Lyfander's Behaviour, who not only sent to Sparta the Money and Spoils he had taken, but even the very Presents that had been made to Himself? (1) I would not however be thought to commend this Action in Lyfander; for perhaps he did Sparta more Harm by his Liberality, than Sylla did Rome by his Rapine; I only make use of it as an Argument to prove his Contempt of Riches. There was something very singular in each of them with respect to their Country. Sylla, who was Himself a most profligate Libertine, however made the Romans Sage and Temperate; whereas Lyfander infected Sparta with Vices, to which He was an utter Stranger; so that they were Both to blame, the One for raising himself above his own Laws; the Other for causing his Citizens to fall beneath his own Example, in that he taught Sparta to want those things, which Himself had learned not to want. And thus much of their Civil Administration.

(1) This Judgment of Platarch's is very remarkable. It often happens that a Statesman does more harm to his Community by pouring Money in upon it, than by draining it; for by depriving it of all superfluous Wealth, and curing in it a Desire after it, This may serve to quicken the Virtues and Industry of the People; whereas if he allows them to wallow in Riches, that Abundance serves only to kindle in them a Thirst after More, it makes Virtue give Place to Luxury and Wantonness, and a thousand other vicious Habits that spring out of Opulence. Of This are to be found many signal Examples.

As for military Expeditions and Engagements, hazardous Enterprizes, and Numbers of Victories, Sylla is without doubt beyond all Compare. Lysander indeed obtained the Victory in two naval Fights, to which may be added the taking of Athens; though That was a Work of greater Fame than Difficulty. But then his Conduct in Beotia, and under the Walls of Haliartus, as it was unfortunate in the Event, so was it the Effect of Indiscretion and Temerity, when out of Ambition and Eagerness to fight, without waiting for the King's Forces, which were then almost at hand from Plataeæ; but giving way to the Transports of Anger and Ambition, he unseasonably approached the Walls, and was miserably defeated by a Sally of a handful of Men. He fell in the Action, but not like Cleombrotus, who was slain whilst he was gloriously making Head against an impetuous Enemy at Leuctra, not like Cyrus, nor Epaminondas, who received a mortal Wound whilst he was rallying his Men and securing to them the Victory. These great Men died in their Callings, they died the Death of Kings and Commanders. Whereas He, like some Common Soldier, or one of the Forlorn Hope, cast away his Life ingloriously, giving this testimony to the ancient Spartans, that they did well to avoid (1) storming of Walls, in which the stoutest Man may chance to fall by the Hand, not only of an abject Fellow, but by that of a Boy or Woman, as they say Achilles was slain in the Gates of Troy by the Hands of the effeminate Paris. As for Sylla,

(1) For the Spartans never had accustomed themselves to the forming of Sieges, it was a sort of military Service for which they were not proper. They chose rather to fight it out upon plain Ground; and Plutarch tells us that Lysander's Death shewed they were in the right. But by his good leave it is a great Misfortune where Troops are fit only to engage in a pitched Battel, and are unable to carry on a Siege; a strong Town may chance to lie in their way, and stop them in their full Career.

it is somewhat hard to reckon up how many set Battels he won, or how many thousands he flew: He took Rome itself twice, and forced the Pyraean Haven, not by Famine, as Lyfander did, but by several sharp Encounters, driving out Archelaus from Land to Sea. If we consider the Enemies they Both had to deal with, we shall find the Difference still greater between them. Lyfander's naval Victory near Samos, wherein he defeated Antiochus, who was no better than Alcibiades's Pilot, was little more than a Mock-fight; nor could his circumventing of Philocles the Athenian Speech-Maker, A Man unknown but for his bitter Tongue, add much to his Renown; Either of which, Antiochus or Philocles, Mithridates would have scorned to compare with the Master of his Horse, or Marius with one of his Lictors. Whereas without enumerating all the Kings, Princes, Consuls, Prætors, Captains, and Tribunes whom Sylla had to contend with; who was there ever amongst the Romans so formidable, as Marius? What King more powerful than Mithridates? Who of the Italians sturdier than Lamponius and Telefinus? Yet of These, the First he drove into Banishment, the Second he subdued, and slew the Others.

But That which in my Opinion is beyond All that has been hitherto said, and is infinitely more glorious for Sylla, is, that Lyfander performed none of his Exploits, obtained none of his Victories without the Assistance of his Country; whereas Sylla, (1) banished as he was, persecuted by his Enemies, his Wife thrust out of Doors, his House burnt, and his Friends murdered, fought in the Heart of Bæotia against an innumerable Army of

Barbarians,

Barbarians, exposed his Person to the most imminent Dangers in the Service of his Country, overthrew them, and erected a Trophy.

But This is not all; in vain did Mitbridates court his Friendship and Alliance, and press him to accept of Men and Money to enable him to oppose his Enemies; he would not so much as give him a kind Word, or Look, or shew him the least Civility, 'till he had it from his own Mouth that he would quit Asia, deliver up his Fleet, and surrender Bythia and Cappadocia to their lawful Princes: Than which Sylla never performed a braver, or more magnanimous Action; when preferring the publick Good to his private Interest, and like those generous Dogs never quitted his Hold 'till his Enemy had confessed himself conquered, and then he took Care to revenge his private Injuries.

We may judge of the Manners of Both from their different Behaviour at Athens. Sylla having made himself Master of it at a time when the Athenians were in War against him in favour of Mitbridates, and for the Increase of his Power and Greatness, did nevertheless restore her to her Liberty, and the free Exercise of her own Laws. Lysander on the contrary, though he found her fallen from the highest point of Dignity and Command, was so far from pitying her in her Distress, that he deprived her of her beloved Democracy, and enslaved her to the most cruel, and unjust of Tyrants. To conclude, it seems to Me that He comes nearest the Truth, who declares (1) that Sylla performed the

(1) If they are taken in this View Sylla must have the Preference; for to have committed but a few Faults does not in my Opinion characterize a great General so much as the Performance of many glorious Actions. It is in War as in the Sublime in Eloquence, the Great is slippery and dangerous, and it is very difficult, not to say impossible, to march steadily without stumbling; whereas the Mean is more safe, and affords room for Precaution,

more Glorious Deeds, but Lyfander committed the fewer Faults ; and giving to One (1) the Preheminence for Moderation and Abstinence, to the Other for Conduct and Valour.

(1) Plutarch does not take upon him to decide in exprefs terms on which fide lies the Advantage. He leaves the Reader to determine for Himfelf, and form his Judgment upon the Sentiments he will often meet with in all his Writings. The Thing is clear in it felf. The Crown of Wisdom and Temperance is much more valuable in the Eyes of the Wife, than That of military Valour and Capacity. For nothing which is confifting with Vice can be fo precious as That which utterly excludes it.

There was left one Orphan of this House, called Damon, surnamed Peripoltas, for Beauty and greatness of Spirit surpassing all of his Age; but of Temper fierce and untractable. A Roman Captain of a Foot-Company that wintered in Chæroneæ, fell in love with this Youth; but since he could not obtain his infamous Desires, either by Gifts or Entreaties, it was much feared that he would proceed to Violence. The Suspicion was made more probable by the contemptible condition of Chæroneæ, which was then so weak, that it had not power either to prevent the Attempt, or punish the Crime. Of which Damon being sensible, and looking upon his Sollicitations as Injuries, resolved to be revenged of him: Accordingly He and sixteen of his Companions, conspired against the Captain; but that the Design might be managed without any danger of being discovered, they All daubed their Faces with Soot. Thus disguised, and inflamed with Wine, they set upon him by break of day, as he was sacrificing; and having killed Him, and not a few of Those that were with him, they fled out of the City; which was extremely alarmed and troubled at the Murder: The Council assembled immediately, and pronounced Sentence of Death against Damon and all his Accomplices. This they did to justify the City to the Romans. But, that Evening, as the Magistrates were at Supper together, according to Custom, Damon and his Confederates breaking into the Room, killed them All, and then again fled out of the Town. About this time, Lucius Lucullus passing that way with his Forces upon some Expedition, and this Disaster having but newly happened, he staid to examine the matter. Upon enquiry he found the Citizens were in no wise faulty, but rather that They themselves had been Sufferers; therefore he drew out the Soldiers and carried ried them away with him. Yet Damon continuing to ravage the Country all about, the Citizens by Messages and Decrees, in appearance favourable, enticed him into the City, and upon his return made him Gymnasiarque, or Master of the Exercises; but afterward as he was suppling himself with Oyl in the Bagnio, they set upon him and killed him. (1) For a long while after Apparitions were seen, and lamentable Groans heard in that place, (as our Fathers have told us,) for which Reason the Gates of the Bagnio were ordered to be made up: And even to this Day Those who dwell about that place, affirm that they sometimes see the same Spectres, and hear the same Lamentations. The Posterity of that Family (of which Some remain in the Country of Phocis, near the City Stiris, living after the manner of the Æolians) are called Asbolomenoi, that is, Men dawbed with Soot. Because Damon was besmeared with Soot when he committed that Murther.

But there being a Quarrel betwixt Those of Chæronea and the Orchomenians, who bordered upon them; they hired an Informer, a Roman, to accuse the Community of Chæronea, as if it had been a single Person, of the Murther of the Romans, of which only Damon and his Ruffians were guilty; accordingly the Process was formed, and the Cause pleaded before the Governour of Macedon, for as yet the Romans (2) had not sent Prætors into Greece.

(1) This Opinion, that Places wherein any Murder has been committed, are haunted, is very ancient. Both the Greeks and Romans gave into it, of which there is a remarkable Example in a Letter of Pliny, which is still remaining.

(2) They were sent soon after the Decision of this Affair. For Cicero in his Speech against Piso gives us to understand that Piso was strangely confounded when he was told that Macedonia was declared a Prætorial Province. Quid Debilitatio atque Abjectio animi tui Macedonia Pratoria nuntiata,

The Advocates who defended the Inhabitants, appealed to the Testimony of Lucullus, who in answer to a Letter the Prætor writ to him, returned a true Account of the matter of Fact. By this means the Town gained their Cause, which otherwise they were in great danger of losing. The Citizens thus preserved, erected a Statue to Lucullus in the Forum, next to That of the God Bacchus.

We also have the same Impressions of Gratitude, and though removed from them by the distance of so many Ages, yet we think ourselves obliged by that Act. And as to draw the Genius and Noble Inclinations of a great Personage, is harder, and so more valuable, than to hit the Lines of his Face; we will put Lucullus's Life amongst our Parallels of Illustrious Men. Wherein we will not use one stroke of Flattery, but keep close to the Truth. (1) It is sufficient we shew how we preserve a grateful Remembrance of his generous Kindness: and (2) He himself would not expect, that in recompence of that Service which consisted in speaking the Truth, we should abuse his Me-cum tu non solum quod tibi succederetur, sed quod Gabinio non succederetur, exsanguis, & mortuus concidisti? It appears further that Lucullus was the First that was sent Prætor thither. For Plutarch tells us in the Life of Cæsar, that He pleaded against Anthony in Favour of Greece before Lucullus Prætor of Macedonia.

(1) Who could have told Lucullus that the Service, or rather Justice by Him rendered to the City of Cheronea on that Occasion, would meet with so glorious a Recompence two hundred Years after, and that a City, at that time so inconsiderable, should produce a Man capable of celebrating his famous Exploits, and rendering them immortal? For Lucullus is little known to Posterity, but in the Life left of him by Plutarch.

(2) Plutarch saith This to excuse before-hand what the Reader may find in the Life of Lucullus that does not tend much to his Honour, and is not so tenderly handled as might be expected towards One to whom Cheronea is so much indebted. The true Testimony which is advanced in our Favour is not to be rewarded with a False Testimony in favour of Him from Whom we received it.

mory with a false and counterfeit Narration. For as we would that a Painter who is to draw a beautiful Face, in which there is yet some Imperfection, should neither wholly leave out, nor entirely express what is defective, because This would deform it, and That spoil the Resemblance; so since it is very hard, nay almost impossible, to shew the Life of a Man wholly free from Blemish, let us in the same manner follow Truth: But if any Lapses occur, which have been occasioned by the Emotions of a sudden Passion, or the Necessity of the Times, let us look upon them rather as (1) Defects of Virtue, than as Vices; (2) let us carry the Pencil gently over them, out of respect to Human Nature, which never furnished any Man with so many good Inclinations to Virtue, but that there was somewhat still wanting which rendered him imperfect. Considering with myself to whom I should compare Lucullus, I find none so exactly his Parallel as Cimon.

They were both valiant in War, and successful against the Barbarians, but affable and courteous to their Fellow-Citizens: Both extinguished the Civil Broils at home, and gained signal Victories abroad. In short, no Greek before Cimon, nor Roman before Lucullus, ever carried the Scene of War so far from their own Country, unless we except

(1) This is very just and reasonable. The Blemishes that are to be found in the Life of great Men are like those Flaws which are often seen in a beautiful Countenance; they do not make it deformed, they only render it less Perfect. What Plutarch saith here of great Men may likewise be applied to the most beautiful Compositions.

(2) Plutarch's Candor and Humanity appear on all Occasions.

How beautiful is this Sentiment! It is paying a Respect to, and shewing a Compassion for human Nature, not to exaggerate the Defects that may be found in great Men. This is drawing up a Charge against those Writers, who full of Envy and Malignity fall unmercifully upon the least Slip, or Weakness, and skim over what is highly Praise-worthy, nay very often set out Virtue itself in the Garb of Vice.

the Exploits of Bacchus and Hercules, Those of Perseus against the Æthiopians, Medes, and Armenians, and the Acts of Jason, (if (1) of These any Memorials that deserve Credit are derived down to our days.) Moreover in This they were alike, that they finished not the Enterprizes they undertook: They brought their Enemies near their Ruin, but never entirely defeated them. There was yet a greater Conformity in their Nature, for the Civility and generous Reception they shewed to all Strangers, and the splendid Provisions of their Tables. We may perhaps have omitted some other good qualities, in which they were alike, but it will be easy to observe them in the following Relation.

Cimon was the Son of Miltiades and Hegeſipyle, who was by Birth a Thracian, and Daughter to King Olorus; This appears from the Poems of (2) Melanthius and Archelaus, which they both writ in praise of Cimon. By this means the Historian Thucydides was his Kinsman by the Mother's ſide; for His Father's Name alſo was Olorus, and poſſeſſed Mines of Gold in Thrace, and was killed in Scaptahyla, a Diſtrict of Thrace, ſo called from its being full of Ditches. His Bones were afterwards brought into Attica, and his Monument is ſhewn amongſt Thoſe of the Houſe of Cimon, near the Tomb of Elpinice, Cimon's Siſter. But Thucydides was of the Tribe of Alimus, and Miltiades of That of Lacia.

(1) Plutarch here plainly confeſſeth that he queſtions if there are any Memorials remaining of the Exploits of Perſeus and Jason, the Firſt of Whom lived thirteen hundred Years before the Incarnation, and the Other undertook his Expedition into Colchos about fourſcore Years after the time wherein Perſeus lived. Of which not the Diſtance of Time,

Miltiades being condemned in a Fine of fifty Talents to the State, and unable to pay it, was cast into Prison, and there died. Thus Cimon was left an Orphan very young, with his Sister Elpinice, who was also young and unmarried. At first he had no Reputation, being looked upon as Riotous, and One who led a dissolute Life, as in reality he did, therefore they said there was (1) an Agreement of Temper, as well as Appellation, betwixt Him and his Grand-father, whose Name was Cimon too; but they Proverbially called him, for his Stupidity, Coalemos, (the Idiot.) Stesimbrotus of Thassus, who lived near about the same time with Cimon, reports of him, that he had little Docility; that they could never teach him Musick, nor the Rudiments of any other Science, which were so easily learned by the young Gentlemen of Athens: That he wanted a Vivacity of Parts requisite for Conversation, was ungentle in his Carriage; neither had he any Capacity to manage serious Affairs: However, that there appeared in him something that was Great; and that he had such a plain Openness of Humour, that you would have taken him rather

(1) Upon the Credit of This, Valerius Maximus writes, Cimonis vero incunabula opinione Stultitia fuerunt referta: ejusdem Stultitia imperia Salutaria Athenienses sensere. " Cimon's Youth was branded with an Imputation of Folly; and yet the Athenians thought themselves greatly benefited by that Folly during his Administration." I have the more willingly cited this Passage to vindicate it from the unjust Criticism of the learned Muretus, who is for leaving out of the Sentence the last Stultitia. This must not be, for it is put there to a very good Purpose. Valerius Maximus means that notwithstanding that Imputation, it was that self-same Folly which conducted the Affairs of Athens with much Prudence and Success whilst He was at the Helm. Cimon passed for a Fool in his Youth, and yet that very Fool, &c. for which reason he adds, Itaque coegit eos stuporis semetipfos damnare, qui eum stolidum crediderant. " Therefore he constrained Those who thought Him a Fool to accuse Themselves of Folly." Happy are those Communities who have many such Fools as Cimon.

for a Native of Peloponnesus than Athens. He being such an one as Euripides describes Hercules.

But he was Honest, though not Elegant.*

For this Character may well agree with That which Stesimbrotus had given of him. They accused him in his younger Years, that he (1) incestuously cared his own Sister Elpinice, who otherwise had no very great Reputation for Chastity; However, if her Brother was not her Gallant, it was reported that Polynotus the Painter was. For when he painted the Trojan Dames in the Porch, then called Plesianaction, now Pecile, he drew (2) Laodice by Her Face. He was not an ordinary Mechanick, to be payed for his Work: But studying always to please the Athenians, (3) he bestowed it freely on the Publick. This all the Historians report of him; and the Poet Melanthius particularly in these Verses ;

(1) This Action of Cimon has been variously interpreted, and given Ground to a great Dispute. Some pretended that Cimon espoused his Sister Elpinice, and That in defiance of the Law, because She was his Sister both by Father and Mother, and such a Marriage was forbidden at Athens, where a Man was not allowed to espouse his Sister unless she was so only by the Father's side. Others say he did marry her without any Breach of the Law, because she was his Father's Child by another Venter. This Passage in Plutarch admits of neither of these Interpretations, leaving no room for any Pretence to Matrimony. It is very plain that Cimon was a debauched Youth, and carried on an incestuous Intrigue with his Sister.

(2) This contradicts what Pausanias saith, that it was believed Laodice was not among the Trojan Captives. Polygnotus took it for granted that She was, and accordingly placed her among them in his Piece. This Galantry of Polygnotus has been imitated by a great many Painters since his time.

(3) By This he would have it thought he was more generous than Mycon, who at the same time painted another Part in the same Portico, for which he had agreed for a round Sum of Money.

Gave Athens Beauty and Magnificence:
New Life to all the Heroes did impart, Embellish'd all the Temples with his Art:
The Splendor of the State restor'd again:
And thus at once oblig'd both Gods and Men.*

Some affirm, that Elpinise did not dissemble her Familiarities with her Brother, but lived publicly with him, as if she had been his Wife: For though she was no Fortune, yet he could meet with None that was an equal Match for her, by reason of the Quality of her Birth. But afterward, when Callias, one of the richest Men of Athens, fell in love with her, and proffered to pay the Mulct the Father was condemned in, if he could obtain the Daughter in Marriage; Cimon accepted the Condition, and betrothed her to Callias. There is no doubt to be made, but that Cimon was of an amorous Complexion: For Melanthius gives him hints of his tendency that way, when in his Eulogies he facetiously rallies him for his Mistresses: The one was called Mnestra, and the other was Aristeria of Salamis; and These, the Poet saith, he was very fond of. However, this is certain, that he loved his Wife Ifodice very passionately; she was the Daughter of Euryptolemus the Son of Megacles. Her death he regretted even to impatience, as appears by those Elegies of Condolence, addressed to him upon his loss of her. The Philosopher Panetius is of Opinion, that Archelaus was the Author of those Elegies; and indeed the Time seems to favour that Conjecture. But take Cimon in all his other Capacities, you shall find nothing in him but what is very good. For as he was as daring as Miltiades, and not at all inferior to Themistocles for Judgment, so he was incomparably more just and honest than Either of them. As he was equal to them in Understanding, and in discharging all the Functions of a Commander; so for the Political part of Government, he excelled Them and Every one else: And This too when he was very young, his Years not yet confirmed by any Experience. For when Themistocles, upon the Medes threatning them with an Invasion, advised the Athenians to forsake their Town and the Country about it, and to carry all their Arms on Ship-board, and in the Streights of Salamis dispute the Dominion of the Sea with their Enemies; when all the World stood amazed at the Confidence and Rashness of this Advice, Cimon only was not at all surprized, but chearfully passed through the Street of Ceramicon, accompanied with other young Men toward the Castle, carrying a Bridle in his Hand to offer to the Goddess Minerva; by This intimating, that there was no more need of Horsemen now, but Mariners. Thus after he had paid his Devotions to the Goddess, and offered up the Bridle, he took down the Bucklers that hung upon the Walls of the Temple, and so went down to the Port. By this Example he encouraged the Citizens to follow him, in order to their Embarking. Besides, he was an handsome Person, of a just Stature, his Hair thick and curled. After he had acquitted himself gallantly in this Battel of Salamis, he obtained a great Reputation among the Athenians; and They not only admired his Actions, but loved his Person. So that they were continually enflaming him with Emulation, to perform Deeds as famous as That of Marathon; that entertaining great Conceptions of things, he might act suitably thereunto. The People were very glad when they saw him applying himself to matters of State; for they were disgusted with Themistocles: In opposition to Whom, and because of the Candor and Freeness of Cimon's Temper, which was agreeable

to every one, they advanced Him to the highest Employments in the Government. The Man that contributed most to his Promotions was Aristides, who constantly cultivated that honest Genius he saw in him; and purposely raised him, that he might be a Counterpoise to the Craft, and repress the Insolence of Themistocles. But when the Medes were driven out of Greece, Cimon being Admiral, though the Athenians had not yet attained the Chief Dominion, but still followed Pausanias and the Lacedaemonians; he kept his Citizens in Heart, and by the Goodness of their Order and Equipage, but chiefly by their Valour, they were distinguished from the rest. Besides, he perceiving that Pausanias managed an Intelligence with the King of Persia, to betray Greece to the Barbarians, and puffed up with Arrogance and Success, treated his Allies haughtily, and committed Insolences upon them; Cimon taking this advantage, robbed him of the Esteem and Command of the Greeks, before he was aware. This he did not by open Enmity, but by affable Discourse and the Obligingness of his Conversation. So that the Allies, no longer able to endure the Sourness and Pride of Pausanias, revolted All from Him to Cimon and Aristides: Who, having gained such a Party from him, writ to the Ephori of Sparta, and sent particular Messengers to complain of him, desiring them to recall a Man who was a dishonour to Sparta, and a trouble to Greece. They report of Pausanias, that when he was in Byzantium he solicited a young Lady of a noble Family in the City, whose name was Cleonice, to debauch her: Her Parents dreading the cruel Humour of the Man, were forced to consent, and so abandoned their Daughter to his Embraces. Cleonice commanded the Servants to put out all the Lights; so that approaching silently, and in the dark towards his Bed, she stumbled upon the Lamp that that was extinguished, which she overturned and spilled: Pausanias, who was fallen asleep, awaked, and startled with the Noise, thought an Assassin had taken that dead time of the Night to murder him; so that hastily snatching up his Poniard that lay by him, he wounded his supposed Enemy to Death. After This he never enjoyed himself, but was disturbed in his Thoughts: For his Dear Mistress haunted his Bed, and would not let him sleep, but interrupted his Repose with these Angry Words:

Or see the Hand that brings thy Punishment.*

This Tragical Accident gave the last stroke to his Ruin. For after This the Allies joining their Resentments and Forces with Cimon's, besieged him in Byzantium: But he escaped out of their Hands, and fled to (1) Heraclea. Here coming to a Place which might be called the Oracle of the Dead, where they raise up Spirits to know future Events, he solemnly invoked Cleonice, and intreated her Ghost to be reconciled: (2) Accordingly she appeared to him, and answered him in these Words: "As soon as thou comest to Sparta thou shalt be freed from all the Misfortunes which now afflict thee." (3) Hereby obscurely foretelling (in my

(1) Strabo places Heraclea in Elis, about forty Furlongs from Olympia; but Pausanias fixeth it a little farther from thence in Arcadia. It is the Same with That which was called Phygalia and Phialia. There Pausanias had Recourse to certain Magicians called Psychagogoi, that is, Such as pretended to raise departed Spirits.

(2) Here the Soul of Cleonice is raised by the Magicians, as was That of Samuel by the Witch of Endor.

(3) For the Lacedaemonians resolving to seize him, he fled for Refuge into a Temple of Minerva, called Chalcioicos. There they stopped up all the Gates, opened the Tyles of the Chappel, whither he was withdrawn, and kept a constant Watch over him 'till they had starved him; and just as he was at the Point of Death they took him from thence, and he expired immediately.

The L I F E of

Opinion) the imminent Death which there attended him. This is the Story that is told of him.

