

Bodleian Libraries

UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD

This book is part of the collection held by the Bodleian Libraries and scanned by Google, Inc. for the Google Books Library Project.

For more information see:

<http://www.bodleian.ox.ac.uk/dbooks>

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-NonCommercial-ShareAlike 2.0 UK: England & Wales (CC BY-NC-SA 2.0) licence.

600018984-

Mus. B.M. III.

A N Universal History,

FROM THE Earliest ACCOUNT of TIME.

Compiled from ORIGINAL AUTHORS;

A N D
Illustrated with MAPS, CUTS, NOTES, &c.

W I T H
A GENERAL INDEX to the Whole.

Ἱστορίας ἀρχαίας ἐξέρχεσθαι μὴ κατανοῦν ἐν αὐταῖς γὰρ ἐυρήσεις ἀκόπως, ἀπὲρ ἕτεροι συνήξαν ἐγκόπως.

Bafil. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

V O L . V .

L O N D O N :

Printed for T. OSBORNE, in Gray's-Inn; A. MILLAR, in the Strand; and J. OSBORN, in Pater-noster Row.

MDCCLXVII.

221. f. 151.

A N

Universal History,

FROM THE

Earliest Account of Time.

V O L. V.

B O O K I.

The ASIATIC History to the Time of ALEXANDER the Great.

C H A P. X.

The History of the Medes.

S E C T. I.

The description of Media.

THE country before us, once the seat of a potent Name, empire, derives its name from Madai, the third fituation, son of Japhet, as is plain from Scripture, where &c. the Medes are constantly called Madai ^a (A). It was bounded, according to Ptolemy, on the north by part of the ^a DAN. v. 28. ibid. vi. 8, 12, 15. ibid. viii. 20. ESTH. i. 3, 14, 18, 19. ibid. x. 2. See before, vol. i. p. 379.

(A) Among profane authors, dia from one Medus, the son of Medea and Jafon; others from some derive the name of Me- Medea and Jafon; others from B 2 a

the Caspian sea; on the south by Persis, Susiana, and Affyria; on the east by Parthia and Hyrkania; and on the west by Armenia Major. It was, in antient times, divided into several provinces, namely Tropatene, Charomithrene, Darites, Marciane, Amariace, and Syro-Media. All these were, by a later division, reduced to two only, the one called Media Magna, the other Media Atropatia, or simply Atropatene^b.

Atropatene was that part which lay between mount Taurus and the Caspian sea, and is supposed to have been so called from one Atropatus, who, being governor of this province in the time of Darius, the last Persian monarch, withstood Alexander the Great, and, upon the downfall of the Persian monarchy, seized on this part of Media, and transmitted it to his posterity, who held it as sovereigns to Strabo's time^c. This was a cold, barren, and inhospitable country, and on that very account allotted by Shalmanezzer for the abode of many captive Israelites, after the conquest of that kingdom.

CITIES of note, in this part of Media, were Gaza or Gazæ, the metropolis of the province, and situated, according to Pliny, in a spacious plain, between Ecbatan and Artaxata, and equally distant from both. Sanina, seated between the Araxes and the Cambyses; Fazina, between the Cambyses and the Cyrus; and Cyropolis, between the Cyrus and the Amarus. This tract was inhabited by the Cadusians and Caspians, a barbarous and inhuman race, originally sprung from the Scythians^d.

MEDIA MAGNA was bounded by Persis, Parthia, Hyrkania, the Hyrkanian sea, and Atropatene. The most remarkable cities in this part of Media were Ecbatan, Laodicea, Apamea, Regeia, Arsacia, &c. Ecbatan, the metropolis of all Media, and the seat both of the Median and Persian monarchs, was built by Dejoces, called in the book of Judith^e Arphaxad, the first that reigned

^b STRAB. l. xi. p. 360, & 363.

^c STRAB. ibid. p. 523.

^d PLIN. l. vi. c. 13.

^e Judith i. 2.

a city here called Media, others we learn (3), that it was whence, say they, the whole country borrowed its name (1). Sextus Rufus tells us, that in his time it was known by the name of Medena (2); and from others we learn (3), that it was also called Aria. But to inquire farther into the origin of these various appellations, would prove both a laborious and fruitless task.

(1) Strab. l. xi. p. 526.
(3) Ortel. ibid.

(2) Ortel. thes. geogr. ad vocem Media.

C. X. The History of the Medes.

3

in Media, after the inhabitants had shaken off the Affyrian yoke^e. The walls of this city are much celebrated by the antients, and minutely described by Herodotus ^f. They were seven in number, all of a circular form, and gradually rising above each other by the height of the battlements of each wall. The situation of the ground, rising by an easy ascent, was very favourable to the design of building them, and perhaps first suggested it. The royal palace and treasury were within the innermost circle of the seven. The first of these walls was equal in circumference to the city of Athens, that is, according to Thucydides ^g, one hundred and seventy-eight furlongs, and had white battlements; the second black; the third of a purple colour; the fourth blue; and the fifth of a deep orange; but the two innermost, as serving more immediately for a fence to the royal person of the king, were embellished above the others, the one being covered with silver, and the other with gold ^h. This description of Herodotus favours, we must own, somewhat of romance; but, nevertheless, that Ecbatan was a great and powerful city, and perhaps no-ways inferior either to Nineveh or Babylon, is confirmed by far greater authorities. In the book of Judith ⁱ we read, that the walls of this stately metropolis were seventy cubits high, and fifty cubits broad; that the towers on the gates were an hundred cubits in height, the breadth in the foundation sixty cubits, and the walls built of hewn and polished stone, each stone being six cubits in length, and three in breadth. This city is, by the antients, constantly called Ecbatan of Media, to distinguish it from another in Syria bearing the same name ^k, where the unfortunate Cambyses died, as we read in Herodotus ^l (B).

LAODI-

- HERODOT. l. i. c. 98. f HERODOT. ubi supra.
- g Lib. i. h HERODOT. ibid. i Judith c. i. 2, 4.
- k HERODOT. l. iii. c. 62. DIODOR. l. xiv. c. 23. PLIN. l. vi. c. 27. PLUTARCH. in Alex. p. 704. TACIT. l. xv. c. 31, &c.
- l HERODOT. l. iii. c. 66.

(B) Pliny (4) tells us, that Ecbatan was built by Seleucus; an unaccountable oversight, since he must have read a description of it not only in Herodotus, but likewise in Demosthenes (5), who calls it the ordinary residence of the Persian monarchs. On the other hand, Diodorus (6) carries the build-

(4) Plin. l. vi. c. 14. Sicul. l. ii. c. 12. (5) Demosth. Phillip. iv. p. 100. (6) Diodor.

LAODICEA, of which appellation there were many towns, so called either from the mother of Nicator, or the wife of Antiochus, is counted, by Strabo^m, among the cities of Media, and placed, by *Pliny*ⁿ, near the confines of Persia. Apamea is, by Strabo, sometimes adjudged to Media, and sometimes to Parthia^o. Raga, Rageia, or Ragea, is called, by Isidorus^p, the greatest city of Media. It was repaired by Nicator, who called it Europus, and by that name it was known to Ptolemy; but, in the book of Tobit, it is called Rages, and placed in ing of this town back to the fabulous times of Semiramis, and speaks of mountains leveled, valleys raised, waters conveyed through rockymountains, and other astonishing works performed by his heroine for the embellishment of the city, and convenience of the inhabitants. This great city was situate on a rising ground, according to Ptolemy and Diodorus, about twelve stades distance from mount Orontes, and not at the foot of mount Jafonius on the southern confines of Media and Persia, where Ammianus Marcellinus is pleased to place it (7). Here Daniel is said by Josephus to have built a stately palace, which afterwards served as a mausoleum of the kings of Media. Some of the beams, says this author, were of silver, and the rest of cedar, but plated with gold. There are now no monuments remaining, either of this magnificent building, or of the proud palace, where the monarchs of Asia were wont to pass their summer; nay, there is a great disagreement among our modern travellers about the place where that stately metropolis stood. The opinion of Molet, who translated and wrote a commentary upon Ptolemy, seems to Sir John Chardin the most probable, viz. that Tauris is the antient and famous Ecbatan (8); and this opinion is confirmed by Ortelius, Golnitz, Tixera, Andrea della Valle, &c. Josephus assures us (9), that the palace built by Daniel was intire in his time; but at present not even the ruins of any magnificent buildings are to be seen either at Tauris, or in that neighbourhood; for in all the ruins there the materials, as our traveller judiciously observes (10), are only earth, brick, and pebbles, which in antient times were never used in Media for the building of palaces. Some writers confound Ecbatan with Batana, which is evidently Ptolemy's Batina, and placed by him to the north of mount Orontes, near the river Straton.

^m STRAB. l. xi. p. 361. ⁿ L. vi. c. 26. ^o STRAB. l. xi. p. 354, & 361. ^p ISIDOR. p. 361.

(7) Ammian. Marcell. l. xxiii. c. 23. p. 181. (8) Chardin. voy. en Pers. vol. i. (9) Joseph. antiquitat. l. x. (10) Chardin ubi supra.

the neighbourhood of Ecbatan P. In process of time, it became the seat of the Parthian kings; who gave it the name of Arfacia, or Arface, as we shall see in the history of that people. Other cities of Media are mentioned by Pliny, Stephanus, Ammianus Marcellinus, and Isidorus; viz. Zombis, Patigran, Gazaca, Margafis, &c. but these were all built in after-ages by the Macedonians, and are therefore called, by Strabo Q, Greek cities. This part of Media was inhabited by the Carduchians, Marandæans, Gelians, Syro-Medians, Margafians, &c.

THE mountains of this country, such as may be proper Mountains to take notice of, are, according to Ptolemy and Strabo R, and rivers. Choatra parting Media from Assyria, and branching out from the Gordyeen mountains on the confines of Assyria and Armenia; Zagrus dividing it from the same Assyria on the east, a mountain, according to Polybius S, one hundred cubits high. Parachoatra placed by Ptolemy on the borders towards Persia, and by Strabo T on the confines of Media, Hyrkania, and Parthia. These are the boundaries between Media and the adjacent regions, and therefore may be said as properly to belong to the latter as to the former; but the Orontes, the Jasonus, and the Coronus, are in the strictest sense mountains of Media, as arising in the very heart of the country. The rivers of note are, according to Ptolemy, the Straton, the Amardus, the Cyrus, and the Cambyfes. But these rivers, as they are represented to disembogue themselves into the most southern part of the Caspian sea, must by their position have belonged to the provinces of Ghilan and Mazandaran, as they are now call'd, and consequently could not belong to Media Proper, as it is described to us by the antients.

WE cannot help taking notice here of a considerable mistake, which many of the antients have been guilty of, with respect to the situation of the Caspian Streights, called by the Latins Portæ Caspiæ, Claustra Caspia, and Pylæ Caspiæ. Ptolemy, Strabo, Arrian, Isidorus, Characenus, and Dionysus Periegeta U, place them on the confines of Media and Parthia, or on the eastern borders of Media. But Pliny, not liking this situation, carries them quite cross the country; and, after having been some time at a loss how to dispose of so heavy a load, drops it at last on the confines of Media and Armenia, that is, on the most western borders of Media ^w. Suetonius ^x and Tacitus ^y confound them with the Iberian streights, which are a narrow passage through the mountains dividing Iberia from Sarmatia. Some of our modern geographers place them in Media Atropatia, between the Caspian mountains and the Caspian sea, confounding them with what the present inhabitants call Demir-can, or Iron-gate, which is a narrow passage out of Tartary into Persia.

P Ch. v. & seq. pass. Q STRAB. l. vi. p. 361. R Idem ibid. p. 363. S POLYB. l. v. c. 44. T STRAB. ubi supra. U STRABO, l. xi. p. 362. ARRIAN. l. iii. ISIDOR. Characenus, p. 6. DIONYS. Perieget. versu 1039.

Soil.

THE northern parts of Media, lying between the Caspian mountains and the sea, are very cold and barren: the present inhabitants make their bread of dried almonds, and their drink of the juice of certain herbs. Here the snow lies on the mountains for nine months in the year ^z. But the southern parts are productive of all sorts of grain, and necessaries for life, and withal so pleasant, that the country adjoining to Tauris, probably the antient Ec-batan, is called the garden of Persia. There are here large plains, among which that of Nysa is famous for the numerous studs of horses that were kept in it for the use of the Persian monarchs, and are often mentioned and celebrated by the antients. Where this plain of Nysa was situated, is no easy matter to determine (C).

THE

^w PLIN. l. vi. c. 15. ^x SUTTON. c. 19. ^y TACIT. l. i. hist. c. 6. ^z CHARDIN voy. en Perse, vol. i. p. 524.

(C) The antients place the Nysean plain in the easternmost parts of what they call Media, and far beyond the limits of what is now supposed to have been properly this country. We have a traveller, who thinks he has seen this fertile pasture; but, if he did, we must place it quite differently from what the antients seem to insinuate it ought to be, and several degrees nearer us. His words are, "We continued our way (from Tauris towards Persia) upon the most beautiful and fertile plains covered with villages. These plains afford the most excellent pasture of all Media, and, I dare say, of the whole world, and the best horses of the country were there at grass.—I asked a young nobleman in company with us, If there were any other plains in Media so fine and so extensive? He told me, He had seen some as fine about Derbent, but none more extensive. So that 'tis reasonable enough to believe, that these plains are the Hippobaton of the antients, and where they say the kings of Media had a stud of fifty thousand horses; and that here it is also we must

THE climate is very unequal; that part which lies between the mountains and the sea is exceeding cold, and the earth swampy, and full of marshes, where innumerable swarms of venomous insects are bred (D), which, together with the vapours rising from the Caspian sea, render that part very inhospitable. The provinces that are more remote from the sea enjoy a very wholesome air, though liable to heavy rains, and violent storms, especially in the spring and autumn^a. Besides the cattle and game of all sorts, which the inland provinces abound with, some of them have been for many ages remarkable on account of the various sorts of excellent wines they produce, especially the neighbourhood of Tauris, where no fewer than sixty different kinds of grapes, all of an exquisite flavour, are to be tasted at this day^b. From its productions in the present state, we may judge what it must have been in better times.

WE cannot dismiss this subject without some observations on the Caspian sea, which is the northern boundary of Media. This large body of waters was by the ancients called indifferently the Caspian and the Hyrceanian sea, from the Caspians and Hyrceanians, whose shores it washed^c. However Pliny^d makes some difference be-

^a CHARDIN ubi supra.^b CHARDIN, vol. i. p. 185.^c STRABO, l. xi. p. 83. DIODOR. l. vii. c. 75. ^d PLIN. l. vi. c. 13. & 16.

“ must look for the Nysean “ plain, so famous for the “ horses of that name. Ste- “ phanus the geographer says,
 “ that Nysa was in the coun“ try of the Medes. I told “ this same nobleman some “ particulars which historians “ relate concerning these “ horses, particularly Phavo- “ rinus, who says, all the “ Nysean horses were light “ duns: he answered, that he “ had never read or heard any “ thing of the kind. I after“ wards inquired of several “ gentlemen of learning; but “ could never understand, that “ there was any place either “ in Persia or Media that pro“ duced horses of that co“ lour (11).”

(D) Ælian tells us (12), that these parts of Media were greatly infested by scorpions; and that, while the king of Persia was on his progress into Media, the inhabitants were employed for three days before his arrival on the confines in clearing the country of these venomous insects.

(11) Chardin ubi supra. p. 185.(12) Ælian. de animal. l. x. c. 26.

tween these two appellations, telling us, that on the Caspian coasts it bears the former denomination, and on those of Hyrkania the latter. The antient, and likewise the modern geographers, had but a very imperfect knowledge of the true situation, extent, coasts, and bays of this sea, before the discoveries made lately by a very able navigator and geographer (E); and therefore what has been said by others is only to be relied on so far as it agrees with the accounts he has given us. Ptolemy, and even Herodotus, knew that the Caspian was surrounded on all sides by land, without any communication with other seas, or visible efflux; whence some thought, that it ought to be called a lake rather than a sea. However Strabo^c, Pliny^f, Pomponius. Mela^g, and Arrian^h, wrote that it was joined either to the Indian or northern ocean; but we are well assured by experience, that they were mistaken. They were perhaps led into this error by such as had made their observations when the Wolga had overflown its banks, at which time it appears more like a sea than a river, covering with its waters, as a modern traveller informs usⁱ, the whole country to the extent of sixty miles: this they might easily have mistaken for a streight joining the Caspian to the ocean. Ptolemy, though not guilty of this error, was greatly mistaken as to its extent from east to west; for he reckons it to have been about twenty-three degrees and an half; whereas it does not exceed, where widest, three degrees forty-two minutes, and where narrowest, one degree twenty-two minutes. He likewise places it three degrees more to the north than it really is. These mistakes were observed, and in some degree redressed, by Abulgeda an Arabian prince, and able geographer, who in 1320 discovered the true situation of the Caspian, and abridged its extent by a third of what Ptolemy had allowed it. By this alteration its length was no more in longitude, as Ptolemy had placed

^c STRABO, l. x. p. 83. ^f PLIN. l. vi. c. 13. ^g POM-
PON. MEL. l. iii. c. 5. ^h ARRIAN. l. vii. p. 477. ⁱ LE BRUYN voy. par la Moscov. tom. iii. p. 465.

(E) M. Vanverden, who, by observations, together with orders of the late Czar, formed a very exact chart of the Caspian, from observations made by him on the spot in 1710, 1721, 1722. These observations, together with M. Vanverden's new chart, were, by the Czar's orders, communicated to the royal academy of sciences at Paris.

it,

it, but in latitude, as it truly is. Abu'lfeda's observations were greatly improved by Bourrous, Olearius, and Jenkinson; but the true dimensions of this sea were not ascertained till the late observations above-mentioned; by which we are assured, that it lies between the thirty-seventh and forty-eighth degrees of north latitude, and does not exceed three degrees forty-two minutes in its greatest longitude, which gives it a quite different figure from what it is represented to have in the maps of Ptolemy, and in the writings of the other antient geographers.

THE Persians call this sea Kulsum, or the sea of Astracan; the Russians, the sea of Gualenskoi; the Georgians, Sowa; the Armenians, Soof. It receives the river Volga, which itself is like a sea, and near two hundred others, into its bosom; and yet is never increased or diminished, nor observed to ebb or flow. This constant plenitude has given rise to many speculations; and some have imagined, that it must necessarily have some subterraneous communication either with the Black sea, though a hundred leagues distant, or with the Persian gulf, which is near 200 leagues distant from it. Father Avril, a modern traveller, seems to favour the latter opinion, and alleges this proof to confirm it; viz. that over-against the province of Xilan in Persia there are two immense whirlpools, which with an incredible rapidity, and frightful noise, suck in and swallow whatever comes near them, and are consequently caused by some great cavity in the earth. He adds, that every year about the latter end of the autumn a great quantity of willow-leaves are observed floating on the water by those who inhabit the coasts of the Persian gulf; and as this tree is no-where to be found near the Persian gulf, and on the other hand the coasts of the Caspian towards the province of Xilan are covered with them, he rightly concludes, that there must be some subterraneous intercourse between these two seas. This observation, if true, is a strong proof of some secret communication between these two bodies of water, the leaves being conveyed through subterraneous fissures from the one to the other. The water of this sea is salt like that of other seas, notwithstanding the opinion of the antients to the contrary; and its freshness in some parts near the shore, is only owing to the rivers that discharge themselves into it. It is neither of a different colour from other seas, nor without various sorts of fish, as Olearius, an eye-witness, assures us, and thereby disproves the opinion of the antients, who who believed it to be of a blackish colour, and to have but one kind of fish, and that of a monstrous form. We shall conclude this section with observing, that the ignorance of the antients, with relation to this sea, or lake, as some are pleased to call it, may be urged as an argument of the imperfect knowledge they had of these northern parts of the Persian empire, and at the same time warn us not to depend on their accounts, unless vouched by the testimonies of modern travellers, who have with far greater care, and better success, surveyed those remote regions.

S E C T. II.

Of the antiquity, government, laws, religion, customs, arts, learning, and trade of the Medes.

Their origin.

WE have already derived the Medes ^k from Madai, the third son of Japhet, and thereby put them upon the level with the most antient nations. In process of time, several colonies from the adjacent countries settled among them, being invited thither by the fruitfulness of the soil, which gave rise to the various tribes into which that people was antiently divided. The Greek writers will have them to be originally Persians ^l; and Herodotus tells us, that they were called Arians till the time of Medus, the son of Medea, from whom they took the name of Medians ^m. But our etymology is far more natural, and confirmed by the authority of all the antient interpreters, who by Madai in Scripture constantly understand the Medes ⁿ.

Government.

THEIR government was originally monarchical, like that of the other primitive nations, and they seem to have had kings of their own in the earliest times. Some are of opinion, that one of the four kings, who, in the days of Abraham, invaded the southern coasts of Canaan, reigned in Media. Lactantius mentions one Hydaspes, who, according to him, reigned long before the Medes were con-

^k Vide supra, vol. i. p. 379.

^l CEDREN. p. 18.

^m HERODOT. l. vii. c. 62.

ⁿ Vide HIERONYM. in cap. xiii. Esaiæ, & in quæst. Hebraic.

quered

quered by the Assyrians. And Diodorus tells us, that Pharnus, king of the Medes, was with his seven sons defeated and taken prisoner by Ninus, in the very beginning of the Assyrian empire °. But his accounts of those early times are no-ways to be relied on, it being plain both from Scripture, and from the authority of the most judicious among the antient and modern chronologers, that the Assyrian empire did not begin till the days of Pul, as has been already fully shewn; whereas Ctesias, and his copyist Diodorus, have made this empire as old as the flood, and given us the names of all the Assyrian kings from Belus, and his feigned son Ninus, to Sardanapalus. According to the successions of the Assyrian kings, as stated by them, that empire continued about 1360 years; whereas Herodotus tells us, that it lasted only five hundred years, and even his numbers are all too long. They were first brought under the Assyrian yoke by Pul, according to us the founder of that monarchy, or by his immediate successor Tiglath-pileser. Till that time they were probably governed by their own kings, as were, according to holy writ, the neighbouring nations (H). In the reign of Sennacherib they shook off the Assyrian yoke, and fell into an anarchy, which lasted till the reign of Dejoces, as we shall see in the following section. Their kings, after the revolt, were quite absolute, and controuled by no law; nay, they claimed an equal respect with the gods themselves.

° DIODOR. SIC. l. v. c. 5.

(H) In the time of the judges of Israel, Mesopotamia was under its own king (19); the king of Zobab reigned on both sides of the Euphrates till he was conquered by David (20). The kingdoms of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Philistia, Zidon, Damascus, and Hamath the Great, were governed by their own princes; and so were those of Haran or Carrhæ, and Sepharvaim in Mesopotamia, and Calneb near Bagdad. As these petty kingdoms were ruled by their own princes, so was Media till the time of Pul, who subdued most of the above-mentioned nations. Media may have been subdued by Nimrod, who was a great warrior; but his empire, if he founded any, was of short continuance, it being the custom in those early times for every father to divide his territories among his sons.

(19) Jud. iii. 8.

(20) 2 Sam. viii. and x.

Manners and customs.