Cimon strengthened with this accession of the Allies, went General into Thrace: For he was told that some great Men among the Persians, of the King's Kindred, having possessed themselves of Eione, a City situated upon the River Strymon, infested the Greeks which confined upon them: First, he defeated these Persians, and shut them up within the Walls of their Town. Then he fell upon the Thracians themselves, who were Borderers, because they supplied Those of Eione with Victuals; he drove them entirely out of the Country, and took possession of it as Conqueror: By this means he reduced the Besieged to such straits, that Butes, who commanded there for the King, in a desperate resolution set fire to the Town, and burned himself, his Goods, and all his Relations, in one common Flame. By this means Cimon got the Town, but no great Booty; for these Barbarians not only consumed Themselves in the Fire, but the richest of their Moveables. However, he gave the Country about it to the Athenians, it being a pleasant and fruitful Soil. For this Action the People permitted him to erect Stone Mercuries; upon the First of which was this Inscription:

*What Honours shall we pay, what Trophies raise,
(The Sacred Guardians of the Hero's Praise)
To those brave Warriors, who at Strymon's Flood
In close Array the hardy Mede withstood!
In vain the Vanquish'd from the Victor fled, Behind Eione's Walls to hide his Head;
Thither new Terrors did the Rout pursue,
And Those the Sword had spar'd, fell Famine slew.*

Upon the Second was this:

*These Monuments of never-dying Fame

*These may her Sons in After-Ages view,
And strive their Great Forefathers to out-do.*

This was the Inscription of the Third:

*Mnestheus from hence led forth his chosen Band,
And wav'd his Banners high in hostile Land.
Mnestheus, as Homer sings, did All excell
In ordering Troops, and ranging Battels well.
From Him his lov'd Athenians learn'd the Art,
To Them his Knowledge did the Prince impart.
They, best of Any, can the Ranks prepare,
And form the Squadrons for the doubtful War.*

Though the Name of Cimon is not mentioned in these Inscriptions, yet his Contemporaries do All assert that they relate to Him, and distinguish him with a peculiar Honour. For Miltiades and Themistocles could never obtain the like. And when Miltiades desired a Crown of Olive, one Sochares, who was of the Tribe of Decelia, stood up in the midst of the Assembly, and spoke these words, which being agreeable to the Populace, were applauded by them, though unjust, and very ungratefully spoken: (1) When thou shalt conquer alone, (Miltiades) thou shalt triumph so too. What then induced them so particularly to honour Cimon? It was certainly This, that under other Commanders they stood upon the defensive; but by His Conduct, they not only repulsed their Enemies; but invaded them in their own Country.

(1) This Sentence may at first View seem reasonable; but is in reality very unjust. A General may very reasonably deserve to be honoured for his brave Exploits, though they were not performed by Himself alone, but by the Assistance of his Forces. For He had the principal Conduct, and was the Life and Soul of the Whole. Besides, the Soldiers share in the Honours done to their Commander.

Thus

Thus they became Masters of Eione and Amphipolis, where they planted Colonies : and (1) afterwards took the Isle of Scyros, which Cimon gained after this manner. The Dolopians were the Inhabitants of this Isle, a People of a sloathful disposition, and who neglected all Husbandry ; their only course of Life was Piracy ; This they practised to that degree of mischief that they rifled Those that brought Merchandise into their own Ports, and so violated all the Laws of Commerce. Some Merchants of Thessaly putting into their Port of Ctesium, they seized their Goods, and confined their Persons : But They breaking out of Prison, went and demanded Justice of the Amphyctions, which is a general Assembly made up of the People of Greece. These, maturely weighing the Fact, condemned the Isle in a great Pecuniary Mulct : but the People that were enriched with the Plunder, began to apprehend that it was They particularly that must refund ; therefore they writ to Cimon to succour them with his Fleet, and they declared themselves ready to deliver the Town into his Hands. Cimon by these means got the Town, expelled those Dolopian Pirates, and so opened the Traffick of the Ægean Sea. After This, understanding that Theseus the Son of Ægeus, when he fled from Athens, and took refuge in this Isle, was here slain by King Lycomedes upon certain suspicions ; Cimon endeavoured to find out where he was buried : (2) For the Oracle had not long before com-

commanded the Athenians to bring home his Ashes and to honour him as an Hero. Cimon could not for a long time learn where he was interred; for Those of Scyros dissembled the knowledge of it, and were not willing he should search. But at length after diligent enquiry he found out the Tomb; and then carried the Reliques into his Admiral Galley, and with great Pomp and Show brought them into Athens, (1) four hundred Years after Theseus first left that Country. This Act got Cimon the Hearts of the People, who received the Discovery with great Joy and abundance of Thanks. To signalize and perpetuate the Memory of this Deed, and their sense of it, they appointed that memorable Decision of Victory betwixt the two Tragedians, Æschylus and Sophocles: For the latter having writ his first Play, being yet very young, the Applause of the Theater was divided, and the Spectators sided into Parties: To determine this, Aphepsion, who was at that time Archon, would not cast Lots who should be Judges; but when Cimon and the other Commanders with him came into the Theater, to see the issue of the Contention, after they had performed the usual Rites to the God of the Festival, the Archon came to them, and made them swear (being Ten in all) to speak their Judgments in this Contention, according to Equity and Honour. And so being sworn Judges, he made them All sit down to give a decisive Sentence. The Contention grew warm, and both Sides ambitiously strove who should get the Suffrages of such honourable Judges; but the Victory was at

'till the last Year of that Olympiad, or the Beginning of the succeeding. By Consequence the Bones of Theseus were not found in the Isle of Scyros, and removed to Athens 'till the Beginning of that Olympiad seventy seven. The last adjudged to Sophocles ; which Æschylus took so ill, that he left Athens, and went to Sicity, where he died of discontent, and was buried near the City of Gela.

Ion reports, that when he was a young Man, and newly returned from Chios to Athens, he chanced to sup with Cimon at Laomedon's House: After Supper, when they had, according to Custom, poured out Wine to the Honour of the Gods, Cimon was desired by the Company to give them a Song: which he did with so good a grace that they were all charmed with his Voice, and extremely pleased with his Humour, declaring that he was more complaisant than Themistocles, who being entreated upon such an occasion to play upon the Lute, answered, That he could not touch an Instrument, but give him a small Village, and he would raise it into a strong and wealthy City. After talking of many indifferent things incident to such Entertainments, they entred into the Particulars of those several Actions for which Cimon had been Famous. And when they had run over the most Signal, he told them they had omitted One, upon which he valued himself most for Address and good Contrivance. He gave this Account of it. When the Athenians and their Allies had taken a great number of the Barbarians Prisoners in Sestos and Byzantium, giving Him the preference to divide the Booty, he put the naked Prisoners in one Lot, and the Spoils of their rich Attire and Jewels in the Other. This the Allies complained of, as an unequal Division; therefore he gave them their choice to take which Lot they would, and the Athenians should be content with That which they refused. One Herophytus of Samos advised them to take the Ornaments for their Share, and leave the Slaves to the Athenians: Upon this Cimon was laughed at for his ridiculous Division:

tion: For the Allies carried away the Gold Chains and Purple Robes, and the Athenians had only the naked Bodies of the Captives, which they could make no advantage of, being unused to Labour. But a little while after, the Parents and Kinsmen of the Prisoners coming from Lydia and Phrygia, every one redeemed his Relations at a very high Ransom. By this means Cimon got so much Treasure, that he maintained his whole Fleet of Gallies with the Money for four Months; and yet there was some left to lay up in the Treasure at Athens. Now Cimon growing rich, what he gain'd from the Barbarians with Honour, he spent hospitably upon the Citizens. For he pull'd down all the Enclosures of his Gardens and Grounds, that all Travellers, but his Citizens especially, might gather of his Fruits freely and without danger. At home he kept a Table that was not furnished indeed with great Delicacies, but where was a Noble Competency of Provisions, and All very good; here the poor Townsmen had a constant and easie Access, so that their Care was employed in discharging their Publick Duties, from which otherwise they would have been distracted by seeking after a Subsistence. But Aristotle reports, That he was partial in this Reception, and that it did not extend to All the Athenians, but only to Those of the Tribe of Lacia. Besides, he always went attended with a Train of young Gentlemen, who were his Domesticks, and very well clad; and if he met with an elderly Citizen in a poor Habit, he would strip one of his Retinue, and cloath the decayed Citizen: and This was looked upon as very well done. He did enjoyn them likewise to carry great Sums of Money about them; and if they met in the Streets any one that they either knew, or who looked as if he were in distress, they had order to relieve him, and convey something privately into his Hand. This Cratinus the Poet speaks of, in one of his Comedies called Archilocha, after this manner.

*I am Metrobius, who still believed,
Nay justly did expect to be relieved,
By such a Table Cimon once did hold
For Men as poor as I, and Men as old.
Cimon of all the Grecians was the best,
Rich, Valiant, Honest, Noble to his Guest.*

*Gorgias the Leontine gives him this Character,
(1) That he got Riches that he might use them, and so used them that he got himself Credit by them. And He'd have in fight Agefilaus's Success.*

Lichas, we know, became Famous in Greece, only because on the days of the Sports, when the young Lads run naked, he used to entertain the Strangers that came to see these Diversions. But Cimon surpassed all the ancient Athenians for Hospitality and good Nature: For though those taught the rest of Greece to sow Corn, and the use of Fire and Water: Yet Cimon by keeping open House, and giving Travellers Liberty to eat all his Fruits, which the several Seasons afforded, seemed to restore to the World that Community of Goods which the Poets fabulously tell us was maintained in the Reign of Saturn. Those who object to him, that he did This to be Popular, and gain the Applause of the Vulgar, are confuted by the constant Tenour of the rest of his Actions, which all tended to uphold the Interests of the Nobility against the Populace; of which he gave instances, when He, together with Aristides, opposed Themistocles, who was for advancing the Authority of the People beyond its just Limits; and downright quarrelled with Ephialtes, who, to ingratiate himself with the Multitude, was for abolishing the Jurisdiction of the Areopagites. And when All of his time, except Aristides and Ephialtes, took Presents, he still kept his Hands clean and untainted, and never acted nor counselled any thing but what was Just and Innocent. They report that Ræfages a Persian, who had traiterously revolted from the King his Master, fled to Athens, and there being harassed by Sycophants, who were still accusing him to the People, he applied himself to Cimon for redress; to gain his Favour, he brought him two Cups, the One full of a Gold Coin called Darius, and the Other of Silver: Cimon would not receive them, but asked him smilingly, whether he would have him to be his Mercenary, or his Friend; he replied, his Friend: If so (said he) take away these pieces, for being your Friend, I presume they are at my Service when I shall have occasion for them, and when I have I'll send to you.

The Allies of the Athenians began now to be very weary of the War, and were willing to have some intervals of repose, that they might look after their Husbandry and Traffick. For they saw their Enemies driven out of the Country, and did not fear any new Incurfions: Yet they still paid the Taxes they were assessed at, but would not send Men and Gallies, as they had done before. This the other Athenian Generals would constrain them to by rigour of Process, 'till at last by fining them so grievously they rendered the Government uneasie, and even odious to them. But Cimon practised a contrary Method, he forced no Man to go, that was not willing, but of Those that desired to be excused from Service, he took Money, and Vessels unman'd: And permitted the Men to stay at home and follow what gainful Vocations they liked best, whether of Husbandry or Merchandise. By this means they grew Luxurious, and enervated all their Courage by living at ease. But the Athenians he took into his Gallies, and by employing Them in all his Naval Expeditions, inured them to suffer Hardship: So that being severely Disciplined, and continually bearing Arms, the Allies began to dread, and then flatter Them who were grown thus dreadful at their Cost; (1) 'till they fell to that degree of Subjection, as of Allies they almost became Tributaries and Slaves. No Man ever checked the growth of the Persians Ambition so much as Cimon; for he not only beat them out of Greece, but closely pursuing them, would not let them take Breath, nor put their Affairs in any posture; but either took their Towns by open force, or made them revolt, by managing Intelligence within their Walls. So that in all Asia, even from Ionia to Pamphylia, there was not one Soldier that appeared for the King of Persia.

(1) This is a Lesson worthy the Perusal of all Princes, and Statesmen. It is certain that a State hardened by continual Exercise, and constant Warfare, will sooner or later grow too many for her Allies, if they chuse to live at their Ease, and instead of bearing a share in their Persons, content themselves with furnishing their Quota towards the Expences attending the Service. Most of the Allies, saith Thucydides, lib. 1.

from an Excess of Idleness, chusing rather to pay down in ready Money their Contingency for the Maintenance of the Fleet, on Condition that they might not be obliged to quit their Dwellings, and serve in Person, the naval Power of the Athenians by that means increased prodigiously, whilst the Confederates, who took care to keep themselves out of Harm's way became enervated, and very unfit for the War.

When

When word was brought that some Persian Commanders were upon the Coasts of Pamphylia with a Land-Army, and a great Fleet of Gallies; Cimon, that he might intercept them before they should come into the Sea that lies betwixt the Che-lidonian Isles, set forth from Triopium and Gnidos with two hundred Gallies, very fleet, and that could easily tack about. They were first contrived and built by Themistocles, but Cimon enlarged them, that when they came to grapple, there might be a greater number of Combatants to oppose the Enemy. He first steered towards the City of Phaselis, which though inhabited by Greeks, yet they would not quit the Interests of Persia, but denied his Gallies entrance into their Port: Whereupon he wasted the Country, and drew up his Army to their very Walls; but some Soldiers of Chios, which were then listed under Cimon, being ancient Friends to the Phaselites, endeavoured to mitigate the General in their behalf; and in the mean time shot Arrows into the Town, to which were fastened Letters of Intelligence, which gave them an account of the state of Affairs: At length Peace was concluded upon these Conditions, That they should pay down ten Talents, and join their Forces with Cimon against the Barbarians. Ephorus saith, the Admiral of the Persian Fleet was Tithraustes, and the General of the Land Army, Pherendates: But Calisthenes is positive, that Argomandes the Son of Gobrias had the supream Command of all the Forces. The whole Fleet anchored at the Mouth of the River Eurymedon, but with no design to fight, because they expected a reinforcement of Phœnician Sail, which were to come from Cyprus; but Cimon, being resolved to prevent their joining, ranged his Gallies in such a posture, that if they declined fighting he might force them to it. The Barbarians seeing This, retired within the mouth of the River, to prevent their being attacked ; but when they saw the Athenians come upon them, notwithstanding their Retreat, they met them with six hundred Sail, as Phenodemus relates, but according to Ephorus, only with three hundred and fifty. Yet notwithstanding this odds of number, they did nothing worthy such mighty Forces ; for they presently turned the Prows of their Gallies toward the shore, where Those that came first threw themselves upon Land, and fled to their Army drawn up thereabout, but the rest perished with their Vessels, or were taken: By This you may guess at their number ; for though a great many escaped out of the Fight, and a great many others were sunk, yet two hundred Gallies were taken by the Athenians. When their Land-Army drew toward the Seaside, Cimon was in suspence whether he should make a Descent : For thereby he should expose his Greeks, wearied with Slaughter in the first Engagement, to the Swords of the Barbarians, who were all fresh Men, and Superiour to them in number : But seeing his Men resolute, and flushed with Victory, he made them land, though they had not yet wiped off the Sweat and Blood of the first Battel. As soon as they touched Ground, they set up a shout, and ran furiously upon the Enemy, who stood firm, and sustained the first shock with great obstinacy ; so that the Fight began to be very doubtful ; the principal Men of the Athenians for Quality and Courage, were slain ; at length, tho' with much ado, they routed the Barbarians, Some they took Prisoners, and plundered all their Tents and Pavilions, which were full of very rich Spoil. Cimon being thus a perfect Conqueror, having in one day gained two Victories, wherein he surpassed That of Salamis by Sea, and That of Platea by Land, was encouraged to pursue his Success: So that

News

News being brought that the Phœnician Succours, in number eighty Sail, were at the Gulf of (1) Hydrus, he bended his Course toward them, and encompassed them about. They had not received any certain account of the former Defeat, and now were in great doubt what to think: So that thus surprized, they lost their Vessels, and all the Men were either Slain or Drowned. This success of Cimon so daunted the King of Persia, that he presently made that memorable Peace, whereby he engaged that his Armies should come no nearer the Grecian Sea than the length of a Horse-race: And that none of his Gallies or Vessels of War should appear between the (2) Cyanean and Chelidonian Isles. Calisthenes says, that he agreed not to any Articles, but that upon the Fear this Victory gave him, he prudently kept off so far from Greece, that when Pericles with fifty, and Ephialtes with thirty Gallies, cruised beyond the Chelidonian Isles, they could not discover one Persian Sail. But in the Collection which Craterus made of the Publick Acts of the People, there is an Original Draught of this Treaty, as following upon that defeat. And it is reported, that at Athens they erected the Altar of

(1) I find not the least Mention of this Port of Hydrus in any Author whatever, not even in Thucydides, who has given us this History at full. Lubin thinks it must have been a Town in the Isle of Cyprus, or some Place in Cilicia, or Pamphylia near the River Eurimedon, where Cimon obtained this great Victory; or that the Text in Plutarch ought to be corrected, and that instead of Ὑδρῶν it should be Σύδρον, Sydræ, for there was a Maritime Town of that name in Cilicia upon the Borders of Pamphylia. And this Conjecture seems the most probable, unless we should rather chuse to read it Hydrassa, for One of the Cyclades went by that name.

(2) By this means he was debarred from entering the Ægean Sea by the Euxine, and the Mediterranean by the Seas of Pamphylia, Syria, &c. For those Cyanean Islands, or Rocks, were near the Entrance of the Euxine, One on the European side near Byzantium, and the Other on the Asiatick near Chalcedon, separated from each other by an Arm of the Sea not above twenty Furlongs broad.

Peace

The L I F E of

Peace upon this occasion; and decreed particular Honours to Callias, who was employed as Ambassador to manage the Treaty.

The People of Athens raised so much Money from the Spoils of this War, which were sold by publick Out-cry, that besides other Expences, and raising the South Wall of the Cittadel, they laid the Foundation of those Walls (afterwards finished) which they called Skele, i. e. Long Shanks, that join the City to the Port; but the Place where they built them being a Moorish Ground, they were forced to sink great Weights of Stone to secure the Foundation; and all this they did out of the Money Cimon supplied them with. It was He likewise that adorned Athens with those Publick Places of Exercise, which they afterward so much frequented and delighted in: He set the Forum with Palm-trees: The Academy, which was before open, and exposed to the Weather, he fenced with Trees, and beautified with Fountains; he made covered Alleys to walk in, and set out Ground for Foot and Horse-races. Afterward being informed that some Persians, who had made themselves Masters of the Chersonese, were so peremptory in not quitting it, that they called in the People of the higher Thrace to help them against Cimon, whom they despised for the Smallness of his Forces; he set upon them with only four Gallies, and took Thirteen of theirs. Then having drove out the Persians, and subdued the Thracians, he made the whole Chersonese subject to the Commonwealth of Athens. From hence he went against the People of Thasos, who had revolted from the Athenians; and having defeated them in a Fight at Sea, where he took thirty three of their Vessels, he stormed their Town, seized for the Athenians all the Mines of Gold on the other side of it, and all the Country dependant on it. This opened him a fair Passage sage into Macedon, so that he might have conquered the greatest part of it. But because he neglected that Opportunity, he was suspected of Corruption, and that he was bribed off by King Alexander: So, by the Combination of his Adversaries, he was accused of being false to his Country. Before the Judges he pleaded, " That he never made an Interest with the Rich Ionians nor Theffalians, as Others have, from whence they drew both Honour and Profit; but that he always embraced the Friendship of the Macedonians; for as he admired, so he wished to imitate the Sedateness of their Temper, their Temperance and Simplicity of Living, which he preferred to any sort of Riches; though he had always been, and still was ambitious to enrich his Country with the Spoils of her Enemies". Stesimbrotus, making mention of his Tryal, reports, That Elpinice, in behalf of her Brother, addressed her self to Pericles, one of the most vehement of his Accusers; to whom Pericles answered with a Smile, You are too Old (Madam) to manage Affairs of this nature. However, after That, he became the mildest of his Prosecutors, and rose up but once all the while to plead against him, which he did but very faintly: And Cimon was acquitted. As for his Demeanour at home, he always restrained the Common People, who would have encroached upon the Nobility, and affected the Supream Power over them. But when he afterward was called out to War, the Multitude broke loose as it were, reversed all the ancient Laws and Customs they had hitherto observed; This they did chiefly at the instigation of Ephialtes; they withdrew likewise the Cognisance of almost all Causes from the Areopagus; so that all Appeals being made to Them, the Government was reduced to a perfect Democracy; and This by the help of Pericles, who declared in favour of the Com-

Common People. But Cimon, when he returned, seeing the Authority of this Great Council so eclipsed, was exceedingly troubled, and endeavoured to remedy these Disorders, by bringing things to their former state, and restoring the Nobility to those Degrees of Command they had in the time of Calisthenes: This the Others declaimed against, with all the vehemence possible, and began to revive those Stories concerning Him and his Sister, and cried out against him as addicted to the Lacedæmonians. Consonant to these Calumnies are the famous Verses of Eupolis the Poet upon Cimon;

*Ill Nature to him we cannot reproach;
But he is Lazy, and he will Debauch.
He goes to Sparta, and is so unkind,
He leaves poor Elpinice in Bed behind.*

(1) But if when Slothful and a Drunkard, he could storm so many Towns, and gain so many Victories; certainly if he had been Sober, and minded his Business with the least application, there had been no Grecian Commander, either before or after him, that could have surpassed him for Exploits of War. He was indeed a Favourer of the Lacedæmonians even from his Youth; and Ste-simbrotus reports, That of two Sons (Twins) that he had by a Woman of Clitorium, he named one Lacedæmonius, and the other Eleus: Whence Pericles often upbraided them with the Race of their Mother. But Diodorus the Geographer doth assert, That both These, and another Son of Cimon's,

(1) Plutarch makes it appear that he did not give much Credit to these Satyrical Verses of Eupolis. In truth, Cimon's great

whose Name was Theſſalus, were born of Iſodice the Daughter of Euryptolemus the Son of Megacles.

However, this is certain, that Cimon was countenanced by the Lacedæmonians in oppoſition to Themiſtocles, whom they hated; and while he was yet very young, they endeavoured to raiſe and increaſe his Credit in Athens: This the Athenians perceived, but diſſembled their knowledge of it; for the Favour the Lacedæmonians ſhewed him was at that time advantageous to Them and their Affairs; who were then practiſing with the Allies to win them over to their ſide: So they ſeemed not at all offended with the Honour and Kindneſs ſhewed to Cimon; for he then bore the greateſt ſway in the Affairs of Greece, was kind to the Lacedæmonians, and courteous to the Allies. But afterwards the Athenians grown more powerful, when they ſaw Cimon ſo entirely devoted to the Lacedæmonians, they began to be angry, for he would always in his Speeches prefer Them to the Athenians; and upon every occaſion, when he would reprimand Theſe for a Fault, or incite them to Emulation, he would cry, “The Lacedæmonians would not do thus.” This raiſed the Diſcontent, and got him the Hatred of the Citizens; but That which miniſtered chiefly to the accuſation againſt him, fell out upon this Occaſion.

In the fourth year of the Reign of Archidamus the Son of Zeuxidamus King of Sparta, there happened in the City of Lacedæmon the moſt dreadful Earthquake that ever was known in the Memory of Man; the Earth opened into moſt frightful Abyſſes; and the top of the Mountain Taygetus was ſo ſhaken, that the hanging Rocks and abrupt prominent Parts of it fell down; and except five Houſes, all the Town was ſhattered to pieces. They ſay, that a little before any Motion was perceived, as ſome young Men were exerciſing themselves in the middle Portico, an Hare of a sudden started out just by them, which Some of them, though all naked, and daubed with Oyl, run after shouting; no sooner were they gone from the place, but the Gymnasium fell down upon Them that were left, and killed them All. In memory of this fatal Accident, the Monument where they were afterwards interred is to this day called Sismatias, (that is) The Tomb of those who were killed by the Earthquake. Archidamus, by the present danger, made apprehensive of what might follow, and seeing the Citizens intent upon removing the richest of their Goods, he commanded an Alarm to be sounded, as if their Enemies were coming upon them, that they should presently with Arms resort to him. It was This alone that saved Sparta at that time: For the Helotes were got together from the adjacent Country, with design to surprize the Spartans, and spoil Those whom the Earthquake had spared: But finding them Armed, and well prepared, they stole away into their Towns, and openly made War with them, having drawn into a Confederacy not a few of their Neighbours; and together with Them, the Messenians fell upon the Spartans, who therefore dispatched Periclidus to Athens to sollicite for Succours; which Aristophanes flung in the Teeth of the Lacedæmonians, when he said,

And, clad in Purple Robes, demand Supply.*

This Ephialtes opposed, protesting that they ought not to raise up, or assist a City that was Rival to Athens; but that being down, it were best to keep her so, and break the Pride and Arrogance of Sparta. But Cimon (as Critias relates) (1) preferring the Safety of Lacedæmon to the Grandeur of his own Country, so persuaded the People, that he soon marched out with a great Army to their Relief. Ion reports the Speech he used to move the Athenians, That they should not suffer Greece (1) to be maimed by the Loss of so considerable a Member, nor their own City to be deprived of her Companion. In his return from aiding the Lacedæmonians, he passed with his Army through the Territory of Corinth: Whereupon Lachartus reproached him for bringing his Army into the Country, without first asking leave of the People: For he that knocks at another Man's Door, ought not to enter the House without the Master's leave. But you, Lachartus, (said Cimon) did not knock at the Gates of the Cleonians and Megarians, but broke them down, and entered by force, thinking that All ought to be open to the Powerful. And having thus rallied the Corinthian, he passed on with his Army. Some time after this, (2) the Lacedæmonians sent a second

(1) This single Word is a sufficient Vindication of Cimon, who advised the Athenians to succour Sparta. It is certain that Athens and Sparta were the two Legs, or Pillars, on Whom all the rest of Greece depended. So that if One of those Legs chanced to miscarry, Greece would thereby become lame and maimed. It is farther certain, that the Athenians were so puffed up with their Power and Grandeur, which had made them mutinous and arrogant, that they stood in need of a Curb to allay their Mettle, for which Sparta only was proper; She only was fit to be a Counter-balance, and keep them within some reasonable Bounds. It was therefore a signal Service to the Athenians to assist Sparta, and save her from ruin, and ought to be considered as a Master-stroke in Policy.