THE Medes were once a very warlike race, as will appear from their history; but in process of time became one of the most effeminate nations of Asia. In war they used the same armour as the Persians, whom they are said to have taught the art of war, especially to handle with dexterity the bow; and likewise to have been the first that introduced luxury into Persia, which at last occasioned the downfall of that empire, as it had before been the ruin of the Medes ^a. Polygamy was so far from being disreputable among them, that they were bound by law to maintain at least seven wives, and those women were looked upon with contempt who maintained fewer than five husbands ^r. In war, they poisoned their arrows with a bituminous liquor called naphtha, whereof there was great plenty in Media, Persia, and Assyria. The arrow, being steeped in it, and shot from a slack bow (for a swift and violent motion took off from its virtue), burnt the flesh with such violence, that water rather increased than extinguished the malignant flame: dust alone could put a stop to it, and, in some degree, allay the unspeakable pain it occasioned. They are likewise said to have bred a number of large dogs, to whom they used to throw the bodies of their friends, parents, and relations, when at the point of death, looking upon it as dishonourable to die in their beds, or be laid in the ground ^s.

SOME writers charge the Medes with being the first authors of making eunuchs ^t; but others impute this execrable practice to the Persians, and even name the place where it first took rise ^u (I). The custom of confirming alliances with the blood of the contracting parties, which obtained among all the eastern nations, even in the Roman times, was originally peculiar to the Medes ^v. When they were to

^a STRABO, lib. xi. XENOPHON. Cyropæd. lib. i. p. 7.
^r STRABO, l. xi. p. 526. ^s BARDESAN. apud Euseb. præ-par. evang. l. vi. c. 8. ^t ATHENÆUS, l. xii. ^u STE-PHAN. de urbib. ^v HERODOT. l. i. c. 74.

(I) Stephanus tells us, that those who charge the Medes with introducing such an unnatural practice, are certainly mistaken, since we find eunuchs in vogue among the Assyrians and Babylonians long before to strike alliances, they used to tie together, with an hard bandage, the thumbs of their right hands, till the blood, starting to the extremities, was, by a slight cut, discharged. This they mutually sucked; and a league, thus confirmed, was esteemed most awful, as mysteriously solemnized with the blood of the parties *.

THE laws and religion of the Medes were much the same with those of the Persians: wherefore we shall defer what may be said of them, till we come to the history of the Persians, from the oriental writers. We shall only Laws, re- observe here, that, when a law was once enacted, it was ligion, &c. not in the king's power to repeal it, or to reverse a decree he had once made; whence the laws of the Medes are, in before such a piece of wanton luxury can be supposed to have been known either to the Medes or Persians. Josephus (21) acquaints us, that Nabuchadon- for commanded the most comely youths among the captive Jews to be made eunuchs. And Hierom is of opinion, that the prophet Daniel and his three companions were eunuchs (22). Ammianus Marcellinus will have Semiramis to have been the first contriver of eunuchism (23). What prompted them thus to maim and deform nature, Petronius Arbiter will tell us:

* TACIT. annal. xii.

Persarum ritu male pubescenti-bus annis

Subripuere viros; exsectaque viscera ferro

In venerem fregere: atque ut fuga mobilis ævi,

Circumscripta mora, properantes differat annos (24).

And Claudian,

Seu Persica ferro

Luxuries vetuit nasci lanuginis umbram (25).

Eunuchs have always been in great repute among the eastern princes, and were antiently employed in the most momentous affairs; all the places of greatest trust being filled by such men. But we have formerly shewn that the term eunuch does not always signify a real one, but often an officer at court, and near to the king's person; such as was Potiphar to the king of Egypt (26). To them the Persian kings committed not only the guard of their own persons (27), but likewise the education of their children, it being a custom among them to put the heir apparent of the crown, as soon as he was born, into the hands of eunuchs, under whose tuition he remained till he attained the seventh year of his age (28).

(21) Joseph. antiquit. l. x. c. 16.

(22) Hieronym. in cap. prim. Daniel.

(23) Ammian. Marcellin. l. xiv.

(24) Petron. Arb. satyr.

(25) Claudian. in Eutrop. l. i.

(26) See vol. iii. p. 293, note (M).

(27) Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. vii.

(28) Plato Alcibiad. i.

holy writ, called unchangeable ^y. A modern writer tells us, that those only were admitted to the crown, who were remarkable, above others, for their strength or stature ^z. But that there was no such law, is plain from the regular succession of father and son, without regard to any personal quality whatsoever. Some law of this nature may perhaps have obtained among them before they were conquered by the Assyrians; but we are quite in the dark as to the state of Media in those early times.

THEY paid their kings the greatest respect imaginable, putting them upon the level even with their gods. They thought it an high offence either to spit or laugh in their presence ^a. They honoured their sovereign with the haughty title of great king, or king of kings; which stile was afterwards adopted by the Persian monarchs, and their proud successors the Parthians, whose king, even in the time of the emperor Constantius, retained that title, writing himself, in a letter to that prince, Sapor, king of kings, allied to the stars, brother to the sun and moon, &c ^b. When they appeared in public, which seldom happened, they were always attended by music, and numerous guards, consisting of the prime nobility; their wives, children, and concubines, being part of their retinue, even when they headed their armies in the field.

As to their arts, learning, and trade, we are quite in the dark. Their country abounded with many excellent productions, as well for the use of the inhabitants themselves, as for foreign exportation; but, whether they ever applied themselves to trade, is what we find no-where recorded: the contrary seems rather to appear, from the character which the prophet ^c gives them of despising gold and silver, and delighting in the bloody trade of war. Neither do we find any mention made by the antients of their arts or sciences. During the short time of their monarchy, they seem to have applied their thoughts only to warlike exercises, namely, to the arts of managing an horse, and handling the bow; in which they surpassed all other nations, the Median horse being no less celebrated by the antients, than were in after-ages the Persian foot ^d. Thus much we have thought necessary to say apart of the Medes,

^y DAN. vi. 8.

^z ALEXAND. ab ALEX. l. iv. c. 23.

^a HERODOT. l. i. c. 99.

^b AMMIAN. MARCELLIN. l. xvii.

^c ISAI. xiii. 17, & seq.

^d XENOPH. Cyropæd. l. i. c. 7.

and their country. What else may be added thereto, we defer to the sections of the following chapter, which will be no more than a continuation of this.

S E C T. III.

The chronology of the Medes, to the translation of their empire to the Persians.

WE have formerly shewn how Ctesias and his followers have darkened the chronology of the Assyrians, Babylonians, and Medes with such enormous anachronisms, that it is no easy matter to ascertain the rise or fall of those potent monarchies. To proceed with all the clearness and perspicuity so perplexed a subject will allow, we shall distinguish, in the chronology of the Medes, three remarkable occurrences, which will give birth to as many different æras, viz. the recovery of their liberty after they had been subdued by the Assyrians; the rise of their kingdom after some years of anarchy; and the beginning of their empire, which, it is agreed on all hands, rose on the ruins of the Assyrian monarchy. The first king of the Assyrians, who brought the Medes under subjection, was either Pul, according to us, the founder of the Assyrian empire, or his immediate successor Tiglath-pileser: for this prince, having, at the request of Abaz king of Judah, made war upon Rezin king of Damascus, and reduced that capital, transplanted its inhabitants to Kir in Media^f; whence it is plain, that the Medes were then subject to the Assyrians; and consequently that they must have been subdued either in the reign of Pul, or soon after the accession of Tiglath-pileser to the crown; for the empire of the Assyrians was already grown great, and the God of Israel stirred up the spirit of Pul king of Assyria, and the spirit of Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria^g, to make war. Pul makes his first appearance in Scripture during the reign of Menahem king of Israel, in the year of the flood 1577. before Christ 771. Tiglath-pileser, who is supposed to have been his son, succeeded him in the year of the flood 1608. before Christ 740. That there was no Assyrian empire before the days of Pul, is plain, both from the Scripture, and from the particular histories of each kingdom; so that the Medes could not be subdued by them before the time we have mentioned.

^f 2 Kings xvi. 7. 9. ^g 1 Chron. v. 26.

From the time of Pul, or Tiglath-pileser, they continued in subjection to the Affyrians till the reign of Sennacherib, which began about the year of the flood 1635, before Christ 713 (L). They took advantage, it is likely, of his long and distant absence, or of the sudden slaughter of his army near Egypt, and, shaking off the yoke, defended their liberty, by dint of arms, against the power of the Affyrians, which was now in its decline. These are the troubles which prevented Tobit from going into Media, according to his custom ⁱ; and they must have happened about the latter end of Sennacherib's reign, that is, about the year of the flood 1638. before Christ 710. The Medes, having thus rescued their country from the Affyrian bondage, fell into a kind of anarchy, as Herodotus informs us ^k; which gave Efar-baddon or Affar-badon, who succeeded Sennacherib, and was both a valorous and fortunate prince, an opportunity of bringing great part of Media, if not the whole country, anew under subjection. How long the anarchy may have lasted, is hard to determine. Some include the years of the anarchy in the fifty-three, which Dejoces, their first king, is said to have reigned. If we suppose the Medes to have revolted in the year before Christ 710. and allow fifty-three years to the reign of Dejoces, the anarchy cannot have lasted above one year: for Dejoces, who, in the book of Judith, is called Arphaxad ^l, was killed by Saosduchinus or Nebuchadonosor, in the year 656. which was the twelfth of Saosduchinus's reign, who came to the crown in the year 668. before the christian æra. But the reign of Dejoces, who, as we read in Herodotus ^m, had some time exercised the office of judge, before he was

ⁱ TOBIT. i. 15. ^k HERODOT. l. i. c. 96. ^l Judith i. 1. ^m HERODOT. ubi supra.

(L) That in the time of Shalmanezzer they were subject to the Affyrians, is plain from Scripture, where that prince is said to have transplanted the inhabitants of Samaria to Halab and Habor, and the other cities of the Medes (30). In this captivity Tobit was carried from his native country, the city of Thisbe, in the tribe of Naphtali, with Anna his wife, and Tobias his son, into Affyria; but the rest of his brethren were carried into Media, and planted there, particularly Gabael in Rages, and Raguel in Ecbatan (31); which proves Media to have been in the time of Shalmanezzer subject to the king of Affyria.

(30) 2 Kings xvii. 6.

(31) Tobit i. 10, & seqq.

chosen king, is evidently too long; and we may safely abridge it of fifteen or twenty years, adding them to the anarchy. From the beginning of the reign of Dejoces, to the destruction of Nineveh, which happened in the ninth year of the reign of Jehoiakim, that is, in the year of the flood 1747. before Christ 601. Media may be properly stiled a kingdom. From the destruction of Nineveh, we may date the rise of the empire of the Medes; for the conquerors, that is, Nebuchadnezzar and Cyaxares, having shared the Assyrian empire, they both became very powerful, and reduced most of the neighbouring nations, as we shall see in the sequel of this history. Their empire lasted till the taking of Babylon; for Xenophon^a tells us, that, after the reduction of that city, Cyrus went to the king of the Medes at Ecbatan, and succeeded him in the kingdom; which is intirely agreeable to Scripture. Babylon was taken sixty-three years after the destruction of Nineveh, to which we may add the two years that Darius the Mede reigned over that city; so that the empire of the Medes lasted sixty-five years, at the period of which the Persian empire took rise in Cyrus. That Darius the Mede reigned over Babylon, is unquestionable; for he is said, in Scripture^o, to have introduced there the immutable laws of the Medes and Persians. In his reign, the Medes are ever placed before the Persians^p, as the Persians, in the reign of Cyrus and his successors, are always set before the Medes^q.

BEFORE we proceed to the history of the Medes, we shall exhibit the series of their kings, according to several authors.

A table of the kings of the Medes, according to Herodotus, Diodorus Siculus, Eusebius, and Syncellus.

| Acc. to Herodot. | Acc. to Diod. | Acc. to Euseb. | Acc. to Syncel. |
|-----------------------|-------------------------|-----------------------|------------------------|
|  1 | Arbaces 28 | 1 Arbaces 28 | 1 Arbaces 28 |
|  2 | Mandauces 50 | 2 Sesarmus 30 | 2 Mandauces 20 |
|  3 | Sesarmus 30 | 3 Medidus 40 | 3 Sesarmus 30 |
|  4 | Articus 50 | 4 Cardiacas 13 | 4 Articus 30 |
|  5 | Arbaces 22 | ***** | ***** |
|  6 | Artax 40 | ***** | ***** |
|  7 | Artynes 22 | 5 Dejoces 54 | 5 Diaces 54 |
| 1 Dejoces 53 | 8 Antibaranes 40 | 6 Pbraortes 24 | 6 Apbraartes 51 |
| 2 Pbraortes 22 | 9 Asibares  | 7 Cyaxares 32 | 7 Cyaxares 32 |
| 3 Cyaxares 40 | 10 Apandas or | 8 Astyas 38 | 8 Astyages } 38 |
| 4 Astyages 35 | Astyages  | | or Darius } |
| Total 150 | 282 | 259 | 283 |

^a XENOPH. Cyrop. l. viii. ^o Dan. vi. 8, 12, 15. ^p Dan. ubi supra, & v. 28. viii. 20. ^q Esth. i. 3, 14, 18, 19. Dan. x. 1, 20. & xi. 2.

THIS table contains what may be called two original catalogues, those of Herodotus, and Diodorus, as he has borrowed it from Ctesias. The other two are compounded of both, with an equal deference to each, as far as they go. By what we have laid down above, and confirmed with the authority of holy writ, it appears, that Herodotus is not greatly mistaken in his numbers. Ctesias enumerates ten kings of Media, whose names are different from those mentioned by Herodotus, except the last, whom he calls Astyages, and Diodorus names Apandas. The reigns of the eight first amount to two hundred and eighty-two years, and those of the two last are omitted; but, if they be supplied from Herodotus, they will come very near Justin's account; who supposes the kings of Media to have reigned three hundred and fifty years. Eusebius and Syncellus differ as widely from Ctesias as from each other, except in the name and reign of the first king Arbaces; and, besides, omit two of his ten. They pay a greater respect to Herodotus, whom they copy more exactly, at least with regard to his names, though they vary sometimes very materially from him in the lengths of the reigns. As for the variations between them, it would be a fruitless task to inquire into them; especially as it must appear, from what we have said already, that they are both grossly mistaken (N).

S E C T.

(N) Dionysius Halicarnasensis and Appian have followed Herodotus with regard to the duration of the empires of the Assyrians and Medes. The former acquaints us (34), that the empire of the Medes was ruined in the fourth generation; and the latter (35), that the three great empires of the Assyrians, Medes and Persians, to the time of Alexander, did not last 900 years. The Persian empire continued 230 years, from the first year of the fifty-fifth Olympiad to the second of the hundredth and twelfth. To this number if we add 670 years, which the empires of the Assyrians and Medes lasted, according to Herodotus, the sum will be but 900 years. These are the sentiments of the most judicious among the profane historians, concerning the duration of the empires of the Assyrians and Medes. But on the other side Cephaleon, Alexander Polyhistor, Diodorus Siculus, Castor, Trogus Pompeius, and his abbreviator Justin, with Velleius Paterculus, have followed Ctesias in his catalogue of the Assyrian kings. Among

(34) Dionys. Halicar. l. i. hist. Rom.(35) Appian. in prefat.

S E C T. IV.

The history of the Medes.

WE shall begin with what we may call the fabulous history of the Medes, being extracted from Ctesias, his transcriber Diodorus, and their followers. According christian chronologers, Africanus, Eusebius, and Syncellus, have inserted in their catalogues, the kings of the Assyrians and Medes mentioned by Ctesias; though, in order to adjust their chronologies, they have sometimes abridged, and sometimes increased their number.

If the empire of the Medes continued 352 years, as it must have done according to Ctesias, if we supply the reigns of the two last kings, in his catalogue, from Eusebius or Syncellus, it must be supposed, that, after the empire of the Assyrians was destroyed by Arbaces, there were no Assyrian kings either at Nineveh or Babylon, and that the Medes were sole masters of Asia. But this supposition is evidently repugnant both to sacred and profane history. If we consult the Scripture, we shall find, that the Assyrian empire was never more potent than after this pretended destruction of Nineveh. The prophet Jonah, who flourished in the reigns of Azariah king of Judah, and Jeroboam king of Israel, was sent to preach repentance to Nineveh, about 80 years after the supposed reign of Arbaces; and Nineveh was then a great city, three days journey long; it had a king of its own, and was so populous as to contain above 120,000 children not yet come to the use of reason; for thus is the passage commonly understood, where it is said, that they could not discern between their right hand and their left (36). Could a city, which had been reduced to an heap of rubbish but 80 years before, grow to such a pitch of grandeur in so short a time? For, according to the prophet's account, it was then in the meridian of its splendor. Those who follow Ctesias, have been forced to own, that Nineveh was twice taken and destroyed, viz. in the time of king Jehoshaphat by Arbaces, and three hundred years after, in the reign of Josiah. But the Scripture, Josephus, and all profane writers, allow only one desolation of that great city. The latter differ only in the time when it happened. Herodotus places it at the end of the reign of Cyaxares, and Polyhistor does not much differ from him. Ctesias, and his followers, refer it to the reign of Arbaces, three hundred years earlier. That the latter are mistaken, is manifest from holy ing to these, the Medes were governed by kings of their own, before the early days of Ninus, the pretended founder of the Assyrian monarchy; for, when Ninus invaded this country, it was ruled by one Pharnus, who, being worsted by that mighty warrior, was taken prisoner, and crucified, with his wife and seven children¹. Thus Media was reduced to a province of the Assyrian empire, and remained subject to the successors of Ninus till the time of Sardanapalus. However, they made some attempts towards the recovery of their liberty during the regency of Semiramis, and minority of her son Ninyas; for she is said to have invaded Media with a mighty army, and, encamping near a mountain called Bagistan, to have made a pleasant garden twelve furlongs in compass. The mountain was dedicated to Jupiter, and had, on one side, craggy rocks seventeen furlongs high, which she ascended on the packs and loads carried by the beasts of burden that followed her army. In the lower part of this rock, she caused her statue to be hewn out, and an hundred of her guards attending her. From hence she marched to Choon, a city of Media, where, on the top of a very lofty rock, she writ, as we have already shewn. We may add, that this powerful empire, which Arbaces founded, must soon have decayed, which is inconsistent with the system of Ctesias, and the authors that follow him. The Assyrian empire must have raised itself again, Nineveh must have been rebuilt, and have passed from an heap of rubbish to an extraordinary pitch of grandeur; and all this in the space of seventy or eighty years: for, after this pretended destruction of Nineveh, and the Assyrian empire, we find, in Scripture, a series of Assyrian kings, and a potent empire, not subject to the Medes. Besides, if we compare the destruction of Nineveh, described by Ctesias, with what we read in Scripture, and Polybistor, they will plainly appear to be the same. Ctesias says, that Sardanapalus burnt himself, his concubines, and treasures; Polybistor writes the same of Sarac. Ctesias tells us, that the Medes, in conjunction with the Babylonians, destroyed Nineveh; and the same is confirmed by Polybistor, and the sacred penmen. Ctesias writes, that the city was laid in ashes, and the citizens dispersed: and this is what we read in the prophets. Such a conformity of facts, joined to the former evidences, amount to a full conviction, that there was but one destruction of the Assyrian empire, and one desolation of Nineveh.

(36) Jonah iii. 3. & iv. 11. Vide Gregor. Pseph. p. 194.

¹ DIODOR. SIC. I. II. C. I.

formed

formed another pleasant garden, with stately edifice, whence she might behold the beauties of the spot, and her whole army encamped in the plain. From Chain she advanced towards Ecbatan, and, on her march, levelled mount Zarceum, which was many furlongs in extent, filled up valleys, and, in spite of nature, opened a plain and easy way to Ecbatan, which, to our author's time, was called Semiramis's road ^m. These extraordinary works, as they were lasting monuments of her conquests not only over the rebellious Medes, but nature itself, kept that nation in a servile subjection and dependency to the reign of Sardanapalus, that is, for the space of near fourteen hundred years (O), when Arbaces, governor of Media, and Belisus, governor of Babylon, put an end to the Assyrian empire, in the manner we have related, and, we hope, more fully confuted, in the history of Assyria.

Arbaces.

ARBACES, the first king of the Medes after their revolt, is represented as a prince of great generosity and gratitude, as appears from his behaviour towards the mean-spirited Babylonian Belisus, who, by a pious fraud, bereaved him of the immense treasures that were concealed in the ashes and ruins of the Assyrian palace, as we have elsewhere related at length. He is said to have subdued all Asia, and to have reigned twenty-eight years.

Mandauc.

He was succeeded by his son Mandauc, who reigned fifty years; but did nothing worthy of notice in the warlike way, being himself, as he is represented, a prince of a peaceable disposition, and his subjects desirous of some respite after the violent struggles for liberty and empire in the last reign.

Sofarmus.

SOSARMUS appears next, by some called Medidus. He reigned thirty years; and this is all we find of him upon record.

Idem ibid.

(O) These stories are of a piece with what the same author relates elsewhere; viz. That the army of Ninus consisted of two millions of men, at a time when the earth was not yet well peopled; that Semiramis employed two millions of workmen in the building of Babylon; that she disposed, in the shape of elephants, the hides of three hundred thousand black oxen, and other fables of the like nature, forged by Cicero, and gravely related by Diodorus.

ARTIAS, by some called Arbycas, by others Cardiccas, reigned next. From his name, some, who indulge etymologies, argue him to have been a great and glorious prince, the word arti or arta, in the composition of his name, denoting greatness, as it does, according to the interpretation of Herodotus, in that of the Persian Artaxerxes P. All we can say is, that, if he performed great exploits, they have been long since buried in oblivion. There is a great disagreement among authors concerning the length of his reign; some allowing him fifty years, others thirty, and some only thirteen.

Arbianes.

AFTER him came Arbianes; in whose reign a war broke out between the Medes and Cadusians, who, at the instigation of one Parfodes, rising up in arms, shook off the yoke, which they had for some time groaned under. Parfodes was by birth a Persian; but the chief favourite and prime minister of Arbianes king of the Medes, whom he served with great fidelity, till, being highly provoked at a sentence pronounced against him by that prince, he fled, with three thousand foot, and a thousand horse, to the Cadusians; where he not only withdrew his obedience to Arbianes, but stirred up the whole nation to a revolt. The Cadusians, being thus encouraged to stand up for their liberties, committed the whole management of the war to Parfodes, as the most proper person, on all accounts, to appear at the head of their army: but, before he took the field, Arbianes died, after a reign of twenty years.

Artæus.

ARTÆUS came to the crown while the Cadusians were making vast preparations to invade his kingdom; and, understanding that Parfodes was advancing towards the frontiers at the head of two hundred thousand men, he thought it high time to curb the insolence of that rebel; and accordingly, having raised an army of eight hundred thousand men, he marched out with his mighty host, and engaged the rebels; but was most shamefully routed, and forced to save himself by flight, leaving fifty thousand of his men dead in the field of battle. Upon this victory, the Cadusians proclaimed Parfodes their king; who, accepting the crown, inspired his new subjects with that irreconcilable hatred which he had conceived against the Medes, and laid the foundations of a perpetual enmity between the two nations. He is said to have solemnly conjured the Cadusians, even on his death-bed, to wage an eternal war with the Medes, and never lay down their arms, till that odious nation was utterly abolished, loading, at the same time, with curses and imprecations, such of his successors, as ever should, upon any terms whatsoever, be reconciled with them. In pursuance of this, as we may call it, his last will, the Cassians watched all opportunities of harassing the Medes with inroads, and doing them what mischief they could, till the empire was transferred from them to the Persians 1.