(2) The Lacedæmonians having undertaken the Siege of Ithome, and finding it impossible for Them who were not well skilled in Attacks, to carry the Place, sent, and demanded the Assistance of the Athenians, who were known to excel in that Part of military Science. They were no sooner arrived before the Town under Cimon's Command, but the Spartans began to be jealous of their Forwardness, and unsettled Temper. They were afraid that if they continued long there, the Strangers that were in their Army being bought off by the Besieged, and countenanced by the Athenians, cond time to desire Succours of the Athenians; against the Messenians and Helotes, who had seized upon Ithome: But when they came, the Spartans fearing their Courage and Resolution, of All that came to their Assistance, they sent Them only back, alledging they were turbulent and seditious. The Athenians returned home, enraged at this Usage, and vented their Anger upon all Those who were Favourers of the Lacedæmonians; therefore upon some slight occasion they banished Cimon for ten years, which is the time prescribed to Those that are banished by the Ostracism. In the mean time the Lacedæmonians intending to free Delphi from the Phoceans, brought an Army to Tanagra, whither the Athenians presently marched with design to fight them.

Cimon also came thither armed, and ranged Himself amongst Those of his own Tribe, which was That of Oeneide; but the Council of Five hundred being informed of This, and frighted at it, (his Adversaries crying out he would disorder the Army, and bring the Lacedæmonians to Athens) commanded the Officers not to receive him; wherefore Cimon left the Army, (1) conjuring Euthippus the Anaphlystian, and the rest of his Companions, who were also suspected as favouring the Lacedæmonians, to behave themselves bravely against their Enemies, and by their Actions make their Innocence evident to their Countrymen. These Men being an Hun-ans, would play them some scurvy Trick, and enterprize something against them. Whereupon they dismissed Cimon and his Soldiers, declaring that they had no Occasion for them. The Athenians incensed at this Affront, which they had not deserved at their Hands, broke the Alliance with Sparta, and joined in Confederacy with the Ar-

 (1) There was something heroic in this Behaviour of Cimon. He had that Moment received from his Citizens the greatest Affront that could be put upon a Man of Honour, and in return he exhorts Those, who were suspected a swell as Himself, to do their Duty, and wipe off that Calumny.

dred in Number (1) took Cimon's compleat Armour, and placing it in the middle of their little Battalion, formed themselves into a close Body, and charged so desperately upon the Enemy, that they were all cut off, leaving to the Athenians a deep regret, for the loss of such brave Men, and repentance for having so unjustly suspected them. Whereupon they did not long retain their severity toward Cimon, partly upon remembrance of his former services, and partly constrained by the juncture of the Times: For being defeated at Tanagra in a great Battel, and fearing the Peloponnesians would come upon them, at the opening of the Spring; they recalled Cimon by a decree, of which Pericles Himself was Author: So reasonable were Mens Repentments in those Times, and so moderate their Anger, that it always gave way to the publick good; even Ambition, the most ungovernable of all human Passions, could then yield to the Necessities of the State.

Cimon, as soon as he returned, put an end to the War, and reconciled the two Cities. But seeing the Athenians impatient of being Idle, and eager after the Honour and Spoils of War; lest they should set upon the Grecians Themselves, or with so many Ships cruising about the Isles and Peloponnesus, give Occasions to intestine Wars, or Complaints of their Allies against them; (2) He equipped two hundred Galleys, with design to

(1) This is an Action of a very particular Nature. When these Athenians found they were not to have Cimon at the Head, and fight under his Command, they beg his Armour of him, which they placed in the Midst, that it might be constantly in their View as a Witness of their Behaviour, and excite in them a Courage and Resolution worthy so renowned a Commander. What an Honour was This done to Cimon!

(2) Plutarch does not seem to Me to have made a proper Distinction between the two Expeditions of the Athenians into Ægypt, but puts Cimon upon two Enterprises at the same time, which I think a little inconsistent with common make an attempt once more upon Ægypt and Cyprus; by This means to use the Athenians to fight against the Barbarians, and enrich themselves by spoiling Those who are by nature Enemies to Greece. But when all things were prepared, and the Army ready to embark, Cimon had this Dream: It seemed to him an angry Bitch bark'd at him, and a kind of human Voice, mixed with barking, uttered these Words:

A Friend to my young Whelps, and me.*

(1) This Dream was hard to interpret; yet Astyphylus of Posidonium, a Man skilled in Divinations, and

mon Prudence. Those two Enterprizes were performed in the following manner: Cimon sailed against Cyprus with two hundred Gallies. Whilst he was buied in that Expedition, Inarces, King of Libya, and Son of Psammetichus, set out from Maraa, a City situated above Pharos, and obliged the greatest Part of Ægypt to revolt against Artaxerxes, and called in the Athenians who were before Cyprus, to his Assistance. Hereupon the Athenians immediately quitted that Island, and sailing into Ægypt made themselves Masters of the Nile, attacked Memphis, seized on Two of the Out-works, and furiously assaulted the Third, which was called the White Wall. But they proved very unfortunate in this Expedition. For Artaxerxes sent Magabazus at the Head of a powerful Army into Ægypt, where he defeated the Rebels and their Associates, drove the Greeks from Memphis, shut them up in an Isle, where he besieged them for eighteen Months together, and at last forced them to surrender.

They almost All perished in that War, which held six Years; so that very few of them got back into Greece: This was the First Expedition. The Second was a few Years after, and happened in the same Manner. The Athenians went against Cyprus with two hundred Gallies. Whilst they were before Citium, to which they had laid Siege, Amerteus the King sent to desire some Succours of them, and Cimon sent him sixty of his Gallies. Some say he went with them Himself; Others, that he continued at the Siege. In all likelihood Plutarch in this Place speaks only of the last Expedition, because he saith, ὡς ἐπ' Αἴγυπτον καὶ Κύπρον αὐθις ἐκστρατεύομεν, once more to make War upon Ægypt and Cyprus. But still I say he does not seem to have made a proper Distinction between those two Expeditions. For Cimon never thought of passing into Ægypt, when he set sail for Cyprus.

(1) It was so in Effect. But let the Dream be never so difficult and intimate with Cimon, told him, that his Death was presaged by this Vision, which he thus explained: A Dog is Enemy to Him he barks at, and one is always most a Friend to ones Enemies, when one is dead; (1) that mixture of human Voice with Barking, signifies the Medes, for the Army of the Medes is mixed with the Greeks and Barbarians. But after this Dream, as he was sacrificing to Bacchus, and the Priest cutting up the Victim, a great number of Emmets, taking up the little congealed particles of the Blood, laid them about Cimon's great Toe: This was not observed a good while; but as soon as Cimon spied it, the Priest came and shewed him the Liver of the Sacrifice imperfect, wanting that part of it, which they called the Head of the Entrail. But he could not then recede from the Enterprize, so he set sail; sixty of his Ships he sent toward Ægypt; with the rest he went and fought the King of Persia's Fleet, composed of Phœnician and Cilician Sail: subdued all the Cities thereabout, and threatened Ægypt; designing no less than the entire Ruin of the Persian Empire; and the rather for that he was informed Themistocles was in great repute among the Barbarians, and had promised the King to lead his Army, whenever he should make War upon Greece: But they say Themistocles losing all hopes of compassing his designs, and despairing to equal the Virtue and good Fortune of Ci- cult in itself, the Diviners are never at a loss for a plausible Interpretation. Astyphilus explains This of Cimon in a very ingenious Manner; it could not have met with a better Explication. But what is most pleasant is that these Explanations, false and superstitious as they are, are often confirmed by the Event.

(1) The Greeks would allow no other Language but their Own to be human, and considered the Speech of the Barbarians to be no better than the barking of Dogs. This Opinion was of great Use to a Divine who was to interpret the Dream of a Genral just as he was upon the March against the Persians.

mon, died a voluntary Death. Cimon still framing great designs, and keeping his Navy about the Isle of Cyprus, sent Messengers to consult the Oracle of Jupiter Hammon upon some secret matter; for it is not known about what they were sent; the God would give them no Answer, but commanded them to return again, for that Cimon was already with him. Hearing This they returned by Sea, and as soon as they came to the Grecian Army, which was then about Ægypt, they understood that Cimon was dead; and computing the time of the Oracle, they found that his Death was meant by it, as being then with the Gods. Some say he died of a Sicknes at Citium in Cyprus, and Others of a Wound he received in an Engagement with the Barbarians. When he perceived he should die, he commanded Those under his charge to return to their Country, and by no means to spread the news of his Death by the way; This they did with such secrecy, that they all came home safe, and neither their Enemies nor Allies knew what had happened. Thus, as Phænodemus relates, the Grecian Army was, as it were, (1) conducted by Cimon thirty days after he was dead. But with Him perished all the good fortune of Greece; for after his Death there was not a Commander that did any thing considerable, or which might deserve the name of a great action, and instead of uniting against their common Enemies, They who bore Sway in the Principal Cities, animated them against one another to that degree, that none durst or would interpose their good Offices to reconcile them. Thus by mutual discord ruining themselves,

(1) Modern History furnisheth us with like Instances of Generals, by Whom even after they were dead Affairs have been conducted, and who have retained the Command for some time by the very Sight of their Corps, which have inspired the Troops with Courage. The Sight of a brave Captain, though dead, is frequently of greater Efficacy than That of an indifferent One in full Health.

the Persians had time to recover Breathe, and repair all their Losses. It is true indeed Agefilaus made some shew of the Grecian Forces in Asia, but it was a long time after; he seemed to revive some little appearances of a War against the King's Lieutenants in the Provinces, but they all quickly vanished; for before he could perform any thing of moment, he was recalled by Civil Dissentions at home: So that he was forced to leave the Persian King's Officers to impose what Tribute they pleased on the Grecian Cities in Asia, though under the Dominion of the Lacedaemonians. (1) Whereas in the time of Cimon no Person whatever, not so much as a Letter-Carrier, durst come near the Borders, nor any Man in Arms within four hundred Furlongs of the Sea.

The Monuments called Cimonian, to this day in Athens, shew That to be the place of his Burial; yet the Inhabitants of the City Citium pay particular Honour to a certain Tomb, which they call the Tomb of Cimon, according to Nausocrates the Rhetorician; who also reports, that in a Famine, when their Necessities were very great, they sent to the Oracle, which commanded them to honour Cimon as a God.

Thus have I drawn the Life of this Famous Captain, and leave the Reader to judge of him by these Proportions.

(1) This single Instance shews how much the Barbarians stood in fear of Cimon. The King's Lieutenants and Satrapa who governed the Provinces, were such covetous insatiable Officers, that all the Greek Cities in Asia were perpetually harrassed and drained by military Executions. Cimon put an End to those Plunderings, and instead of such shameful Disorders, established Peace and Tranquility in all those Quarters.

LUCULLUS his Grandfather had been Consul, his Uncle by the Mother's side was Metellus surnamed Numidicus. As for his Parents, his Father was convicted of Extortion; and his Mother Cæcilia's Reputation was blasted by her loose Life. As for Lucullus himself, whilst he was very young, and before he had put up for any Office, or Dignity in the State, he made himself known in the World by an Action, which caused him to be much respected; for he preferred a Bill against Servilius the Augur, who had been his Father's Accuser, and was by Him charged with Corruption in the Execution of his Office. This step was generally applauded, and considered as an Act of singular lar Virtue; (1) though in the main the Romans were better pleased with those Prosecutions which were commenced, and carried on without any personal Pique; they looked on Them as certain Tokens of Courage and Magnanimity, and compared the Authors to generous Hounds, of the right Breed, and keen upon their Prey.

If this Cause was prosecuted with great Vehemence and Animosity, it was defended with no less Heat and Vivacity; and the Contest was carried to such a Pitch that Several were killed, and Many wounded on both sides; however Servilius in the Issue was acquitted. Lucullus applied himself very early, and with much Diligence, to his Studies, so that he soon became Master of the Greek, as well as his Mother Tongue, and could express himself with equal Fluency and Elegance in Both, for which Reason Sylla dedicated his Memoirs to Him, as to a Person more able than Himself to digest them into Method, and form a regular History upon them. His Eloquence was not purely (2) That of a mercenary Pleader, who in a

(1) Though the Person Lucullus prosecuted had impeached his Father, and though consequently there was Room to suspect that what he did was from a Spirit of Resentment, yet it was considered as a very commendable, and glorious Action. This is an Instance of the great Opinion the Romans even then entertained of Lucullus.

(2) For there is nothing more common than to see some Men very fluent, for instance, at the Bar, who notwithstanding have not a Word to say when they are to speak to other Affairs wherein they are not conversant. Then, as Plutarch observes, they are dry, and betray their Ignorance. This puts me in mind of a beautiful Passage in one of Plato's Dialogues, where he considers the Advantages the Statesman has over the Philosopher, and Those the Philosopher has over the Statesman. When the Debate is upon Political Affairs, there the Statesman shines, and the Philosopher who is but a Philosopher has nothing to say for himself, but is as mute as a Fish. But when the Argument is of Wisdom, Virtue, &c. then the Philosopher has his Revenge, then he speaks like an Oracle, and the Statesman, who is but a Statesman, either speaks nothing to the Purpose, or is forced to hold his Tongue.

publick Audience, or at the Bar, expatiates with much Rhetorick upon the knotty Points of an intricate Question, Like the (1) Thunny sporting in the vast Abyfs; but take them from the Bar, and they are mute, or, as we say, like a Fish out of Water. In his Youth, for the better polishing and cultivating of his Mind, he addicted himself to Humanity Learning, and what we call the Liberal Sciences, because they are the proper Studies of Persons of a free and more elevated State. But as he grew in Years, and became as it were worn out in Camps and Battels, he refreshed his Mind with the more comfortable Study of Philosophy, chiefly favouring the Contemplative Part, seasonably abating and deadening the more active and ambitious, the better to prepare him to behave as he ought in the Contest he foresaw arising betwixt Himself, and Pompey. We have this remarkable Instance of his great Learning, and Erudition. One day after he had made himself merry for some time upon the Subject with Hortensius the Lawyer, and Sisenna the Historian, he offered in good earnest to write an Account of the Marsian War in Verse, or Prose, and That either in the Greek or Roman Language, as should be determined by Lot. They took him at his Word, and the Lot falling upon the Greek, he performed his Promise; and to This we owe the History of that War written in Greek, which is at this day extant among us. Among the many Instances of his singular Love and Affection to his Brother Marcus, That which was First in Date, was esteemed the First in Merit by the Romans. Though he was much older than his Brother, yet he declined entering upon any Office, and waited 'till his Brother was qualified by Age to share with him in the Honours and Dignities of the Commonwealth. The People were so charmed with this brotherly Affection, that Lucullus, though absent, was chosen Ædile with Marcus.

(1) Plutarch in this Place makes a very proper Application of a Passage in an antient Poet, that is now lost. It is in the Greek Θύννος βολαῖος, and H. Stephens has explained this βολαῖος by wounded, but I rather think it signifies swift, impetuous, shooting like an Arrow, which is the Quality of the Thunny.

Many and early were the Proofs of his Valour and Conduct in the Marsian War, being admired by Sylla for his Constancy and Mildness, and always employ'd by him in dispatching affairs where Industry and Fidelity were required; especially in the Mint, most of the Money for carrying on the Mitbridatick War being coined by Him: Which being soon exchanged for Necessaries in the Camp, was for a long time current in the Army, and from Him called Luculleian Coin. After This, when Sylla had conquered Athens, and Necessaries for his Army were cut off by reason the Enemy was Master at Sea; Lucullus was the Man whom he sent into Libya and Ægypt, to procure him shipping. It was then the depth of Winter, when he ventured out with no more than three small Greek Vessels, and as many Rhodian Galleys, not only into the main Sea, but also among multitudes of the Enemies Shipping, even There where they were absolute Masters. Arriving at Crete, he gained it to Sylla's Party; and finding the Cyrenians harrassed by many Tyrannies, and a destructive War, he took Care of their publick Affairs, and settled them: (1) Putting their City in mind of that Saying which

(1) The Cyrenians sent to Plato to desire he would come and frame some Laws for them. Plato absolutely refused them, and said that they were too much wedded to their Wealth, and that it was not possible for so opulent a People to be obedient to Laws. Lucullus adds with good Reason that those Words of Plato were propheti-

cal, for in Effect the Disorders he found them under were owing to their Riches. The Words of true Philosophers are, generally speaking, oraculous. This single Passage in Plutarch justifies the Commendation given to Lucullus, that he was well skilled in the Grecian Learning.

Plato

Plato had prophetically uttered of them. For the Cyrenians having sent and intreated that Philosopher to prescribe Laws to them, and mould them into some sound form of Government, he made answer, That it was a hard thing to give Laws to the Cyrenians, abounding with so much Wealth and Plenty. For nothing renders a Man more intractable than Felicity, nor more gentle than the shock of Fortune. This made the Cyrenians so willingly submit to the Laws which Lucullus imposed upon them. Having thus settled Affairs at Cyrene he sailed from thence into Ægypt, but in his Passage lost the best part of the Ships he had been collecting, which fell into the Hands of Pyrates; he Himself escaping with great Difficulty to Alexandria, where he was received with much Ceremony: For the whole Royal Navy went in great order out of the Port to meet him, and paid him the same Compliments the King Himself was used to receive upon his return from any Naval Expedition. (1) Ptolomy, who was then very young, entertained him with the highest Testimonies of Kindness and Respect, even so far as to appoint him an Apartment and Table in the Palace, an Honour never shewn before to any foreign Officer, or Commander. Besides, his Appointments for the defraying his Expences were four times as much as any that had been settled heretofore on the like Occasions. However Lucullus made a right use of that royal Bounty; he accepted of no more than what was absolutely necessary, and refused the Presents that had been offered him, though they were very con-

(1) I cannot learn upon what Authority Plutarch saith This; for I find that at the time when Lucullus went to Alexandria during the Siege of Athens, Ptolomy surnamed Lathurus was then upon the Throne, and he could not be young, for he was at that time in the thirtieth Year of his Reign, and did not die 'till a Year after Sylla. They who would have him to be Ptolomy Auletes, the Son of Lathurus, are mistaken.

siderable, and valued at more than fourscore Talents. It is reported that he neither went to see Memphis, nor Any of the celebrated Wonders of Ægypt: As thinking it fitter for a Man of no Business, and much Curiosity, to see such things, than for Him who had left his Commander in the Trenches, storming the Walls of his Enemies. Ptolomy refused to enter into an Alliance with Sylla, for fear of drawing the War upon Himself, but at the same time provided Lucullus with a sufficient Squadron to convoy him to Cyprus; and just as he was ready to embark the King carested him with great Tenderness, embraced him, wished him a good Voyage, and presented him with a large beautiful Emerald set in Gold. Lucullus at first refused it, but when the King shewed him that his Picture was engraven upon it, and that it was very like him, he was then forced in Prudence to accept of it; for had he shewed any discontent at parting, it might have endangered his Passage.

In his Return he summoned all the Maritime Towns to join him with their Naval Forces, except Such as gave Harbour to the Pyrates, or were suspected to be in their Interest, and in this Condition he arrived at Cyprus; there he was informed that the Enemy lay in wait for him under the Promontories, whereupon he laid up his Fleet, and sent to the Cities to supply him with Provisions, because he was resolved to winter among them. But by that time this Resolution was fully known abroad, and as soon as the Wind served, he launched on a sudden, embarked, and proceeded on his Voyage, lowering his Sails in the day time, and hoisting them when it was dark; by which Stratagem he got safe without any Accident to Rhodes. Being furnished with Ships at Rhodes, he soon prevailed upon the Inhabitants of Chios and Knidos to quit the Party of Mithridates, and join with Him against the Samians. He drove the King's Garrison out of Cbios, and set the Colophonians at Liberty, having seized Epigonus the Tyrant who cruelly oppressed them.

About this time Mithridates left Pergamus, and retired to Pitane, where being closely besieged by Fimbria, and not daring to engage with so bold and victorious a Commander, he contrived his Escape by Sea, and sent for all his Fleet to attend him. Which when Fimbria perceived, having no Ships of his Own, he sent to Lucullus, entreating him to assist him with His, in subduing the most dangerous and determined Enemy of Rome, lest the opportunity of humbling Mithridates, an Enterprize which had cost the Romans so much Blood and Trouble, should now at last be lost, when he was within reach, and so easily to be taken; who being caught, no one would be more highly commended than He, who cut off his passage, and seized him in his Flight. He being drove from the Land by the One, and stopt at Sea by the Other, would be abundant Matter of Renown and Glory to them Both, and eclipse the Fame of Sylla's Actions at Chæronæa and Orchomenus.

The Proposal was no unlikely thing, it being obvious to all Men; that if Lucullus had hearkened to Fimbria, and with his Navy, which was then near at hand, had blocked up the Haven, the War had soon been brought to an end, and infinite Numbers of Mischiefs prevented thereby. But He, either preferring the Interest and Authority of Sylla, whose Lieutenant he was, to all other Considerations, whether of a publick or private Nature, or else looking on Fimbria with an Eye of Detestation for having lately imbrued his Hands in the Blood of his Friend, who was at the same time his General, or lastly being led to it (1) by an especial Providence, which inspired him to spare Mithridates for the present, and preserve him as an Enemy in due time worthy his own Arms; whatever it was, he gave no Ear to the Proposal, but suffered Mithridates to escape, and laugh at Fimbria and all his Preparations. After which He alone had the Honour of defeating the King's Fleet in two Engagements. The First was at Leëtus, a Promontory of Troas; soon after which hearing that Neoptolemus, the King's Lieutenant, was riding at Anchor in the Bay of Tenedos, where he waited for him with a Fleet more numerous and stronger than the Former, he sailed towards him, and to provoke him to an Engagement, he advanced before his Squadron on board a Galley of Rhodes commanded by Demagoras, an expert Seaman, and a great Friend to the Romans. Neoptolemus upon Sight of him made up furiously at him, and commanded the Master with all imaginable Force to bear up to him; but Demagoras fearing the bulk and massy Stem of the Admiral Galley, thought it dangerous to meet him a-head, wherefore tacking about he received him a-stern, in which place, though violently bore upon, he suffered no great Damage, because the Shock fell on the lower Parts of the Ship, which are constantly under Water. Immediately upon This the rest of the Fleet came up, and Lucullus ordering the Master of the Galley to tack again, fell vigorously upon the Enemy, and behaving himself with extraordinary Courage and Resolution, he constrained them to fly, and had Neoptolemus in chace for a good while together. After This he proceeded and joined Sylla in Chersonesus, as he was passing the Straits, and brought timely Assistance for the Transportation of the Army.

(1) The Words in the Original are divine Fortune. The Philosophers, particularly the Pythagoreans, called divine Fortune the Union of Man's Will with the Judgment and Determination of God, who presides over all, and governs all. This is fully explained in the Commentaries upon Hierocles. In Truth, Divine Fortune is only another Expression for Providence.

(1) As soon as the Peace was concluded betwixt Mithridates and the Romans, the King sailed back to Pontus, and Sylla laid a Fine of twenty thousand Talents upon Asia. Lucullus was ordered to levy the Fine, and new coin the Money; and his Behaviour in that Employment proved some sort of Ease and Consolation to those distressed Cities, after the Hardships and Severities they had received from Sylla. For he proceeded not only like a Man of Uprightness and Integrity, but shewed as much Moderation and Tendernefs as could be expected from the Nature of his Office and Employment.

The Mitylenians having revolted, and declared for Marius, he earnestly wished they might be sensible of their Error, and so come off with an easy Punishment. But when he found they were led by their evil Genius to persist in their Rebellion, he came upon them with his Fleet, overthrew them in a warm Engagement, shut them up in their City, and besieged them. Some time after This he had recourse to the following Stratagem: He embarked at noon-day in open View of the City, and pretended to set sail for Elea; but as soon as it was dark he tacked about, returned privately without any Noise, and lay in Ambush near the City.

The Mitylenians early the next Morning sallied out in a disorderly manner, and ran to pillage the Camp, which they expected to find defenceless and

(1) This Peace was concluded in the Year of Rome 669, eighty two Years before the Incarnation, and eight Years before the Death of Sylla. And this is a plain Proof that Ptolomy Lathurus was King at the time Lucullus was in Ægypt.

forfaken. But Lucullus rifing from his Ambufcade fell upon them on a fudden, made many of them Prifoners, flew five thousand, who flood upon their Defence, took from them fix thousand Slaves, and a very rich Booty.

He had no Hand in the many infinite Calamities, in which all Italy was involved by the Means of Marius and Sylla. He was preferved from that Misfortune (1) by the particular Care of divine Providence, which kept him exercifed in Asia. And yet, though abfent, he was as much in Sylla's Favour as any of his other Friends, among whom he was diftinguifhed by that General. For, as we obferved before, he dedicated his Memoirs to Him as to his particular Friend, and at his Death left Him Guardian to his Son, exclusive of Pompey. It is very likely that this Preference was the Principal Cause of the Contention and Jealoufy that afterwards broke out between them; Both Young, and equally contending for Honour and Authority.

A little after Sylla's Death he was declared Conful with Marcus Aurelius Cotta, about the one hundred feventy fixth Olympiad. At that time Some were for renewing the War with Mithridates, and the Matter was debated in Senate, where Cotta the Conful declared, that it was not dead, but laid afleep only for the prefent. Wherefore when the Provinces came to be determined by Lot, and the Cisalpine Gaul fell to Lucullus, he was exceedingly troubled at it, becaufe he confidered it as a Province where there was no room for any great Exploits,

(1) Plutarch acknowledgeth here that it was Providence, or in his own Words, divine Fortune, that kept Lucullus from having a Hand in thofe infinite Calamities brought by Marius and Sylla upon Italy, by retaining him in Asia. For if he had been at that time in Italy it would have been almoft impoffible for him not to have had his Share in them; or if he would have oppofed them, His Oppofition might have aggravated them.

and where consequently no Glory was to be acquired. Besides, he was nettled to the quick at Pompey's Success in Spain, where he had acquired great Reputation, and he foresaw that as soon as That War was ended, He was the most likely of any Man to be declared General against Mithridates. Wherefore when Pompey had demanded large Sums of Money, and declared in plain terms, that unless it was sent him he would relinquish Spain to Sertorius, and return with his Army into Italy, Lucullus seconded his Demand with great Zeal, and made use of all his Interest and Authority to have the Money sent him, that he might have no Pretence of coming home during his Consulate. For it was not to be doubted but he would be Master in Rome, where he might govern as he pleased whilst he was at the Head of so great an Army. Besides, Cethegus the Tribune, who had the greatest Influence and Authority of any Man in the City, because he neither said, nor did any thing there but what he knew would be agreeable to the People, was a secret, but bitter Enemy to Lucullus, who abominated him for his Lewdness and Infamy, and had on that Account declared open War against him.

At the same time when Lucius Quintius the other Tribune was for abrogating Sylla's Acts and Constitutions, which could not be done without changing the whole Face of Affairs, and throwing Rome into new Troubles and Convulsions, instead of the Peace and Tranquility which she at that time enjoyed; Lucullus by his private Exhortations and publick Admonitions, so effectually calmed and reclaimed him, that he hindered his Design, and suppressed his Ambition, wisely and safely encountering so great an Evil in the very Bud.

About this time News was brought to Rome that Octavius the Governour of Cilicia was dead, upon which many Candidates appeared for that Government, and All of them made their Court to Cethegus, as the Man whose Credit could enable him to turn the Balance in Favour of Him he was pleased to countenance. Lucullus did not look on that Province as any thing considerable in itself, only he conceived that if he could obtain it, no Man besides Himself would be employed in the War against Mithridates, by reason of its nearness to Cappadocia. This made him use all his Interest for the obtaining of that Province, and put him upon a Project, not so Honest and Commendable, as Expedient for compassing his Design, submitting to Necessity against his own Inclination. There was at that time in Rome a Woman called Præcia, One of Those who were particularly noted for their Wit and Vivacity of Parts as well as Beauty, though She was in other respects no better than a profest Harlot. This Woman knew how to make a right use of the Credit and Favour she was in with Those who visited her, and apply it to the Service of her Friends, who often carried their Points by her sole Interest and Assistance; so that besides the Reputation of being the most beautiful Woman in her Person, and most agreeable in her Conversation, she had likewise That of being the most zealous Friend, and the best able to carry on an Affair with Prudence and Success, which made her much courted, and gave her an universal Reputation. But the Moment Cethegus became captivated, and He fell into the Snare, who was the Man of greatest Authority in all Rome, she from that time became absolute, and had, as we call it, the World in a String; for nothing was transacted in Publick but by the Advice and Approbation of Cethegus, and Cethegus did nothing without the good Will and Pleasure of Præcia.

This Woman did Lucullus labour to gain by Flattery and Presents. Lucullus did not disdain to list himself in the Number of Præcia's Admirers, and pay her Homage; which was no small Matter of Triumph to a Woman of her Pride and Ambition, so that in Return Cethegus became a professed Stickler for Lucullus. He was full of his Commendations in all their Assemblies, and the First to appoint Him to the Government of Cilicia; which when he had once obtained, he was no longer under a Necessity of Courting the assistance either of Præcia, or Cethegus. The Conduct of the War against Mithridates was unanimously voted to Lucullus, as the only Person fit to cope with that Prince, and command the Roman Armies with Reputation and Success. For Pompey was still employed in Spain against Sertorius, and Metellus was superannated; and They Two were the only Officers who could dispute that Command with Lucullus. However Cotta his Collegue, with much Difficulty obtained an Order of Senate, by whom he was sent with a Fleet to guard the Propontis, and defend Bitbynia.

Lucullus having raised a Legion, passed with great Expedition over into Asia. There he found other Forces of which his Army was to be composed; All corrupted and disabled by a long Course of Luxury, the Pleasures of the Country, and an insatiable Avarice. Besides These Vices which were common to them All, the Fimbrians, as they were called, who were a Part of those Forces, who had for a long time been without any Chief, were become Headstrong and Ungovernable. These were the Men who had slain Flaccus the Consul, and General under Fimbria, and These were They who afterward betrayed Fimbria to Sylla; a bold and barbarous People, warlike, expert, and hardy in the Field. Lucullus in a short time took down the Courage of These, and disciplined Others, who then first knew what it was to be under a good Captain, and real Commander; for before That they had been constantly humoured and conjoled by their Officers, and knew no Obedience but That to their own Will.

As for the State of the Enemy's Affairs, it stood thus: Mithridates (1) like a true Sophister in War set out at first with more State, Pomp, and Noise than Substance and Solidity. His Army indeed was very splendid and magnificent in Appearance, but vain and unserviceable in Effect. Accordingly he met with a signal Disgrace, and was most shamefully routed. This taught him to be wiser for the future, so that when the War came to be renewed, he reduced his Forces into a just and well martialled Army, formed not so much for Shew as Service. He retrenched that confused Multitude of so many People and Nations, and all those Menaces and Bravadoes vented by Barbarians in an infinite Number of Tongues and Languages, and laid aside all the Armour burnished with Gold, and enriched with precious Stones, which he looked on rather as the Wealth of the Conqueror, than a Defence and Security to the Bearers. He provided his Soldiers with Swords formed like Those of the Romans, and with Shields solid and substantial. He took care to have his Horses strong and well trained, rather than magnificently harnessed; mustered a hundred and twenty thousand Foot, armed and disciplined after the manner of the Roman Infantry, and sixteen thousand Horse well appointed for the Service, besides a hundred Cha-

(1) This is a very proper Expression. As the Sophisters land their Discourses, and mind only the Pomp and Ostentation of Words without any Regard to Solidity and Truth; so Mithridates arming against the Romans with more Shew and Noise than any effectual Preparations, might very truly be called a Sophister in War.

riots armed with long Scythes, and drawn each by four Horses. To This Preparation for the Land Service he added a Fleet not cumbered, as before, with Golden Cabins, lascivious Baths, and effeminate Furniture, but stored with all sorts of Weapons, both offensive and defensive, and provided with Money to pay the Soldiers.

With this formidable Preparation he fell into Bitthynia, where the Cities opened their Gates, and received him joyfully; and not only Those in Bitthynia, but almost all the Cities throughout Asia, relapsed into their former Distempers, being cruelly oppressed by the Roman Publicans, and Usurers. Lucullus did in the End rid the Country of those Harpies, who fed upon the very Vitals of the Inhabitants; but for the present he thought it sufficient to admonish them to be more compassionate and reasonable, by reminding them of their Duty. This composed the Minds of the People, and prevented a Sedition which was in a manner ripe and ready to break out in every Corner.

Whilst Lucullus was thus busied in applying a Remedy to these Distempers, Cotta fancied that now was his time, and that he ought to do something extraordinary in the Absence of his Collegue. Wherefore he prepares to encounter Mitbridates; and the more he is told that Lucullus is at Hand, and that he is already advanced as far as Phrygia, and was just ready to join him, the more forward is he to engage, thinking the Victory already in his Hands, and desirous to deprive his Collegue of his Share in the Honour of it. But notwithstanding all his Confidence, he was routed both by Sea and Land. In the naval Engagement he lost sixty of his Ships with all their Equipage, and by Land they slew four thousand of the best Men in all his Troops, and forced him to fly to Chalcedon, from whence he could not escape unless Lucullus came to relieve him. The greatest Part of the Army pressed Lucullus to leave Cotta behind, and enter without delay into the Territories of Mitbridates, assuring him that he would find his Capital in a weak defenceless Condition. This was the Language in general of all the Soldiers, who highly resented it, that Cotta should not only ruin Himself by his Folly and Temerity, and lose the Flower of his Army, but prevent Them from obtaining an honourable Victory, which was to be purchased without any Danger, by obliging them to march to His Assistance, and make good the False Steps He had been taking. But Lucullus in a solemn Speech to the Army on that Occasion declared, that he chose rather to save one Roman than be Master of all the Wealth and Power of the Enemy. When Archelaus, who in quality of the King's Lieutenant, had fought his Battels in the Plains of Bœotia, but had afterwards quitted his Service, and declared for the Romans, demonstrated to Lucullus that he need only shew himself in Pontus to have all the Country declare for him, he replied, It did not become Him to be more ungenerous or fearful than the Huntsman, who never left the Chace of the wild Beasts to seek after Sport in their deserted Lodges. Having so said, he marched against Mitbridates with thirty thousand Foot, and two thousand five hundred Horse.

As soon as he arrived within Sight of the Enemy, and had an Opportunity of discerning the dreadful Number of their Forces, he stoped short, and resolved to avoid fighting, if possible, and spin out the War. But in spite of this Resolution, Marius, a Roman Officer, who had been sent by Sertorius out of Spain with some Troops to the assistance of Mitbridates, advancing towards him, and provoking him to fight, he could no longer forbear, but drew up his Army in order of Bat-

tel. Both sides were just ready to engage, and waited only for the Signal, when on a sudden, without any previous visible Alteration of the Weather, the Sky opened, and a great Body of Light fell down in the Midst between the two Armies, in shape like a Tun, or Hogshhead, but in Colour like molten Silver. Both Sides were so astonished at that Prodigy, that they immediately separated without coming to Blows. We are told that this Prodigy happened near a Place called Otryæ in Phrygia.

Lucullus very wisely began to consider with himself that no Wealth, no Provisions were sufficient to sustain for any considerable time such an innumerable Multitude as Mithridates had in his Army, especially in the Face of the Enemy; wherefore ordering one of the Prisoners to be brought before him, he asked him in the first Place how many Comrades he had quartered with him? and secondly, how much Provision he had left behind him in his Tent? When the Prisoner had given him an Answer to those Questions, he ordered him to be removed; then proposing the Same to a Second, and after That to a Third, he compared from Their Answers the Quantity of Provisions with the Number of Men Mithridates had in his Army, and computed that the Enemy could not have above three or four days Subsistence at the most. This confirmed him in his former Resolution of spinning out the time without running any Hazard. Wherefore he ordered his Camp to be plentifully supplied with abundant Stores, so that he might be at leisure to watch the Enemy, and make his Advantage of their Necessities.

In the mean time Mithridates endeavoured to surprize Cyzicus, which had extreamly suffered in the late Engagement near Chalcedon, where She lost three thousand Men, and ten of her Vessels. The better to conceal his Design from Lucullus, he began his March after Supper in a dark rainy Night, and used so much Expedition, that the next Morning by day break he arrived before the Place, and encamped (1) on Mount Adrastia.

Lucullus being informed of this Motion, immediately followed him close upon the Heels, and without stumbling unluckily upon the Enemy in the Obscurity of the Night, as he might well have done, he sat down with his Troops near a Place called Thracia, a convenient Post which gave him the Command of the whole Country, and all the Passes, through which the Enemy's Provisions were of necessity to be conducted. Whereupon foreseeing what would unavoidably be the Event, he did not conceal it from his Soldiers, but as soon as they had entrenched themselves, and secured their Camp, he called them together, and in a chearful Speech assured them that in a few days he would secure to them the Victory without the Loss of one Drop of Blood.

Mithridates divided his Forces into ten Camps, with which he invested Cyzicus by Land, and with his Ships by Sea blocked up the Strait (2) which separates the City from the Continent. The Inhabitants were fully resolved to make a vigorous Defence, and to endure the utmost Extremity rather than forsake the Romans. That which troubled them most was, that they knew not where Lucullus was, and heard nothing of him, though manner that it passeth for an Island, and is so termed by Apollonius, Strabo, and Pliny. Cyzicus, saith Strabo, is upon the Propontis, and is an Island joined to the Continent by two Bridges, near to which is a City of the same Name, with two Havens capable of containing two hundred Vessels. at that time his Army was within Sight of their Walls; but they were imposed upon by the Mithridatians, who shewing them the Romans encamped on the Hills, Do you see those Troops? said they; Those are the Auxiliary Medes and Armenians which Tigranes has sent to the Assistance of Mithridates. These Words put them out of all hopes of Succour; for they saw themselves hemmed in on every Side, and all the Country about them covered with the Enemy, so that they could not flatter themselves with the Thoughts of any possibility of Relief, though Lucullus Himself should come to their Assistance.

Whilst they were under these Anxieties, Demonax, who had been sent by Archelaus, got into the Place, and assured them that Lucullus lay within View. At first they could not believe him, but thought he came with forged News to keep them in heart, and comfort them. In that Instant a Youth who had been taken by the Enemy, and made his Escape, returned into the City, and was brought before them. They immediately questioned Him, and asked him where it was reported Lucullus lay with his Army? This set the Youth a laughing, for he thought they had a Mind to make themselves merry with him; but when he saw they were in earnest he pointed with his Finger, and shewed them the Camp of the Romans. This revived their Hopes, and animated them with fresh Courage and Resolution.

There is near the City of Cyzicus a Lake called Dascylitis, on which are Boats of a middling Burden. Lucullus made Choice of one of the largest, and caused it to be hauled ashore, and to be carried on a Waggon to the Sea-shore; there he clapped on board as many Soldiers as it would hold, and sent it to Cyzicus. This Boat passed along unseen in the dead of Night, and landed the Soldiers safe in the City. This Reinforcement, small as it was, kept the Besieged in Heart; and the Gods themselves, as if pleased with their Courage and Constancy, seemed to support and fortify them with many Signs and Tokens of their Benevolence, and among Others, with This that follows: The Feast of Proserpine fell out during the Siege, wherein they were to make an Offering of a black Heifer; for want of which the Besieged (1) prepared one in Paste, and carried it to the Altar. That which had been consecrated to the Goddess, and was destined for the Sacrifice, was at that time feeding with the rest of the Herd belonging to the Cyziceni-ans, on the other side of the Strait in the adjacent Continent. The very day of the Festival this Heifer quitted her Companions, took to the Water, swam cross that Arm of the Sea, entered the City, and presented herself at the Altar. The Night following the Goddess appeared in a Dream to Aristagoras the publick School-Master, and said, Behold I have brought the Libyan Piper against the Trumpeter of Pontus: Go therefore, and bid thy Fellow-Citizens be of good Heart. Whilst the Cyziceni-ans were at a loss what Interpretation to put up-

(1) This Custom, as has been observed in the Life of Pythagoras, is founded upon a Law of great Antiquity, by which it was allowed to offer artificial Victims when they could not come at the Natural, or could not offer them. Thus Porphyry writes, that Pythagoras sacrificed an Ox, not a living Ox, but One made of Paste. And Athenaus tells us in like manner that Empedocles, Pythagoras's Disciple, when he was crowned at the Olympick Games, distributed to Those present an Ox made of Myrrhe, Incense and all Sorts of Aromaticks. Pythagoras had learned This in Ægypt, where the Custom was very ancient, and was practised even in the days of Herodotus, who writes, that notwithstanding Hogs were an Abomination to the Ægyptians, they offered them in Sacrifice to Bacchus and the Moon, and eat of the Flesh of those Victims, and that They who had not the means of purchasing a Hog for that Purpose, made one of Paste, and when they had baked it made an Offering of it as if it had been alive.

on this Oracle; early in the Morning a high blustering Wind blew hard at Sea, and wrought a Tempest. Immediately the King's battering Engines, the wonderful Contrivance of Niconides the Thessalian, gave a terrible Crack, and made such a Noise as plainly foretold what was to follow. This was succeeded by (1) a strong South Wind, which with an incredible Violence destroyed all those Works, and in a Moment's Space levelled with the Ground a wooden Tower which had been raised even with the Walls, being a hundred Cubits high. It is said that Minerva appeared that Night in a dream to several of the Inhabitants in Ilium, and that the Goddess all in a sweat told them, She was just come from relieving the Cyziceni-ans. And there was heretofore shewn at Ilium a Pillar with an Inscription, in Memory of that Miracle.

(2) Mithridates had been so imposed upon by his Officers, that he was kept hitherto ignorant of the State and Condition of his Army, and the Necessities to which his Soldiers were reduced, so that he was exceedingly provoked at the Cyziceni-ans for their obstinate Defence; but when he came to understand that his Men were ready to perish for want of Food, and that they were forced to feed on human Flesh, then his Ambition sunk on a sudden, and he abated much of his usual Pride and Arrogance. He found Lucullus did not make

(1) This Wind is what the Oracle meant by the Libyan Piper. This Libyan Piper was brought against the Trumpeter of Pontus, that is, against the King's Machines, which were perfected and ready for the Assault, only waiting 'till the Trumpets gave the Signal.

(2) We are not to wonder if Princes are ignorant of the true State and Condition of their Provinces that lie at a great Distance from the Capital. Here is a Prince who in his very Camp is ignorant of the Famine that consumes his Army. When Flatterers are ready to shut up all the Avenues, how can Truth be conveyed to the Ears of a Prince? They hide from them the Knowledge even of Things wherein they are personally concerned, and which tend to their Destruction.

a mock War of it, but pushed on in earnest, and fixed the Seat of it in the very Bellies of his Soldiers; for he had so effectually secured all the Avenues, that it was impossible for him to receive any of his Convoys. Wherefore he watched his Opportunity, whilst Lucullus was besieging a Fort which incommoded his Camp, and detached almost all his Horse with the Sumpters, and such of the Foot as could best be spared in that Conjunction, to fetch Provisions out of Bithynia. As soon as Lucullus was informed of this Motion he returned to the Camp, and early the next Morning in a very tempestuous Season pursued them with ten Cohorts, and some of his Cavalry. The Snow fell in such Abundance, and the Weather was so excessive Cold, that several of the Men being unable to bear up against it, were left behind. He continued his March with the rest, and met the Enemy as they were returning with their Convoy near the River Rindacus, where he attacked, and defeated them. So great was the Overthrow, that the Women of Apollonia came out to seize the Baggage, and strip the Slain.

Besides Those who fell in the Action, amounting to a very great Number, the Romans took fifteen thousand Prisoners, six thousand Horses, and Beasts of Burden without Number, with all which Booty Lucullus returned to his Camp, passing by the Retrenchment of the Enemy. And here I cannot but wonder at Salust, who says, that This was the first time Camels had ever been seen by the Romans; how can it be thought that These (1) who formerly fought under Scipio against Antiochus, or Those who lately overthrew Archelaus at Orchome-

(1) For that Antiochus had Camels in his Army appears clearly from Livy, Lib. 37. 40. Ante hunc equitatum falcata Quadriga, & Cameli, quos appellant Dromadas. There were Elephants in both Armies. Livy mentions fifty four in That of Antigonus. Those of the Romans were fewer in Number, of a smaller Size, and weaker; Theirs were of Africk, but Antigonus brought His out of Asia.

Mithridates, quite dispirited by this last Disaster, resolved to fly without any farther delay; and in order to give Lucullus a Diversion, he thought it advisable to send Aristonicus, who had the Command of his Fleet, into the Grecian Seas. But just as Aristonicus was ready to embark, Some of his own People betrayed him, and delivered him into the Hands of Lucullus, together with ten thousand Pieces of Gold, which he was to carry with him to corrupt Some in the Roman Army. Immediately upon This Mithridates fled by Sea, whilst his Generals marched off with the Armies by Land. Lucullus followed them close upon the Heels, and coming up with them near the River Granicus, he slew twenty thousand of them upon the Spot, and made an infinite Number Prisoners. It is said that there fell in this War near three hundred thousand Men, as well Soldiers as Servants, and Others who followed the Army.

Immediately after This Lucullus made his Entry into Cyzicus, where he was received with the highest Demonstrations of Joy and Respect. Thence he sailed into the Hellepont, with a design to draw his Ships together, and form a Navy. As he was coasting along he landed in Troas, and was lodged in the Temple of Venus. Here whilst he was asleep the Goddess appeared to him in a Dream, and asked him, Why sleepest thou, Generous Lion, whilst the Fawns are nigh? At which Words he awakened, rose immediately, and sending for his Friends he related to them his Vision. He had hardly finished, before some Persons, who came from Ilium, informed him that thirteen of Mithridates's Gallies were seen off (1) the Grecian Port, bound for Lemnos. Immediately he sailed towards them, took them All, and killed Ifidorus their Admiral. When This was done he proceeded in Pursuit of some other Ships that were a-head, but before he could come up, they were got into Harbour, and rode at Anchor. As soon as the Officers saw him approach, they hauled ashore, and from their Decks very much incommoded the Romans, who could not surround them, nor could their Gallies, which were kept by the Waves in continual Motion, make any Impression upon Those of the Enemy that were fixed in the Sand, and remained unshaken. At last having discovered one landing Place, he with great Difficulty put Some of the choicest of his Men ashore, and They falling upon the Enemy's Rear, killed Many of them, and forced the rest to cut their Cables, and stand out to Sea; but crowding All out at once in great Hurry and Confusion, they either fell foul on one another, or were driven upon the Beaks of the Gallies of Lucullus. A great Number of the Enemy were slain in this Action, and more taken Prisoners. Among These was Marius, the same Officer that had been sent by Sertorius to Mithridates. This Man had but one Eye, and Lucullus had given strict Charge to his Men before the Engagement not to kill any one-eyed Man, with whom they should happen to encounter. For he was desirous to reserve Marius for another sort of Punishment, and put him to a shameful ignominious Death, such as He deserved.

When this Action was over he hastened in Pursuit of Mithridates, and was in hopes to find him still in Bitynia blocked up by Boconius, whom he had detached with some Ships to Nicomedia, in order to stop him in his Flight. But Boconius loitering in Samothracia, where he would needs be initiated initiated (1) in the Mysteries of the Cabiri, and spend his time in Feasting, gave Mitbridates an Opportunity to make his Escape. For that Prince made all possible haste to reach Pontus before Lucullus could come up to him.

In his Retreat he was catched in a Storm which dispersed his Fleet, and sunk many of his Ships, insomuch that for several days together the Coast was covered with dead Bodies and Wrecks, which by the Violence of the Storm had been driven ashore. The King Himself was on board a Hulk, which drew too much Water to make to Land, and was too unwieldy to live at Sea in that Stress of Weather, so that he was constrained to trust to the Mercy of a Pyratical Crew, and fling himself into a Brigantine, which beyond his Hopes landed him safe at Heraclen, a Town in Pontus.

There happened at this time to be a generous Emulation between Lucullus and the Senate, which was crowned with the Success it deserved. The Senate having decreed him three thousand Talents for the fitting out of a Fleet, and to enable him to put an End to the War, He himself opposed it, and wrote in very strong and confident terms, that he should be able without that Supply to answer

(1) Samosrace was particularly celebrated for the Mysteries of the Dii Cabiri, who were devoutly worshipped in that Island. The Rites, as well as the Name of those Gods, came from Phœnicia. For Cabir in Hebrew and Arabick signifies powerful. The Cabiri were those whom the Romans called Divos potes, that is the Puissant Deities. They were Axieros, that is Ceres, Axiokousa Proserpine, Axiokirse Pluto, and Casmillus, Mercury, who administered to them. Those Mysteries were held in the highest Veneration, for they were persuaded that They who had been once initiated became immediately more Just and more Holy; that those Gods assisted them in all times of Danger, and that particularly by their Help they were preserved from Shipwreck. For this Reason Persons of the greatest Quality were very desirous to be initiated. Boconius took a wrong time for it, he ought to have delayed it 'till he had executed his Commission.

the Service, with the Ships only of the Allies. What he had with so much Confidence asserted was as happily executed by the divine Assistance. For it was assured that the late Storm by which the Royal Navy was destroyed, had been raised by (1) Diana, to punish the Sacrilege committed by Mithridates upon her Temple in Priapus, which he pillaged and robbed of her Statue.

There were Many in the Army who persuaded Lucullus to abate a little, and give some Respite to his Forces; but He, instead of listning to such timorous Advice, urged on, and passing through Bithynia and Galatia, penetrated into Pontus. In this Expedition he suffered so much at first from the Scarcity of Provisions, that he was under a Necessity of forcing thirty thousand Galatians to follow the Army, every Man carrying a Bushel of Wheat upon his Shoulders. But as he advanced on, subduing whole Towns and Provinces in his March, he at last met with such Plenty that an Ox was sold in the Camp for one Drachma, and a Slave for four. As for the other Booty it was so little valued, that the Soldiers would not be at the Trouble to collect it, or at least they wasted it in Mirth and Wantonness; for no Beggars were found, where every Man had more than was sufficient. So that in their IncurSIONS as far as Themiscyra, and the Plains, which are watered by the River Thermodon, they did nothing but lay the Country waste, and render it an uninhabitable Desert. And This it was that raised the Clamour of the Army against him. Their only Complaint was that he took all the Towns and Cities by Capitulation, and None

(1) We see by this Passage that the Worship of Diana was established in Mysia upon the Propon-tis, as it was likewise in most Parts of the East on the other side of Euphrates, and even in Persia, as appears from the Names attributed to that Goddess, particularly That of Diana Persica, which is met with in antient Monuments, and which we shall find Plutarch mentioning hereafter.