AFTER Artæus, Artynes reigned twenty-two years; but did nothing worth mentioning. He was succeeded by Artibarnas or Artabanus; in whose reign, the Parthians, revolting, put themselves under the protection of the Sacæ, a people inhabiting mount Hæmodus, which separates India from Scythia. This occasioned a war of many years between the Medes and the Sacæ, who were then governed by the famed Zanara, an heroine of great prowess. That princess is no less celebrated, by our author, for her courage and conduct in war, than for her beauty. She had, according to him, rescued her country from the tyranny of the neighbouring princes, civilized her subjects, and inured them to military discipline, and the toils of war. After she had, for many years, harassed the Medes, a peace was at last concluded between her and Artibarnas, on the following equitable conditions, that the Parthian should submit to the Medes; and the Sacæ and Medes quietly enjoy what they possessed at the beginning of the war (P).

Artynes.

Artibarnas.

HITHERTO we have dwelt on what we may safely call the fabulous history of the Medes, these kings, or most of them, being no-where found, but in the books, or rather

1 Diod. Sic. l. ii. c. 3. 1 Idem ibid.

(P) This queen was, according to our author, another Semiramis. She excelled all her own sex in beauty, and was inferior to none of the other in courage and wisdom; she built many cities, made considerable conquests, and raised the obscure nation of the Sacæ to a great pitch of glory. Whence her subjects in gratitude for the many advantages they enjoyed by her means, erected her a monument after her death, of vast dimensions, being three furlongs in breadth, and on the top of which was built a pyramid of a furlong in height. Upon this pyramid she was represented by a golden colossus, and adored by her subjects as a goddess (37).

(37) Diod. Sic. l. ii. c. 3.

The genuine history of the Medes.

in the imagination, of Otesias, which was very fertile in the production of monsters. We now come to the genuine history of Media, as it has been transmitted to us by authors of a quite different character.

THE Medes, having thrown off the Affyrian yoke in the reign of Sennacherib, lived some time without a king; but were again brought under subjection by one of their own country, whose name was Dejoces. He is represented as a subtle, crafty man, and aiming at absolute power; and is said to have compassed his design in the following manner: The Medes were, at that time, divided into several districts, in one of which lived Dejoces, who, seeing all kind of licentiousness prevail over the whole country, applied himself to the administration of justice with great zeal and diligence. The Medes of the same district, observing the equity of his conduct, chose him for their judge; and he, aspiring to the sovereign power, performed that office with all possible regard to justice. By this means, he not only acquired a great reputation in his own district, but among those also of the other divisions, who looked upon him as the only impartial judge in the whole nation: whence such as thought themselves injured by unjust sentences, resorted from all parts to him, in order to obtain justice, till, at last, no one would commit the decision of a difference to any other person. At length the numbers of those, who applied to him for redress, increasing, in proportion to the great fame of his equity, and the whole care of administering justice being devolved upon him, he unexpectedly absented himself from the place where he used to determine differences, declaring, he would no longer perform that office, and submitting it to the judgment of his countrymen, whether it was reasonable, that he should neglect his private affairs, to attend those of the public. Hereupon rapine and all manner of wickedness prevailing again to such a degree, that it was not safe to live in the country, the Medes called a general assembly of the whole nation, to deliberate on the means of reforming the abuses, that were daily becoming more frequent. Upon this occasion, those who were in the interest of Dejoces observed, that, if a stop was not put to the growth of the disorders that had already overspread the whole land, they should soon be obliged to abandon their country to a foreign enemy. They advised therefore their countrymen to appoint a king of their own nation, as the only expedient that could rescue their country from impending ruin. Their discourse was received with general approbation, and a king was resolved on. Their next deliberation was concerning the person, whom they should prefer to the crown; when Dejoces was named to the sovereignty, and, with universal applause, placed on the throne.

Thus was Dejoces created king; and no sooner was he vested with the supreme power, than he threw off the mask, and commenced tyrant; though the rigour he practised may perhaps have been absolutely necessary to bring the nation, after some years of anarchy, into any order or discipline.

Dejoces chosen king
Year of the flood 1638.
Bef. Chr.
710.

The first thing he did, after his promotion, was to command his new subjects to build him a palace suitable to his dignity, and to appoint him guards for the safety of his person. He was obeyed; and, on the ground which he chose, a strong and stately fabric was erected for his ordinary residence. At the same time he was allowed to chuse for his guard, out of the whole nation, such as he thought most proper for that trust. Thus settled on the throne, he united the several districts, into which the Medes had been divided during the anarchy, and turned his thoughts towards building a strong city, which might be the metropolis of his new kingdom. To this also his subjects submitted; and the famous city of Ecbatan was built, pursuant to his orders and directions, a city which, in process of time, became very famous in those parts (Q).

Dejoces, thus lodged in a magnificent and well-defended city, enacted the following laws to be observed by all his subjects, of what rank soever: that no one should be admitted to his presence; but transact all things by his servants and ministers: that none should be allowed

HERODOT. l. i. c. 95—99.

(Q) Ecbatan, in Scripture Arbaces, whom he confounds (38), is called Achmetha; by Tiglath-pileser, to be the Ctesias and Stephanus, Aghatan. founder of it. Josephus (40) In the book of Judith, it is acquaints us, that the decree said to have been built by Arphaxad king of the Medes. of Cyrus, about the rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem, was found at Ecbatan; which plainly proves it to be the same not, that Ecbatan was only with the Achmetha of Scripture, where, according to Ezra enlarged and beautified by Dejoces. He will, perhaps, have (41), the said decree was lodged.

(38) Ezra, vi. 2. (39) Connect. of the Old and New Testament, p. 26.
(40) Joseph. antiq. l. xii. c. 4. (41) Ezra. ubi supra.

even to see him, that were not immediately of his household: and that for any, who attended him, to laugh or spit in his presence, should be accounted a great indecency, and contrary to the respect which is due to a sovereign. These laws he enjoined, that the malecontents might have no opportunity of putting in execution any evil design against his person, not doubting but those, who were debarred from seeing him, would be easily induced to think him of a superior nature to themselves: but tho' he kept himself thus concealed from the eyes of the people, yet he was informed of every thing that happened in his dominions, maintaining to that end many emissaries in all the provinces of his government, who brought him a minute account of every transaction. By this means, no crime escaped either the knowledge of the prince, or the rigour of the law; and the punishment, thus treading upon the heels of the offence, kept the wicked in awe, and stemmed the course of violence and injustice.

DEJOCES, having thus civilized his unpolished subjects, began to entertain thoughts of extending the limits of his new kingdom; and, with this view, invaded Assyria, which was now in its decline, and greatly weakened by the revolt of many nations, who, following the example of the Medes, had shaken off the Assyrian yoke. But Saasduchinus or Nebuchadonosor, at that time king of Assyria, meeting him in the great plain of Ragau, a battle ensued, in which the Medes were utterly defeated, and Dejoces himself slain, after a reign, according to Herodotus, of fifty-three years (R). Nebu-

HERODOT. l. i. c. 99—101. and Judith l. pass.

Idem ibid. c. 102.

(R) This unsuccessful war was not carried on, as some suppose, by Phraortes, the son and successor of Dejoces, but by Dejoces himself, by the prince, which reigned over the Medes in Ecbatana, and built in Ecbatana walls round about, as we read in the book of Judith (42). Now the city of Ecbatana, and the walls for which the city was chiefly remarkable, were built by Dejoces, as is said in express terms by Herodotus (43). We may hence conclude the Dejoces of Herodotus, and the Arphaxad of the book of Judith, who was killed by Nebuchadonosor in the great plain of Ragau, to be one and the same person (44).

(42) Judith l. 1, 2.

(43) Herodotus l. i. c. 98.

(44) See Usp.

ad A. M. 3296. and Prideaux counsell. part i. book i. p. 35.

chadonosor,

cbadonosor, following his blow, reduced several cities of Media, and among the rest Ecbatan itself, which he almost intirely destroyed.

He was succeeded by his son Phraortes; who, being Phraortes. of a warlike temper, and not satisfied with the kingdom of Media, which his father had left him, invaded Persia; and is said to have brought that nation under subjection to the Medes. But we are inclined to disagree with our author in this particular, and ascribe the conquest of Persia, not to Phraortes; but to his son and successor Cyaxares (S).

Year of
the flood 1692.
Bef. Chr.
656.

How
Judith i. 14. HERODOT. ubi supra.

(S) It seems plain from Scripture, that the Persians were not subdued by the Medes till after the taking of Nineveh, by the joint forces of Cyaxares and Nebuchadnezzar. In the fourth year of Jehoiakim, which the Jews reckon to be the first of Nebuchadnezzar (45), God threatened, by his prophet (46), that he would take all the families of the north, and Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, and bring them against Judea, and against the nations round about, and utterly destroy those nations, and make them an astonishment and lasting desolations, and cause them all to drink the wine-cup of his fury; and in particular, he names the kings of Judab and Egypt, and those of Edom and Moab, and Ammon and Tyre, and all the kings of Elam, and all the kings of the Medes, &c. Where it is to be observed, that in numbering the nations which were to be subdued, he omits the Assyrians, who must consequently have been already conquered, and names the kings of Elam or Persia, as distinct from those of the Medes; whence we may conclude, that the Persians were not yet subdued by the Medes. In the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah, that is, in the sixth year of Nebuchadnezzar, the same prophet foretold the approaching conquest of Persia by the Medes and their confederates: Behold, says he, I will break the bow of Elam—upon Elam will I bring the four winds from the four quarters of heaven—and there shall be no nation where the outcasts of Elam shall not come.—I will set my throne in Elam, and will destroy from thence the king and the princes, saith the LORD; but it shall come to pass in the latter days (that is, in the reign of Cyrus), that I will bring again the captivity of Elam, saith the LORD (47).

From these words of the prophet it is manifest, that, in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, nay, after the destruction of Nineveh, the Persians had kings of their own, and consequently could

(45) Jerem. xxv. 1. 33, & seq.

(46) Ibid. ver. 9.

(47) Jerem. xlix.

However, he subdued several of the neighbouring nations, attacking them one after another, till he made himself master of almost all the Upper Asia, lying between mount Taurus and the river Halys. Elated with the good success that attended his army, at length he invaded Affyria, made himself master of great part of the country, and even laid siege to Nineveh, the metropolis of the empire. But here his good fortune abandoning him, he perished, with the greater part of his army, in the attempt, after having reigned twenty-two years^y.

Cyaxares I.

Year of the flood

1713.
Bef. Chr.

635.

UPON the death of Phraortes, his son Cyaxares was placed on the throne. He was a brave and enterprising prince; and indeed such a man was then, more than ever, wanting, to save the nation from impending slavery, most part of the kingdom being already possessed by the Affyrians. Having settled himself well in his kingdom, and brought his troops under good discipline (T), he soon recovered what the Affyrians had taken during the reigns of his father and grandfather. What he had next at heart was, to avenge their death, by the destruction of Nineveh; and accordingly, having assembled all his forces, he marched out, with a design to treat that city, as Nebuchadonofor had treated the metropolis of Media. The Affyrians meeting him on the frontiers, with the remains only of that great army which had been destroyed before Bethulia, an engagement ensued, wherein the former were defeated, and driven into Nineveh. Cyaxares, pursuing his victory, laid close siege to the city; but was soon obliged to give over the enterprize, and employ his troops in the defence of his own kingdom^z.

^y Idem ibid.

^z Idem ibid. c. 103.

could not be subdued by Pbraartes, who was killed thirty years before Nebuchadnezzar came to the crown of Babylon (48).

(T) He was the first, according to Herodotus (49), that marshalled the people of Asia into distinct bodies of lances, cavalry, and archers; whereas, before his time, horse and foot, and pikemen and archers, engaged promiscuously. But this we can hardly believe, when we consider that the nations of this part of Asia were engaged in continual wars, and consequently must have been more experienced in the military art.

(48) See Sir Isaac Newton's chron. of ant. kingd. amend. p. 313, & seqq.
(49) Herodot. l. i.

A for-

A formidable army of Scythians, having driven the Cimmerians out of Europe, were in full march in pursuit of their flying enemies, and ready to enter Media. They were come from the neighbourhood of the Palus Maeotis, and commanded by king Madyes, the son of Protothyas. This Madyes can be no other than Indathyrus the Scythian, who invaded Asia, as Strabo informs us^a; and, having laid waste great part of that country, advanced to the confines of Egypt. Cyaxares no sooner heard of their march, but, breaking up the siege of Nineveh, he advanced with all his forces against them. The two armies engaged; and the Medes, though encouraged by the example of their king, who, on that occasion, gave proofs of an extraordinary valour, were utterly routed. The conquerors, having no other enemy to contend with, over-ran not only all Media, but the greater part of Upper Asia (U). From thence they

^a STRAB. l. i. prope initium.

(U) Eusebius tells us, that Cyaxares took the city of Nineveh before the Scythians invaded Media. But as Herodotus, and all the profane historians, without exception, unanimously agree in this point, that the Scythians broke into Media while he was besieging Nineveh, and obliged him to withdraw his troops from thence to the defence of his own kingdom, we have chosen to follow them rather than Eusebius, whose authors we are unacquainted with. Touching the expedition of the Scythians, Herodotus tells us, that the Cimmerians, being driven out by the Scythians, invaded and laid waste part of Asia; and that the Scythians, not satisfied with driving them from their habitations, followed them, we know not why, into far distant countries, and in this pursuit fell, as it were by chance, upon Media, while the Cimmerians were gone another way into Lydia (50). As the Cimmerians, Scythians, and Samaritans, were all of the same race and nation, as Goropius Becanus learnedly proves in his Amazonica, we are inclined to think, that this pretended expulsion of the Cimmerians was nothing else but the sending of a colony into Asia with an army of Scythians, to assist them in acquiring new settlements, and establishing plantations, in a foreign country. For though the Cimmerians, Scythians, and Samaritans, were but one people, yet they were distinguished in name according to their different tribes, professions, and perhaps dialects. Such another expedition the same people undertook some ages after,

(50) H. i. c. 103.

when

they extended their conquests into Syria, as far as the confines of Egypt. But there Psammiticus, king of that country, when they were encountered by the Romans. For they came from the countries bordering on the lake Mæotis; they were then likewise assisted, as Plutarch informs us (51), by their neighbours the Scythians, and had in their army above 300,000 men, besides a great multitude of women and children. They wandered over many countries, bearing all down before them, and finally, designing to settle in Italy, divided into several bodies, to facilitate their passage thither; but were all cut off in three battles by the Roman consuls. Mere necessity obliged these poor nations to infest their neighbours, and expose themselves to such dangers: for their country abounding more in men than in sustenance, and shut up in the north by intolerable cold, they were compelled to discharge their overgrown numbers on the southern countries, and drive others, right or wrong, from their possessions, as being intitled to what others had, because they had nothing themselves. As they were a warlike race, and inured to hardships, they generally prevailed, their next neighbours giving them a free passage, that they might the sooner get rid of them; others supplying them with provisions, and guides, to lead them to more wealthy countries.

(51) Plutarch. in Mario.

The first body of these, mentioned by Herodotus, took the way of the Euxine sea, which they had on the left, as mount Caucasus on their right. They passed through Colchis and Pontus, and, arriving in Paphlagonia, fortified the promontory whereon Sinope was afterwards built by the Greeks. Here they left, under a strong guard, such as were unfit for service, and great part of their baggage; and then continued their march into Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, having now no mountains or deep rivers to stop their march; for the Iris and Halys they had already passed. We shall give an account of their wars with the Lydians in the history of Lydia.

As the Cimmerians held their course westerly along the Shore of the Euxine sea, so the Scythians took the other way; and, having the Caspian on their left, passed between that sea and the Caucasus, thro' Albania, Colchene, and other obscure nations, till they came into Media, where they engaged and routed Cyaxares, as we have said. To this overthrow of Cyaxares, some commentators refer that prophecy of Nabum (52); He (that is, Cyaxares besieging Nineweb) shall recount his worthies; they shall stumble in their walk (that is, in the walk or perambulation of the Scythians, whose coming

(52) Nabum ii. 5.

try, meeting them in person, prevailed upon those barbarians, what by intreaties, what by presents, to proceed no farther, and thereby saved his country from the heavy oppression, which his neighbours groaned under ^a. In this expedition, the Scythians possessed themselves of the city of Bethsheam in the territories of the tribe of Manasseh on this side the Jordan, and held it as long as they continued in Asia; whence it is called Scythopolis, or the city of the Scythians ^b. On their return from Egypt, as they passed through the land of the Philistines, some of the stragglers plundered the temple of Venus at Ascalon; which was believed the most antient in the world dedicated to that goddess. To avenge this attempt, the goddess is said to have inflicted on those that were concerned in the sacrilege, and their posterity, the hemorrhoids; which shews that the Philistines still preserved the memory of what they had formerly suffered on account of the ark; for, from that time, they looked, it seems, on this distemper as a punishment from Heaven attending such sacrilegious attempts; and therefore, in charging the Scythians with this crime, took care not to omit, in their histories, the punishment which their ancestors had suffered for one of the same nature ^c.

THE Scythians were, for the space of twenty-eight years, masters of the Upper Asia, namely the two Armenias, Cappadocia, Pontus, Colchis, Iberia, and great part of Lydia. Cyaxares, finding it impracticable to get rid of his troublesome guests by open force, resolved to try what might be effected by stratagem; and accordingly invited the greatest part of them to a general feast, which was given in every family. Each landlord made his guest drunk; and in that condition were the Scythians massacred, and the kingdom coming at this time into Asia and all the upper Asia): they may well be so termed, since shall make haste to the wall it was rather a passing thro', therefore, and the defence shall than any settlement; for in the be prepared; that is, they shall short space of twenty-eight hasten to Nineveh, as if they years they over-ran, conquered intended to deliver it from the ed, and lost Media, Assyria, Medes besieging it (53).

^a HERODOT. lib. i. c. 105. lib. ii. c. 1. & lib. vii. c. 20.

^b SYNCEL. p. 214.

^c HERODOT. l. i. c. 105.

(53) Vid. int. al. Jun. & Tremel. in loc.

delivered from a long and cruel bondage (W). The Medes then repossessed themselves of the provinces they had lost, and once more extended their empire to the banks of the Halys, which was their antient boundary westward ^e.

CYAXARES, having thus freed his country from the oppression of the Scythians, found himself soon after engaged in a war with the Lydians. The occasion of this war is thus related by Herodotus ^f: Upon a sedition which happened among the Scythian nomades, a party of them made their escape into Media; where they were not only entertained with great humanity by Cyaxares, but intrusted with the education of divers youths, whom they were to instruct in the use of the bow, and in the Scythian language. These strangers went frequently to hunt, and were ever accustomed to return with some game; but one day happening to come home with empty hands, Cyaxares, whom they used daily to present with some venison, treated them with most opprobrious language. This they resented; and

^e HERODOT. l. i. c. 106.

^f HERODOT. l. i. c. 73, 74.

(W) We do not find, that the Scythians, who escaped this bloody feast, raised any commotions in Media, or that they ever afterwards, either in revenge of this treachery, or on any other pretence, troubled the Medes. We are therefore apt to believe, that the stratagem of Cyaxares was attended with less bloodshed than is commonly supposed: for, by cutting off the chief men among them, he might have brought the others to reasonable terms. It is not improbable, that in the space of twenty-eight years, many had settled themselves so well, that they were willing to live in subjection to Cyaxares, provided they might peaceably enjoy what they possessed: many who had enriched themselves with the spoils of Asia, were willing to return home to their wives and families with the booty, and such as were not pleased with either of these two courses, might join their companions in Lydia and Parthia, or seek their fortunes in other countries. We read in Scripture, that all the families of the north were with Nebuchadnezzar; which may well be understood of these brave northern nations settling in his dominions, after they were driven out of Media and Lydia. 'Tis certain that, after this expulsion of the Scythians, the Babylonians, who never before had been a match for the Egyptians, in all engagements with them, carried the day; which may be ascribed to this new addition of forces.

agreed among themselves to kill one of the youths committed to their care, dress his flesh like venison, and serve it up to Cyaxares and his guests. They executed what they proposed; and then, flying to Sardis, implored the protection of Halyattes king of Lydia. Cyaxares immediately dispatched ambassadors to demand the Scythians; but they not being able to prevail with the king of Lydia to deliver them up, a war of five years ensued between the two nations, with various success (X). The battle, fought in the sixth year of this war, was very remarkable, on account of a total eclipse of the sun, which happened during the engagement, and is said to have been foretold by Thales the Milesian (Y). The Medes and Lydians, who were then in the heat of the battle, equally terrified with this

(X) This Herodotus delivers as the occasion of a war between the Medes and Lydians; the one king demanding the fugitives, and the other refusing to deliver up such as had put themselves under his protection. But to us we must own, it does not at all seem probable, that the Scythians should have sheltered themselves from their own countrymen in the dominions of either prince, considering how odious the Scythian name must at this time have been in both kingdoms. As to Cyaxares, they had particular reasons to distrust him for the treachery he had shewn towards their countrymen, as we have related above. Some writers therefore, with greater probability, suppose, that the Scythians, who retired into Lydia, were such as had escaped the massacre in Media, and not any other new colony;

for that universal slaughter being fresh in their memories, it is very unlikely, that other Scythians would have come to settle in the very country where it had been so lately perpetrated.

(Y) That this eclipse fell out, while Cyaxares the father of Astyages, and Halyattes the father of Cræsus, were engaged in a battle, is confirmed by Endemus, in his astronomical history. Pliny likewise (55), in speaking of eclipses, acquaints us, that Thales the Milesian was the first that foretold an eclipse of the sun; and adds, that the eclipse foretold by him happened in the fourth year of the forty-eighth Olympiad, in the reign of Halyattes (and not of Astyages, as we find in some modern copies), 170 years after the foundation of Rome. Clemens Alexandrinus (56) places this battle, and the eclipse of the sun, in the 50th

(55) Plin. l. i. c. 122(56) Clem. Alexand. Stromat. l. i

this uncommon event, which they looked upon as a sign of the anger of the gods, immediately retreated, and soon after concluded a peace, by the mediation of Labynetus, that is, Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, and Syennefis king of Cilicia. This peace was strengthened by a marriage between Aryenis, the daughter of Halyattes, and Astyages, the eldest son of Cyaxares ^g; of which marriage was born the ensuing year Cyaxares, who, in the book of Daniel, is called Darius the Mede ^h.

Nineveh taken and destroyed.
Year of
the flood 1747.
Bef. Chr.
601.

Cyaxares's first care, as soon as he was disengaged from the Lydian war, was to resume the siege of Nineveh, which the irruption of the Scythians had obliged him to raise. Having, with this view, entered into a strict alliance with Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and confirmed it by a marriage between that prince and his daughter Amyite (Z), he returned, in conjunction with the Babylonians, before Nine-

^g HERODOT. l. i. c. 73, 74.

^h Dan. v. 31.

Olympiad; wherein he differs widely from Endemus, whom he quotes, and pretends to follow. The time assigned, both by him and Pliny, does not suit with the reign of Cyaxares, but with that of his successor Astyages. The solar and lunar tables of Ptolemy, which are the same with those of Hipparchus, place this eclipse on the fourth year of the 44th Olympiad, and on the fourth day of the Egyptian month Pacon (or the 20th day of September, according to the Julian calendar, on a Sunday), three hours thirty-five minutes before noon. But, according to Sir Isaac Newton, it fell upon the 28th of May, in the year of Nabonassar 163, forty-seven years before the taking of Babylon (58), and 585 before Christ.