He listened more earnestly to Those who reproached him for his being Dilatory, and wasting so much time in taking in a parcel of Places that were not worth their while, and in the mean time allowing Mithridates time to Recruit and fortify himself. “ That is what I design, said he, and am “ contriving by my delay, that he may grow great
 “ may induce him to stand, and not fly before us;

(1) How came they to complain of This, since they were crammed with Plunder, so that they were obliged either to waste a great deal, or leave it behind them? It was not the Loss of the Plunder that they regretted, but of the ready Money that was to be found in those Places, with which they might have enriched themselves at once.

(2) It appears from this Passage in Plutarch, and Another in Strabo, that there was a District on the Borders of Phrygia, called the Country of the Cabiri. For the Worship of those Gods had prevailed in many Parts of Asia.

 “ we force him to fly for Refuge in his Court, and “ implore his Assistance, he will refuse to aid him, “ and not rather declare War against us in his “ Behalf? So that by being too keen in the Pur-

 “ Arms of Tigranes, who has long wanted a Pre-

 “ one more specious, honourable, and justifiable “ than That of protecting his Father-in-Law, a “ padocians, whom we have so often conquered, “ than to stir up new Enemies against us, and be “ forced to contend with the Medes and Armenians?”

Upon these Motives Lucullus sat down before Ami- sus, which he rather blocked up than besieged in Form; and when the Winter was far spent, he left Murena in charge there, and went himself against Mithridates, who was then Rendezyouzing in the Plains of the Cabiri, where he resolved to wait for the Romans at the Head of an Army of forty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse, wherein he placed his chiefest Confidence. With this Army he passed the River Lycus, and offered Battel to the Romans.

The first Encounter was between the Cavalry, in which That of Lucullus was worsted, and among the Prisoners taken by the Barbarians on that Occasion was a Roman Officer of Reputation, called Pomponius. This Man being dangerously wounded, was brought before Mithridates, who seeing him in that Condition, said, If I take care of thee, and get thee cured, wilt thou be my Friend for the future? to which Pomponius replied without Hesitation, Yes, if You will be at Amity with the Romans, otherwise I must be your irreconcilable Enemy. Mithridates admired his Virtue, and forbore to use him hardly.

Lucullus thought the Plain an unsafe Situation for his Army, because the Enemy out-numbered him in Horse, and at the same time durst not venture to remove up into the High Lands, to which the March was long and difficult. Whilst he was under these Perplexities, some Greeks, who had hid themselves in a Cave, where some Roman Soldiers happened to find them, were brought before him. The Eldest of These, called Artemidorus, undertook to Lucullus to conduct and place his Army in a safe advantagious Post, where there was a Fort that commanded the Plains of Cabiri. Lucullus trusted to him, and as soon as it grew dark, marched with his Army, having first kindled a great many Fires in his Camp, and got through the narrow Passes without any Danger or Difficulty. The next Morning the Enemy saw him commodiously encamped in such a manner, that they could not force him to fight if he declined it, and if he thought fit to engage, he had the Advantage of the Ground on his side.

When neither Lucullus nor Mithridates were as yet determined to fight, it is said that some of Mithridates's Soldiers by chance unharbour'd a Stag, and hunted him, and being observed by the Romans they went and crossed them upon the Chace. This ended in an obstinate Engagement, wherein both sides were supported by Fresh Forces occasionally detached from the two Armies, 'till at last Mithridates's Party preyailed.

When the Romans beheld from their Intrenchments the Flight of their Companions they were seized with Shame and Indignation, and ran to Lucullus, earnestly pressing him to give the Signal. But He chose rather to make them sensible of what Importance the Presence of a General was, even in the most sudden and desperate Cases. Wherefore he strictly commanded them not to stir, but keep within the Camp, whilst he descended in Person down to the Plain, where he seized on the first Runaways that he met, commanded them to stand, and turn back with him. These obeying, the Rest follow'd their Example, so that rallying All together they drove back the Enemy, and pursued them up to their very Camp. When Lucullus was returned to his Post, he ordered those Troops to undergo that ignominious Punishment which the Roman Discipline has provided for Those that fly in an Engagement. He commanded them to dig a Trench twelve Foot deep in their loose Tunics, whilst the rest of the Army stood by, and looked on.

There was at that time in Mithridates's Camp, a Person of great Power, and Quality among the Dardarians, a Barbarous People living near the Lake Mæotus, called Olthacus, a Man remarkable for Strength and Courage in Fight, Wise in Council, and Pleasant and Free in Conversation. He, out of Emulation and Glory contending with the rest of the Lords of his Country who should be most in the King's Favour, undertook a Piece of Service, which was no less than the Death of Lucullus. Mitbridates highly commended his Zeal, and, as it had been agreed between them, provoked him by many Outrages and Indignities, to resent the Usage, and quit his Service.

Olthacus in appearance breathing nothing but Revenge, deserted to Lucullus, who received him very kindly, and with all the Marks of Esteem and Respect, for he knew him to be a Person of great Credit in the Army. After some short tryal of his Sagacity and Wisdom, he found way to Lucullus's Board and Council. When the Dardarian thought he had a fair opportunity for putting his Design in Execution, he commanded his Servants to lead his Horse out of the Camp, while He himself, as the Soldiers were refreshing and easing themselves in the Shade, it being then High-noon, went to the General's Tent, not at all suspecting that Entrance would be denied Him, who was so familiar with the General, and came under pretence of extraordinary Business with him. He had certainly been admitted, had not Sleep, which had destroyed many Captains, saved Lucullus. For so it was, that Menedemus, one of the Bed-chamber, was standing at the Door, who told Olthacus, that it was altogether unfit to see him at that Season, since after long Watching and hard Labour, he was just then laid down to compose him. Olthacus would admit of no Denial, but still persisted, saying, that he must go in to discourse him upon some Affairs of the highest Importance; whereupon Menedemus grew angry, and replied, That nothing was more important than the Safety of Lucullus, and so forced him away with both Hands. This Usage made Olthacus imagine he was suspected, wherefore he straightway left the Camp, took Horse, and returned to Mitbridates, without being able to put his detestable Design in Execution.

Execution. Thus in Affairs, as in Physicks, Opportunity either saves, or destroys, as it is favourable or unfriendly.

Some time after This Lucullus detached an Officer called Sornatius with ten Cohorts to cover a Convoy; upon which Mithridates ordered out Menander one of his Generals with a stronger Party to oppose him. Sornatius encountered him, killed a great Number of his Men upon the Spot, and put the rest to Flight. A few days after Lucullus being in some concern for another Convoy, which was to supply the Army in great Abundance, ordered Adrianus to take with him a competent Force, and conduct it to his Camp. Mithridates was not wanting upon this Occasion, but sent after him Menemachus and Myro with a great Force both of Horse and Foot, to intercept him. But of all These it is said that only Two returned to the Camp, the rest being cut off by the Romans. Mithridates concealed the Loss, giving it out, that it was nothing near so great as was reported, and that it was occasioned chiefly by the Unskilfulness of the Leaders. But Adrianus in great Pomp passed by his Camp, having many Waggon full of Corn, and other Booty; the Sight of which flung Mithridates into Despair, and put the Army into a horrible Consternation. From that Moment it was resolved to remain there no longer.

The chief Officers of the Court were the first who commanded their Servants to pack up the choicest of their Goods, and convey them off, and that they might do it with less Difficulty, they would not suffer the Soldiers to stir; but They, when they found themselves jostled and injuriously treated at the Gates, fell a plundering of the Baggage, killing Those that had the Charge of it, without sparing even their Masters. Among These Dorilaus, one of the King's Lieutenants, was slain purely for the sake of his Purple Robe, and Hermes the Priest was trodden to death in the Gate. Mithridates Himself brushed out in the Croud, without so much as a Horse, a Servant or Equerry to attend him; 'till at last one of his Eunuchs called Ptolemy seeing him hurried along as it were in the general Torrent, dismounted, and gave his Horse to the King. The Romans were by this time come up so near that he was just upon the Point of being taken, and it was not for want of Diligence that he slipt out of their Hands. Avarice only caused them to miss of the Prey they had been so long hunting after, at the Expence of so much Labour, so many Dangers, and such obstinate Engagements, and deprived Lucullus of the sole End of all his Victories. They were just up with the Horse on which the King was mounted, and in a Moment's time he had been taken; but one of the Mules laden with the King's Treasure stepping into the Road between Him, and Them, whether by Accident, or that the King had so ordered it on purpose, the Soldiers in an instant quitted the Pursuit, and fell to Plunder, quarrelling among themselves about it, whilst the greatest Prize of all slipt out of their Hands. Nor was this the only Damage Lucullus received from their Covetousness; he suffered in Another that was very considerable. (1) Callistratus the King's principal Secretary was taken, and ordered by Lucullus to be conducted to the Camp, and there kept in safe Custody; but They who were charged with him being informed that he had five hundred Pieces of Gold quilted in his Girdle, slew him for the sake of it, in spight of Lucullus's Command to the contrary; notwithstanding which he gave up the King's Camp to be plundered by those Harpies.

(1) Plutarch justly calls This a very considerable Damage; for having the Secretary in his Power, Lucullus might have made Himself Master of all his Papers, and so have been informed of all the King's Schemes and Designs.

After this shameful Rout, and Dispersion of the Enemy, Lucullus reduced the City of Cabiri, and several other Towns and Fortresses, wherein he found great Treasures. He likewise found all the Prisons belonging to them crouded with Grecian Captives, and many Princes nearly related to Mithridates who by his Order had been confined in them. As those poor Wretches had for a long time considered themselves no better than dead Men, they esteemed the Liberty to which they were now restored by the Grace and Favour of Lucullus not so much a Deliverance and Safety, as a Resurrection, and new Life. There was likewise taken in one of these Castles a Sister of the King's, called Nyssa; and this proved to her a blessed Captivity. For the Wives, and other Sisters of that Prince, who had been removed farther from Danger, and thought themselves in a place of Safety near the City of Pharnacia, died miserably, Mithridates having in his flight sent Bacchidas the Eunuch thither with orders to dispatch them.

There were among These unfortunate Women two of the Kings Virgin Sisters about forty Years old, called Roxana and Statira, and two of his Wives Both of Ionia, One of Chio called Berenice, and the Other of Miletus named Monima. The Last of These was celebrated throughout all Greece, where she was in high Reputation, when it was known that the King being deeply in Love with her had omitted nothing that could be thought of to engage her, for he offered her a Present at one time of fifteen thousand Pieces of Gold, notwithstanding which she held out to the last, and rejected all his Offerings, 'till he had consented to Marry her, had sent her a Diadem, and declared her Queen. From that time to the very Moment of which we are now speaking did that unfortunate Princess pass her days in the Bitterness of Sorrow and Affliction, bewailing that fatal Beauty which instead of an affectionate Husband had procured her an imperious Master, and instead of a cheerful Family, and conjugal Society, had confined her in a close Prison under the Guard of surly Barbarians, where far removed from Greece, she had only enjoyed in a Dream the Happiness she expected, and had actually lost those real and essential Pleasures which she indeed enjoyed in her own beloved Country.

As soon as Bacchidas was arrived he signified to those Princesses the Orders he had received from Mitbridates, kindly allowing each of them to chuse what sort of Death she liked best, as the most easy and expeditious. Monima took the Diadem from her Head, tied it about her Neck, and endeavoured to hang her self with it; but as it proved too weak for the Purpose, and broke, Accursed Fillet, said she, thou art unprofitable to Me even in this melancholy Office! then flinging it from her, and spitting upon it, she held out her Neck to Bacchidas. Berenice had prepared a Potion for her self, but at her Mother's intreaty, who stood by, she gave Her part of it: Each had her share of the Poison, which prevailed over the weaker Body; but Berenice's Dose being not sufficient for One of her Years and Constitution, she struggled a long time in extream Torture, 'till Bacchidas complained of the Delay, and then she was strangled. It is said that one of the unmarried Sisters drank the Poison with the bitterest Curses and Execrations upon Mitbridates, but Statira uttered nothing reproachful or unbecoming her Dignity. On the contrary she commended her Brother, who in that time of his own Danger was not unmindful of them, but carefully provided that without shame or disgrace they might go out of the World.

on, he came to Talauri, from whence he was informed Mitbridates had removed four days before his Arrival, and had betaken himself to Tigranes in Armenia. Upon This he returned back, and when he had subdued the Chaldeans, Tibarenians, the Lesser Armenia, and the several Towns and Fortresses that had been garrisoned by Mitbridates, he sent Appius to Tigranes, requiring him to deliver up Mitbridates. In the meantime he went Himself to Amisus, which still held out against him. (1) The long Defence which this City made against the Arms of the Romans was entirely owing to Callimachus the Governor. For as he was a consummate Engineer, capable of inventing and forming all sorts of Warlike Engines, and had a Headfull of such Stratagems and Contrivances as are of use in a Siege, he gave the Romans a great deal of Trouble, for which however he paid dearly in the End. He was at this time circumvented by a Stratagem of Lucullus, who gave Orders for a vigorous Attack at that time of the day when it was customary for the Soldiers to quit the Works, and refresh themselves. This unexpected Assault succeeded to his Wish, and made him Master of one part of the Wall. When Callimachus saw the Place was no longer tenable he left it, but first set it on Fire, either because he envied the Romans the Booty, or to secure his Flight. For no one took any Notice of Those, who flung themselves into Boats in order to Escape, but the Moment the Flames began to spread the Romans fell a plundering. Lucullus was grieved to behold so famous a City on the Brink of Destruction, and endeavoured all he could to assist it from

(1) This Engineer made the same Defence against Lucullus before Amisus, as Archimedes had done one hundred and twenty Years before against Marcellus in the Siege of Syracuse. Now-a-days twenty Engineers with all their Fire cannot perform what One only was able to effect in those times.

without, commanding his Men to do their utmost to extinguish the Flames. But there was not a Man would obey his Orders, instead of which with a general Voice they all demanded the Plunder, and that in so high a Tone that Lucullus was forced to give way, and abandon the City to them; besides, he thought it might be one means of preserving it from the Fire; but the Event proved contrary to his Expectations; for as the Soldiers were rummaging every where with Torches in their Hands to discover what might be concealed in the most obscure and remote Parts, that nothing might escape their ravenous Clutches, they Themselves set Fire to most of the Houses.

When Lucullus made his Entry into the City the day following, and beheld that terrible Defolation, he burst into Tears, and complained to his Friends that attended him, saying, I ever looked on Sylla as the happiest of Mankind, but I never admired his good Fortune so much as I do at present. He had a Mind to save Athens, and was able to do it; but my Infelicity is such, that while I endeavour to imitate Him, I become like Mummius. Nevertheless he endeavoured to save as much of the City as was possible; and at the same time also, by a lucky Providence, the Rain concurred to extinguish the Fire. He himself before his Departure repaired the Ruins as much as he could, receiving the Inhabitants who had fled, and were willing to return, and settling as many Greeks as had a mind to live there, appropriating a hundred and twenty Furlongs for the Territories of the City.

This City was an antient Colony of the Athenians, who built it in the time of their greatest Prosperity, and whilst they were Masters at Sea. For which Reason They who chose to quit Athens on Account of Aristo's Tyranny settled here, and were made free; but had the ill luck to fly from Evils

Evils at home, into greater abroad. As many of These as survived, Lucullus furnished with Clothes, and two hundred Drachmas a-piece, and sent them home into their own Country.

Tyrannio the Grammarian being taken Prisoner among the rest, Murena begged him of Lucullus, and having obtained his Request he set him free, wherein he made an absurd Use of Lucullus his Favour; for Lucullus would not allow that a Person of Tyrannio's great Learning ought at first to be made a Slave in order to be enfranchised afterwards, for he could not impart to him that legal Liberty 'till he had robbed him of his natural Freedom, to which he was entitled by Birth. But Murena did not make it appear in this Instance only that he came far behind his General in Politeness and Generosity.

When Lucullus left Amisus he went to visit the Towns in Asia; for being then at some Leisure from the Affairs of War he thought he could not employ his time better, than in examining into the Civil Administration. And indeed it was high time for him so to do, in a Province where Disorders and Calamities infinite and inexpressible had taken deep root, from a long and total neglect of Law and Justice. It had been cruelly harrassed and exhausted by the grievous Extortions of Publicans and Usurers: Insomuch that the miserable Inhabitants were forced privately to sell their hopeful Sons, and Virgin Daughters, and publicly expose to Sale by Auction the holy Offerings of their Temples, the consecrated Images, and Pictures of their Deities. And when the Amount of all This was not sufficient to pay the Impositions exacted from them, and clear their Debts, They themselves were without Mercy delivered up as Slaves into the Hands of their usurious Creditors; and even That seemed to be a State of Relief from the former mer Condition, which was much more cruel and insupportable, when they were thrown into Prisons, put to the Torture, made to ride the wooden Horse, exposed naked to the scorching Beams of the Sun in Summer, and plunged deep in Mire or Snow in the Winter. Such was their State of Freedom, which rendered even Bondage it self a sort of Redemption, and made Slavery appear a more eligible Condition.

Lucullus soon administered a Remedy to all these Mischiefs. He first reduced Interest to the Rate of One per Cent. In the second place he cancelled all those Debts where the Interest ran higher than the Principal. The Third, and most considerable Provision was, that the Creditor should receive a fourth part of the Debtor's Income, and that He who had exacted Interest upon Interest should lose both Principal and Interest. By this Regulation the whole Debt would be cleared in four Years, and the Effects that had been mortgaged return to the Owners.

These immense Debts throughout the Province were originally occasioned through the Fine of twenty thousand Talents imposed by Sylla, and the Province had paid it more than twice over; but those insatiable Usurers, by creating Interest upon Interest, had raised it up to a hundred and twenty thousand Talents, so that there remained twice as much to be paid as they had already exacted.

These Farmers, and Usurers, who had been thus deprived by Lucullus of their enormous Profit, complained loudly against him as One that had done them the greatest Injury and Injustice. They carried their Complaints to Rome, where they found mercenary Lawyers enough, who for the sake of great Fees were ready to plead for them. Besides This, Many of the Leading Men in the State had borrowed Money of them, so that their Interest

Interest was very powerful. But Lucullus had not only the Good-will of all such as had been benefited by him, but was the Desire of other Provinces, who envied the Lot of Those, whose good Fortune it was to fall under his Government.

But to resume the Thread of our History. Appius Clodius, who had been sent Ambassador to Tigranes, and was Brother to the Wife of Lucullus, at first trusted to the Guides provided for him by the Country, who being All the King's Subjects dealt perfidiously with him, and instead of conducting him the ready way, led him round about, over the higher and more remote Provinces, so that after several days travelling he was farther from his Journey's End than at his first setting out. At last, being made sensible of their Treachery by One of his Freemen, a Syrian by Nation, (1) he dismiss his Barbarian Guides, and striking out of that long and deceitful Road, he in a few days after passed the Euphrates, and arrived at Antiochia (2) of Daphne.

He was ordered to wait there for Tigranes, who was at that time absent upon an Expedition into Phœnicia, where he was reducing as many of the Towns in that Country as had not then submitted to him. Clodius lost no time in this Interval, but gained over to the Roman Interest many Princes, and Men of Quality in those Parts, who had been forced to pay the King of Armenia an unwilling Obedience; among whom was Zarbienus King of Gordiena :

(1) But why did he not punish them as they deserved for their Perfidy? He probably was afraid that by punishing Them he might incense Those against him, who only knew how to conduct him safe out of his present Danger. Every thing was to be suspected in so unfortunate a Conjunction.

about forty Furlongs from the City there was a Village and Grove consecrated to Daphne, a delicious Place watered with many Fountains. In the middle of this Grove, which was fourscore Furlongs in Compass, was the Temple of Apollo, and Diana, and a Sanctuary.

(2) It was so called because

And

And when several Cities in the new Conquests sent their Deputies privately to him, he assured them of Lucullus's Assistance, and Protection, but advised them to lye still for the present. For the Armenian Power and Dominion was become insupportable to the Greeks; but That which was the most grievous, and gave them the greatest Trouble, was the excessive Pride of the King, who maintained (1) that whatever the World esteemed valuable, or to be desired, was not only in his Power, but designed for his Use and Enjoyment. That which had instilled into him this unaccountable Arrogance, was the long Series of his Prosperities. For from a small, and inconsiderable Beginning he had subdued many Nations, broke the Power of the Parthians more than any Man before him, and filled Mesopotamia with Greeks, whom he had transplanted thither out of Cilicia and Cappadocia. He had likewise drawn out of their own Country the Arabs, called Scenites from their Manner of dwelling in Tents; and forcing them to depart from their antient Customs, obliged them to settle nearer Him for the Improvement of Trade. He had many Kings in his Court, who served him in the Nature of Slaves; of whom Four particularly were constantly about his Person in the Quality of a Body Guard, running before him on Foot in a single Vest when he went on Horseback; and when he sat on his Throne, and gave Audience, they stood near him with folded Hands, which

(1) This is the highest Excess of Pride a Tyrant can be capable of, in the full tide of his Prosperities. And this Arrogant Presumption, even at this day, is common with the Eastern Princes. They think every thing belongs to Them, and that every thing was made for Them. How contrary is This to that Equity, and Moderation, which is the distinguishing Character of Those who are Kings indeed, who look on Themselves as the Fathers of their People, and that they are born for Them, as a Shepherd is for his Flock, of whom he must give an Account to the Master, by whom he was intrusted with the Care of them.

among those People passed for the most humble Posture, and strongest Confession of Servitude and Subjection, by which they declared that they had renounced all manner of Claim to a State of Liberty and Independence, and delivered their Bodies up to their Master, prepared to suffer All from him, and enterprize Nothing against him.

Appius was not in the least terrified, or dismayed at this tragical Appearance, when he received his first Audience from Tigranes, but told him with an open stedly Countenance that he was come to demand Mithridates, due to the Triumphs of Lucullus, and in case of Refusal to declare War against Tigranes. Tho' the King did all he could to keep his Countenance, and seemed to hear what was said with a smiling Air, it was visible to Those who were near him that his Colour changed at such a Liberty of Speech in that young Roman, who was the First that had presumed to speak his Mind freely to him (1) for the space of twenty five Years, for he had reigned so long, or rather so long had he tyrannised. His Answer to Appius was that he would not deliver up Mithridates, and that if the Romans began the War he was in a Condition to defend Himself, and make Them that were the Aggressors repent it. He was highly offended at Lucullus, who in his Letters gave him the Title of King only, and did not style him King of Kings, wherefore in his Answer he would not give Him the Title of Emperor. However he sent many valuable Presents to Appius, and when he refused them he sent him Others of still a greater Value. Appius would not have it thought he rejected his Presents out of any particular Prejudice, or because he looked on him already as an Enemy, wherefore he accepted

Tigranes had not as yet condescended so much as to see Mithridates, or to speak to him, tho' he was his Father-in-law, and a Prince fallen from a mighty Empire, but treated him with the utmost Pride and Contempt, keeping him at a Distance from him, guarded like a Prisoner of State in a moorish unhealthy Residence. But upon this Embassy of Appius he immediately sent for him to Court, with the highest Demonstrations of Honour, and Tokens of Friendship. There in a private Conference they healed their mutual Jealousies, to the Ruin of their Favourites, who bore all the Blame. In the Number of these unfortunate Courtiers was Metrodorus of Scepsis, a Person of great Eloquence and Learning, and most agreeable Conversation. He was moreover in such great Credit and Intimacy with Mithridates that he was called the King's Father.

Mithridates had sent this Man Ambassador to Tigranes, to desire his Assistance against the Romans. When Metrodorus had explained to Tigranes the Subject he was come about, the King asked him, And You Metrodorus what would you advise Me to do in this Case? In answer to which Metrodorus either as a real Friend to Tigranes, or because he did not wish to see Mithridates restored, replied, (1) As Mithridates's Ambassador I must press You to it, but as Your Counsellor I must advise You against it. Tigranes discovered This to Mithridates, in an Expectation that no Harm would come of it to Metrodorus, who however was killed immediately; and Tigranes, when it was too late, repented of what he had done, though he was not absolutely the Cause of his Death, and only added to the Indignation Mithridates had conceived against him before, in which one grain turned the Balance, and made his Destruction sure. For the King had for a long time before been disgusted at him, as appeared from several Papers taken afterwards in his Cabinet, among which there was One wherein the Death of Metrodorus had been resolved upon, and ordered. Tigranes ordered him to be buried with great Magnificence and Solemnity, sparing no Costs to honour the Funerals of the Dead, whom he had betrayed whilst Alive.

(1) This was not only a foolish but criminal Sincerity. A Man cannot be at the same time Ambassador from one Prince, and the Counsellor of Another, to whom he is sent; especially when the Council he gives him is directly contrary to his Instructions.