(Z) Some will have Amyite to be the daughter of Astyages, and grand-daughter of Cyaxares. But Astyages at that time could not have a daughter marriageable; and Nebuchadnezzar, had he married her, must have been, at the time of his death, at least eighty-five years old, and Astyages much older. In the book of Tobit, the destruction of Nineveh is ascribed to Abasuerus king of Media, and Nabuchadonosor king of Babylon (59). This Abasuerus can be no other than Cyaxares, who, as Sir Isaac Newton shews, was called Achsuerus, Assuerus, Oxyares, Axeres, prince Axeres, or Cy-Axeres, the word Cy signifying a prince in the Median language (60). By Nabuchadonosor is meant Ne-

(58) Sir Isaac Newton, chron. of ancient kingd. amend. p. 316. (59) Tobit
xiv. ver. ult. (60) Sir Isaac Newton, ubi supra, p. 509.

Nineveh, took the place, slew Sarac the king, and leveled that mighty city with the ground ^h. Thus was the proud metropolis of the Affyrian empire laid in ashes, pursuant to the prophecies uttered above an hundred years before ⁱ (A).

THIS victory, with the destruction of Nineveh, the Jews ascribe to the Chaldeans; the Greeks to the Medes;

^h HERODOT. l. i. c. 106. ALEXANDER POLYHIST. apud Euseb. in chron. p. 46. & apud Syncell. p. 210. ⁱ Nahum i. i. ii. 1, 2, & seqq. iii. 1, & seqq. Zephan. ii. 13, 15.

Nebuchadnezzar the great, both these names being given by the Babylonians to their kings, as that of Pharaoh was by the Egyptians to theirs. That Nabopallassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, was called by both these names, is plain from the books of the rab-bies, and also from Josephus. R. Juchasin calls Nebuchadnezzar the son of Nebuchadnezzar (61); and David Ganz calls the father Nebuchadnezzar the first, and the son Nebuchadnezzar the second (62). Josephus, in speaking of Nabopallassar, sometimes calls him Nabuchadonosor (63), and sometimes Nabulassar (64), which is a contraction of Nabopallassar. It is certain, that the books of Tobit and Judith cannot be reconciled with any other antient writings, sacred or profane, relating to those times, unless we allow the name of Nebuchadonosor to have been common to the kings of Babylon.

(A) On the ruins of the old Nineveh, another city was raised, which for a long time bore the same name, but never attained to the grandeur and glory of the former. It is now called Mosul (65), and situated on the west side of the Tigris, where was antiently only a part of the suburbs of old Nineveh; for the city itself stood on the east-side of the river. The circuit of Nineveh was, according to Diodorus Siculus (66), 480 furlongs, that is, sixty of our miles. Hence it is said by Jonah (67), to be a city of three days journey, that is, in compass; for twenty miles is as much as a man can well walk in one day. Strabo (68) tells us, that it was much bigger than Babylon; and in the same place says, that the circuit of Babylon was 385 furlongs, that is, 48 of our miles.

(61) Juchas. fol. 126.

(62) David Ganz, at the year of the world

3285.

(63) Joseph. antiq. l. x. c. 11.

(64) Joseph. contra

Apion. l. i.

(65) Thevenot, part ii. l. i. c. 10. p. 50.

(66) Diod.

Sic. l. ii. p. 65.

(67) Jonah iii. 3.

(68) Strabo, l. xvi.

p. 737.

Tobit, Polyhistor, Josephus, and Ctesias, to both. It gave a beginning to the great successes of Nebuchadnezzar and Cyaxares; and laid the foundation of the two collateral empires, as we may call them, of the Medes and Babylonians, which rose on the ruins of the Assyrian monarchy.

AFTER the reduction of Nineveh, the two conquerors, prosecuting their victory, led the confederate army against Pharaoh Necho king of Egypt, who had, some time before, routed the king of Assyria, and taken Carchemish. Pharaoh met them near the Euphrates, was defeated, and forced to abandon whatever he had formerly taken from the Assyrians ^k, as we have seen in a former volume ^l; for what had once belonged to them, Cyaxares and Nebuchadnezzar looked upon now as theirs by right of conquest (B). After this victory, they seized on the important place of Carchemish, reduced all Cæle-Syria and Phænice; and then, with an army of Babylonians, Medes, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, to the number of ten thousand chariots, an hundred and eighty thousand foot, and an hundred and twenty thousand horse, invaded and laid waste Samaria, Galilee, Scythopolis, &c. and at last besieged Jerusalem,

^k 2 Kings xxiv. 7. Jerem. xlvi. 2. EUPOL. apud Euseb. præp. evang. l. ix. c. 35. ^l See before vol. i. p. 85.

(B) From this time the Jewish computation of the years of Nebuchadnezzar's reign begins; that is, from the end of the third year of Jehoiakim, and therefore the fourth year of Jehoiakim, when Nebuchadnezzar was by his father taken into partnership of the empire, is, according to the Jews (70), the first year of his reign. But, according to the Babylonian computation, his reign is not reckoned to begin till his father's death, which happened two years after. As both these computations are found in Scripture, we thought it necessary to say thus much, in order to reconcile them. We must further observe, that as the Chaldean astronomers counted the reigns of their kings by the years of Nabonassar, beginning with the month Thoth; so the Jews counted the reigns of their kings by the years of Moses, beginning with the month Nisan; insomuch that if any king began his reign but a few days before the first of the month Nisan, those few days were reckoned a whole year, and the beginning of this month was accounted the beginning of his second year (71).

(70) Jerem. xxv. 1.

(71) Sir Isaac Newton, ubi supra, p. 269.

and

and took Jehoiakim prisoner ^m. Enriched with the spoils of the conquered nations, they divided their forces, Nebuchadnezzar pursuing his conquests in the west; and Cyaxares falling upon the Assyrian provinces of Armenia, Pontus, and Cappadocia, which he subdued, with great slaughter of the inhabitants. After this, they united their forces once more; and, by the reduction of Persis (C) and Susiana, accomplished the conquest of the Assyrian empire.

THE prophet Ezekiel ⁿ enumerates the chief nations that were subdued and slaughtered by the two conquerors Cyaxares and Nebuchadnezzar: Ashur is there, and all her company, viz. in hades, or the lower parts of the earth, where the dead bodies lay buried: his graves are about him: all of them slain, fallen by the sword, which caused their terror in the land of the living. There is Elam, and all her multitude round about her grave: all of them slain, fallen by the sword, which are gone down uncircumcised into the nether parts of the earth, which caused their terror in the land of the living: yet have they borne their shame with them that go down into the pit.---There is Meshech, Tubal, and all her multitude (viz. the Scythians); her graves are round about him: all of them uncircumcised, slain by the sword, though they caused their terror in the land of the living.---There is Edom, her kings and all her princes, which, with their might, are laid by them that were slain by the sword.---There be the princes of the north, all of them, and all the Zidonians, which, with their terror, are gone

^m 2 Kings xxiv. 12. Dan. i. 1. & 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6.

ⁿ Ezek. xxxii. 22, & seqq.

(C) While the Assyrians reigned at Nineveh, Persia was divided into several kingdoms. Amongst others, there was a kingdom of Elam, which flourished in the days of Hezekiah, Manasseh, Josiah, and Jehoiakim, kings of Judah, and fell in the reign of Zedekiah (73). This kingdom seems to have been very powerful. Isaiab, foretelling the siege of Babylon, joins Elam and Me- dia among the besiegers (74); and Jeremiah threatens the former with a terrible downfall (75); which we therefore suppose to have been accomplished by the Medes and Babylonians: which confirms what we have said before; viz. that the Persians were not subdued by Phraortes, as Herodotus would have it, but by Cyaxares, in conjunction with the Babylonians.

(73) Jerem. xxv. 25. and xlix. 34.
(75) Cb. xlix. 34, & seqq.

Ezek. xxxii. 24.

(74) Cb. xxi. 2.

down with the slain. By the princes of the north are meant such as were on the north of Judea, namely the princes of Armenia and Cappadocia, who fell in the wars which Cyaxares waged in reducing those provinces, after the destruction of Nineveh.

CYAXARES, having thus erected the kingdom of Media into a powerful empire, and shared the new acquisitions with his Babylonian ally, died in the fortieth year of his reign^o; and was succeeded by his son

ASTYAGES, who in Scripture is called Abasuerus^p. This prince had by Aryenis, the daughter of Halyattes king of Lydia, Cyaxares II. called, in Scripture, Darius the Mede, and who was sixty-two years old, when Belshazzar was slain at the taking of Babylon^q. The same year that Cyaxares was born, Astyages gave his daughter Mandane, whom he had by a former wife, to Cambyfes a Persian; from which marriage sprung Cyrus, the founder of the Persian monarchy, and the restorer of the Jews to their country, to their temple, and former condition. He was born but one year after the birth of his uncle Cyaxares, and consequently was in the sixty-first year of his age, when Babylon was taken. Whether his father Cambyfes was king of Persia, as Xenophon^r would have it, or only a nobleman of that country, as we read in Herodotus^s, is what we shall examine hereafter. Though the reign of Astyages was very long, having lasted thirty-five years^t; yet we find no particulars of it recorded in history, except his repulsing the Babylonians, who, under the conduct of Evil-merodach, the son of Nebuchadnezzar, had made an inroad into his country, as we have related in the history of Babylon. The victory, which he gained on this occasion, was, in great part, owing to the valour and conduct of Cyrus, who attended his grandfather in this expedition, and, though at that time but sixteen years of age, signa- lized himself in a very particular manner^w, pursuing the Babylonian, with great slaughter, quite home to his own borders. This rash, and seemingly unjust, undertaking of Evil-merodach laid the foundation of that animosity between the Medes and Babylonians, which ended at last in the ruin of Babylon. From hence we may infer, that Evil-merodach was not the son of Nebuchadnezzar by Amyite, the daughter of Cyaxares, or, as others will have it, of Astyages, but by some other wife; it not being likely, that they would have thus engaged in war against each other, had they been so nearly related. It is still more improbable, that Evil-merodach should undertake such hostilities while he was on the point of marrying Nitocris, as is commonly reported, who was by birth a Mede.

^o HERODOT. l. i. c. 107. ^p Dan. ix. 1. ^q Dan. v. ver. ult. ^r XENOPH. Cyropæd. l. i. ^s HERODOT. l. i. c. 107. ^t Idem, l. i. c. 130. ^w XEN. l. i. Cyropæd.

ASTYAGES, after a reign of thirty-five years, was succeeded by his son Cyaxares, uncle to Cyrus. This prince was scarce seated on his throne, when he found himself engaged in a bloody war with Neriglissar, who had murdered Evil-merodach, and usurped the crown of Babylon. This war was carried on with great slaughter on both sides by Cyaxares and Cyrus, during the reigns of the usurper Neriglissar, of his son Laborsoarchod, and of Nabonadius the son of Evil-merodach, and grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, in whose time Babylon was taken, and the Babylonian empire utterly ruined. But as this war, which lasted twenty years, was intirely managed by Cyrus, we shall defer the relating of these important events till the reign of that great and glorious prince, which, as he was the founder of the Persian monarchy, we shall reserve to the history of that empire.

As for Cyaxares, he is said, in Scripture, to have taken the kingdom, after the reduction of Babylon, and death of Belshazzar ^x; for Cyrus, as long as his uncle lived, held the empire only in partnership with him, though he had intirely acquired it by his own valour; nay, so far did he carry his complaisance, that he let him enjoy the first rank: but the command of the army, and the whole management of affairs, being vested in Cyrus, he alone was looked upon as the supreme governor of the empire; and hence it is, that, in Ptolemy's canon, no notice is taken of Cyaxares; but, immediately after the death of Nabonadius, Cyrus is placed there, as the next successor. But that a Mede reigned at Babylon, after the death of Nabonadius, or, as Herodotus calls him, Labyntus, the last Babylonian king in the canon, is plain both from Xenophon ^y and Scripture. The former tells us, that, after the taking of Babylon, Cyrus went to the king of the Medes at Ecbatan, and succeeded him in the kingdom: and we read in Scripture, that Babylon was destroyed by the Medes ^z; by the kings of the Medes, and the captains and rulers thereof, and all the land of his dominion ^a; that the

Cyaxares
II.
Year of
the flood 1788.
Bef. Chr.
560.

^x Dan. v. 31.
xiii. 17, 19.

^y XENOPH. Cyropæd. l. viii.
^a Jer. li. 11, 28.

^z Isa.

king-

kingdom of Babylon was numbered, and finished, and broken, and given to the Medes and Persians ^b; first to the Medes under Darius, and then to the Persians under Cyrus: for Darius reigned over Babylon like a conqueror, not observing the laws of the Babylonians, but introducing the immutable laws of the conquering nations the Medes and Persians ^c. In his reign, the Medes, as we have observed elsewhere, are constantly placed before the Persians ^d, as the Persians, in the reign of Cyrus and his successors, are placed before the Medes ^e; which shews, that, according to Scripture, a Mede reigned at Babylon between the last Babylonish king in Ptolemy's canon and Cyrus. This king can be no other than Cyaxares, as Xenophon calls him ^f, or Darius the Mede, as he is stiled by Daniel. The Scripture ascribes the destruction of Babylon chiefly to Cyaxares, whereof St. Hierom alleges three reasons ^g: 1. because Darius or Cyaxares was the elder of the two; 2. in regard the Medes were at that time more famous than the Persians; and, lastly, because the uncle ought to be preferred to the nephew. On the other hand, that few of the Greek writers take any notice of Cyaxares, may easily be accounted for: the Persians, desirous to magnify and extol Cyrus their countryman, gave him all the glory of that great conquest; and from them the Greeks borrowed their relations: besides, Cyrus alone was employed in the siege of Babylon, Darius being then absent; and the confederate army under his conduct stormed the town, and put an end to the empire of Babylon. We may add, that, as Darius did not reign at Babylon full two years before the fame of this great conquest was spread abroad in distant countries, Cyrus was in the intire possession of the Babylonian empire; whence they looked upon him as the great hero, who had alone performed such extraordinary feats. But Josephus, who was better informed, tells us ^h, that Darius, with his ally Cyrus, destroyed the kingdom of Babylon. The same author adds, that this Darius was the son of Astyages; and that he was known to the Greeks by another name. Now, if we ask the Greeks the name of Astyages's son, Xenophon ⁱ will tell us, that he was called Cyaxares. As for the name of Darius, it was preserved in the darics or stateres darici, those famous pieces of gold, which, for several ages, were preferred by the eastern nations to any other coin; for we are told ^k, that these were coined, not by the father of Xerxes, but by an earlier Darius, the first king of the Medes and Persians that coined gold. But no Darius, more antient than the father of Xerxes, is anywhere said to have reigned, except this Darius, whom the Scripture calls Darius the Mede.

^b Dan. v. 26, 28. ^c Dan. vi. 8, 12, 15. ^d Idem, ibid. & 28. viii. 20. ^e Esth. i. 3. 14, 18, 19. Dan. x. 1, 20.
^f XENOPH. Cyropæd. l. i. c. 19. ^g Comment. in Dan. v.
^h JOSEPH. antiq. l. xii. c. 13. ⁱ XENOPH. ubi supra.

AFTER the reduction of Babylon, Cyaxares, in concert with Cyrus, settled the affairs of their new empire, dividing it into an hundred and twenty provinces ^l, which were governed by those, who had distinguished themselves during the war. Over these governors were appointed three presidents, who were constantly to reside at court, and, receiving accounts of what happened in the several provinces, dispatch the king's orders to the immediate officers; so that these three principal ministers had the superintendency over, and the chief administration of, the most weighty affairs of the whole kingdom. Of these Daniel was appointed the chief, an honour which he highly deserved, not only on account of his great wisdom, but likewise of his age, and consummate experience; for he had now served the kings of Babylon full sixty-five years in the quality of prime minister. As this employment advanced him to be the next person to the king, it raised no small jealousy in the other courtiers, who, conspiring against him, would have compassed his ruin, had he not been miraculously preserved by that Providence, which is ever watching over the safety of the just. As the only thing they could lay hold of to disgrace him at court, and make him incur the king's displeasure, was the law of his GOD, to which they knew him inviolably attached, they prevailed with Darius to issue out a proclamation, forbidding all persons to put up any petition whatsoever to GOD or man, except to the king, for the space of thirty days, upon pain of being cast into the lions den. Now, as Daniel was saying his usual prayers, with his face turned towards Jerusalem, he was surprised, accused, and, as the laws of the Medes were unalterable, condemned to be devoured by the lions; but, being miraculously delivered from their jaws, this malicious contrivance ended in the destruction of its authors, and greatly raised, as we may well imagine, Daniel's reputation both with Darius and Cyrus ^m. This probably

^k SUIDAS sub voce Δαρείος. HARPOCRATION: Scholiast. in Aristoph. eccles. p. 741, 742. ^l Dan. vi. 1, 2.

^m Idem ibid. ver. 4, 5, 6, &c. ad finem.

probably happened, while Cyrus was in Syria; for, after having settled his affairs at Babylon, and furnished the garrisons with such troops as were necessary for the defence of the several parts of the empire, he marched, with the remainder, into Syria; which he brought under subjection, with the other adjacent countries, extending his conquests as far as the Red-Sea, and the confines of Ethiopia. In the mean time, Darius remained at Babylon, managing the civil affairs of the empire; and in this interval was Daniel cast into the lions den. The darics were, perhaps, coined, much about the same time, out of the gold of the conquered Lydians (B). But, in the reign of Cyrus, we shall give a more distinct account of several particulars relating to his two predecessors Cyaxares and Astyages. We have hitherto supposed the former to be Daniel's Darius the Mede; but, as this point is controverted by writers of no mean characters, before we dismiss the history of Media, we must beg leave to offer something in our notes in defence of this our supposition, after having acquainted the reader with the sentiments of others, and the arguments they produce to support them (C).

C H A P.

(B) This piece, according to Dr. Bernard (83), weighed two grains more than one of our guineas; but, as it had very little alloy, it may be reckoned, as the proportion of gold and silver now stands with us, to have been worth twenty-five shillings.

(C) Authors are no less divided in their opinions touching Daniel's Darius the Mede, than they are about his Belshazzar. Sir John Marsham (84), as we have hinted above, stands up for Neriglissar; and will have the Medo-Persian empire to have begun in him. He supposes Neriglissar to have been a Mede, for no other reason but because he married the sister of Evil-merodach, whose mother was a Mede. We are unwilling to quarrel with him on account of this supposition, or rather conjecture; but should be glad to know how, even according to this supposition, the kingdom of Babylon was, upon the death of Belshazzar, that is, according to him, of Evil-merodach, divided, and given to the Medes and Persians? Is it not equally certain, that Belshazzar was killed, as that his kingdom was given to the Medes and Persians; and that this happened immediately upon the death of that king, as the words of the prophet plainly insinuate? Thy kingdom is di-

(83) De ponder. & mensur. antiq. p. 171.(84) Can. chron. secul. 18.

wided, and given to the Medes and Persians. — In that night was Belshazzar the king of the Chaldeans slain. And Darius the Median took the kingdom (85). Besides, it is very plain, from the whole sixth chapter of Daniel, that Darius the Mede was king of Media. He introduced the laws of the Medes and Persians; which would have been very impolitic in him, had he usurped the crown without any friends or troops to rely on, except the Babylonians, whose laws he trod under foot, and annulled. And this, if we suppose him to be Neriglissar, was his case; for he introduced the laws of the Medes and Persians, was at war with both nations, and had no friends to depend upon, except his own subjects, who naturally must have hated him, without any further provocation, as a stranger, as an usurper, and as the murderer of their lawful prince. To all this we may add, that if the Medo-Persian empire began in Neriglissar, Cyrus did not destroy the Babylonian, but the Medo-Persian empire; which no author ever asserted. But the strongest proof, in our opinion, that can be produced against this system, and that also of Scaliger, who takes Nabonadius to be Darius the Mede, is, that Darius is said to have divided his empire into 120 provinces (86); which must be understood, not of the Babylonian, which was never so extensive, but of the Persian empire. The latter, on the conquest of Egypt by Cambyfes, and of Thrace and India by Darius Hystaspes, had seven other provinces added to its former number: whence, in the time of Esther, it consisted of 127 provinces. If this was the division of the Persian empire in her time, the former must necessarily have been that of the same empire; for, if the Persian empire, from India to Ethiopia, contained but 127 provinces, the empire of Babylon alone, which was hardly the seventh part of the other, could not contain 120. It is not, therefore, to be doubted, but Darius the Mede was lord, not of the Babylonian only, but of the Persian empire; which cannot be said either of Neriglissar or Nabonadius.

Scaliger (87) maintains Nabonadius to be Daniel's Darius, adding, that he was by nation a Mede, and no way related to Nebuchadnezzar, but freely elected king by the same Babylonian lords who put Labosoarchod to death. That he was freely elected, he endeavours to prove from the words of the prophet Daniel, saying that he took the kingdom; which imply a free election, and not a forcible invasion. That he was a Mede, he pretends to evince from a prophecy which Megasthenes (88) relates Nebuchadnezzar to have uttered before his death, foretelling to the Babylonians, that a great calamity was to fall on them, which neither Belus, nor queen Beltis could avert; that a Persian mule should bring the Ba-(85) Dan. v. 28. 30, 31.

temp. l. vi.

(86) Dan. vi. 1.

(87) Scal. de emend.

(88) Apud Euseb. præp. evang. l. ix.

Babylonians under subjection, being assisted by a Mede. The Persian mule is Cyrus, he being the issue of a Persian and a Mede; the Mede, who assisted him, was Nabonadius. If we ask Scaliger, how Nabonadius can be said to have assisted Cyrus in destroying the city and kingdom of Babylon, since he waged war with him in defence of both, and was vanquished and killed? his answer is, that Nabonadius forwarded the destruction of Babylon by being conquered and slain; and that, in this sense (if in this there be any sense), he concurred with Cyrus in the overturning of the Babylonian empire. This argument needs no answer; it is sufficiently refuted by being related: and therefore Isaac Vossius well observes (89), that the arguments produced by Scaliger to support this wild opinion are unworthy of Scaliger. As to his other proof, viz. that Darius took the kingdom; they imply, we own, no violence, on the part of Darius, who cannot properly be said to have stormed the town, or won it by dint of arms; seeing this was performed by Cyrus, in the absence of Darius, though with the joint forces of the Medes and Persians. This city being thus reduced by the troops of Darius, and by Cyrus his general, Darius, without any further opposition, took possession of the empire, as conquered by his forces. It is not by any means probable, that the Babylonian lords, after murdering their king, should place a Mede on the throne, while they were at open war with that nation: nor can the division of the kingdom of Babylon between the Medes and Persians, foretold by Daniel, be meant of a king, who, though by nation a Mede, should be elected by the Babylonians, and peaceably enjoy the kingdom till driven out by the Persians. This division must have been made after the empire was destroyed, and the city taken. To conclude: This system contradicts not only the prophecy of Daniel, touching the division of the empire between the Babylonians and Medes, but that likewise of Jeremiah, where it is said, that all nations shall serve him (Nebuchadnezzar) and his son, and his son's son. If Nabonadius was Darius, who of all the kings of Babylon was Nebuchadnezzar's son's son? Since Scaliger could not answer this question, it was well done of him to take no notice of it, in displaying and solving, in the best manner he could, several difficulties that others might have started against his assertion. He commonly adopts the sentiments of Berosus; but here he even forsakes him; for Berosus tells us (90), that Nabonadius was a Babylonian. 'Tis true, he seems afterwards concerned for having thus slighted the authority of such an unerring guide, and is inclined to make him a Babylonian. But how can this be reconciled with Scripture, where he is ever stiled Darius the Median? He has a salve for this fore too: the word Median, or Mede, is not, says he, the national name, as the whole tribe of chronologers and interpreters, simple well-meaning men, have imagined, but the surname of Darius. But it is very unlucky, that Daniel should begin his ninth chapter thus: In the first year of Darius the son of Ahasuerus, of the seed of the Medes, which was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans. He was therefore by nation a Mede, and the son of a king of Media. But our writer seems to have been more conversant in the mangled fragments of Berosus, than in the books of the prophets, from which there is no appeal: and may, on that very account, richly deserve the compliments which he ironically bestows on such as are unwilling to adopt his wild notions. But we will not press this further: contradiction, and an over-bearing positiveness, were, as is well known, the essential ingredients of his character: and had he not in most things been singular, in all peremptory, he had neither been a Scaliger, nor the son of Julius.

(89) Isaac Voss. chronol. sacr. p. 144. tit. l. x. c. 11.

(90) Beros. apud Joseph. antiq. l. x. c. 11.

The difficulties we have objected against the two foregoing opinions, have made other writers look for Darius the Mede elsewhere: they suppose, that there was one Da- rius a Mede king of Persia before Cambyfes the father of Cyrus, who was also, according to Xenophon, king of Persia. This conjecture is supported by a passage out of Æschylus (91), where that poet seemingly supposes the first king of Persia there mentioned, to have been a Mede, who with a powerful army took Susa: next to him, he places his son, whom he does not name; and, in the third place, Cyrus, whom he calls an happy prince. This Darius, who took Susa, and waged war with the Babylonians, they will have to be Darius the Mede, son of Ahasuerus. This opinion is liable to one strong objection, namely, that Darius, the grandfather of Cyrus, could not be alive when Babylon was taken, Cyrus himself being then, as is agreed on all hands, and we shall shew in the history of Persia, sixty-one years old.

Other writers, following Xenophon's account, maintain Cyaxares the son of Astyages, and uncle of Cyrus, to be Darius the Mede. He succeeded Astyages in the kingdom of Media, as Cyrus did Cambyfes in that of Persia. These two kings, with joint forces, invaded the kingdom of Babylon, and took the city: Cyaxares reigned two years at Babylon; and, at his death, Cyrus became master of the whole empire. This hypothesis is intirely agreeable to Scripture, and free from those unfurmoutable difficulties which attend the others, as is allowed

(91) Æsch. Persæ, v. 762.

even by those who reject it. Their only exception to this system is, that neither Herodotus, Berosus, nor Megasthenes, knew of any such king as Darius or Cyaxares II. nay, Herodotus tells us, in express words, that Astyages was succeeded by his grandson Cyrus. This immediate succession of Cyrus to his grandfather is vouched by Diodorus, Justin, Strabo, Polyænus, Africanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Justin Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, Hierom, Austin, &c. But these, as they have only copied after Herodotus, add no weight to the scale. The above-mentioned writers, we own, give Astyages no other successor than Cyrus; but Xenophon (92) does, and likewise Josephus (93), forsaking herein Berosus, whom he often quotes, and ever follows, where his authority does not clash with Scripture. Xenophon calls the successor of Astyages Cyaxares, and Josephus gives him the name of Darius; adding, that he overturned the kingdom of Babylon, being, in that enterprise, assisted by his nephew Cyrus (94): which is consonant both to Scripture and chronology; whereas the contrary opinion, though perhaps not repugnant to holy writ, cannot by any means be reconciled with chronology: for, if we suppose that Astyages had no other successor but Cyrus, we must allow him to have lived one hundred years, and upwards; for he gave his daughter in marriage to Nebuchadnezzar, as the sticklers for Herodotus tells us, before the siege of Nineweb; that is, seventy-three years before the reduction of Babylon. He must have been, at that time, at least thirty years old, and two years more he reigned at Babylon. Could we but prevail upon ourselves to believe, that Astyages lived to so great an age, we should willingly follow Herodotus, having a great respect for that venerable, and by some much injured historian. His system is no ways repugnant to scripture, where nothing is said of Darius the Mede, which may not be as well applied to Astyages himself as to his son.

A modern writer (95), so prepossessed in favour of Herodotus, as not to call in question any thing that author asserts, endeavours to support his system with a passage from the Apocryphal of Daniel, xiii. 65. where it is said, And king Astyages was gathered to his fathers, and Cyrus of Persia received the kingdom. His quotation is right, according to the vulgate, which is the standard in the church of Rome; but in our Bibles these words are to be found in the Apocryphal history of Bel and the Dragon, ver. 1. we shall not therefore take the pains of confuting our author, but close this note with an ob-

(92) Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. i. c. 19.(94) Joseph ubi supra.
tom. i. p. 322.(93) Joseph. antiq. l. x. c. 13.(95) See Lenglet. methode pour etudier l'hist.

ervation of greater moment and profit; which is, that this great event, this total end, and final destruction, of the Babylonish monarchy was literally and circumstantially fulfilled, according to the prophecies, that had gone long before; as the reader may see, by comparing the one with the other, in the following instances, among many more: It was foretold, 1st, That proud city was to be besieged by the Medes (96), in conjunction with other nations (97); that the passes and fords should be seized, the mighty men cast into the greatest dread and confusion (98); that the rivers should be dried up (99); that the city should be surprised in the midst of their mirth and jollity, and her princes and captains in the height of their carousing, and be cast from their drunkenness into an eternal sleep (100): and, lastly, That that once so potent and glorious city should certainly become utterly waste, and an habitation for owls, bitterns, and other such ominous birds (101): All which was exactly verified, as we have seen. Thus much we have thought necessary to say on a subject, which has occasioned endless disputes among the learned; and hope that the reader will not think we have trespassed on his patience, when he reflects, that we have brought, within the compass of one note, what has supplied matter for whole volumes.

(96) Isa. xiii. 17. xxi. 1—10. (97) Jerem. li. 11, 27, & seqq.
 (98) Ibid. 30, & seq. (99) Ibid. l. 38. li. i. 9. 21. 35, & seqq.
 (100) Idem ibid. 39. & seqq. 57, & seqq. (101) Isa. xiii. xiv. xxiii. pass.
 & alibi. Jerem. l. 29.

C H A P. XI.

The History of Persia.

S E C T. I.

The description of Persia.

THIS country, like many others, has, in different Its several ages, been called by different names; and though, names. to some, the settling of these may seem a dry and useless task, yet, inasmuch as the subsequent history will be much enlightened thereby, we shall give the reader as distinct and accurate an account of them as we can. The most antient name of Persia is that by which it is called by Moses ^a, viz. Elam, or, as some write it,

^a Gen. x. 22. xiv. 1. Jerem. xxv. 25. JOSEPH. antiq. l. i. c. 7.

Ælam, from Elam the son of Shem, the father of its first inhabitants. Herodotus ^b calls its inhabitants Cephenes; and, in very antient times, the people ^c of this country called themselves Artæi, and the region wherein they dwelt Artæa. In the books of Daniel ^d, Esdra ^e, &c. we find it called Paras, agreeable to the Persian denomination of Pars, or Phârs, by which the proper Persia is called at this time. It has been also called Achæmenia ^f and Arfaca, from its antient kings. In ^g oriental writers it is called Agjem, Irân, and Shahistân, which last signifies the dominions of the Shâh. It is true, that, strictly speaking, Achæmenia and Irân are not general names of Persia, but rather of parts thereof; yet as they are frequently used in authors to signify that country which we call Persia, they may well enough be comprehended in this list of names (A).

THE

^b L. vii. c. 61. ^c HYDE relig. vet. Perfar. p. 413.
^d Ch. vi. 28. ^e 1 Esdr. vii. 4. ^f HORAT. lib. iii.
 od. i. c. 44. OVID. de arte, lib. i. ver. 226. ^g HYDE, ubi supra. CHARDIN'S travels, tom. iii. p. 2, 3.

(A) The best commentators agree, that the Elamites, who were the ancestors of the Persians, were descended from Elam the son of Shem; and thus much has been asserted, and proved, as far as the nature of the thing would admit, in a foregoing volume (1). It is likewise allowed, that the most antient among the inspired writers constantly intend Persia, when they speak of Elam, and the kingdom of Elam. Thus, not to detain the reader with unnecessary quotations, when the prophet Jeremiab, after denouncing many judgments against this country, adds these words, But it shall come to pass, in the latter days, that I will bring again the captivity of Elam, saith THE LORD (2); he is always understood to mean the restoration of the kingdom of the Persians by Cyrus, who subdued the Babylonians, as these had before subdued the Persians, and made them subject to their empire (3). As to the word פָּרַס Paras, authors are not very well agreed as to its etymology, or signification: some are for deriving it from the Arabic word Phâris, which signifies a horse. Some Persian historians say, that Phars is a proper name; and that the person so called was the son of Arsham; i. e. Arphaxad the son of Shem: others make this Phars the son of Japhet, &c. Some again, who seem to be

(1) Vol. i. p. 267.
 Lxxviii on Jerem. xlix. 39.

(2) Ch. xlix. 39.

(3) Poli synop. critic.

THE extent of Persia has been, in different ages, as Extent. various as its names. Ptolemy ^h bounds it thus; on the north it hath Media; on the east Carmania: On the west Susiana; on the south the Persian gulf: but this relates to Persia as a province. We consider it in another light; and therefore, to speak as clearly and distinctly as we may, let us first assign the boundaries of the Persian empire, as they stood antiently, when it extended farthest; let us next settle the boundaries of the modern Persian empire; and, thirdly, let us review the several provinces mentioned nearest the truth, say that he was the son of Elam the son of Sbem (4). It is evident, however, that the Greek word Persis, and the Latin word Persia, are derived from this oriental denomination, and not from this country's being conquered by Perseus. The name Artæi is thought to be derived from the Persian word Ard, or Art, which signifies strong, brave, magnanimous; intimating, that the people of this country were such in their dispositions (5). Achæmenia, as Stephanus Byzantius (6) informs us, was only a part of Persia: Strabo says nearly the same thing; yet sometimes it is used to signify Persia in general, as particularly by Herodotus (8), who makes Cambyses, in an oration, call his people Achæmenidæ. In the Armenian language, Persia, as I have said, is stiled Shahistân; i. e. the country of the Shâh (9). The Arabians gave the name of Agemessaan to Persia, because, in their language, Agem signifies stranger, or rather barbarian; which, with great modesty, they impose on every other nation but their own: hence the distinction of Arak-Arab, and Arak-Agem, which signifies as much as the towns of the Arabs, and the towns of the Barbarians. The Persians themselves call their country generally Iroun, and Iran; for this reason they say, that under the reign of king Efrasiab, their empire contained all the countries between the Caspian sea and China. This monarch divided his mighty empire into two parts, calling that on the other side of the river Oxus, Touran; and this Iran; i. e. on the other side of the river, and on this side of the river: whence, in the antient Persian histories, Key Iran, and Key Touran, signified the king of Persia, and the king of Tartary. At this day, the Persian monarch is stiled Padcha Iran, and the grand visier of Persia, Iran Medary; i. e. the pole of Persia (10).

^h Geogr. lib. vi. c. 4.

(4) Hyde rel. vet. Pers. c. 35. p. 418. (5) Ibid. p. 413. (6) Apud Hyde ubi supra. (7) Lib. xv. p. 500. (8) L. iii. c. 65.
(9) Hyde, p. 413. (10) Chardin voy. vol. iii. p. 3.

by antient writers, and, as we go on, take some account of the condition they are now in.

Boundaries.

As to the antient ⁱ empire of the Persians, it reached in length from the Hellefpont to the mouth of the river Indus, about two thousand eight hundred English miles; in breadth from Pontus to the mouth of the Arabian gulf, about two thousand miles.

THE ^k modern Persia, that is, the dominions of the Persian crown, extended in length from the mouth of the river Araxes, to the mouth of the river Indus, about one thousand eight hundred and forty of our miles; and in breadth, from the river Oxus to the Persian gulf, about one thousand and eighty of our miles: bounded thus; on the north, by the Caspian sea, the river Oxus, and mount Caucasus; on the east, by the river Indus, and the dominions of the great mogul, as he is commonly called; on the south, by the Persian gulf, and the Indian ocean; and on the west, by the dominions of the grand signior (B).

IN

ⁱ CLUVER. geogr. l. v. c. 13.

^k Idem, ubi supra.

(B) The ingenious Sir John Chardin tells us, That "Persia is the greatest empire in the world, if we consider it according to the geographical descriptions of the Persians; for they represent its antient boundaries to have been the four following great seas; viz. the Black sea, the Red sea, the Caspian-sea, and the Persian gulf; and also these six rivers almost as well known as seas, Euphrates, Araxis, Tigris, Phasus, Oxus, and Indus. It is, indeed, impossible to mark precisely the limits of this vast kingdom; for it is not with it as with the dominions of some petty sovereigns, where a rivulet or pillar marks the frontier: Persia has, on every side, a space of three or four days journey, utterly uninhabited, though the soil is in some places the best in the world. The Persians look on it as a mark of true grandeur, the leaving such deserts between great empires: It hinders, say they, all disputes about limits; and they serve, like walls, to separate one kingdom from another. The seas and rivers before-mentioned are far from being the boundaries of Persia at this day: yet the latest Persian writers describe always their empire within these limits; for they insist, that of right all the countries between them belong to them; and that they want only such another brave king as Abbas the Great, to restore them to

“ the

IN our account of the provinces, into which the country Gedrosia. we are speaking of was antiently divided, we shall begin with Gedrosia, mentioned by Pliny, Strabo, and other writers¹. It is bounded on the west by Carmania; on the north by Drangiana and Arachosia; on the east by Guzarata, a province of India; on the south by the Indian ocean. It is called at present Makran. Of old it was inhabited by the Arbitæ, Parsiræ, Musarnæi, and the Rhamnæ. Its principal cities were Pasis, Arbis, and Cuni. Ptolemy places here a celebrated emporium, called the haven of women. The principal modern cities are Firhk^m, Chalak, and the port of Guadal (C).

CAR-

¹ See note (C). ^m Voyages de TAVERNIER, l. iv. c. 8.

“ the possession of their antient territory. Persia, in the state I saw it, taking it from Georgia; i. e. from the 45th deg. of latitude to the 80th; and from the river Indus to the mountains of Ararat; that is, from the 77th to the 112th deg. of longitude; contains in length about 550 Persian leagues, which makes 750 French leagues, and in breadth about 400 (11)”. We have chosen to make use of the testimony of this traveller, preferable to others, because he seems to have taken great pains in the description which he has given us of this country; and since it must be allowed, that his long stay therein, his great parts, and general knowlege, qualified him perfectly for such a work, if we cannot credit him, it is hard to know on whom we may rely.

(C) As it would have swelled this chapter to an excessive

bulk, if we had, in the text, been very particular as to the respective provinces of Persia, so, to avoid obscurity on the other hand, we have thought it necessary to add such a description of each province, in these notes, as may suffice to give the reader a competent idea of its situation, extent, and productions. This being premised, let us proceed in the order observed in the text.

Tho' Gedrosia be constantly so called by Strabo and Ptolemy, yet (12) Diodorus Siculus, (13) Suidas, and some manuscripts of (14) Ammianus Marcellinus, read Cedrosia. The extent of this province cannot easily be assigned, because, though in general terms, its boundaries be pretty well settled, yet how to fix these at this distance of time, is a question not readily resolved. Mount Becius, or rather a ridge of mountains, runs through the middle of this province; and

(11) Chardin voy. tom. iii. p. 2. verb. Καδρωσία.

(12) Lib. xviii. c. 6.

(13) In

(14) In edit. Valesii, p. 369.

Carmania

CARMANIA is divided into Carmania the Desert, and Carmania Proper. Carmania the Desert is bounded on the north by Parthia; on the west by Persis; on the east by Drangiana; on the south by Carmania Proper. Carmania Proper hath on the south the Indian ocean; on the west Persis, and the gulf of Persia; on the east Gedrosia; and on the north Carmania the Desert. It contains the modern provinces of Chirman and Ormas. It was inhabited by the Isaticæ, Zuthi, Gadanopydres, Camelobosci, Agdonites, Rhudianæ, Ares, Charadææ, Pasargadææ, and Armozæi. Its antient cities were Carmanæ, now Khirman, still a considerable place, and famous for the excellent scymitars made there; Alexandria, built by Alexander the Great; Armuzæ or Armuzum, on the shore of the gulf, giving name to a promontory, and to the island of Ormuz. The modern places of note besides, are Khirman, Bermazir, Kubestek, and Iasquez, which gives name to a cape or promontory shooting into the Persian gulf (D).

DRAN-

ⁿ PTOL. l. vi, c. 6. ^o Lib. vi. c. 8. P TAVERN, VOY. l. iv. c. 1.

from them springs the celebrated river Arbis, or Arabis, which, after a short course, runs into the Indian ocean. At the mouth of this river stood the Γυναικῶν λιμὴν, or port of women, of Ptolemy (15), mentioned also by Arrian, in his Indian history, who tells us, that this place was so called, because it was first governed by a woman (16). The soil of this province was sandy and barren, very deficient in water, and the air intemperately hot; so that Alexander's army suffered excessively here, notwithstanding they built their huts with aromatic wood, and met with spices in profusion (17). Ptolemy mentions two islands dependent on this province, Astea and Codane (18). Arrian, speaking of the voyage of Nearchus, tells us he observed several others (19).

(D) Though other authors speak of Carmania in general, yet Ptolemy makes not only the difference before noted in the text, but interposes the description of Arabia Felix between Carmania Deserta, and Carmania the Proper. As to the first, it is very truly what Ptolemy calls it, having scarce a town or a village in it, its soil being an unhospitable sand, its air hot and unhealthy; and the whole province, in a manner, destitute of water (21). Carmania Proper is a better country, having in it several rivers, particularly the Anda-

(15) Lib. vi. c. 21. (16) Cb. 22. (17) Strabo, l. xv. p. 495.
(18) Ubi supra. (19) Hist. Indic. p. 366. (21) Lib. vi. c. 8.

DRANGIANA ⁹, bounded on the south by Gedrosia; on Drangian the east by Arachosia; on the north by Aria; on the west ana.

⁹ PTOL. I. vi. c. 19.

nis mentioned by Pliny (22) and Ptolemy (23). It is mountainous, though with this advantage, that these mountains have mines of copper and iron. The people anciently, however, lived in no very desirable condition, if the description given us by Pomponius Mela be true: The "Carmanians, said he, have "neither fruits nor raiment, "nor house nor cattle, but "cover themselves with skins "of fish; and feeding on them "for the most part, the bodies, as well as heads of "these people, are covered "with hair (24)." It may be, Pomponius Mela confounds the Carmanians with a nation inhabiting the sea-coast, and called, from their manner of living, Ichthyophagi, mentioned both by Strabo (25) and Arrian (26); and who are said not only to have fed on fish, but to have erected huts with their bones. Ammianus Marcellinus (27) gives Carmania a better character. At this day this province is particularly remarkable for producing sheep which bear the finest wool in the world; they have this peculiar property, that, having fed upon new grass from January to May, their fleece falls off of itself, and leaves the sheep quite naked; the wool being gathered, and beaten, the coarse breaks, and the fine only remains. The Gauris have the whole manufacture of this wool in their hands, which consists in girdles much esteemed through the east, and in a sort of serges which are as soft, and almost as fine, as silk (28). Dependent on this province is the little, but famous, island of Ormuz, in compass about 20 miles, stony, and full of rocks, barren, and destitute of all necessaries, except salt, of which there is such plenty, and so hard, that it is said houses are built thereof. The soil is composed of a white sand, formerly imported into Europe. Water (except such as after rains was preserved in cisterns) it had none: so that, even in its most flourishing times, when it was the emporium of this part of the world, its inhabitants had not only their victuals, but the very water they used, from the continent. The air in summer was so excessively sultry, that people were forced to live in grotts, and to lie in water (29). At present there is nothing on it but a fort: but of its antient kingdom, and of the several revolutions which happened therein, we shall treat in its proper place.

(22) Lib. vi. c. 23. (23) Ubi supra. (24) De situ orbis, l. iii. c. 8.
 (25) Lib. xv. p. 495. (26) Hist. Ind. c. 26. (27) Lib. xxiii. (28) Tavernier in Harris's collection, vol. ii. p. 307. (29) Mandelsjö's travels in Harris's collection, vol. ii. p. 118. Tavern. in the same vol. p. 347.

by Carmania the Desert; derived its name, as some say, from the river Drangius, and is called, by the modern Persians, Sigistan. It was antiently peopled by the Darandæ and the Batrii. Ptolemy reckons ten considerable cities in this province, the most famous of which were Arispe and Prophthasia. Those now of any note are Sistan, supposed, by some, to be the antient city last-mentioned, Chatak, and Kets. Some writers ^s speak of a certain valley in this province, called Mulebat, improved, by a prince named Aladin, into a paradise, though for very bad purposes (E).

^r TAVERN. voy. ubi supra.

^s See note (E).

(E) Strabo (30), Ptolemy (31), and Pliny (32), agree in calling this province Drangiana: Diodorus calls it Drangina, and its inhabitants Drangi (33). A ridge of mountains, the principal of which is called Bagous, runs through this country; and from thence some have fancied, that there ran a river called Drangius, from whence this country took its name; but of this there is no certainty. The province is not large, and every-where hilly, far from abounding with any rich commodities; and therefore never very famous, either in antient or modern times. At present, it is only so from its being reported to have been the birth-place of Rustan the celebrated hero of oriental romances. As to the valley of Mulebat, or paradise of sultan Aladin, mentioned above, its history runs thus: A petty prince, of this name, caused this valley to be adorned in the most elegant manner he could contrive, furnishing it especially with airy pavilions, fine women, rich sherbet, and delicate provisions: he then shut up its entrance with a strong fort; and, whenever he had any dangerous exploit to perform (for it seems he was but a kind of a free-booter), he chose out some strong able young man; and, having first got him to drink to such a degree as to lose his senses, he caused him, while in that condition, to be removed into this paradise of his, where having suffered him to remain for two or three days, he then directed him to be lulled asleep in the same manner, and so sent home to his own house: then, under promise of sending him for ever to dwell in that paradise, the joys of which he had tasted, Aladin quickly drew the deluded wretch to perpetrate the most barbarous and bloody fact that could be thought of (34).

(30) Lib. xv. p. 497.

(31) Lib. vi. c. 19.

(32) Lib. vi. c. 23.

(33) Lib. xvii.

(34) Paul Venet. apud Purchas's pilgrimage, b. iv. c. 6.

p. 317.

ARACHOSIA is bounded on the west by Drangiana; on Arachosia the north by Paropamisus; on the east by the river Indus; on the south by Gedrosia. Its modern name is not well settled. It was inhabited of old by the Arimaspi, who were afterwards called Margyætæ, and then Euergetæ, the Sydri, Raplutæ, and Eortæ. Ptolemy reckons up thirteen cities in this province. We shall content ourselves with mentioning only three; Arachotus, built, on a lake of the same name, by the famous Semiramis, who is said to have given it the name of Cophes; Alexandria, built by Alexander the Great, and by some thought to be the same with the city now called Cabul^t; and Arbaca, supposed to have derived its name from some of the kings of Parthia named Arbaces. As to modern towns of note, we know of none (F).

PARO-

^t See note (F).