There died likewise in the Court of Tigranes an Orator called Amphicrates, if we may be allowed to mention him purely in respect to Athens, of which he was a Native. It is said that being banished from his Country he retired to Seleucia upon the Tigris, where the Inhabitants being charmed with his Eloquence desired him to open a School for Rhetorick, and that he replied with the Arrogance of a Sophister, (1) The Dish was not large enough for the Dolphin: that from thence he betook himself to Cleopatra, Mithridates's Daughter, and the Wife of Tigranes, where he soon became suspected by the Ministry, who forbidding him to hold any Correspondence with his Countrymen, his proud Spirit resented it so heinously that he starved himself to Death. Cleopatra ordered him a magnificent Interment, and his Sepulchre is near a Fortrefs called Sapha.

Lucullus, when he had established wholesome Laws, and a lasting Peace in Asia, did not altogether banish Pleasure and Mirth; but during his Residence at Ephesus, gratified the Country with Sports, Festival Triumphs, Wrestling Games, and Prizes. And They, in requital, instituted others, called Lucullian Games, in Honour to Him, thereby manifesting their real Love, which was of more value to Him, than all the Honour in the World. But when Appius came to him, and told him he must prepare for War, he went again into Pontus, and gathering together his Army, besieged Synope, or rather the Cilicians, who had seized it for the King, and upon the Approach of Lucullus put most of the Inhabitants to the Sword, after which as many as could made their Escape by the Favour of the Night, having first set fire to the City. Lucullus being advertised of it entered the Place with his Troops, put to death eight thousand of the Cilicians, who had been left behind, restored to the Natives all their Effects that could be recovered, and did his utmost to save the City, to which he was particularly prompted by the following Vision. A Person appeared to him in his Sleep, and said, Go on a little farther, Lucullus, for Autolycus is coming to confer with thee. When he arose he was at a Loss how to interpret it; but that very day he took the City, and as he was pursuing the Cilicians, who were endeavouring to escape by Sea, he perceived a Statue lying on the Shore, which the Enemy had not time to put on board, and which proved afterwards to be one of the most celebrated Performances of the Sculptor Sthenis. He was immediately told (1) that it was the Statue of Autolycus,

(1) Strabo makes mention of this Autolicus in his twelfth Book, where he saith that Lucullus having rendered himself Master of Synope was very careful in preserving all the Ornaments of that City, and that he only took the Sphere of Billarus, and Autolicus his Statue, which was the Performance of Sthenis; that the Inhabitants of Synope held Autolycus for their Founder, that they paid

Autolycus, Founder of Sinope. This Autolycus was said to be the Son of Deimachus, and One of Those Heroes who accompanied Hercules out of Thessaly in his Expedition against the Amazons. In his Return from thence with Demolion and Phlogius he lost his Ship, which split on a Rock in the Cbesonesus called Pedalion. He himself was preserved, with his Arms and Companions, and arriving at Sinope drove out the Syrians who had possess'd themselves of it. They were descended from a certain Hero called Syrus the Son of Apollo, and the Nymph Sinope the Daughter of Asopus. This piece of History made Lucullus reflect on a Passage in Sylla's Memoirs, wherein he positively asserts, that Nothing is so certain, nothing so much to be depended upon, as what is revealed in Dreams.

As soon as it was told him that Mithridates and Tigranes were just ready to transport their Forces into Lycaonia and Cilicia, that they might be beforehand with him, and seize on Asia, (1) he much admired the Conduct of the Armenian, who having for a long time before determin'd within Himself to declare against the Romans, had not joined with Mithridates his Father-in-law at a time when his Forces were entire, and his Strength formidable; but first suffered Him to be routed, and his Army broken in Pieces, and then associate himself with a Prince, whom it was impossible for him to raise, and with whom he must therefore necessarily share in the common Ruin.

paid him divine Honours, and that he had an Oracle in that Place. It appears, adds he, that he was one of Jason's Companions, and that in his Return he possess'd himself of Sinope.

(1) This is meant Ironically. In truth one cannot sufficiently wonder at the Imprudence of Tigranes, who having determin'd in himself to quarrel with the Romans, did not at first join his Forces with Those of his Father-in-law, whilst they were entire, but waited 'till he had been defeated before he would make use of his Assistance. This Folly had the Success it deserved, and may stand as a very useful Instruction to Princes.

During these Transactions Machares the Son of Mitbridates, who governed in the Bosphorus, sent Lucullus a Crown of Gold valued at a thousand Pieces, and desired he might be declared a Friend and Ally of the Romans. From hence he concluded that the First War was at an end, and left Sornatius his Deputy, with six thousand Soldiers to take care of the Province. He himself with twelve thousand Foot, and little less than three thousand Horse, advanced to the Second War. This was condemned by all the World (1) as a very rash and inconsiderate Undertaking, directly contrary to the Maxims of sound Judgment and Wisdom, to march with so small a Force, and fling himself into the very Heart of so many Warlike Nations, so many Millions of Horse, such extended Plains, abounding with deep and large Rivers, encompassed on every side with high Mountains eternally covered with Snow. This made the Soldiers, who at the best were not the most orderly, to follow with unwilling Minds just ripe for Mutiny. At the same time the Tribunes of the People inveigh'd bitterly against him at Rome, complaining that he tack'd War upon War; not so much for the Interest of the State, as to keep his Commission subsisting, and enrich Himself at the Expence of the Republick. These Complainants in the long Run gained their End, which was the Revocation of Lucullus.

In the mean time He continued his Expedition, and by long uninterrupted Marches soon reached the Banks of the Euphrates, which he found extremely swoln by the Winter Rains, and melting of the Snow, which had rendered the Stream rapid, and impetuous. This made him very uneasy, for he knew it would require much time to procure Boats, and provide a Bridge for the Passage of his Forces. But towards the Evening the Flood began to abate, and sunk so considerably that Night, that the next Morning he found the River not only confined within its own ordinary Channel, but more shallow than usual. Insomuch that the People of the Country, when they discovered several Heads of Land like little Islets rising above the Water, which seemed to stagnate round them, they considered Lucullus as some Deity, who had wrought a Miracle, and forced the River to submit, and yield him a safe expeditious Passage.

(1) The most experienced Generals sometimes take steps that are condemned by all the World, and which seem directly opposite to Sense and Reason; but often those very steps are the Effects of great Prudence, and Capacity, which They that censure them are not capable of discerning.

He embraced the Opportunity without delay, and immediately passing over his Forces was well-coming on the other side with a very favourable Prefage. On that side of the Euphrates they feed (1) Heifers consecrated to Diana Persica, for whom the Barbarians in those Parts have a singular Veneration. These Heifers are never used but in their Sacrifices to the Goddess; at other times they range at full Liberty in the Pastures, (2) bearing the Mark of the Goddess imprinted on their Foreheads, which is a lighted Flambeau. They are used to so much Liberty that when there is occasion for them they are not taken without much Difficulty.

(1) This was a Custom observed by the Greeks as well as Barbarians; they had Flocks and Herds consecrated to Some of their Deities, which were suffered to feed at Liberty in their Pastures, and were never touched but when they were to be offered in Sacrifice to the God to whom they belonged. When therefore we read in Homer of Bullocks of the Sun, we must consider it as a Fiction

(2) This Torch, or Flambeau, was a proper Emblem for a Goddess, who was called Diana Lucifera, Ἀρτεμὶς φωσφορος. The Custom of imprinting some marks on Horses with an Iron is very ancient, for Anacreon makes mention of it, but I believe This is the only Instance in all Antiquity of Heifers being branded with a Torch.

The L I F E of

When the Army had passed the Euphrates, One of these Heifers walked up to a Rock consecrated to Diana, where she stopt, and sinking her Head like Those whom the Priests force down with the Cords when they are to be sacrificed, presented her self to Lucullus as prepared for that Office, and he offered her accordingly. At the same time he sacrificed a Bull to the Euphrates, in Gratitude for his safe Passage. That day he encamped on the Banks of that River; on the next, and Those that followed, he continued his March through the Province of Sophene, using no manner of Violence to Those who came in to him, and allowed Quarters for his Army. In his March his Soldiers were for storming a Castle, which lay in their way, and where it was said there was great store of Riches; but Lucullus prevented it, saying, There is the Castle we must storm, pointing to Mount Taurus, which was at some Distance, as for the Riches which are in This here, They will belong to the Conqueror. Wherefore hastening his March he passed the Tigris, and entered into Armenia.

The First who brought Tigranes the News of the Approach of Lucullus was ill rewarded for his Intelligence, for he immediately ordered him to be beheaded. Others were so far intimidated by this Example, that no one after That was hardy enough to give him any Information; so that the Enemy were suffered to waste and burn the Country all round, whilst He remained in profound Security listening to his flattering Courtiers, who asserted that Lucullus must be a Man of Courage and Resolution indeed, if he so much as waited his Coming even at Ephesus, and did not rather run away, and quit Asia on a sudden, the Moment he should be told that an Army consisting of so many Millions of Combatants was upon the March against him. So true it is, that as all Constitutions cannot cannot bear a Load of Wine, so neither are all Tempers capable of supporting a Glut of Felicity without being intoxicated. The first of all his Friends, who had the Courage to tell him the Truth, was Mithrobarzanes, who in reward for that Liberty was instantly detached with three thousand Horse, and a numerous Body of Foot, with a peremptory Command to bring Lucullus alive to the King, and put every Man else to the Sword without Mercy, or Quarter.

Lucullus had not yet formed his Army: Part of it was encamped, and the rest were marching to join them. When his Scouts had given him Notice that the Barbarians were approaching, he was in fear lest he should be attacked before all his Men were come up, and his Army in a condition to receive them. This made him think it more advisable to continue in his Camp, and fortify it, and send Sextilius his Lieutenant with sixteen hundred Horse, and a greater Number of Foot, as well light as heavy-armed, with orders to halt as soon as he was got within some Distance of the Enemy, and make it his Business only to amuse them, and keep them in Play 'till he had received Advice that all the Troops were arrived, and encamped. Sextilius designed to have kept this Order: But Mithrobarzanes coming furiously upon him, he could not avoid an Engagement. Mithrobarzanes himself was slain fighting with much Courage and Resolution, and all his Men, except a few who ran away, were cut to Pieces.

Immediately upon This Tigranes quitted his Capital Tigranocerta, which he had built himself, and retired to Mount Taurus, where he summoned his Forces from all Quarters to come, and join him. But Lucullus giving him no time to Rendezvous, sent out Murena on one side, to hinder and cut off Those who were marching to Tigranes, and Sexti-

lius on the Other, to disperse a great Company of Arabians then going to the King. Sextilius fell upon the Arabians as they were forming their Camp, and destroyed most of them; at the same time Murena following Tigranes close upon the Heels, took his opportunity as he was passing a long Vale narrow and incommodious, especially for a numerous Army, and fell upon him. Tigranes fled immediately, leaving his heavy Baggage behind him. Great Numbers of the Armenians were killed in the Action, and more taken Prisoners. After this Success Lucullus went to Tigranocerta, and sitting down before the City, besieged it. There were many Greeks in the Place, who had been removed thither out of Cilicia, and a great many Barbarians in the same Circumstances with the Greeks, Adiabeniens, Assyrians, Gordienians, and Cappadocians, whose Towns had been destroyed by Tigranes, who transported them thither, and compelled them to settle in his new City. Besides This it was of itself exceeding rich, and beautiful; for all the Inhabitants as well the Commons as Nobility, strove to out-do one another, in Compliment to the King, and contributed all they cou'd to the enriching and adorning of it. This made Lucullus more vigorously assault it, being persuaded that Tigranes would by no means suffer it to be taken, but contrary to his first Intention would come down in great Fury, and offer him Battel, in order to make him raise the Siege. He was not out in his Conjecture, tho' Mithridates earnestly dissuaded him from it, and pressed him in his Letters not to run the Hazard of an Engagement, but only with his Horse cut off Lucullus's Convoys. Taxiles the Ambassador of Mithridates stuck close by him in his Camp, and was daily at him to keep as far off as he could from the Arms of the Romans, and not engage, if he could help it, with an Enemy that was invincible.

At first he gave Ear to this Advice. But when the Armenians and Gordienians had joined him, when the Kings of the Medes and Adiabeniens were come up with all their Forces, when a strong Body of Arabians were arrived from the Banks of the Babylonian Sea, and a Multitude of Albanians from the Caspian, to whom were joined their Neighbours the Iberians; when from the Banks of the Araxes came pouring in an infinite Number of those Barbarians who are free and independent, having no King to govern them; when all These were come to his Assistance, Some out of Love to his Person, and Others for Hire; then not only their Feasts and Banquets, but even the Council-board rung with empty Menaces, vain Hopes, and insolent Bravadoes. Taxiles went in danger of his Life, for having presumed to give his Opinion contrary to Those who were for fighting, and Mithridates himself was openly taxed for opposing it out of Envy to his Son-in-law, whom he would deprive of the Honour of so glorious an Enterprize.

In this Confidence, Tigranes was resolved not to wait for his Arrival, for fear He should come in for a share in the Glory of the Day, but immediately marched at the Head of his Forces, and said, as it is reported, to a Friend near him, that one thing troubled him, which was that he had to do with Lucullus only, and not with all the Roman Generals together. It must be confessed that this Bravado was not ill-grounded, or unreasonable, if we consider by how many Kings and Nations he was followed, so many Battalions compleatly armed, so many Millions of Horse of which his Army was composed. For he had twenty thousand Archers and Slingers, of whom seventeen thousand were armed Cap-a-pe, as Lucullus Himself wrote to the Senate; a hundred and fifty thousand Foot formed into Companies and Battalions; Labourers to open the Roads, build Bridges, scower and divert the course of Rivers, hew Wood, and perform other Services necessary in Armies, to the Number of five and thirty thousand. These marching in a Body behind the rest, made the Army appear more numerous, and formidable.

When he had marched over Mount Taurus, and his Forces appeared on the Plain, from whence he could discover the Camp of Lucullus, Those within the Place, upon the sight of such a stupendous Body marching to their Relief, saluted them with loud Shouts and Acclamations, and threatening the Romans from the Walls, pointed to the Armenians.

Lucullus called a Council of War, where Some were for raising the Siege, and marching against Tigranes; Others were not for raising the Siege, nor suffering such a numerous Army of Enemies behind them. Lucullus said that neither the One or the Other judged rightly, (1) but that Both together

(1) I must confess that there is something very intricate in this Passage. How could Lucullus say that neither the one side nor the Other, separately taken, judged rightly, but Both together gave such Advice as he would follow? For it is very plain he did not follow the Advice of the First, which was for raising the Siege, and marching directly with all his Forces against Tigranes, but he did literally follow the Second, which was not for raising the Siege nor suffering such a numerous Army behind them. For he did not raise the Siege, but left Murena to carry it on, nor did he suffer such a numerous Army behind him, for he went to engage it. It is not therefore true that Both together advised him well. I am inclined to believe that there is some Error in that Part of the Text which contains the Second Opinion, and that a very small Alteration may set it right. Instead of οἱ δὲ μὴ καταλιπεῖν, let it be read οἱ δὲ μὲν καταλιπεῖν, &c. and translated, Others were for suffering that numerous Army behind them, and not raising the Siege; and thus neither the One nor the Other gave him good Advice. The first would have Lucullus raise the Siege, and march with all his Forces against the Enemy; the Others on the contrary advised him to leave Tigranes where he was, and continue the Siege. Lucullus follows Neither of These, but out of Both he forms together gave such Advice as he would follow. Accordingly he divided his Army, leaving Murena with six thousand Foot before the Place, whilst He with the rest of the Infantry, consisting of twenty four Cohorts, which all together did not amount to more than ten thousand Men, all the Horse, and about a thousand Slingers and Archers, marched against Tigranes, and encamped in a Plain, with a large River before him.

When the Barbarians beheld this Handful of Men, they insolently despised them, and Tigranes's Flatterers made themselves very merry upon the Subject. Some laught at them outright, and Others in a jesting manner cast Lots for the Spoil, and there was not One of all Tigranes's Generals, or of the Kings that followed him, but what came to him, desiring that He only might have the charge of the Engagement, whilst the King sat still as a Spectator of the Combat. Tigranes Himself had a mind to shew his Wit on the Occasion, and made use of that celebrated Saying, If they come as Ambassadors they are too Many, if as an Enemy too Few. Thus the first day was spent in Jest, and Rallery.

The next Morning as soon as it was light Lucullus drew his Army out of their Entrenchments. That of the Barbarians stood on the other side of the River to the East. The Course of the River was such that all on a sudden it turned towards the West, at a Point where it was fordable. Thither Lucullus marched with so much haste, that Tigranes thought he was flying, and calling Taxiles to him, forms One which he did follow; according to the First, he marched against Tigranes without raising the Siege; and according to the Second, he continued the Siege without leaving Tigranes behind him, for he left Murena to carry on the Siege, at the same time: he marched against him. This made him say that neither the One nor the Other advised him well, but that Both together gave him good Advice. For in short he took ha'f the Advice of each, and rejected the other half.

he

he said in Derision, Dost thou see, Taxiles, those invincible Romans? see how they fly. Taxiles replied, I wish, Sir, with all my Heart that your good Fortune may this day work some Miracle in your Favour. But it is not customary for Travellers to put on their best Cloaths upon a Journey, nor for those Legions to strike the Eye with their polish'd Shields, and cover their Heads with their naked Casques drawn out of their Leathern Cases, upon a simple March; This looks more like Men prepared to fight, and marching against the Enemy.

Whilst Taxiles was speaking, the Eagle of the first Legion appeared on a sudden wheeling to the Right, and all the Bands, according to their Divisions and Companies, were preparing to pass the River. Upon which Tigranes, recovering as it were out of a fit of Drunkenness, cryed out twice or thrice, Are those Men coming to Us? and then drew up in haste, not without a great deal of Disorder and Confusion. He had the Command of the main Body Himself. The Left Wing was given in Charge to the King of the Adiabeniens, and the Right to the Mede, in the Front of which were placed most of the armed Cavalry.

As Lucullus was preparing to pass the River, some of his Officers advised him to lye still that day, which was one of the unfortunate days called Black by the Romans, for on that very day the Army under Cepio was defeated by the Cimbri. Lucullus thereupon returned them this memorable Answer, (1) I will make This a happy day to the Romans. It happened to be the sixth of October. When he had so said, and exhorted them to be of good Courage, he passed the River, and marched at the Head against the Enemy. He was armed in a Coat of Mail with shining scales of a wonderful Brightness, over which he wore a fringed Mantle. He drew his Sword, and brandished it in the Air, to signify to his Troops that their Business was to close at first with an Enemy, who had been accustomed to fight only at a Distance, and by marching speedily up to them render their Archers unserviceable for want of Space. When he perceived that the armed Cavalry, in which the Enemy had placed their greatest Confidence, were drawn up under a Hill, on the Top of which was a broad even Plain, about four Furlongs high, and the Ascent not troublesome or difficult, he commanded his Thracian and Galatian Horse to take them in Flank, and beat down, or put by the Launces with their Swords. For the main, if not only Service of those armed Horsemen consists in their Lance, without the Use of which they can neither annoy the Enemy or defend Themselves, by reason of the weight and stubbornness of their Armour, in which they are in a manner immured.

(1) This is a fine Saying. There is no day in it self lucky, or unlucky; We only make it so by our Courage, or Pusillanimity.

Whilst the Cavalry were marching to execute these Orders, he placed Himself at the Head of two Cohorts, and made to the Top of the Mountain. They followed him with great Intrepidity, being animated by the Example of their General, when they saw him in Arms marching in the Front, and climbing first up the Ascent. As soon as he had reached the Summit, he stood on a conspicuous Place, where he could best be seen, and heard, and cried out with a loud Voice, The Victory is Ours, O my Fellow-Soldiers, the Victory is Ours! At the same time he fell with those two Cohorts upon the armed Horse of the Enemy, commanding his Men to lay by their Piles, to attack them Sword in Hand, and aim at their Shins and Thighs, which were the only Parts unguarded. This Caution proved useless, for the Enemy would not stand the Charge, but fled shamefully with great Noise and Clamour,

Clamour, without striking a Stroke ; and falling with their heavy unwieldy Horses upon the Infantry, broke their Ranks before the Fight began, insomuch that that innumerable Multitude of Barbarians were overthrown, without a Wound given, or the loss of one drop of Blood. The Slaughter did not begin 'till they fled, or rather endeavoured to fly, being obstructed by their own Battalions, whose Ranks were so close and deep, that they could not easily open them. Tigranes fled One of the first, with a few of his Attendants ; and observing his Son in the same Misfortune and Distress, he took the Crown from his Head, and with Tears in his Eyes presented it to him, conjuring him to direct his Flight some other way, if any other remained for his Escape.

The young Prince would not venture to wear the Crown, but committed it to the care of one of his most trusty Servants, who had the ill luck to be taken soon after and conducted to Lucullus, so that the Royal Crown of Tigranes was also amongst the Prisoners. It is reported, that above a hundred thousand Foot were lost, and few of the Horse escap'd. Of the Romans, a hundred were wounded, and five kill'd. Antiochus the Philosopher making mention of this Fight, in his Treatise of the Gods, says, That the Sun never saw the like. (1) Strabo, another Philosopher, in his Historical Collection, says, That the Romans could not but blush and deride themselves, for putting on Armour against such pitiful Slaves. Livy also says, That the Romans never engaged an Enemy with so unequal Force ; for the Victors did not make a twentieth Part of the Vanquished.

(1) This is the same with Strabo the Geographer. He was a Stoick, and wrote several hi-

The most understanding of the Roman Captains, and most experienced in War, have chiefly commended Lucullus, for having conquered two of the most potent and formidable of all the Kings, by two very different Expedients, by Celerity, and Delay. For he broke the flourishing Power of Mithridates by spinning out the Time, and That of Tigranes by pushing on, without allowing him Leisure to look about him. So that of all the Captains that had ever been, He best knew how to make use of Delay for Advantage, and Speed for Security. It was for this Reason that Mithridates was not in haste to come up, imagining Lucullus would, as he had done before, use Caution and Delay, which made him march the slower to Tigranes: but as he met some stragling Armenians in the way, running in great fear and consternation, he suspected the worst; and when greater numbers of naked and wounded Men assured him of the Defeat, he went in search of Tigranes. At last he found him abandoned and forsaken, in a very deplorable Condition; but instead of treating him, as He had been treated, and insulting over him as He had been insulted by him in his Calamities, he lighted from his Horse, condoled with him upon their common Misfortunes, caused his own Guard to attend him, did all he could to revive his Spirits, and encourage him with Hopes of better times. Upon which they Both gave out the necessary Orders for raising fresh Troops, and forming another Army.

In the mean time there arose a terrible Sedition in Tigranocerta, where the Greeks fell out with the Barbarians, and were for surrendering to Lucullus. In the Heat of this Sedition Lucullus arrived, laid hold of the Opportunity, stormed the City, and took it. He seized to Himself the royal Treasury, and abandoned every thing else to the Pillage of the Soldiers,

Soldiers, who among other Riches of immense value found in the City eight thousand Talents of Silver ready coined. Besides which Lucullus gave every Soldier a Donative of eight hundred Drachmas out of the Spoils he had taken. When he understood that many Players were taken in the City, who had been invited by Tigranes out of all Parts for opening the Theater which he had lately built, he made use of them for celebrating his Triumphal Games and Spectacles. He sent the Greeks home, allowing them Money for their Journey: He did the same by as many of the Barbarians as had been forced by Tigranes to quit their own Habitations and settle in Tigranocerta; insomuch that this one City being dissolved, Many were repaired by the Restitution of their former Inhabitants. By all which Lucullus was honoured and beloved, not only as a Benefactor but Founder. In every thing else he met with that glorious Success, which is the Reward of Virtue; for he put a greater Value upon those Commendations that flow from the Practice of Justice and Clemency, than such as arise from Achievements in War; for the Soldiers partake in These, and the largest share is claimed by Fortune: whereas the First are personal, and are certain Demonstrations of a great and generous Spirit, and by These alone Lucullus, without the help of Arms, gained the Hearts of the Barbarians. Accordingly the Kings of the Arabians came and submitted to him, making him Master of their Persons, and Fortunes. The whole Nation of the Sophenians followed their Example; and he had gained so much upon the Gordienians, that they offered to quit their Habitations, and follow him with their Wives and Children. For Zarbienus the King of that Nation being no longer able to support Tigranes's Tyranny, did, as we have before mentioned, enter secretly into a Treaty of Alliance by the Negotiation of Appius Clodius; which which being discovered by the Tyrant, he put Him, together with his Wife and Children, to Death, before the Romans had entered Armenia. Lucullus was not unmindful of this Ally but immediately upon his Arrival in that Country caused a magnificent Funeral to be solemnized in Honour of the Dead, raised a stately Pile, adorned it with Gold and Silver Tissue, and other rich Spoils belonging to Tigranes, set fire to it with his own Hands, poured upon it the usual Libations, in Conjunction with the Friends and Relations of the Deceased, calling him his Companion, and styling him the Friend and Ally of the Romans. When all This was done, he ordered vast Sums of Money to be expended in a Monument erected to his Memory ; for they found an immense Wealth in the Palaces belonging to Zarbiemus, and no less than three hundred thousand Measures of Corn in his Granaries, which proved of great Service to the Troops; insomuch that Lucullus was highly commended for making the War furnish its own Expences, without any Demands upon the publick Treasury.