(F) It is on the authority of Monf. Tavernier, that we have told our readers there are now no towns of note in this province (35); by which we mean, none that are exactly known to stand within the limits of the antient Arachosia: however, since some writers are positive, that the antient city of Arachotus, or rather Arachotas (for it is a Greek appellation), was seated where now stands the city of Cabul (36), we will take this opportunity of inserting a description of that city, and the parts adjacent; which may, perhaps, prove as useful, and must of necessity be more entertaining to our readers, than a dry recital of the conjectures of geographers, relating to this province: “Caboul is a large city, “ the metropolis of the province of Caboulistan, or Caboul. It hath two castles “ well fortified; and because “ several kings have held their “ courts there, and many “ princes successively have had “ it for their portion, there “ are a great many palaces in “ it. It lies in 33 degrees of “ north latitude. The mountains about it produce plenty “ of mirobalans, which from “ thence the eastern people “ call cabuly, several sorts of “ drugs, and some spices, “ which, with the iron-mines “ in them, yield a great profit “ to the inhabitants. In this “ town they maintain a great “ trade with Tartary, the country of the Usbecks, and the “ Indies. The Usbecks alone “ sell yearly, in this town, “ above sixty thousand horses; “ and the Persians bring hither “ great numbers of sheep, and “ other cattle; by which means “ they are much enriched. “ Wine is to be had, and pro-

(35) Lib. iv. c. 1. p. 412.(36) Heylin's cosmography, b. iii. p. 146.

“ visions

Paropamisus.

PAROPAMISUS, bounded on the west by Aria; on the north by Bactria; on the east by the dominions of the Mogul; on the south by Arachosia; is called, by the moderns, Sablestan ^u, including likewise the kingdom of Candahar. Its antient inhabitants were the Bolitaë, Aristophili, Ambantæ, Parietæ, and Parfii. Its chief cities Ortospanum and Naulibis. Modern cities there are many of great note, such as Becksabat, Asbe, Bust ^w, strengthened with one of the finest castles in Persia, and adorned with various beautiful karavanferas (G).

BA-

^u TAVERN. voy. ubi supra.
1. iii. p. 394.

^w TAVERN. voy. tom. i.

“visions are cheap, tho’ the “country about it is but cold “and barren, unless in some “places, which are sheltered “by the mountains, being “rendered little the more “fruitful by the two rivers “that water it, and have their “source in the mountains.
“From this province especial“ly, come the large canes, of “which they make halberts “and lances; and they have “many grounds planted with “them. The inhabitants of “the city and province are “most of them heathens; and “therefore, in all towns and “villages, are many pagods.
“They reckon the months by “moons; and, with great de“votion, celebrate the feast “called Houly, which lasts two “days, at the full moon in “February; at this feast they “are all cloathed in a dark “red; and after they have “prayed in the temple, and “made their oblations, they “spend the rest of the time in “dancing by companies, in “the streets, to the sound “of trumpets, visiting their “friends, and eating toge“ther, every tribe by itself.

“The great mogul’s revenue “from this country is four or “five millions yearly (37).” Yet, after all, it is far from being certain, whether Cabul has any thing to do with the antient province of Arachosia, since Caboulistan lies beyond Candahar, and is generally re-ckoned part of the mogul’s dominions.

(G) The name of this province is differently written, generally Paropamisus, sometimes Parapamisus; and again Paro-pamisus (38), deriving this denomination from the mountain Paropamisus, which is a part of Taurus, but was falsely filed Caucasus, to flatter Alexander the Great, that it might be said of him that he had passed that famous ridge of mountains. A strange vanity! and scarce to be credited, if it were not supported by the authority of writers of the highest cre-

(37) Tavern. in Harris’s collection, vol. ii. p. 355.
geogr. antiq. vol. ii. c. 23. p. 719.

(38) Cellar.

dit

BACTRIANA * or Bactria, now called Chorassan, anti-Bactriana, entirely inhabited by the Salataræ, Zariaspæ, Chômatri, Comi, Acinacæ, Tambyzi, Thocaræ, a powerful people, and several other nations of less note. It was, in the first ages of the world, a kingdom, and a very famous one too. In later times, it boasted a thousand cities; the chief of these were Bactra and Ebusmi, both royal cities, as Ptolemy tells us, Maracunda, and Charracharta. Its modern cities of note are also numerous; but we shall not mention them here, because we shall have occasion hereafter to consider this country more particularly.

MARGIANA is bounded on the west by Hyrkania; on Margiana the north by Tartary; on the south by Aria; and on the east by Bactria, now called Estarabad. It is divided from Tartary by the river Oxus, called, by the modern Persians †, Ruth-kbant-kurkan; and was inhabited antiently by the Derbicæ, the Massagetæ, who came hither from Scythia, the Parni, the Daæ, and the Tapurni. Among its cities of note ‡ we may reckon Alexandria, one of the six cities of that name in Persia, afterwards called Antiochia, and, after that, Seleucia; Nigæa, or rather Nysæa, mentioned by Ptolemy. As to modern places of note, Estarabad, Amul, and Damkau, deserve chiefly to be mentioned (H).

HYR-

* PTOL. I. vi. c. II.

† TAVERN. VOY. I. iv. c. I.

‡ CLUV. ubi supra.

dit (39). The soil of this country, in general, is not over fruitful, the province being full of hills, which, however, by overshadowing the valleys, render them cool and pleasant. We have observed above, that the kingdom of Candabar is included within the antient province of Paropamisus. This little realm hath for its capital a city of the same name, which is looked upon to be the best fortified place in all this part of Asia. As the caravans pass constantly through it, in going to or coming from In- dia, it is consequently a place rich, and full of trade. Tavernier has given us an ample description of it, at the end of the fifth book of his travels. As to the history of its princes, and of the various fortunes it has sustained, we shall give the reader a distinct view of them, when we have deduced the Persian history as low as to the erecting of this little kingdom.

(H) Many antient authors agree in commending the situation of this province, begirt, as it is, with high mountains,

(39) Strabo, lib. xi. p. 348, Arrian, expedit. Alex. lib. v. c. 3.

watered

Hyrcania

HYRCANIA ^a is bounded on the north by the Caspian sea, called sometimes Mare Hyrcanum, from its washing the shore of this province; on the west by Media; on the south by Parthia; and on the east by Margiana, called now Mazandran, and including likewise the province of Kylan. The old inhabitants of this country were the Maxeræ, Astabeni, and Chrindi. Its antient capital was called Hyrcania, as well as the province; nor has it, at this distance of time, much changed its name, since it is still named Hyrcana. Sambrace was likewise a considerable and very strong place, at the time when Arfaces began to lay the foundation of his empire. Modern places of note are Ferb-abad ^b, a port seated on a navigable arm of the Caspian sea, a fine city, much frequented by Russian merchants, as being not above a fortnight's sail from Astracan: Giru, Talarapeset, Ciarman, and Escref, are also places of note in this country (I).

ARIA,

^a PTOL. l. vi. c. 9.

travels in HARRIS'S collect. vol. i. p. 434.

^b SIR THOMAS HERBERT'S

watered with pleasant rivers; amongst the rest with the noble river Oxus, so famous in Greek and Latin authors. It is likewise celebrated for its fertility in vines of such an extraordinary size, that two men can scarce fathom the trunk of one of them, bearing clusters, some of which are two cubits long. Antiochus Soter was so much pleased with the beauty of this country, that he not only built a magnificent city therein, but even inclosed the whole plain, watered by the rivers Arias and Margue, with a wall 1500 stadia in circuit (40). Estarabad, its present capital, is chiefly remarkable for the fine druggets, and other excellent woolen goods manufactured there (41).

(I) Antient writers agree, in representing Hyrcania as a country fruitful in wine, wheat, figs, and all other kind of fruits; here-and-there, however, interspersed with meadows and pasture-lands; and, in some places, with the less pleasant prospect of thick woods, abounding with wild beasts of almost every kind, even to a proverb. As to its present condition, nothing can be more amazing than the wide difference there is between the accounts given us by persons of credit and capacity; and who have had equal opportunities of acquiring a perfect knowlege of the things of which they discourse. The reader will the better judge of this, if he takes the trouble of comparing the following passage, extracted from the travels of the duke of Holstein's ambassadors, with what we shall

(40) Strabo, lib. xi. p. 355. & Plin. l. vi. c. 16. (41) Tavern. vol. i. p. 397.

ARIA ^c, bounded on the north by Margiana and Ba- Aria. Aria; on the west by Parthia and Carmania the Desert; on the south by Drangiana; on the east by Paropamisus, now comprehended under the province of Chorasán. It was antiently inhabited by the Nisæi, Astaveni, Musdorani, Cassiotæ, Obares, Elymandri, and the Borgi. Its principal cities of old were Aria, seated on the river Arias, mentioned by Pliny, thought to be the same city, which is still famous under the name of Heri or Herat, rebuilt, and splendidly adorned, by the sultan Heussen-Mirza; Alexandria, built by Alexander, who settled a colony of Macedonians therein; Artacanda, by Strabo ^d called Artacana, and Bitaxa (K).

PAR-

^c Ptol. lib. vi. c. 17.^d Geogr. lib. xi. p. 350.

shall hereafter give him from Sir John Chardin, in speaking of the air of Persia: "It must be confessed by all those who have travelled in these parts, that the province of Kilan is a terrestrial paradise, abounding in silk, oil, wine, rice, tobacco, lemons, oranges, pomgranates, and all sorts of other fruits. The vines (which spread themselves with their branches up the trees), being very excellent here, are as big in compass as a man in the waist. The Caspian sea, as well as the rivers belonging to this province, afford to the inhabitants prodigious quantities of fish, as their pasture-grounds furnish them with great store of cattle, and their forests with venison and wild-fowl; which makes me admire how John de Laet, who follows the footsteps of Johannes de Persia, could assert with so much confidence, that Mes- sanderan (part of the province of Kilan) lies under so cold a climate, that the fruits there seldom come to full maturity; when it is confessed by all that have any right knowledge of those parts, that, among all the provinces of that vast empire, there is none that challenge prerogative for a temperate and benign air, before that of Messanderan, which, beyond all dispute, produces the best fruits of all Persia. Shah Abbas was so well convinced of this point, that he gave the preference, in his opinion, to this province, before any other of all his dominions; which made him lay the foundation of the city of Ferabath, his ordinary residence, where he died (43)."

(K) It is not easy to determine, whether Aria and Ariana were the same province; or, if they were not, how they differed. To discuss so per-

(43) Harris's collect. vol. ii. p. 101.

plexed

Parthia.

PARTHIA ^c, bounded on the west by Media; on the north by Hyrkania; on the east by Aria; on the south by Carmania the Desert; surrounded with mountains, which serve for boundaries on every side; at this day called Erak or Arak; and, to distinguish it from Chaldea, which is likewise called Erak, this is stiled Erac-Agami. The antient ^f Parthians are said to have been originally Celtes, of whom we shall speak in the sequel; who, being driven out of their own country, settled here, and had this name given them, which, in their own, that is, in the Celtic lan-

^c PTOL. lib. vi. c. 5.^f CLUV. ubi supra.

plexed a question here, and to endeavour to solve what to the best geographers has appeared an inexplicable doubt, would be at once an act of vanity and rashness. It is better, therefore, to refer the learned reader to the authors cited at the bottom of the page, from whom he may receive all the satisfaction the nature of the thing will admit (44). In our description in the text, we have followed Ptolemy exactly, as knowing no better guide, though we must at the same time allow, that some things there are in his description of this province, which are not easily understood, such as the several fountains from whence he derives the stream of the river Arius, and the lake which he says it forms (45). Of the thirty-five cities mentioned by that author, we cannot find above five or six mentioned by any other antient writer; and of these the greatest part are found all together, in a paragraph of Ammianus Marcellinus (46). It was antiently a very populous country, though much subject to heats, and intermixed with deserts, heaths, and forests, near the mountains: however, where the heat of the sun is a little rebated, they have very fruitful plains, which, among other things, produce grapes, the wine of which hath so strong a body as to keep fourscore or a hundred years, without diminution of colour or flavour. The antient city of Aria, now known by the name of Heri, or Herat, is still large and populous. Sir Thomas Herbert, in his travels, tells us, that when he was there, he found it under a governor of its own; and adds, that the adjoining country abounds with roses, of which they make a water much stronger in its smell than that made in Europe. There are likewise, says another eminent traveller, admirable tapestries made in the neighbourhood of this place, such as transcend not only the tapestries of Europe, but even those that come from the rest of the Persian looms (47).

(44) Cellar. geogr. antiq. lib. iii. c. 22. p. 721. Casaub. in Strab. lib. xv. p. 720. sub fin. (45) Lib. vi. c. 17. (46) Ammian. Marcellin. lib. xxiii. (47) Harris's collect. vol. i. p. 435.

guage, signified separated, or put away. Ptolemy reckons twenty-five large cities within this province; and it must certainly have been very populous, since many cities, and about two thousand villages, are reckoned to have been destroyed by earthquakes. Its capital was Hecatompylus, so called from its having an hundred gates, a noble and magnificent place, and so lucky, as some think, to remain still the capital of Persia, under the name of Hispaban, or rather Spauhawn. Modern towns of note are * Touchercau, and Hamadan, a very considerable place, and especially noted for great herds of cattle fed in its neighbourhood, producing great quantities of butter, cheese, and hides; Chachan, Com, Casbin, &c. (L), and some others less considerable.

PER-

* TAVERN. VOY. I. IV. C. I.

(L) The mighty reputation which the kings of Parthia, by their military virtues, obtained, will oblige us to speak hereafter of this province more accurately, than in this general description of the Persian dominions it was proper for us to do. As to what we have advanced concerning the origin of the Parthians, it may not be amiss to give the reader here the words of that author, on whose authority we took it, noting that he has confounded the Scythians and Celtes, or mistaken the one for the other, as shall be further proved in the history of those two nations.

“ The Parthians (says he) are also derived from the Scythians; for they were exiles of that country, as their very name testifies; for, in the Scythian language, banished men are called Parthians. These, in like manner with the Bactrians, “ being by civil wars driven out of Scythia, first fixed themselves by stealth in the country adjoining to Hyrkania; and afterwards obtained by force more extended dominions (48).” Though, in later ages, Parthia became the mistress of her neighbours, and shared with Rome the empire of the world, yet under the ancient Persian, and even under the Macedonian monarchs, it was so little considered, that it remained an adjunct of Hyrkania, and was not made a particular province. It is not easy to fix the derivation of the capital of Parthia. In ancient time, Polybius says, that it was called Hecatompylos, because all the roads through the Parthian dominions centred here (49): Curtius says it was built by the Greeks; but by whom, or at what time, he informs us not (50). It should seem, that Hecatompylos is rather a Greek

(48) Isidor. origin. ix. c. 2. (49) Lib. x. c. 25. (50) Lib. vi. c. 11.

PERSIS^h, bounded on the north by Media; on the west by Susiana; on the east by the Carmanias; on the south by interpretation of the true name of this city, than the real name thereof; but then what name this was in the Parthian language, we pretend not to say, it not having been recorded by any author we have met with.

^h PTOL. lib. vi. c. 4.

In respect to what has been observed, in the text, of Spaubawn's being founded on the ruins of the antient Hecatompylos, there are many authorities to bear us out, though we do not find any certain grounds whereon to found this opinion (51). It is unanimously acknowledged, that the present city is of no great antiquity; and the two parts into which it is divided preserve the names of two contiguous towns, from the junction of which it is formed: these are Heider, and Neamet-Olabi. The inhabitants of these places, notwithstanding their neighbourhood, bore a mortal hatred to each other, which they have transmitted to their successors, who, tho' they live in the same city, shew notwithstanding, on all public occasions, a warm and inveterate antipathy one towards the other. Some, indeed, ascribe this enmity to another cause: they say, that Heider, and Neamet-Olabi, are the names of two princes who reigned antiently over Persia, and who divided their subjects into two parties; which are said to have subsisted ever since, not only in Spaubawn, but in all the towns of Persia. Such as say this, however, own that the city we are speaking of was composed of two distinct towns, called by them Deredechte and Joubare. It may be wondered, that their magistrates, in the course of ages, have not subdued these unnatural feuds, for which no good reason can be assigned, except that which our author intimates (52); viz. the gain which those magistrates made of their frequent quarrels and broils.

It is not very clear at what time the towns before-mentioned were united, or when this city received the name by which it is now known. Some say this happened before the reign of the famous Timour Beg, corruptly called Tamerlane, who destroyed it twice. Certain it is, that Spaubawn owes the glory it now possesses to the great shah Abbas, who, after the conquest of the kingdoms of Lar and Ormus, charmed with the situation of this place, made it the capital of his empire, between the year 1620 and 1628. There is, perhaps, no city in the world,

(51) Herbert's travels in Harris's collect. vol. i. p. 431. Holstein ambassadors travels in the same collection, vol. ii. p. 79. Carreri voyag. tom. ii. p. 85.
(52) Tavernier voyag. tom. i. l. iv. c. 5. p. 434. Chardin, tom. ii. p. 6. Carreri, ubi supra. Le Brun voy. tom. i. p. 197.

by the Persian gulf, called now Pars or Phars; antiently inhabited by the Mefabatae, Rapsii, Hippophagi, Suzæi, Megores, the name of which is so differently written as this of the capital of Persia (53). Among Europeans it is usually written Hispahan, or Ispahan; it is also called Spaha, Spachæa, Aspahan, Izpaan, and Spabon. The Nubian geographer calls it Asbahawn; and the Persians themselves pronounce it as it is written in the text, Spaubawn; which orthography we have taken the freedom to introduce, since the best writers are divided on this head: Tavernier, and Sir John Chardin, write it Ispahan, Dr. Gemelli Carreri, Spabon; M. le Brun, Spaban: but all these authors agree, that the inhabitants pronounce it in the manner we have spelled it. The etymology of the word is no less difficult to be discovered, than the manner in which it should be written. Before the time of Tamerlane, it is said to have been called Sipahan, from the prodigious number of its inhabitants; Sipe, in the old Persic, and Uzbeque language, signifying an army; and the plural thereof, Sipahan, consequently signifying armies. Another derivation there is from an Arabic word, signifying a battalion (54). But it is time to quit these dry inquiries for something more useful, as well as more entertaining, since, in the description of Persia, it would be an unpardonable fault to omit an exact account of its capital, especially as we are so well furnished with noble materials in the travels of Sir Thomas Herbert, the Holstein ambassadors, M. Tavernier, Sir John Chardin, Dr. Gemelli Carreri, M. le Brun, and others. Chardin, and le Brun, have each of them given us a copious description thereof, adorned with copper-plates; from whence it is as easy to form a just idea of it, as of London or Paris. All who speak of Spaubawn, are agreed that nothing can be more beautiful in nature than the situation thereof: it stands in a plain spacious and fertile, surrounded with mountains, which defend it alike from the sultry heats of summer, and the piercing winds of the winter-season. Through this plain run several rivers, which water Spaubawn, and contribute alike to its ornament and use. The first of these is the river Zenderoud, over which there are three fine bridges. This river takes its rise in the mountains of Jayabat, three days journey from the city, and is but a small stream of itself; but Abbas the Great cut a channel, whereby he brought a brisker and more considerable stream to fall into this river, for the greater convenience of his favourite metropolis; by which contrivance the Zenderoud is as broad at Spaubawn in the spring, as the Seine is at

(53) Holstein ambassadors travels. Tavernier voy. ubi supra. Carreri, ubi supra, p. 86.

(54) Holstein ambassadors travels, ubi supra.

Megores, Stabai, &c. Antient cities of note were Persepolis, the noble metropolis of the antient Persian empire; Axima;

Paris in the winter. The united waters of these rivers are sweet, pleasant, and wholesome, almost beyond comparison, as indeed are all the springs which are found in the gardens belonging to the houses of Spauhawn. The river brought by Abbas into the Zenderoud is called Mahmoud. We shall have occasion to speak both of it, and the Zenderoud, in another place. Besides these, there are two more streams, which run very near each other, and are both comprehended under the name of Abcorrenge: one of these is pretty considerable, its waters being at all times deep, and, generally speaking, equal; for which reason several attempts have been made to bring it to enter the Zenderoud. King Tabmas, in the sixteenth century, expended an excessive sum of money on a project of this sort, without success: Abbas the Great did the same thing, on another project, but without effect; which did not, however, discourage Abbas the second from twice endeavouring at the same thing, in which likewise failing, it is now looked on as a thing impracticable (55). The extent of Spauhawn is very great, not less perhaps than twenty miles within the walls: these are of earth, poorly built, and so covered with houses, and shaded with gardens, that, in many places, it is a difficult thing to discover them; which is a defect not peculiar to this city, but is common to most of the great towns in Persia; whence many travellers have been led to represent them as not walled at all. The Persians themselves are wont to say, Spauhawn nisse gebon; i. e. Spauhawn is half the world. It is certainly a very large and populous city: but never were there seen wider accounts than those which different authors give us of the number of souls in this city. Sir Thomas Herbert says, in his time there were 200,000 (56): Sir John Chardin says, that some have reckoned eleven hundred thousand (57); but he is himself of opinion, that it is not more populous than London. At a distance the city is not easily distinguished; for the streets being many of them adorned with plantanes, and every house having its garden, the whole looks like a wood. The streets, in general, are neither broad nor convenient, there being three great evils which attend them; the first is, that, being built on common sewers, these are frequently broke up, which is very dangerous, considering that most people ride; the second is, that there are frequent wells, or pits, in the streets, which are no less dan-

(55) Chardin voy. tom. ii. p. 2, 3.

(56) Ubi supra. (57) Ubi supra.

Axima; Marasum, called now Marazu; Toace, the capital of a district of the same name; Pasargada, a noble gerous; the third arises from the people's emptying all their ordure from the tops of their houses: this last is indeed, in some measure, qualified by the dryness of the air, and by its being quickly removed by the peasants, who carry it away to dung their grounds. Sir John Chardin reckons eight gates; four looking to the east and south, and four to the west and north; viz. the gate of Haffen-Abad, the gate of Joubare, called also the gate of Abbas, the gate of Seidabmedion, the Dervazedeulet, that is, the imperial gate, the gate of Lombon, the gate of Tokchi, and the gate Deredechte: he reckons also six posterns. Other authors say there are ten gates; but it is agreed, that there is no difficulty of entering Spauharwn at any hour of the day or night. Whoever has a mind to make himself perfectly master of the names of the streets, and even of the houses of this vast city, may satisfy his curiosity, and be very agreeably entertained, by perusing Chardin's elegant description of it, which is at once pleasant and exact, and equally fitted to amuse and to instruct the reader. The compass of this note will not allow us so much as to abridge his curious account: we shall therefore content ourselves with mentioning only the principal things in Spauharwn, as they are described by that gentleman, and M. le Brun. To begin then with the royal palace, which is three quarters of a league in circumference; it has six gates; the first called Ali Kapesie; that is, the gate of Ali; the second, Haram Kapesie, or the gate of the seraglio; the third, Moerbag Kapesie, the gate of the kitchen; the fourth, Gandag Kapesie, or the garden-gate, through which none passes but the king himself, and his kapaters, or eunuchs, who attend his women; the fifth, Ghajatganna Kapesie, or the gate of the tailors, because those belonging to the king have apartments near it; the sixth, Ghanna Kapesie, or the gate of the secretary. The grandes of the kingdom, when they go to pay their court, generally enter the palace by the two gates first-mentioned. 2. The Meydoen, which is one of the principal ornaments of this great city: it is a grand market, 710 paces long from east to west, and 210 broad from north to south: on the south side stands the royal palace, and on the north the Nachroe-chone, a building wherein are placed the king's band of music: on one side of the Meydoen stands the mosque Sjig-lotf-olla, so called from one of their doctors, who is reputed a saint; it has a fine dome, adorned with green and blue stones incrustated with gold, having on the top a pyramid, on which are placed three balls of the same metal: on the west side noble city built by Cyrus, and honoured with his tombⁱ. As to modern cities, there are many of great note; and, amongst

ⁱ TAVERN. VOY. tom. i. l. iv. cap. 1. p. 412.

of the Mey-doen stands the royal mosque, extremely magnificent: at some distance from thence appears the gate called Ali Kapesfe; and between these stand a range of fine buildings, adorned with porticoes, full of shops. The middle space is taken up, in a great measure, with tents, under which all sorts of goods are sold; but these are taken away in the evening, to make room for the guards, who, with their great dogs, attend there all night long: in this space the mountebanks erect stages, distribute their packets, and with their antick tricks divert the populace. In the middle stands a pillar, on the summit of which the prize is placed, when tournaments are celebrated: this prize generally is either a cup of gold, or something of the same value; and none are suffered to contend for it but persons of very high quality. On the feast of Nou-roes, or the beginning of the year, all the tents are taken away, and every thing is made clear, for the more commodious celebration of the carousals which are then performed in the presence of the king, who is seated in a kind of gallery, or theatre, called Talael, very curiously adorned, on the gate of Ali. 3. Next to this noble market-place we ought to mention the principal street of Spaubawn, called Cbiaer- baeg, i. e. four gardens, one of the grandest ornaments of this city, the shops therein being wonderfully magnificent, and the disposition thereof, in every respect, convenient and pleasant. 4. From thence runs the bridge of Allawerdie-Chan, over the river Zenderoud, 540 paces long, and 17 broad, built with large stones: it has three-and-thirty arches, some of which are founded on the sand, which is firm and stable; and through these, when it is high enough, the water flows. There are ninety-three niches upon this bridge, some shut, some open; and the corners thereof are flanked with four towers: it has a wall, or parapet, of brick, with openings at certain distances, which afford the finest prospect in the world. In the neighbourhood of this bridge are divers pleasure-houses belonging to the king, and gardens stored with fruit-trees, and adorned with every thing else that can contribute to the making them worthy of their possessor. There are some other bridges, mosques, and public structures, which deserve to be particularized, if this note were not already too long; let us conclude it then with observing, that the citadel, or fortress, called by the Persians Tabarook, is a very mean structure, and in as mean a condition, its walls being in such a ruinous state, that though amongst these Schiras, Benaron, Lar, Bender-abassi or Gombroon, and Bender-congo, are reckoned the most considerable (M).

Susi-

though there are some cannon mounted upon them, yet they are never made use of, from an apprehension, that the walls would fall, if those pieces were discharged.

(M) This country is very frequently mentioned in antient authors; and therefore we are the better enabled to give an account of its former as well as present state (60). Such parts of it as lie towards the north are hilly and barren, bearing neither fruit nor corn sufficient for the use of the inhabitants: some emeralds, indeed, are there found, but of no great value. On the coast of the Persian gulph the soil is as bad, though of a different nature, being hot and sandy, and producing few other trees than palms: but between these there lies a rich and pleasant region, abounding with corn, fruit, and cattle, and better watered, though but by small rivers, than most of the other regions within this wide empire. The entrance of this country is narrow and difficult, defended formerly against Alexander the Great by Ariobarzanes, a noble Persian, who gave a check to that conqueror's progress, and immortalized his name by this gallant performance in the service of his country. As to Persepolis, the antient capital of this province, and of the old empire of the Persians, Diodorus Siculus informs us, that it was the richest city in the world, at the time that it was subdued by Alexander, whose soldiers, taking it by storm, put all the men to the sword, rifled their houses, and carried off immense quantities of gold and silver, Alexander reserving to himself the treasures in the citadel, which had been amassing there from the time of Cyrus, the founder of the Persian empire. If this author's computation be right, he took thence an hundred and twenty thousand talents of gold: in fine, the spoil was so great, that the neighbouring countries were constrained to furnish mules and other beasts of burden, besides three thousand camels, to carry it off; for he had conceived such a dislike to the inhabitants of this city, that he was resolved to leave them nothing of value; and thus, as the same writer observes, Persepolis, once so famous for its magnificence, became no less remarkable for its calamity (61). Among the cities of note at this time, the principal is Schiras; which, with the adjacent country, is thus described by a famous traveller, in his account of the road from Spaubawn to the Indies: "From thence

(60) Strab. l. xv. p. 501. Plin. l. vi. c. 26. Herod. c. 125. (61) Diod. Sic. lib. xvii. c. 68.

Sufiana.

SUSIANA, bounded on the^k north by Assyria; on the west by Ghaldea; on the east by Persia; on the south by the

^k PTOL. lib. vi. c. 5.

“ (i. e. Tchelminar) to Schiras “ is an hard day’s journey, “ especially when the snow “ melts, for then the road is “ like a sea. The city of “ Schiras, which many will “ have to be the antient Cyro- “ polis, the metropolis of the “ province of Persia, lies in “ 78 deg. 15 miles long. and “ 29 deg. 36 miles latitude.
 “ It is seated in a plain about “ four leagues in extent from “ north to south, and about “ five leagues from east to “ west. Upon the south-east “ is a lake of salt-water about “ four leagues in compass.
 “ The soil about it is very “ good and fruitful, and “ famous for the best wines
 “ in Persia. The city itself “ has nothing handsome in it;
 “ for it looks more like a “ ruined town, than a city.
 “ It has no walls, but a bad “ ditch, and the houses are “ built of earth dried in the “ sun, and whitened over with “ lime; so that when they are “ well moistened with rain, “ they often fall down of “ themselves; only the col“ lege which Iman Kouli-Kan “ built, and some of the “ mosques, are of brick; and “ the best of these mosques, “ which is called Sha Shi- “ raque, is kept in something “ better repair than ordinary,
 “ out of a particular devo“ tion; but there is nothing “ worth taking notice of in “ it. On the north-east stands “ an high mountain, which is “ covered with several forts “ of fruit-trees, of which “ there are some oranges, le“ mons, and cypresses, and at “ the foot of it a stone bridge,
 “ from whence there is a street “ which goes in a strait “ line quite through the city.
 “ This street is walled on “ both sides, and at certain “ spaces are several gates,
 “ which have neat little houses “ built upon them, from “ which is a pleasant prospect “ into the gardens planted “ with rows of cypresses.
 “ The streets of Schiras are “ somewhat narrow; but “ there are some fair ones, “ having in the midst of “ them lovely canals, and ba“ fons of water very plea“ sant. There are a great “ many fair covered bazars “ or markets, with great “ shops, well furnished with “ all sorts of Indian and Turk- “ ish commodities, and every “ commodity has its particu“ lar bazar. In the college “ there are professors, who “ have salaries for teaching “ theology, philosophy, and “ medicine; and, ’tis said, it “ has sometimes 500 students.
 “ There are in this city three “ or four glass-houses, where “ they make great and small “ bottles, to transport the “ sweet waters made in this “ city; as also several other “ vessels, the Persian gulf; is believed by some to have been the land of Havilah, called now Chufistan, inhabited by the “ vessels, to put their pic“ kled fruits in, which they “ send in great quantities into “ India, Sumatra, Batavia,

 “ and other places. They “ make their glafs of a white “ stone almost as hard as “ marble, which they fetch “ from an hill four days “ journey from Schiras, and “ ’tis as clear and delicate as “ any glafs in the world. It “ is wonderful how they blow “ their great bottles called “ caraba, which are a finger “ thick, and hold near 30 “ quarts of wine. They “ have no manufactures at “ Schiras, but a few coarse “ painted cloths, which are “ used only by the meaner “ sort. On the north-west “ side is the king’s garden, “ called Baysha, which is “ indeed well planted with “ fruit-trees, roses, and jas-“ mines; but, for want of “ order, it looks like a wil“ derness. From this garden “ to the hills, is a vineyard “ belonging to several per“ sons, two leagues long, and “ one broad, which is wa“ tered with the river Ben- “ demir, which is sometimes “ dry in summer, because it “ never rains there but in “ spring and autumn. The “ wines made here are the “ best in all Persia, but they “ make no great quantities “ of them, because they dry “ and pickle good part of “ their grapes. ’Tis an ex“ cellent stomach-wine, but “ very strong; so that, with“ out spoiling the taste of it,

 “ it will carry two thirds of “ water. They sell their “ wine by weight, and not “ by measure; and, putting “ it into chests, send a great “ deal yearly to Spaubawn
 “ and the Indies. The people “ of Schiras are very witty,
 “ and most of the best poets
 “ in Persia were born here.
 “ In an antient mosque here “ lies Scheich Sadi, one of the “ best of their poets, whom “ they honour as a saint.
 “ The soil about this city
 “ is very good, and pro“ duces plenty of all things.
 “ They have all the fruits “ that we have, and oranges
 “ and lemons in abundance.
 “ They have vast quantities of “ roses, from which they draw “ such great plenty of rose“ water, that they furnish all “ the Indies with it. They “ have a great deal of corn, “ but give much to their horses “ to be eaten in the blade, be“ cause they say, that for want “ of water it would never “ come to maturity. There “ is a great deal of opium,
 “ made at Schiras; for round “ about the town are large “ fields sown with white pop“ pies: they have also store of “ capers, which they send in-
 “ to all parts (62)”.
 “

(62) Tavern, in Harris's collect. vol. iii. p. 344.

two nations following; viz. the Elymæi and Cossæi. Its capital was the famous city of Susa, the *Shufban*¹ of the Scriptures; and Tariana, by Ammianus called Tarfiana^m. The modern towns of note are ⁿ Abawas, Scabar, and Ram-hormus (N).

Curdistan and Schirwan. THERE are two other provinces of the Persian empire, which need not be described here, because they have been

¹ Dan. viii. 2. Nehem. i. 1. Esth. i. 2. ^m Apud CELLAR. geogr. antiq. lib. iii. c. 19. p. 684. ⁿ TAVERN. voyag. ubi supra.

(N) Sufiana, as described by Ptolemy, includes the province stiled Elymais (63); which Pliny also observes to have lain within the bounds of this province, and to have been severed from it by the river Eulæus (64). It received its name from Susa, the capital thereof, once the royal seat of the Persian kings, who were wont to reside one part of the year here, and the other at Echatan. Pliny says, that it was founded by Darius the son of Hystaspes (65): but this is not to be taken strictly; for certain it is, that the Darius he speaks of could only be its restorer, since Strabo positively affirms, that it was built by Tithonus the father of Memnon (66; and Herodotus long before says, that Susa was called the city of Memnon (67). It is difficult to determine whether in pleasantness, magnificence, or strength, this noble city excelled: seated it was, as sacred and profane authors agree, on the river Ulai, or Eulæus, called also the Choaspes, or rather on the confluence of these two rivers; for the Eulæus and the Choaspes, meeting at Susa, run together in one stream; and are afterwards stiled sometimes by one name, sometimes by the other. As to its beauty, Diodorus affirms, that, when Alexander seized the palace here, he took possession of the noblest mansion in the universe. Here were preserved the records of the Persian empire; and here were laid up the treasures of the kingdom, that they might be made use of on any emergency, and not be squandered away at the will of the prince. Alexander took from hence nine thousand talents of coined gold, and forty thousand talents of gold and silver bullion (68). The modern name of this celebrated city differs not much from that by which it was formerly called, the city of Shustern being by some travellers conceived to be built at least very near the place where Susa of old stood (69).

(63) Cellar. geogr. antiq. lib. iii. c. 19. 5. 2. p. 682.

(64) Hist.

nat. lib. vi. c. 27.

(65) Ubi supra,

(66) Geogr. l. xv.

p. 599, c. 66.

(67) Terpsich. c. 54.

(68) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xviii.

(69) Tavern. voyag. tom. i. l. iv. c. 1.

treated

treated of elsewhere already. These are Curdistan ^o, containing the antient Affyria, and Schirwan ^p, of old stiled Media. A famous modern traveller ^q tells us, that there are reckoned, in the dominions of Persia, upwards of five hundred considerable places, walled towns, and castles, about sixty thousand villages, and forty millions of souls.

As to the air and climate of this country, considering Climatt. the great extent thereof, it cannot be otherwise than varied, according to the situation of the several parts thereof, some being frozen with cold, and others burnt with heat, at the same time of the year. The air, where-ever it is cold, is dry; but, where it is extremely hot, it is sometimes moist. In order to give the reader a just notion of this, it will be necessary to observe, that all along the coast of the Persian gulf, from west to east, to the very mouth of the river Indus, the heat is, for four months, so excessive, that even those, who are born in the country, unable to bear it, are forced to quit their houses, and retire to the mountains; so that such as travel in these parts, at that season, find none in the villages, but wretched poor creatures, left there to watch the effects of the rich, at the expence of their own health. The extreme heat of the air, as it renders it insupportable, so it makes it prodigiously unwholsome, strangers frequently falling sick there, and seldom escaping. The eastern provinces of Persia, from the river Indus to the borders of Tartary, are subject to great heats; but not quite so unwholsome as on the coasts of the Indian ocean, and Persian gulf: but, in the northern provinces, on the coast of the Caspian sea, the heat is full as great, and, though attended with moisture, as unwholsome as on the coast before-mentioned. From October to May, there is no country in the world more pleasant than this; but the people carry in their faces indeleble marks of the malign influence of their summers, looking all of them of a faint yellow, and having neither strength nor spirits, though, about the end of April, they abandon their houses, and retire to the mountains, which are five-and-twenty or thirty leagues from the sea. In a word, the unhealthiness of this place is so notorious, that, when a person is sent to the government of Keilan, it is generally looked on as a kind of disgrace; and the people at Spauhawn are apt to ask, whether he has robbed or

^o CLUVER. geograph. l. v. c. 14. TAVERN. ubi supra.
^p CLUVER. ubi supra. TAVERN. ubi supra. ^q CHARDIN
voy. tom. iii. p. 4.

murdered to deserve such a commission. But this moistness in the air is only in these parts; the rest of Persia enjoys a dry air, the sky being perfectly serene, and hardly so much as a cloud seen to fly therein. To say the truth, the purity of this element is the greatest blessing the inhabitants enjoy, deriving from thence a clear and florid complexion, together with an excellent habit of body. It rains seldom; but it does not follow, that the heat admits of no mitigation: for, in the night, though not a cloud be seen, the sky being so clear, that the stars alone afford a light sufficient to travel by, yet there is a brisk wind, which lasts till within an hour of the morning, and gives such a coolness to the air, that a man may dispense with a tolerable warm garment. The seasons in general, and particularly in the middle of this kingdom, happen thus; the winter, beginning in November, and lasting till March, is very sharp and rude, attended with frost and snow; which last descends in great flakes on the mountains; but never on the plains. There are mountains, three day journey to the west of Spauhawn, on which the snow lies for eight months of the year. It is said, that they find there white worms as big as one's little-finger, which, if crushed, feel colder than the snow itself. From the month of March to that of May, there are brisk winds; from May to September, the air is serene and dry, refreshed by pleasant gales, which blow in the night, at evening, and morning; and, in September and November, the wind blows as in spring. It is to be observed, that, in summer, the nights are about ten hours long, the twilight being very short; which, joined to the coolness of the night, renders the heat of the day so moderate, that this season is as supportable at Spauhawn as at Paris. The great dryness of its air exempts Persia from thunder and earthquakes. In the spring indeed there sometimes falls hail; and, as the harvest is then pretty far advanced, it does a great deal of mischief. The rainbow is seldom seen in this country, because there rise not there vapours sufficient to form it; but, in the night, there are seen rays of light shooting through the firmament, and followed, as it were, by a train of smoke. The winds, however brisk, seldom swell into storms or tempests; but, on the other hand, they are sometimes poisonous and infectious on the shore of the gulf, as all travellers agree (O). THERE

(O) As to the air and climate loved the so often commended of Persia, we have chiefly followed Sir John Chardin, but never without

THERE is perhaps no country in the world, which, Mountains generally speaking, is more mountainous than Persia; but these mountains are far from being advantageous, since

without comparing what he says with what is said by other writers the most esteemed on the same subject. M. Tavernier and he both agree in reporting, that at Spaubawn it is usual to inquire whether a man has robbed or murdered, who is sent to Keilan (70): which makes it the more strange, that intelligent persons, who have also been on the spot, should report directly the contrary, as has been remarked in a former note: yet after all, some account may be given of this matter; nay, it is to be hoped, such a one as will satisfy even a critical reader. There are a few months in the year, in which the account given by Olearius is still found strictly true; but, alas! the rest of the year the people are in a wretched condition, fly from their habitations, and scarce know where to seek for rest. It was in the best season of the year, that the Holstein ambassadors, and their retinue, crossed this country: and thus, it seems, it came to pass, that they represented it as a paradise, not suspecting that at another season of the year it could be so intolerable a place as it really is. As to the insupportable heat at Gambroom, all authors are agreed about it. M. Tavernier says, that people often find themselves struck by a south wind in such a manner, that they cry, I burn; and immediately fall down dead (71). M. le Brun says, that he was greatly incommoded therewith while he was there; and that the people assured him, that the weather was at some times so excessively sultry, as to melt the seals of letters. At this time the people go in their shirts, and are continually sprinkled with cold water; nay, the interpreter belonging to M. le Brun, and his company, had a well, in which he passed some part of the day. Among the inconveniencies consequent from this malign disposition of the air, one of the most terrible is the ingendering in the arms and legs a kind of long small worms, which are not to be withdrawn without great danger of breaking them; upon which a mortification ensues. Our author last-mentioned had therefore just reason to say, that a severer punishment could not be inflicted even on a heinous offender, than the leaving him in such a place as this: and yet, as he observes, there are many people of worth and good sense, who, for the sake of acquiring large fortunes in a short time, hazard themselves here, but rarely live to enjoy the riches, which they have got (72).

(70) Chardin, tom. iii. p. 7. Tavern. tom. i. liv. iv. c. 1. p. 414.
 (71) Tavern. tom. i. liv. v. c. 23. p. 764. (72) Le Brun voyag.
 tom. ii. p. 322.

many of them yield neither springs nor metals, and but a few of them are shaded with trees. It is true, that many of them are situated on the frontiers, and serve as a kind of natural bastions or ramparts to this vast region; and, it is very likely, contribute, in other places, to make the country wholesome, by sheltering the valleys under them from excessive heat. On some of these hills there is found a kind of mineral salt, which is sold very cheap^r. As for particular mountains, we have already mentioned most of them, which deserved to be taken notice of, in our description of the several provinces of Persia.

Rivers.

In respect to rivers, it has been already observed, that, except the Araxis, there is not one navigable stream in all this country. There are indeed, in most of its provinces, some little rivers, which run short courses, and would be more considerable than they are, if, through want of water, the inhabitants were not forced to divert their streams by small chanel, in order to fructify their grounds. An eminent traveller informs us, that this was practised antiently much more than of late years; and that from hence, in a great measure, arises the mighty difference between the productions of antient and modern Persia. He affirms, that a Persian of great quality, and who was perfectly acquainted with this matter, informed him, that, within the space of twenty-four years, no less than fourscore chanel had been choaked up, and lost, in the territory of Tauris^s. As to seas, the northern provinces of the Persian empire lie on the Caspian lake or sea; of which an account has been already given at the beginning of this volume^t. On the south, the Persian shore is washed by the Indian ocean, and by the waters of the Persian gulf, or gulf of Balsora, flowing out of the Indian ocean near the isle of Ormus, from the south-east to the north-west, having Persia on the east, and Arabia on the west, it runs as high as the antient Chaldea, where it receives the Euphrates and the Tigris, united in one stream; and very few rivers of note besides. It may not be amiss to take notice here, that the gulf is sometimes stiled the Red sea, as well as the gulf of Aden (P).

AFTER

^r TAVERN. voy. tom. i. l. iv. c. 1. p. 416.
TAVERN. voyag. ubi supra.

^s TAVERN. voyag. ubi supra. ^t Pag. 9, & seqq.

(P) As we have remarked, that there is not above one navigable river in Persia, the reader need not be surpris'd, that

AFTER this account of mountains and rivers, and after Soil. affirming, that there are many of the former, and but a very that we say so little of the several streams which water that country; one of them we shall have occasion to speak of under the head of natural rarities; but the river Araxes deserves to be further considered, on account of the mistakes which some writers have been guilty of in relation thereto, occasioned chiefly by the giving this name to two different rivers. Olearius gives us a very distinct account of this matter, which we shall therefore recite in his own words: "The 17th we crossed the famous river of Aras (Araxes) by the means of a bridge of boats near Tzanat: Q. Curtius speaking of this river in two different passages, and in a different sense, has not a little puzzled the antient historians and geographers, who, for the most part, put it in the same province, but can't agree in the description of its course; for Q. Curtius, in his fifth book, puts it in Persia, and says its course is to the south; whereas, in his seventh book, he makes it pass through Media, and disembogue itself into the Caspian sea: Strabo is no less dubious; and Raderus, endeavouring to dissolve this knot, by asserting that the river Medus before it is joined with Araxes, has its course to the south, and afterwards exonerates itself into the Caspian sea, is fallen into a gross mistake; for how is it

"to be conceived, that the "river should make its way "through the vast mountain
"Taurus, which is so many
"leagues in breadth, and di"vides not only all Persia, but "even Asia itself, and so con"tinue its current from Perse- "polis to the Caspian sea? The "foundation of the whole
"mistake lay here, that there "are two rivers which bear
"the name of Araxes, in Per-
"sia, one in Media, the other "in Persis: to the last, which "washes the walls of Perse-
"polis (now called Schiras),
"Q. Curtius has left the right
"name of Araxes; but has "taken the liberty to impose
"the name of Tanais upon
"the Iaxartes, which passes
"through Scythia, as he has "given the name of Caucasus
"to the eastern branch of the "mountain Taurus; but, with "what reason, I am not able "to determine. That which "passes through Persis is by "the Persians called Bend-
"Emer, from a signal miracle
"there performed by Ali;
"and disembogues into the "ocean in the Persian gulf:
"that which we speak of
"now, keeps its antient
"name, and rises out of the "mountains of Armenia, be"hind the great Ararat; and,
"being joined by many other
"rivers, the chiefest whereof
"are Karafu, Senki, Kerni,
"and Arpa, it turns its chan"nel, near Karafu, deep into "the country; and afterwards,
"near

very few to be met with of the latter, the reader will easily comprehend, that the soil cannot be generally rich or fruitful,

“ near Ordabath, falls with a “ great noise, which is heard “ two leagues thence, in the “ plain of Mokan. Its course “ there is very slow, and, af“ ter having received into its “ chanel, about 12 leagues
 “ above Tzanat, the river “ Cur or Cyrus (as large a “ river as itself, coming north“ ward out of Georgia), it “ exonerates itself into the “ Caspian sea. This suffici“ ently refutes Ptolemy, and “ those who follow his foot“ steps, who make the Araxes
 “ and the Cyrus fall by two “ different chanel into the “ Caspian sea. Thus they “ would have Cyropolis called “ Scamachie, which Maginus
 “ would infer from the de“ grees of latitude given by “ Ptolemy. But, according to “ that supposition, these two “ rivers must not be placed “ above, but below the city, “ towards the south, it being “ certain, that when we tra“ velled in those parts, we “ found the conflux of those “ two rivers at 39 deg. 54
 “ min. and the city of Sca- “ machie at 40 deg. 50 min.
 “ which is 13 leagues thence,
 “ and under another meridian.
 “ Neither is there any other “ river within 19 days journey
 “ of Scamachie on either side,
 “ which bears the least com“ parison in bigness, or other“ wise, to this river (73).”