During these Transactions arrived an Embassy from the King of Parthia, desiring to be received into Friendship and Alliance with the Romans. Lucullus embraced the Proposition, and sent Ambassadors on his Part to the Parthian Court, where when they were arrived they soon discovered that the King was playing a double Game, and that whilst he was treating with the Romans he was underhand offering to assist Tigranes, upon Condition he might have Mesopotamia delivered up to him. As soon as Lucullus was informed of this double Dealing, he was resolved to give over the Chace of Mithridates and Tigranes, as of Enemies in a manner run down, and try the Power of Parthia, by making a Descent into that Kingdom ; for he thought it would redound much to his Honour to have subdued ſucceſſively, and in one ſingle Expedition, three of the Eaſtern Monarchs, and like a generous Wreſtler without quitting the Ring foil three ſuch potent Adverſaries, and with Sword in Hand always victorious, always invincible, reduce the Provinces of three of the moſt potent Princes in the Univerſe.

He therefore ſent his Orders to Sornatius, and the other Officers in Pontus, to join him with their Forces, in his Expedition againſt the Parthians; but thoſe Officers who had before experienced the ſtubborn and mutinous temper of the Soldiers on other Occaſions, did now plainly diſcover the evil Diſpoſition they were in, and their incorrigible Rebellion. For neither could they by Remonſtrances, or Menaces, by fair means, or foul, oblige them to march. On the contrary they proteſted and declared, One and All, that they would ſtay no longer in Pontus, but return every Man to his own Habitation.

When this Account was brought to Lucullus, it ſerved only to infect his own Soldiers with the ſame Diſtemper. Wealth and Plenty had made them weary of the War, and diſpoſed them altogether to Sloth and Idleneſs. Upon hearing of the Inſolent Behaviour of Thoſe in Pontus they commended them for it, and propoſed it as a Pattern for their Imitation, inſiſting that they had ſerved long enough, and had a right to be diſcharged.

Theſe, and Words of a worſe Tendency being reported to Lucullus, he gave over all Thoughts of invading Parthia, and marched againſt Tigranes. It was now in the miſt of Summer, (1) ſo that he was astonished when from the Top of Mount Taurus he beheld all the Corn green in the Fields before him : so backward are the Seasons, by reason of the excessive Cold in those Parts. However he marched down into the Vallies, and after having defeated the Armenians, who disputed his Passage, in two or three Encounters, he foraged up and down the Country, intercepted a Convoy of Provisions designed for Tigranes, and so reduced the Enemy to that scarcity of which he had himself been apprehensive.

(1) What Plutarch tells us here of the backward Seasons in the upper Armenia is confirmed by our modern Travellers, who aſſure us that it is exceeding cold in the Month of June, and that the Ground is then covered with Snow, which does not melt 'till towards the End of Auguſt.

In the mean time he did all he could to draw them to a Battel ; sometimes shutting them up in their Camp by drawing Intrenchments round it, with a design to starve them ; at other times he endeavoured to provoke them, by burning and destroying their Country under their very Noses ; but all to no Purpose ; they had been so often worsted that they durst not look the Romans in the Face, but kept within the Ramparts. When Lucullus perceived This he marched towards Artaxata, the Capital of the Kingdom, wherein Tigranes had left his Wife and Children, which made him conceive that he would sooner hazard a Battel than tamely suffer a Place to be lost, so wealthy, and of such Importance, wherein he had lodged every thing that was dear and precious to him.

We are told that Hannibal the Carthaginian retired to Artaxes King of Armenia, after Antiochus had been defeated by the Romans, and gave him several necessary and useful Instructions. Among Others, being taken with the delightful Situation of the Country, notwithstanding which it lay neglected and uncultivated, he drew a Model of a City, and bringing Artaxes thither shewed it him, and advised him to build a City according to that Plan. The King, highly pleased with it, immediately set about it, and desired Hannibal to direct and over-look the Workmen. In a short time a stately City was erected, and finished, called after the King's Name, and made the Metropolis of Armenia.

Lucullus being thus on his March in order to besiege it, Tigranes could by no means suffer it, but drawing all his Forces together in four days time came within sight of the Romans, from whom he was separated only by the River Arsanias, which Lucullus must necessarily pass in his march to Artaxata. After Lucullus had offered a Sacrifice of Thanksgiving to the Gods, as if he was sure of the Victory, he passed the River in Battel-Array, having twelve Cohorts in Front, and the rest in the Rear to sustain them, and hinder them from being enclosed by the Enemy. For they beheld a numerous Cavalry before them, covered with flying Squadrons of Mardian Archers, and Iberian Lances, in Whom of all the Foreigners Tigranes placed the greatest Confidence. Notwithstanding which they did nothing extraordinary, or answerable to the high Opinion conceived of them. For tho' they skirmished a little at first with the Roman Horse, they could not stand the Legions, but being broken, and flying to the Right and Left, the Roman Cavalry divided, and pursued them. When Tigranes beheld This he commanded his Horse to advance, and Lucullus observing their Numbers, and their Order, began to be doubtful of the Event. Wherefore he recalled his Horse from the Pursuit, and instantly advanced against the Satrapenians, who with the choicest of their Troops were coming to charge him. But before they could come up nigh enough to begin the Charge, and fight Hand to Hand, he so intimidated them with the undaunted Fierceness of his Appearance, that they took to their Heels, and fled. Of three Kings that were then in the Front of the Battel, Mithridates most shamefully shamefully fled the First, being not so much as able to endure the Shouts of the Romans. The Pursuit continued the whole Night, 'till the Romans glutted with Slaughter, tired with taking Prisoners, and loaden with Treasure, and other rich Booty, gave over the Chace. Livy saith that greater Numbers fell in the first Battel, but Those of better Note in the Second.

Lucullus being flushed by this Victory, and animated with Success, determined to march into the upper Provinces, and there compleat his Conquests over the Barbarians. But tho' the Autumnal Equinox was not yet passed, all on a sudden, and contrary to Expectation, the Weather grew as severe as in the midst of Winter. The whole Country was covered with Snow, and in the clearest days they were pinched with Frost, and Ice. Insomuch that all the Rivers were frozen; so that the Horses could not drink by reason the Water was so excessive cold, nor pass over without great Hazard, because the Ice breaking under their Feet, cut their Sinews, and lamed them. The Country being exceeding Woody, and abounding with Forests, where the Paths were very narrow, the Soldiers could not March in the day time without being wet with the Snow which fell from the Trees; and what was worse, at Night they were forced to encamp on Places full of Mud, and melted Snow. For these Reasons they did not follow Lucullus many days after the Battel, before they began to Mutiny.

At first they had Recourse to Prayers, and sent their Officers to lay their Complaints before the General; but at last they assembled in a tumultuous manner, and made a Noise all Night long in their Tents, which is the certain Token of an Army ripe for Sedition. Lucullus earnestly pressed, and entreated them to arm themselves with Courage and Patience, 'till they had taken the Armenian Carthage, and destroyed the Work of their greatest Enemy, meaning Hannibal: But all his Prayers were ineffectual, they were resolute, and inflexible. This constrained him to lead them back, and having marched over Mount Taurus he descended into the Province of Mygdonia, a fertile temperate Country, wherein was a large populous City, (1) called Nisibis by the Barbarians, and by the Greeks Antioch of Mygdonia. Gouras the Brother of Tigranes had the Title of Governor in respect to his Quality, but He who actually commanded was Callimachus, by reason of his great Experience in War, and his Capacity as an Engineer: The Same who had before found out so much Work for Lucullus during the Siege of Amisus.

Lucullus besieged it in form, and carried his Works on with so much Skill and Celerity that in a short time he took it by Storm. He treated Gaurus, who came and surrendered himself to him, with great Humanity; but for Callimachus, he would not so much as hear Him, tho' he offered to make a Discovery of immense Treasures that lay concealed, but commanded him to be kept in Chains, in order to be punished as he deserved for firing the City of Amisus, and thereby depriving him of the Means as well as the Honour of giving the Greeks evident Proofs of his great Bounty and Generosity.

Hitherto Fortune seems to have taken Pleasure in following Lucullus, and fighting for him. But now the Tide turned all on a sudden, from this Moment he did nothing but by Force, and against

(1) Thus likewise says Strabo. The Mygdonians as they are called by the Macedonians, their Capital is Nisibis, which is also called Antioch of Mygdonia. The Greeks called it Antioch of Mygdonia from the delightfulness of the Soil, comparing it with Antioch of Syria, famous for its delicious Situation.

the Grain, with infinite Trouble and Difficulty. It must be allowed that he always exerted himself with the Virtue, Force, Courage and Patience of a brave Commander; but his Actions were not, as heretofore, attended with that Lustre and Reputation; even the Glory he had acquired had like to have been lost, and swallowed up in the Calamities wherein he was involved, and the Disputes he drew upon himself without any manner of Occasion. In the first place he could not persuade himself to shew any Indulgence to the Soldiers, maintaining that all Favours expressed by the General to Those under his Command tended to the lessening of his Authority, and often ended in Disobedience. But what was still worse, he could not live well with Those who were his Equals in Birth and Dignity, but looked on them with an Eye of Contempt, as if unworthy to stand in Competition with him. These are the Defects which are said to have sullied all the Virtues and Perfections of his Body, as well as Mind; for he was handsome and well-shaped in his Person, very eloquent, and of a consummate Prudence not only in the Administration of civil Affairs, but in Those relating to War. Salust says, the Soldiers were ill affected to him from the beginning, for being forced to keep the Field two Winters together, One at Cyzicus, and the Other at Amisus.

The following Winters were no less disagreeable, for they were spent either in actual War, or in their Tents; for Lucullus, during the whole time of his Expeditions, would not suffer his Troops to quarter in any City of the Greeks that was an Ally, or Confederate.

This ill Disposition in the Army was aggravated by the leading Speech-Makers in the City, who invidiously accused him of prolonging the War, purely to gratify his Avarice and Ambition; for he held under his Government and Authority all Cilicia, Asia, Bithynia, Paphlagonia, Armenia, and the rest of the Provinces as far as the River Phasis; besides which he had pillaged the Royal Palaces of Tigranes, as if he had been sent to Plunder the Kings, and not subdue them. For These, we are told, were the very Words of One of the Officers called Lucius Quintius, at whose Instance the People decreed that Another should be sent to succeed Lucullus in the Province, and that the greatest part of his Army should be disbanded.

To all These Misfortunes Another was added, of a nearer and more dangerous Consequence, by Publius Clodius, a Person of the greatest Insolence and Presumption. This Man was Brother to Lucullus's Wife, a Lady of such notorious Incontinence that she was shrewdly suspected of Incest with her own Brother. Clodius was then in the Army, but not in that Rank and Authority he thought he deserved. He would fain have been One of the First, but his Character was such that Others were preferred before him. This Indignity provoked him, so that he tampered with those Soldiers in the Army that had served under Fimbria, and stirred them up against Lucullus, wheedling them with fair Words, and flattering Speeches, to which they listned very greedily, having of old been accustomed to such Treatment. These were the Men who at Fimbria's Instigations murdered the Consul Flaccus, and chose Him for their General in his room. The same Dispositions made them run after Clodius, and call him the Soldiers Friend, because he seemed to compassionate their Condition, and sympathize with them in their Miseries. Will there be no end of these Wars, and painful Expeditions? Must their Lives be spent in fighting with all Nations, and wandering over the Universe, without reaping any other Fruit of all their Labours, any other Reward for their Services, Services, than eternally to convoy the Carriages and Camels of Lucullus, laden with golden Goblets set with Diamonds? Pompey's Soldiers are become Citizens, returned long since to their Wives and Children, in Possession of comfortable Establishments, which they have received not as a Reward for having, like Them, hunted Mithridates and Tigranes through inaccessible Desarts, or for razing and destroying the Royal Towns and Palaces of Asia, but for having reduced Exiles in Spain, and Fugitives in Italy. But if it be our Fate to be in War eternally, ought we not rather to reserve the miserable Remains of our battered Bodies, and our Souls, for such a General, who thinks the Wealth of his Army his greatest Glory?

These Murmurs and Complaints against Lucullus corrupted and debauched his Army to such a Degree, that they refused to follow him against Tigranes, and even against Mithridates, who had quitted Armenia, and flung himself into Pontus, where he had already recovered a good part of his Country. Under a pretence that the Winter Season was advanced they refused to March, and sat idle in Gordyene, expecting every Minute that Pompey, or some other General, would arrive to succeed Lucullus. But when News came that Mithridates had defeated Fabius, and that he was upon full March against Sornatius and Triarius, then they were seized with Shame and Confusion, and desired Lucullus to lead them where-ever he pleased. Triarius, informed that Lucullus was approaching, had the foolish Ambition to prevent his Arrival, and deny him the Glory of a Victory, which he thought he had infallibly in his own Hands, but he was most shamefully beaten; for it is said there fell above seven thousand of the Romans, among whom were a hundred and fifty Centurions, four and twenty Tribunes, and that the Camp it self was taken. Lucullus came up soon after, very luckily for Triarius, for he secreted him from the Resentment of the Soldiers, who would have discharged their Anger upon him.

Mithridates industriously avoided coming to an Engagement with Lucullus 'till the Arrival of Tigranes, who was then on his March with a powerful Army; but Lucullus, in order to prevent their joining, thought it best to meet Tigranes, and fight him. In his March the mutinous Fimbrians deserted their Colours, declaring that they were disbanded by a Decree of the Senate, and that the Command of the Army did not belong to Lucullus, who was no longer Governor of the Provinces. There was nothing beneath the Dignity of Lucullus, which he was not forced to bear, entreating them, one by one, from Tent to Tent, going up and down dejected and sorrowful, and submitting to shake some of them by the Hands. But they rejected all his Caresses, and flinging their empty Knapfacks at his Feet, they bid him go and fight the Enemy alone, since He alone was to be the Gainer. At length, by the intreaty of the other Soldiers, the Fimbrians were prevailed upon, and consented to tarry that Summer under him, upon Condition that if during that time no Enemy offered to encounter them they might be discharged. Lucullus of necessity was forced to comply with This, or else to leave the deserted Province to the Barbarians. He kept them indeed with him, but without any Power over them: Nor did he lead them out to Battel, being contented to have them stay with him, tho' he then saw Cappadocia wasted by Tigranes, and Mithridates resuming his former Pride, whom not long before he had reported to the Senate to be wholly subdued, and in no Condition to undertake any thing against the Romans for the future. Upon this Advice the Senate sent their Deputies into Pontus, to regulate Affairs there as of a conquered Kingdom. But these Deputies at their Arrival found Lucullus so far from being Master of Pontus, that he was not so

so much as Master of Himself, but that the Soldiers treated him with the utmost Derision and Contempt. Their Insolence was arrived to such a pitch, that towards the End of the Summer they put on their Armour, drew their Swords, defied their Enemies, who were then out of reach, and with loud Shouts and mock Skirmishes marched out of the Camp, declaring that the time they had promised to remain with Lucullus was expired.

Pompey also wrote to Others in the Army, requiring them to join Him, for He had been declared General in the War against Tigranes and Mithridates by the factious Cabals of the Tribunes, and Favour of the People. At the same time it appeared to the Senate, and all unprejudiced Persons, that they were doing Lucullus a manifest Injustice, for they were not sending him Successors to finish the War, but rob Him of his Triumph; and did not so much force him to give up the Command of the Armies to Others, as resign to them the Honour and Reputation he had so justly merited.

This Injustice still appeared more barefaced to Those who were upon the Spot; for Lucullus remained no longer Master of Rewards or Punishments. Pompey would not suffer any Applications to be made to Him, nor Notice to be taken of any Orders, or Regulations, he should make in Conjunction with the ten Deputies that had been sent to him by the Senate. He prohibited it by publick Edicts, and was sure to be obeyed, being at the Head of so formidable an Army.

However, their Friends on both Sides endeavoured to bring them to a Meeting, and they accordingly had an Interview at an obscure Village in Galatia. At first they accosted each other with great Civility and Address, and mutually congratulated each other upon their great and glorious Atchievements. Lucullus was first in Years, but Pompey in Dignity, for he had commanded oftner, and and received the Honour of two Triumphs. Both had their Rods adorned with Laurel carried before them, in token of their Victories. But Pompey having in his March passed thorough several dry and desert Countries, the Laurels round his Rods were grown faint and withered, which when Lucullus's Lictors observed they gave them Some of theirs which were fresh and blooming, which the Friends of Pompey looked upon as a favourable Omen. And in truth the glorious Actions of Lucullus gave a great Lustre to this Expedition of Pompey. Their Conversation did not conclude with the same Friendship it had opened. They could agree upon nothing, so that instead of being better Friends they parted more dissatisfied than ever.

Pompey repealed all the Ordinances of Lucullus, and commanded his Army from him, leaving him no more than sixteen hundred Men to attend his Triumph, and even They followed him with an unwilling Mind. So unqualified was Lucullus, or so unhappy in the Want of That which is reckoned the chief and most essential Talent in a General, the Knack of rendering himself amiable to the Soldiers; a Talent so considerable, that could he have joined it to his other excellent Qualities, his Courage, Vigilance, Wisdom, and Justice, instead of the Euphrates, the Hyrceanian Sea, or rather the utmost Limits of the Earth, had been the Boundaries of the Roman Empire. For all other Nations had been already subdued by Tigranes; and the Power of the Parthians was neither so great in Lucullus's time, as it proved afterwards in That of Crassus, nor so well united; but on the contrary so divided by Dissentions at home, and so broken in the Wars with their Neighbours, that they were not able to make Head against the Armenians, who daily insulted them. For this Reason Lucullus seems to Me to have done more Harm to his Country by Others, than Good to it by Himself. For the Trophies planted by Him in Armenia, so near the Parthians, the Conquest of Tigranocerta and Nisibis, the immense Riches of these two famous Cities, which were conveyed to Rome, and the Crown of Tigranes exposed as a Captive in the Triumph, so strongly excited Craesus's Covetousness, and made him so blindly fond of an eastern Expedition, as if the Barbarians were made up of Gold, and were a Prey ready for the first Comer. But falling Himself soon after a Prey to the Parthian Arrows, he made it appear by his Defeat that the Advantages gained by Lucullus in that War, were entirely owing to his great Courage and Prudence, and by no means to the Ignorance, Cowardice, and Effeminacy of the Barbarians. But of This we shall have Occasion to say more in another Place.

Lucullus, upon his return to Rome, found his Brother Marcus accused by C. Memmius, for what he did when Treasurer, by the Command of Sylla; but He being acquitted, Memmius changed the Scene, and animated the People against Lucullus Himself, and persuaded them to deny him a Triumph, upon a Pretence that he had diverted to his own private Use much of the Treasure that belonged to the Publick, and had prolonged the War out of selfish Views to his own Interest.

By this means Lucullus was in a fair way of losing his Triumph; but the chief and most powerful Men in the City mixing themselves among the Tribes, gained so much upon the People, partly by their Prayers and Intreaties, and partly by Bustle and Opposition, that at last it was with much Difficulty accorded.

This Triumph was not, as some Others had been, pompous and tiresome by a long March and vast Train of Spoils carryed in it, but was noted chiefly for a great Quantity of all sorts of Armour, and a Number of warlike Machines, which made a very agreeable Shew from the Singularity of it, and were placed in the Flaminian Circus. Some Horse compleatly armed marched in the Cavalcade, and ten Chariots armed with Scythes. These were followed by sixty of the King's Friends and Officers; and after Them were drawn a hundred and ten Gallies, having their Beaks of Brass. Then followed a Statue of Mithridates six Foot high, All of massy Gold, with a Head-piece covered with precious Stones. Next appeared twenty Pageants covered with Silver Vessels, and two and thirty Others covered in like Manner with Vessels of Gold, Armour of the same Metal, and golden Coin. These Pageants were carryed by Men who bore them on their Shoulders. In the Rear came eight Mules loaden with Beds of Gold, and fifty six with Silver Bullion. Then followed a hundred and seven more with all the Silver Coin, amounting to no less than two Millions seven hundred thousand Drachmas. The Whole was closed with Register Tables, wherein was contained an Account of the Sums furnished by Lucullus to Pompey in the War against the Pirates, Those he had returned to the Treasurers to be lodged in the publick Treasury, and what his Donative to the Army amounted to, at nine hundred and fifty Drachmas to each Soldier. The Triumph concluded with a magnificent Feast, wherein he entertained the whole City, and the Inhabitants of the adjacent Villages.

Having divorced Clodia for her Incontinency, and other Vices, he espoused Servilia the Sister of Cato; but this Marriage proved no better than the Former; for of all Clodia's Vices, Servilia was a Stranger but to One, which was her incestuous Commerce with her Brothers. In all things else she was was as debauched and profligate as Clodia. He for some time bore with her out of Respect to Cato, but was forced at last to dismiss her.

The Senate had built their Hopes on Lucullus as on a Person who would be a Counterpoise against Pompey's Tyranny, and be a Support to the Nobility, the rather because he had acquired much Glory, Credit, and Authority by his great Employments and Services. But he deceived their Expectations, for he retired from Business, and refused to have any share in the Government, either because he found it in a languishing, and almost irrecoverable Condition, or, as Others say, for that he was grown weary of Action and Labours, which had not succeeded under him; and having had his fill of Honour and Glory, he had a mind to spend the Remainder of his Days in Repose and Tranquility. Herein they highly commend him, and looked on this Step as a Token of great Prudence, in that he did not follow the Example of Marius, who after his Victories over the Cimbri, and so many prosperous Atchievements, was not satisfied to enjoy the Honour attending them, and be held in Admiration by his Citizens, but thro' an insatiable Thirst of Dominion and Power, entered the Lists in his Age against Those who had Youth on their side, contended with them for Preheminency, and so drew on Himself a Necessity of committing many great Crimes, and of enduring still Greater. Better had it been, say They, for Cicero, if after he had preserved Rome from the Conspiracy of Catiline, he had known when to give over, and retired. And Scipio would not have ended his days so unhappily, if when he had added the Conquest of Numantia to That of Carthage, he had known how to be contented. For, add they, (1) there is

(1) Age is not to be the Rule | Body, and the Vigour of the Mind;
in this Case, but the Strength of | for old Men are fitter for publick Affairs,

is a time in Life when Men ought to retire from the Stage of publick Affairs, and like antiquated Wrestlers resign the Ring to the more Robust and Vigorous.

Notwithstanding This, Crassus and Pompey laugh'd at Lucullus when they saw him thus unbend himself, and sink into Wantonness and Luxury, as if that sort of Life was as unbecoming a Man of his Years, as the Administration of the Government, and the Command of Armies. It is true, in Lucullus's Life, (1) as in the old Comedy, we meet with Policy and Action in the beginning; and good Eating and Drinking in the end: And indeed scarce any thing but Feattings, and Revelings, and Sports. Among which I count his Stately Buildings, Portico's and Baths; but above all, his Pictures and Carvings, (2) with those other Master-

Affairs, if their Judgment remains sound and clear, because the Experience They have had in the World is an inexhaustible Fund upon Cases of Emergency. This was well understood by Homer; for Nestor, though an old Man, was more serviceable to Agamemnon than They who were much younger; wherefore that Prince did not wish for ten Ajax's, or ten Diomedes, but ten Nestors. Plutarch was not of the Opinion of Those whom he has introduced, speaking in this Place. He has written a Treatise on Purpose to shew that a good Man ought to crown the Labours of Youth with Those of Age, and die in the honourable Exercise of serving his Country, whether in the Field, or Cabinet.

(1) Plutarch speaks here of those Satyrical Pieces, which were a diverting Medly, partly tragical and partly comical, where was to be seen on one side the wonderful Adventure of some celebrated Hero, and on the Other the diverting Humours of Silenus and the Satyrs; as for Example, in the Cyclops of Euripides, which is the only Piece of Satyre remaining of the Ancients.

(2) Plutarch justly condemns as a childish Curiosity that prodigious Heap of Rarities, which Lucullus had collected with so much Pains and Expence. And herein he is of the same Sentiments with Epictetus, who has left us this fine Lesson: Do not be curious in adorning thy House with fine Paintings, but labour rather to beautify it with Wisdom and Temperance. Pictures are no better than Impostures that deceive the Eye; whereas, Wisdom is an Ornament real, lasting, and substantial. This is a Truth not to be contradicted, Wisdom

Master-pieces which he collected at a prodigious Expence, profusely squandering away upon such trifling Curiosities the immense Treasures he had been so long acquiring in his more active and laborious Occupations. Even in these days, when Luxury is thought to be in its Meridian, the Gardens of Lucullus are esteemed equal in Beauty and Expence with Those of the most potent Princes. Wherefore (1) Tubero the Stoick, when he beheld his Buildings near Naples, where he bored Hills thorough, and suspended them upon Arches, brought in the Sea for Moats and Fish-ponds round his House, and built Pleasure-houses in the Waters, called him (2) Xerxes in a Gown. Besides These, he had Houses of Pleasure built near Tusculum, adorned with capacious Galleries, Salons open on every side for the Benefit of the Prospect, commodious Apartments, and airy Walks. When Pompey went

Wisdom is certainly more precious than Pictures, or Statues. However, we are not to push This too far; for this Curiosity, for which Lucullus is condemned by Plutarch, may be both laudable and profitable, and Princes especially are not to be blamed if they make a Collection of the most excellent Performances of the most celebrated Masters, as Ornaments for their Cabiners, and Instances of their good Taste, and for the Encouragement of Art and Ingenuity. If it was not for this Taste what would become of the Sciences? We should sink into Barbarism. The only thing to be desired of them is, that they keep their Curiosity within Bounds, that they reject every thing that is licentious, all those Objects of Debauch from whence Corruption continually passeth through the Eye to the Heart, and that they be not so solicitous in adorning their Palaces, as to neglect Themselves.

(1) Q. Ælius Tubero, Grandson of Lucius Paulus. He was a great Philosopher, good Lawyer, and exact Historian. Cicero speaks advantageously of him in his Brutus, where he saith, that the Roughness of his Style was answerable to the Austerity of his Life; it is not therefore to be wondered at if such a Man was surprized and offended at this Magnificence in Lucullus.

(2) This aims particularly at the Mountains, which Lucullus bored thorough, and the Vaults under them; for Xerxes had in like manner bored thorough Mount Athos to let the Waters in, and make a Passage for his Shipping. Herod. Lib. 7.

one day thither pay him a Visit, he blamed him for being at such Pains to make his House so delicious in the Summer, and at the same time uninhabitable in the Winter; to which Lucullus replied, Do You think I am less provident than the Cranes and Storks, and that I do not know, as well as They, how to change my Habitation with the Season?

When one of the Prætors, who was at great Cost and Pains to exhibit some magnificent Entertainment to the People, desired to borrow of him some Purple Hangings for the Stage, Lucullus told him he would inquire at home, and if he had Any they should be at his Service. The next day he asked him how many he had Occasion for, and when he said a hundred would be sufficient; Very well, said he, you may send for two hundred if you want them. (1) This made the Poet Horace lay it down as a certain Maxim, that That was a poor House which had not more unnecessary Furniture in it than the Master knew, and which might be lost without being missed, than That which was in Sight and constant Use.

There was likewise (2) an insolent Ostentation of Wealth in his daily Repasts, at which his Beds were not only spread with the richest Purple Carpets, his Side-Boards set out with Plate, adorned

(1) This is the true Sense of Plutarch's Words, εις ὃ καὶ φλάκκα ὁ ποιητῆς ἐπιπεφώνηκεν; for this Saying of Horace, that That is a poor House, is not the true Sentiment of the Poet, but a Consequence, or Conclusion drawn from this History of Lucullus, to make it appear how ridiculous it is for a Man to desire to be rich, and to build his Happiness upon Riches, since to be so indeed he must have an infinite Number of Things, of which he has not only no manner of Use, but of which also he ought to be ignorant.

(2) The Expression is very remarkable in Plutarch; One Word in it is exceeding significant, νεόπλαστα δ' ἦν τὰ δεῖπνα, His Repasts were the Repasts of a Man newly become rich; that is to say full of Luxury and Vanity, for those are the Vices of Such as are grown rich on a sudden, of which we meet with many notable Examples.

with precious Stones, his Tables served in Gold, and Interludes and Musick attending to entertain him whilst he was eating; but the Provisions likewise were all of the most exquisite Kinds, which could not but raise the Admiration of Those who are weak enough to judge of a Man's Happiness by such vain Superfluities. Upon this Occasion an Answer Pompey made to his Physician in a fit of Sicknes, was highly applauded. The Physician had prescribed a Thrush for his Dinner, and when the Servants said, that it was a Bird to be had no where in the Summer but out of Lucullus's Penns, where they were fed for the Service of his Table in every Season throughout the Year; Pompey would not suffer them to fetch one from thence, but said to his Physician, Must Pompey be a dead Man but for the lickerish Palate of Lucullus? At the same time he ordered something else, easier to be come at, to be got ready for him.

Though Cato was his Friend and Brother-in-Law, yet he was so offended at his Expence and Luxury, that when a young Man had one day been making a long impertinent Speech in the Senate in Commendation of Frugality and Temperance, Cato, no longer able to bear him, stood up, and said, Wilt thou never leave off preaching, Thou who art as rich as Crassus, livest like Lucullus, and yet must be speaking like Cato? Some Authors ascribe This to Another, and not to Cato. It is plain from the many Sayings Lucullus has left behind him, that he not only took a Pleasure, but gloried in that way of living. For he feasted some Greeks upon their first Arrival at Rome, for several days together; and when They, who had been accustomed to the Temperance and Simplicity of their own Country, and were unwilling to press too much upon so generous a Landlord, refused to come any more by reason of the prodigious Expence they put him to; Lucullus told them with a Smile, It is true, my Friends, of all this vast Expence a small part is for Your Sakes, but the greatest for the sake of Lucullus.

Once, when he supped alone, there being only one Table, and that but moderately furnished, he called his Steward and reproved him for it; and when the Steward said in his own Justification, that since no Company was invited, he thought there had been no Occasion for a great Entertainment: What, said he, did you not know that Lucullus was this Night to sup with Lucullus?

He grew so notorious for his Luxury and Expence, that he became the Town-Talk; wherefore Cicero and Pompey seeing him one day sauntering up and down in the Forum, went and joined him. Cicero was One of his most intimate Friends; and though Pompey and He had been at Variance about the Command in the Army, yet They lived well enough together, so as to converse and see one another. Cicero, after he had saluted him, asked him, If he would let them sup with him? With all my Heart, replied Lucullus, and pressed them to name the day. This very day, said Cicero, we will go home with you, provided you give us no more than your own Supper. Lucullus at first would have evaded it, telling them that they would be sorrily entertained, and desiring them to put it off 'till to-morrow, which they refused. They would not so much as let him speak to any of his Servants, for fear he should give Orders to have Something added. With much ado they allowed him to tell one of them in their Hearing that he would sup in the Apollo, which was the Name of One of the best Rooms in his House, and by that means he was too cunning for them. For every Room had its stated Expence, its own Bill of Fare, and particular Furniture; so that when the Servants were once told in what Room he would sup, they immediately knew what the Supper was to cost, and how and in what manner every thing was to be prepared and regulated. His Suppers in the Apollo were staid at fifty thousand Drachmas, and That was the Sum laid out in that day's Entertainment, insomuch that Pompey was surprized not only at the Expence, but the shortness of time wherein it was prepared. (1) Thus Lucullus used his Riches, as Riches truly captive and barbarous.

It is true he was at another Expence more reasonable, and highly worthy of him. For he bought up, and made a Collection of a great Number of the best and most valuable Books then in being, of which he composed an excellent Library; and the use he made of it was still more laudable and worthy, than the Purchase; for this Library was open to All that came, and every one had Access to the Walks, Galleries, and Cabinets belonging to it. The Greeks that were then at Rome, neglecting all other Affairs, resorted to it as to the Residence of the Muses, and spent whole days together in learned Discourses and Disputations. Lucullus Himself would often walk and confer with those learned Men in his Galleries. He would likewise advise and assist them in the Management of their Affairs, when they desired it of him; so that his House might be truly called the Sanctuary and Prytaneum of Greece, whither all the Greeks, that were at Rome, resorted.

(1) This Reflection is very beautiful, and full of good Sense. As much as if he had said Lucullus exposed his Wealth, and made a Shew of it as they do of the Spoils of a vanquished Enemy in their Triumphs. At the same time it carries with it a Secret Reproach, intimating that that ostentatious Magnificence, those prodigious Superfluities were the only Fruits Lucullus received of his Victories over Mithridates and Tigranes.

He had a great Value and Esteem for Philosophy in general, being an Enemy to none of the Sects into which it was divided; but his particular Attachment was to the Academy, not to That which was called the New Academy, though the Writings of Carneades, as they were explained by Philo, had brought it much in Vogue, but the old One then taught, and maintained in the School of Antiochus the Ascalonite. Lucullus had courted the Friendship of that learned Man with great Zeal and Affiduity; he entertained him in his own House, and set him up in Opposition to Philo's Auditors, among Whom was Cicero, (1) who had written a very fine Treatise against the Old Academy, wherein he made Lucullus maintain the Opinion of that Sect; which asserts, that there are Things of which Man may arrive at a certain Knowledge, and he Himself maintained the contrary Opinion which was that of the New Academy, who held that Man could at the best but doubt. This Book is called Lucullus; for there was, as I observed before, a great Intimacy and Friendship between them, Both thinking the same way in respect to the Government. For Lucullus had not absolutely retired from publick Affairs, but had only resigned to Crassus and Cato that Dispute and Contest between them, which should be the greatest Man, and bear the greatest Sway, as an Ambition not only dangerous in itself, but what would first or last lay a Man under a Necessity of act-

(1) It is the fourth Book of his Academick Questions, to which he gave the Name of Lucullus. This Opinion of the Old Academy, that there are things, of which Man may arrive at a certain Knowledge, is very true; and in my Opinion there is nothing debases Humanity so much as the Doctrine of the New Academy, which ties us down to an invincible Ignorance, and maintains that We can but doubt. Now if This Doctrine of Theirs be true, we are come at least to the perfect Knowledge of one Truth, which destroys their own Principle.

ing or suffering much Insolence and Indignity. When Lucullus had refused to place himself at the Head of the Senate, They who grew jealous of Pompey's Power, joined themselves with Crassus and Cato. In the mean time Lucullus continued to go to the Assemblies of the People, when he could serve any of his Friends by it, and to the Senate when he could be of use in defeating any of Pompey's pernicious Projects, and curbing his Ambition. He caused all the Edicts he had published after he had reduced the two Kings to be revoked, and joined with Cato in preventing a Law he had proposed for the Division of Lands to the Soldiers.

Pompey thinking himself ill used, joined in Friendship, or rather in a Conspiracy, with Crassus and Cæsar; by their Means and Assistance he filled the City with armed Men, and got his Decrees established by Force, having first driven Lucullus and Cato out of the Assembly.

When Pompey's Party found these Proceedings highly resented by the Nobility, they suborned one Vectius, pretending they apprehended him in a Design against Pompey's Life. Vectius being examined in the Senate, without any mention of Lucullus, named Others, but in an Assembly of the People accused Lucullus by Name, as the Person who had suborned him to murder Pompey. There was not a Man in Rome gave Credit to this Deposition, but it was visible to all the World that the Fellow was an abandoned Wretch, and that he had been hired for an Evidence. In This they were thoroughly confirmed a few days after, when the Corps of this Informer was found lying at the Prison Door. It was given out indeed that he had laid violent Hands on Himself; but the Marks of the Cord with which they had strangled him, and of the Blows they gave him, plainly demonstrated that the very Persons by whom he was first employed were his Murderers. This tragical Adventure alienated Lucullus more than ever from publick Affairs; but when they had banished Cicero, and, as it were, confined Cato to Cyprus, then he retired for good and all. It is said that some time before his death he grew mopish and stupid, Age having by degrees impaired his Intellects. But Cornelius Nepos denies that his Mind was weakened either by Age, or Sickness, but by a Dose given him by one of his Freemen, called Callisthenes, who gave it him not with an ill Intention, (1) but in a Belief that it was of such a Quality as to make his Master more doatingly fond of him; but it had a quite contrary effect, for it so intoxicated and disabled him, that for some Years before he died his Brother had the ordering of his Affairs. Notwithstanding which, when he came to die, the People were as much afflicted at his Death, as if he had fallen in the full Tide of his Prosperities, and in the Height of all his Glory. They flocked in Crowds to his Funeral, and as some young Gentlemen of the first Quality in Rome were bearing the Corps into the Forum, they were by all means for having him interred in the Campus Martius, where they had buried Sylla; but as That was a Thing that had been never thought on, and no Provision was made for such Obsequies, his

(1) As there were an infinite Number of Sorcerers in those times of Darkness, they had possessed the World with a Belief that they knew how to compose Draughts, which could kindle Love in the Person who drank of them, which Draughts were for that Reason called φίλτρα, Philizers; and that they could likewise compose Others that would infuse Hate and Aversion into Those to whom they were given, and

These were called μίσσητρα: and this Opinion, no less mischievous than it is silly and ridiculous, is entertained even to this day by People of weak Understandings. The Effect of these Doses has ever been either the Death of Those to whom they have been given, or a Deprivation of their Intellects. Lucullus, and after Him Propertius, fell Victims to it, to whom may be added some modern Examples.

Brother

Brother so prevailed upon them with his Prayers and Intreaties, that they at last consented to have him buried at his Country-Seat at Tusculum, where every Thing was provided, and a Tomb prepared for him. He did not long survive him; but as he had followed him close in the Course of Age, and the Attainment of Honours; so likewise did he in the last Article of Life, soon following him to his Grave, and leaving behind him the Character of a most affectionate Brother.

The Comparison of Lucullus with Cimon.

THE good Fortune of Lucullus appears in nothing more conspicuous than in the Time wherein he died. He closed his Eyes before they had been Witnesses to those great Revolutions with which Fate was then big, and which the Civil Wars produced soon after. He died in his City, languishing indeed, and shaken with Seditions, but still free and independent. And in This more than any thing else does he resemble Cimon. For He died likewise whilst the Greeks were in a composed State, at Unity among themselves, and in a flourishing Condition. But there is this Difference between them: Cimon died in his Camp, and in the full Authority of General. He had not been deprived of his Charge, nor was he for that Reason grown out of humour, or weary of the War, proposing no other End or Reward for all his Toils, Expeditions, and Atchievements, than Debauch and Luxury, like the Poet Orpheus, (1) whom
Plato

(1) I have no where met with such an Opinion, which that Philosopher attributes not to Orpheus, that Passage in Plato, where he laughs at Orpheus for maintaining but Musans, I shall here insert that

Plato ridicules for maintaining that the Reward prepared below for Those who led a virtuous Life in this World was a perpetual Drunkenness. It must be confessed that Tranquillity and Repose, Study, and the reading of good Books, which joins Pleasure with Contemplation and Instruction, are for an old Man, who has been by Age obliged to quit the Field, and retire from the civil Administration, not only a delightful Amusement, but a proper and suitable Consolation. But to make Pleasure the sole and ultimate Point of all his brave Exploits, and after so many victorious Expeditions, and the Command of such invincible Armies, for a Man to spend his time in celebrating the Festivals of Venus, and that Passage, such as We find it in the second Book of his Republick. Μυσαῖοι δὲ τέτων νεανιωτέρας, τ' ἀγαθά, καὶ ὁ υἱὸς αὐτῶ, παρὰ θεῶν διδύασσι τοῖς δικαίοις. εἰς ἅδ' αὖ γὰρ ἀγαγόντες πῶ λόγῳ, καὶ κατακλίνας, καὶ συμπόσιον τῶ ὁσίων κατασκευάσαντες, ἐξεφανομένους ποῖσσι τῶ ἅπαντα χερόνον ἢ δὴ διάγειν μεθύοντες ἢ γησάμενοι κάλλισον ἀρετῆς μίθον μέθ' αὖ αἰώνιον. Musæus and his Son promise to just Men still greater Happiness, which the Gods have laid up in Store for them; for having by their Lectures and Discourses conducted them down to the infernal Regions, prepared a Banquet of the Saints, placed them at the Table, and crowned them with Chaplets, they make them pass their time in perpetual Drunkenness, conceiving that the Virtuous cannot be better rewarded than in a State of Debauch, which is to last without Intermission to all Eternity. Did Plutarch quote this Passage by his Memory only? I cannot believe it. I rather think that his Words ought otherwise to be explained, and that when he saith, τῶ θεῶ τῶ Ὀρφέα, he does not mean Orpheus Himself, but Those who had been bred up in his School, that is Musæus, and his Son; for it is said that Musæus and Eumolpus were the Disciples of Orpheus. However it be, it is certain that this eternal Drunkenness which Musæus and his Son promise to Those who lead a virtuous Life, is as extravagant and ridiculous as the Reward Mahomet has found out for his Followers. But possibly Plato may have passed too hasty a Judgment upon those two Philosophers, whose Expression may be understood in a better Sense, and by the Word Drunkenness they might mean a Life of all sorts of Spiritual Enjoyments and Delights; for so the Word is sometimes understood, as the Reader may find particularly in some Places in the Psalms of David.

wallow in Wantonness and Sensuality; This is so far beneath the Dignity of the Academy, so unbecoming One who sets up for a Follower of Xenocrates, that it is fit only for such as have devoted themselves to the Principles of Epicurus. But That which is the most extraordinary is, that the One in his Youth was loose and intemperate, the Other studious and reserved. (1) Now He is chiefly to be commended who changes for the better, and That is certainly the best Disposition where Vice grows weak and infirm by degrees, and Virtue gathers Strength and flourisheth.

They were Both rich alike, but did not make a like Use of their Riches; (2) for we are not to compare Lucullus's Buildings at Naples, his fine Galleries and Prospects, all which were erected out of the Spoils taken from the Barbarians, with the Wall Cimon caused to be built at his own Expence on the South side of the Citadel. Nor are we to compare the Table of Lucullus with That of Cimon; One was the Table of Cost and Magnificence, the Other of Charity and Hospitality. That of Cimon daily fed all needy Comers with a frugal Plenty; That of Lucullus regaled only a select Company of wealthy Epicures with an ostentatious Prodigality. It may indeed be said that the different Circumstances of the Times only might create this Difference between them. For who can tell but that Cimon if he had lived to be old, and Age had disqualified him for all Employments,

(1) This is most certain; it is a great part of Virtue in a Man to correct and reclaim himself from his Vices. In This Cimon has the Advantage of Lucullus, for He turned from Vice to Virtue; whereas Lucullus in his old Age became vicious.

(2) The Expences we are at for the Benefit of the Publick are infinitely more commendable than Those we run into to gratify our own Vanity. And to speak the Truth, He that lays out a great deal upon Himself is not to be esteemed a magnificent Person, but He that lays it out for the sake of the Publick.

civil and military, might, after all his great Actions and Services, have taken the same turn, and plunged himself in Wantonness and Luxury; especially considering he was naturally addicted to good Fellowship, and was known to be of an amorous Constitution. (1) For it is certain that great and glorious Actions inspire the Mind with Pleasures of a more exalted Kind, and stifle the Sense of all vulgar groveling Appetites in the Souls of Those who are naturally ambitious, and engage in the Management of publick Affairs. (2) So that had Lucullus died in the midst of Action, and whilst his Laurels were fresh upon him, I do not think the most malicious Detracter would have found a Handle to charge him with the least Irregularity or Indecency. Thus much for their Manners and Behaviour.

As for their Military Capacities, it is certain they were Both excellent Commanders by Sea as well as at Land. But as among Champions, Those who have in one and the same day carryed the Prize in the wrestling Ring, and all the other Points of Exercise, are by a peculiar custom proclaimed not under the simple Title of Conquerors, but under That of wonderful and extraordinary,

(1) Plutarch gives this Reason for what he had advanced before, that if Cimon had lived, and like Lucullus spent the latter part of his Life in an Inactivity and Recess from Business, He might probably have been touched with the same Spirit of Luxury. But as he was continually kept warm in Action, That guarded him against it; for a Man that succeeds in great and glorious Enterprizes is possessed with more exalted Pleasures. His Spirit is too elevated to be captivated with such mean Appetites as allure Those only who move in a lower Sphere. And yet we have seen Some aspiring Persons, whose Ambition has not been Proof against the meanest and most ignoble Enjoyments.

(2) It is therefore a great Misfortune to Lucullus that he did not die when he was in that Situation, for then he would have died without a Blemish; whereas his Age blackened and dishonoured his Youth and his Years of Glory, which would have made him renowned to all Posterity. How many great Men have there been who lived too long?

thus Cimon who in one day obtained two Crowns for Greece, the One in a Battel gained by Land, and the Other in a naval Engagement, seems to Me to claim some Distinction and Preference before all other Commanders.

(1) Lucullus owed his Authority to his Country, whereas Athens owed Hers to Cimon. Lucullus found Rome domineering it over her Allies, and made use of their Forces to extend her Conquests; whereas Cimon found Athens in a subaltern State and dependent Condition; notwithstanding which he in time put it in her Power to give the Law to her Allies, and made her triumph over her Enemies, by driving the Persians out of the Sea, and persuading the Spartans voluntarily to quit the Command to the Athenians.

If it be the highest Excellence in a General so to work upon the Soldiers as to render their Obedience chearful and voluntary, Lucullus was despised, and Cimon on the other hand always beloved not only by his own Soldiers, but by Those of the Confederates. Lucullus was deserted by his Own, and Cimon courted even by Strangers; Lucullus set out at the Head of a fine Army, of which he had the Command, and returned alone, being forsaken by that very Army; Cimon marched with Troops, who like Him were subject to the Command of Others, and returned gloriously with the same Troops, who now commanded Those to whom they were before in Subjection, having first procured to his Country three Things the most difficult and most considerable, Peace with her Enemies, the Command over her Allies, and a good Understanding with the Lacedæmonians.

(1) In This Cimon has without Contradiction the Advantage over Lucullus. He received from his Country the general Command, whereas Cimon procured it to his Country in making her Superior not only to her Enemies, but even to her Allies.

Both

Both of them undertook the Overthrow of mighty Empires, and Both miscarried in the Attempt. One purely through the Malignity of Fortune, for Death cut him off at the Head of his Army in the full Tide of Success; whereas Lucullus is not entirely free from Reproach, for having been the sole Cause of his own Disasters, either for that he knew not, or did not take care to apply a Remedy to the Murmurs and Complaints of the Army, which at last broke out into a general Hatred and Animosity against him.

(1) It is true, it may be said that This he had in common with Cimon, whose Citizens raised a Process against him, indicted him, and in the End banished him by the Decree of Ostracism, to the End, as Plato saith, they might not hear him speak for ten Years together. For Such as are naturally inclined to Aristocracy are never in any Degree of Favour with the People; and as they commonly make use of Force and Violence, they wound Those they would cure, like a Surgeon's Bandage, which indeed is intended to confine and restore a dislocated Part, and yet is at the same time very painful to the Patient. Wherefore it may be unjust to tax either of them on that Account.

Lucullus carryed his Arms much farther than Cimon. He was the First of all the Romans who marched an Army over Mount Taurus, and passed the Tigris. He took and burned the royal Cities in Asia, Tigranocerta, Cabiri, Sinope, and Nisibis, under the very Noses of their Princes. He penetrated as far as the River Phasis to the North,

(1) But Circumstances vary the Case very much between them; for it is no extraordinary thing for a General, after the many Services rendered to his Country abroad, to find upon his return home, where he has no Command, where his Commission is	of no Force, a powerful Faction raised against him to his Ruin; but it is very extraordinary for a General at the Head of his Army to be despised by his own Troops, and not know how to make himself obeyed by a Remedy seasonably applied to their Discontents.

as far as Media to the East, and by the Assistance of the Kings of the Arabians as far as the Red Sea to the Southward, subduing all to the Roman Empire, and breaking the Power of those Monarchies. There was nothing wanting to render his Conquests and Glory compleat, but the taking the Kings themselves Prisoners; but They like wild Beasts fled into inaccessible Desarts, and Forests impenetrable. The Advantage Lucullus has over Cimon in this Particular is evident from This, that the Persians, as if the Advantages obtained over them by Cimon had been of little Moment, soon recovered themselves, nosed the Grecians, and defeated their Army in Ægypt; whereas Tigranes and Mithridates were able to make no Figure, or perform any thing considerable after the Victories obtained over them by Lucullus. Instead of which, Mithridates, exhausted and disabled by the preceding Engagements, had not the Heart so much as once to look Pompey in the Face; but placing his Safety in his Flight, he made with all the Speed he could to the Bosphorus, where he died; and Tigranes, naked and unarmed, in a suppliant manner embraced Pompey's Knees, and taking his Crown from his Head, laid it at his Feet, complimenting that General with Ornaments which were no longer his Own, for they belonged to the Triumph of Lucullus; and when Pompey returned it to him, he received it with great Tokens of Satisfaction, confessing by this Behaviour, that he had before been deprived of it. He therefore, like a Wrestler, is esteemed the greatest Captain who leaves his Adversary broken, and in a manner ready conquered to his Successor's Hands. Now Cimon at his Arrival found the King's Power extreamly enfeebled, and the Haughtiness of the Persians abated by the many Losses they had sustained, and the Flights to which they had been forced by Themistocles, Pausanias, and Leotychidas;

so that he met with an easy Conquest over the Bodies of Those whose Minds were broken and dispirited to his Hands. Whereas Lucullus had to deal with a Prince, who had never met with any Check or Repulse, but had come off victorious in many important Actions, and whose Mind consequently was elevated, and his Courage augmented by a long train of Prosperities.

(1) As to the Number of the Enemies, there is no Comparison between Those who were armed against Lucullus, and Those subdued by Cimon. So that upon the Whole it is no easy Matter to determine between them, and declare which of these two Men was the Greatest; for the Gods themselves were equally favourable to them Both, in directing the One what he was to do, and warning the Other what he was to avoid. Wherefore it may be said that They have given in their Testimony in Favour of Both, declaring them Both to be good Men, and that their Nature did partake of the Heavenly and Divine.

(1) Plutarch's Expression here is very equivocal, for he seems to leave it as a Question which of the Two had the Advantage in this Particular, and That is only to be settled by what follows: For in Fact, if after he has given to Lucullus the two preceding Advantages, he gives him This too of having had more Enemies to deal with than Cimon, it would be very improper to add, so that upon the Whole it is no easy Matter to determine between them, for in that Case he would have decided it Himself, and Lucullus, without Contradiction, would have had the Preference. This makes Me think that he gives Cimon the Advantage with respect to the Number of the Enemy. Lucullus had numerous Armies to encounter, but Cimon had still greater. In one day he obtained two great Victories, for he defeated the Persian Fleet, which consisted of six hundred Sail, and beat their Land Army, which was very numerous, and striking whilst the Iron was hot, he pursued his Stroke, sailed against fourscore Ships of the Phœnicians, sent to the Assistance of the Persians, fought and took them. He likewise overthrew a strong Squadron of the Persians, beat the Thasians in a naval Engagement, as he did likewise another Fleet of the Persians. In all the Exploits of Lucullus we do not find any thing so glorious as the two Victories obtained by Cimon in one day, and the new Trophies that were added to them.