We should not have introduced so long a quotation, if it had not been a matter of consequence, as will appear in the subsequent history, where this account will serve to rectify some points, which have hitherto confounded even the best authors. It is but just to add, that M. Le Brun, in his travels, confirms precisely what this author has said (74). As to the Persian gulf, it is not to be questioned, but that the antients stiled it, as well as the gulf of Arabia, the Red sea; what renders it most remarkable now, is its pearl-fishery, of which no doubt the reader will expect some account.
 They fish for them in many places of the gulf, but especially about the islands of Babamin. This fishery produces a prodigious quantity of pearl; Sir John Chardin says, more than a million in a year: the largest weigh generally from ten to twelve grains; and, if by chance any are taken of greater weight, the fishers are directed, under great penalties, to bring them to the king's exchequer, which, it is however believed, they do not always do (75). This fishing is performed by divers, who being carried down to the bottom of the sea in five fathom water, by the weight of a stone fixed to their toes, they

(73) Embassadors of Holfstein's travels, in Harris's collect. vol. ii. p. 104.
 (74) Voyag. tom. ii. p. 158. (75) Chardin, tom. ii. p. 31.

ful, but, on the contrary, sandy and barren. However, here-and-there the valleys are fruitful, and pleasant enough. The earth, in some places, is sandy and stony; in others heavy and hard; but every-where so dry, that, if it be not watered, it produces nothing, not even grass. Rain is not wholly wanting; it rains however very seldom, and not enough to keep even the best lands in a condition of bearing corn or fruits, without further help; and, even in the winter, the beams of the sun are so brisk and so drying, that the rain has not much effect: but, wherever the soil is sufficiently moistened, either by natural or artificial means, it bears wonderfully well. If it should be asked, how this description suits with what we find recorded in antiënt authors of the luxury and profuseness of the Persians; such a question is capable of various answers: for, first, Persia is not now near so much peopled as it was heretofore; and consequently there cannot be so great a number of labourers, which must cause barrenness in a country, that produces nothing without cultivation. Again, it may be said, that the alteration of government, and of religion, has, in a great measure, produced this difference: the antiënt kings of Persia were mild and beneficent to their subjects; whereas the Mohammedan princes have been always proud, overbearing, and cruel. According to the opinion of the Persees or Gaurs, it was meritorious to render barren fields fertile; whereas the Persians, like other Mohammedans, are satisfied with what good things they find, and will not give themselves the trouble to labour for posterity. They look upon life as a great road, wherein men ought to content themselves with such things as fall in their way; and, in consequence of such notions, there is no great wonder, that sterility has ensued, and that modern travellers do not speak in the same language with Quintus Curtius, Ammianus Marcelli- pick up there all the shells they can see, as fast as they can; and put them into a basket they carry down with them on purpose; and then rise up again to take breath, and refresh themselves with a pipe of tobacco: those who are in the boat pull up the baskets: the divers work but from one to eleven, and from eight to three. They fish for pearls from the end of June to the end of September: besides the pearl-oysters, they catch others in this sea, excellent for eating (76).

(76) Tavern. in Harris's collect. vol. ii. p. 314.

mus, and other such-like authors. Sir John Chardin therefore delivers it as his opinion, that, if the Turks were to inhabit this country, it would grow still poorer than it is; whereas, if the Armenians or the Persees were to become masters thereof, it would, from their industry, quickly recover its antient fertility. It must not however be imagined, that there is not still, at this day, the same variety, in point of fruitfulness, among the provinces of this extensive country, as heretofore. Media, Iberia, Hyrkania, Bactria, are now, in a great measure, what they were, and surpass most of the other provinces in their productions. All along the coasts of the Persian gulf, the soil is still more barren, cattle less plenty, and every thing in a worse condition, than any-where else. Before we part with this subject, we think proper to remark, that the Persians are so sensible of the snow's fertilizing their land, that they examine very curiously how high it rises every year, there being a stone on the top of a mountain, four leagues from Spaubawn, between two and three feet high, over which when once the snow rises, the peasant, who first brings the news to court, receives a considerable reward for his pains^u. But it is now time for us to speak more particularly of the productions of the earth.

Trees.

AMONG the trees that are most common in Persia, we may reckon the plantane, the willow, the fir, and cornil, by the Arabs called feder, and conar by the Persians; from whence probably came the Latin cornus, and thence our cornil. It is a received opinion here, that the plantane has a singular virtue against the plague, and all other infectious diseases; and they positively assert, that there has been no contagion at Spaubawn since the planting vast numbers of these trees in its streets and gardens. The tree, which bears gall-nuts, grows in several parts of Persia; but particularly in Kourdestan. The trees, which produce gums, mastich, and incense, are found very commonly in most parts of Persia; that however, which bears incense, is particularly found in Carmania the Desert, resembling, in form, a large pear-tree: turpentine-trees, and almond-trees, with the wild-chestnut, are common. The tree which bears manna, is also frequent; but there are several sorts of manna in Persia: the best is of a yellowish colour, and of a large grain. It comes from Nichapour, which is a part of Bactria. There is another sort, called

^t Voyag. tom. iii. p. 11.
l. iv. c. 1. p. 414.

^u TAVERN. voyag. tom. i.

the manna of tamarisk, because it is gathered from that tree. All the different kinds of manna are used to the same end in medicine, and are therefore gathered with like care, being esteemed a valuable commodity, as well as one easily disposed of. The herbs in Persia, especially Herbs and such as are aromatic, exceed those of other countries: drugs. roots, pulse, and fallading are larger, fairer, and better-tasted, than elsewhere, and are eaten raw, without danger of their creating any crudities in the stomach. Most of our European roots, greens, &c. flourish here in great perfection; and they would certainly be more cultivated than they are, if, as in Europe, men were, by religion, restrained from eating flesh. As to drugs, Persia produces as many as any country in Asia; for, besides manna, cassia, senna, the nux vomica, common in most provinces, gum ammoniac, by the Persians called ouscioc, is found in abundance on the confines of Parthia, towards the south. Rhubarb grows commonly in Corasson, or the antient Sogdiana; but it is not so good as that which is brought from the country of the Tartars, between the Caspian sea and China; and, for this reason, they endeavour to confound both under the name of Rivend-tchini, i. e. rhubarb of China: in Corasson they eat it commonly, as we do beetroots. The poppy of Persia is esteemed the finest in the world, not only in respect to its beauty, but because its juice is by far stronger than the juice of the same plant elsewhere. The Persians call this juice afioon; from whence our word opium: the best is made in the territory of Lingan, six miles from Spaubawn; though others prefer the afioon of Cazaron, which is towards the Persian gulf, as being less apt to ingender crudities in the stomach. Tobacco grows all over Persia, especially about Hammadan, which is the antient Susa, and in Courdestan near the Persian gulf, which is esteemed the finest. The Persians themselves however, who are great smokers, prefer what they call tambacou Inglese, or English tobacco, to their own; but Sir John Chardin says, that this tobacco, which was no other than Brasil, being kept at too high a price, the demand for it is now quite lost. Saffron is cultivated in many provinces, and especially about the Caspian sea, and in the neighbourhood of Hammadan, and is much esteemed. The plant, by the Persians called hiltet, and supposed to be the laserpitium or filphium of Dioscorides, from whence drops the asafetida, is common every-where; but abounds most in Sogdiana: there are two sorts of it, the white and black: the white is the least esteemed, because less strong than the black. This juice or gum is, all over the east, called king; and the Indians consume vast quantities of it, mixing it in all their ragouts and sauces. It has by far the strongest odour of any thing hitherto discovered, since places, where it has been kept, will retain its scent for whole years; and the vessels, in which it is transported to India, are so thoroughly impregnated therewith, that no other goods can be put on board them, without acquiring its scent, however carefully packed. Mummy of both sorts is a great Persian commodity: the first is taken from embalmed bodies, or such as are dried in the sands; the other is a precious gum, which distils out of a rock. There are two mines or sources of it in Persia, the one in Carmania the Desert, in the country of Sar, which is the best; for it is certain, that there is no bruise, cut or wound, which a drachm of this excellent gum will not cure in twenty-four hours. The other mine is in Corafson: the rocks, from whence it distils, belong to the king, and all that issues from thence is for his use. They are inclosed with walls, the gates of which are secured by the seals of the five principal officers in the province. Once a year each mine is opened in their presence, and all the mummy that is then found, or at least the greatest part of it, is sent to the king's treasure. It derives its name from the Persian word moum, which signifies literally an unguent. The Hebrews and Arabs make use of the same term. The Persians say, that the prophet Daniel taught them the use and preparation of mummy. Cotton is very common over all Persia; but there is a tree, which somewhat resembles it, but is by far more rare, which produces a sort of silk, very fine and soft, and of which many uses are made. Galbanum is likewise common in this country, together with the vegetable alkali; and many other drugs, which do not deserve to be mentioned here^u.

Fruits.

In speaking of the fruits of Persia, melons certainly claim the first place. They have above twenty sorts of them here; the first are called guermec, i. e. forced by heat. They are round and small, a spring fruit, insipid in the mouth, and consequently no-way pleasant. The people, however, fancy them prodigiously wholesome, and, on their first coming in, eat, for a fortnight or three weeks together, twelve or thirteen pound-weight each day; nay, an author of good credit, and a physician, says, that some

^u TAVERN. voyag. tom. i. l. iv. c. 2. p. 418. CHARDIN, tom. iii. p. 12. CARRERI, tom. ii. p. 209.

eat thirty pounds of them at a meal, without feeling any inconvenience therefrom. For four months in the year, in which melons are plenty, the common people eat hardly any thing else; and Sir John Chardin says, that they eat more of them in Spauhawn in a day, than throughout all France in a month. The best grow about a little borough called Craguerde, on the borders of Tartary, from whence, though it be thirty days journey, they are brought to Spauhawn, for the use of the king. The people in general are so fond of melons, that they take great pains to preserve them in certain repositories, during the last months of the year, and even till they are again in season. After the melon, the raisin deserves our notice, of which there are twelve or fourteen sorts in Persia. The most esteemed are the violet, the red, and the black: they are so large, that one of them is a good mouthful. They preserve grapes all the winter in Persia, putting them up in paper-bags on the vines, in order to preserve them from the birds. In Courdestan, and about Sultania, where they have abundance of violets, they mingle their leaves with the dry raisins, which at once give them a fine taste, and render them more wholesome. The best grapes, in the neighbourhood of Spauhawn, are found on the vines belonging to the Gaurs, or antient Persians; for they, being permitted by their religion to drink wine, take the more pains in cultivating these trees, which, for the same reason, are neglected by the Mohammedan Persians. The dates of Persia are, without comparison, the richest in the world, their syrup being sweeter, and more pleasant, than virgin-honey. The best grow in Courdestan, Sistan, about Persepolis, and the shore of the Persian gulf; and particularly at Jaron, a town in the road between Schiras and Lar. Strangers, however, ought to eat very moderately of this fruit; otherwise it is apt to overheat the blood sometimes to such a degree, as to create ulcers; but the inhabitants never feel any such inconvenience. Dates grow in clusters on the palm-tree, which is the highest of all fruit-bearing trees, and has no branches but at the very top. It produces fruit at fifteen years growth, and continues bearing till it is two hundred years old. All our European fruits grow in great perfection here: their apricots are excellent, and of several sorts: nectarines and peaches weigh sometimes sixteen or eighteen ounces each; they break easily, and, what is very extraordinary, the stone opens at the same time the peach is broken, and discovers a kernel extremely white, and of a taste the most delicious that can be imagined. The Persian pomgranates grow of several colours, in the highest perfection, some of them weighing a full pound. To sum up all, it may not be amiss to mention the particular places where the several kinds of fruit are held most excellent: apples and pears grow to the highest perfection in Iberia; dates in Carmania; pomgranates about Schiras; oranges in Hyrkania; and all sorts in Bactria, which produces finer and fairer fruit, than any other country in the world; but it is particularly renowned for its onions, at once prodigiously large, and sweet as apples. Pistaches, almonds, hazels, filberts, and figs, abound here likewise; and Sir John Chardin tells us, that, at an entertainment near Spanhawn, he saw fifty different kinds of fruit provided for one dessert ^w.

Grain.

THE grain most common in Persia is wheat, which is wonderfully fair and clean. As for barley, rice, and millet, they only make bread of them in some places, as in Courdestan, when their wheat-bread is exhausted before the return of harvest. They do not cultivate in this country either oats or rye, except where the Armenians are settled, who make great use of the latter in Lent. Rice is the universal aliment of all sorts of people in Persia: for this reason they are extremely careful in its cultivation; for, after they have sown it in the same manner with other grain, they, in three months time, transplant it, root by root, into fields which are well watered, otherwise it would never attain that perfection, in which we find it there, since it is softer, sooner boiled, and more delicious to the taste, than the same grain in any other part of the world. It may be, its taste is, in some measure, heightened by a practice they make use of to give it a glossy whiteness, viz. by cleansing it, after its being beaten out of the husks, with a mixture of flour and salt ^x.

Flowers.

THERE are in Persia all the sorts of flowers which are to be found in Europe, but they are not equally common in all the provinces of this empire; for there are fewer sorts of them, and fewer of each sort, in the southern provinces than in the rest, excessive heat being more destructive to them than frost; which is the reason that in India they have fewer than in Persia, and that those in Persia have more vivid and delightful colours than those either in India or Europe. Hyrkania, in this respect, excels the rest of Persia as much as Persia does other countries. There are there whole forests of oranges, the jessamin single and double; and there all the flowers we have in Europe, with many we have not, are profusely scattered by nature. The most eastern part of this country, which is called Mazanderan, is a perfect parterre: from September to the end of April, the whole country is covered with flowers as with a carpet, and the fruits are then in their best season, the excessive heat, and the malignity of the air, destroying them in succeeding months. Towards Media, and on the southern frontiers of Arabia, the fields are adorned with tulips, anemonies, ranunculuses, of the brightest red, all springing of themselves: in other places, as in the neighbourhood of Spaubawn, jonquils grow wild, and subsist all the winter. To recite all that is said on this subject, by such as have travelled through Persia, would not be agreeable to the design of this work: let us content ourselves therefore with adding, that roses of uncommon beauty are frequent here, the bushes bearing often three different-coloured roses on one branch, viz. yellow, yellow and black, and red. Pietro della Valle, who reports that the Persians are wont to make use of art in dying their roots, in order to give different colours to their flowers, is, in this circumstance, contradicted by Sir John Chardin, who affirms, on the contrary, that their gardeners have little or no skill; and that the nobility of Persia are so far from being curious in such things, that they take no pleasure in walking in their gardens, however beautifully and richly adorned; but content themselves with singling out some spot or other, on their first coming in, where they sit down, and smoke, and drink coffee, as long as they remain there † (Q).

^w CHARDIN, tom. iii. p. 23. TAVERN. voyag. tom. i. l. iv. c. 2. p. 418. CARRERI, tom. ii. p. 209. ^x CHARDIN, ubi sup. p. 101.

ME-

† CHARDIN, tom. iii. p. 26. TAVERN. tom. i. l. iv. c. 2. p. 420. CARRERI, tom. ii. p. 3. LE BRUN, tom. i. p. 227.

(Q) Though there is scarce a province in Persia, which does not produce wine, yet the wine of some provinces is much more esteemed than the wine of others; but Schiras wine is universally allowed to be the very best in Persia; in-somuch that it is a common proverb there, that to live happily one must eat the bread of Yezd, and drink the wine of Schiras. They do not make use in this country of wooden vessels, as we do, for keeping their wine; but preserve it in earthen vessels, which they take care to have well glazed, otherwise they would imbibe a great quantity

Metals or Minerals.

METALS of all sorts are frequently found in Persia, especially of late years; and since the reign of Abbas the Great, who was at immense pains to search them out, and to make the best use of mines where-ever they were discovered, iron, copper, and lead are become very common; but of gold and silver there are no mines open at present. As Persia is a very mountainous country, and as those mountains produce sulphur and saltpetre, if the inhabitants of this country were as active and inquisitive as amongst us, there is no doubt to be made, but that gold and silver both might be found in some part or other of the Persian dominions. In the country of Guendamon, near a town called Kervan, four leagues from Spauhawn, there is a silver mine, which has been formerly wrought; but, through the scarcity of wood, its produce has never equalled its expence; and it is therefore become a proverb in Persia, to signify an unlucky undertaking, that it is like the mine of Kervan, where they lay out ten to receive nine. There were also silver mines in Kirman and Mazanderan, but they are now abandoned for the same reason. Mines of iron are found in Hyrkania, in the northern Media, in Parthia, and Bactria; but it is not so pliable as some European iron. This may be owing indeed to the unskilfulness of their workmen, and may be likewise the reason why the steel that is made from it (and which some of our travellers have improperly called their mines of steel, there being no mines of that metal, but it being all done by art) is there so brittle and useless, Sir John Chardin tells us, that it is not worth above sixpence a pound; and is so full of sulphur, that if you cast some of the filings of it into the fire, they make a report as loud as gunpowder. It is fine and close, and almost as hard as a diamond; but, on the other hand, it is so very brittle, that the Persian artists, who know not how to correct this, are able to make no very valuable instruments thereof. It has moreover this ill quality, that, by giving it too fierce a fire, it may be burnt and destroyed. The Persians call both this, and the steel of the Indies, of the wine. These pots are set in very handsome order in their caves or cellars; these too being as much adorned as such places will admit of, and have always a reservoir of water in the middle of them, that upon occasion people may be entertained there, and drink wine out of the reach of the sun (77).

(77) Tavern. tom. i. l. iv. c. 2. p. 426.

steel

steel of Damascus, in order to distinguish it from European steel. Copper is found in greatest quantity at Sary in the mountains of Mazanderan; there are also mines of it in Bactria, and towards Casbin; it is however poor, and not fit for use, till mingled with either Swedish copper, or copper of Japan. The lead mines are towards Kirman and Yefde. Minerals are also found in Persia in vast abundance; sulphur and saltpetre are taken out of the mountain of Damavend, which separates Hyrkania from Parthia. Salt is made here by nature without the least assistance of art, as are also sulphur and alum. There are two sorts of salt in Persia, that found on the earth, and rock-salt; nothing is more common than to meet in this country with plains, sometimes ten leagues in length, covered intirely with salt, and others covered in like manner with sulphur or alum. In Media, and at Spaubawn, the salt is dug out of mines, and is as hard and firm as fire-stone; nay, in Carmania the Desert, the people actually use it as such in building their houses. Marble, free-stone, and slate, are found in great plenty about Hamadan: the marble is of four colours, white or statuary, black, red and black, and white and black. The best is found about Tauris; it is almost as transparent as crystal; its colour is white, mingled with a pale-green; but it is so soft, that some have questioned whether it be really a stone or not. In the neighbourhood of the same city they find azure; but it is not so good as that of Tartary. In Hyrkania, and especially in Mazanderan, the petroleum or naphthe is met with, of two sorts, black and white; but the richest mine in Persia is the turquoise. There are two sorts of this precious stone, one at Nichapour in Corasson, and the other in Phirous-Cou, or mount Phirous, between Hyrkania and Parthia, four leagues journey from the Caspian sea. This mountain derives its name from an antient king of Persia, who subdued this country, and in whose time the mine was found; nay, the very stones carry his name also: for, though we call them turquoises, because they come from the true and proper Turky, yet, throughout the east, they are stiled phirouze. They have, of late years, discovered another mine of the same sort of stones; but they are by no means so valuable. They are commonly known amongst us by the name of turquoises of the new rock, to distinguish them from those taken out of the antient mines, which belong intirely to the king, who, after selecting the most beautiful, sells the rest to merchants. The reason why these late-discovered turquoises are less valued than those of the old mines, is, because they are less beautiful in their colour; and what colour they have is not thoroughly fixed; but grows paler by degrees, and at last wears almost quite out^z.

Beasts tame and wild.

THE horses of Persia are the most beautiful in the east, though they are not so much esteemed as those of Arabia. They are higher than our saddle-horses, and their limbs as well-proportioned as can be imagined. Though there are great numbers of them, yet, considering how much they are used, and the great demand made for them by the subjects of the mogul on one side, and of the grand signior on the other, they are held at a very great price, a fine horse being sometimes valued at a thousand crowns. Next to horses, we may reckon mules, which are much esteemed here, and are very fine; and, next to these, we may justly place asses, of which they have, in this country, two sorts, the first bred in Persia, heavy and doltish, as asses in other countries are; the other originally of an Arabian breed, the most docile and useful creature of its kind in the world. These are used wholly for the saddle, and are very frequently adorned with fine accoutrements, because of their easy manner of going, and their being very sure-footed. The clergy, that have not great benefices, affect to ride much on these Arabian asses; and, on this account, these animals are also kept at an high rate, a good ass being worth at Spauhawn twenty-five pistoles. Camels are numerous in Persia, and so much in esteem, that they are called kechty-krouch-konion, i. e. the ships of the land, because the inland trade is carried on by the help of these camels, as the foreign by ships. To describe this animal particularly here, would be improper, since they are rather more in use among the Arabians than among the Persians: we shall only observe, that the Persians make use of three sorts, a smaller, a larger, and a swifter kind of camel than are common elsewhere. The largest camels will travel with a load of twelve or thirteen hundred weight: the swifter kind of camel is called revatrie; i. e. the goer; because they trot as fast as an horse can gallop. It is worthy of notice, that these creatures are managed intirely by the voice, those who direct them making use of a kind of song; and according as they keep a quicker or slower time, the camel moves brisker, or at its ordinary pace. As beef is little eat in Persia, their oxen are generally employed in plough-

^z CHARDIN, tom. iii. p. 28. TAVERN. tom. i. l. iv. c. 2. p. 221. CARRERI, tom. ii. p. 212.

ploughing, and other sorts of labour. Hogs are no-where bred in Persia, if we except a province or two on the borders of the Caspian sea. Sheep and deer are very common throughout all Persia: and, as to the former, sir John Chardin assures us, that he has seen flocks of them, which covered four or five leagues of pasturage. As to beasts of chace, they are not so common here as in most of the countries of Europe, because it is, generally speaking, devoid of woods; but in Hyrkania, which abounds with them, deer of all sorts, and gazels, are found in great abundance. The gazel is a creature common throughout the east; and so many of them have been brought into Europe, that they need not any description. As to wild beasts, there are not a great number of them in this country, for the same reason which has been before assigned, with respect to beasts of chace, except in Hyrkania, where, in the woods, there are great numbers of lions, bears, tygers, leopards, &c. so that the antients spoke very truly of Hyrkania, when they called it the country of wild beasts. One thing; however, is to be remarked, that neither here, nor throughout all Persia, are there any wolves; but the chakal, or jackal (a creature which makes a terrible noise, and which many good writers take for the hyæna), is common every-where; and has this peculiar quality, that it tears up dead bodies, if the graves are not carefully watched. As to insects, the dryness of the air prevents our having much to say about them: there are, however, in some provinces, prodigious numbers of locusts, or grasshoppers, which come in such clouds as to obscure the air. In certain parts of the Persian dominions, they have large black scorpions, so venomous, that such as are stung by them die in a few hours: in others, they have lizards frightfully ugly, which are an ell long, and as thick as a large toad, their skins being as hard and tough as that of the sea-dog: they are said to attack and kill men sometimes; but that may be doubted. Among the reptiles of this country there is a long worm, called by the inhabitants bazar-pey; i. e. thousand feet: its whole body is stuck with small feet, with which it runs prodigiously fast; it is longer and smaller than a caterpillar; and its bite is dangerous, and even mortal, if it gets into the ear ^a.

THERE are in Persia all the several sorts of fowl which Birds. we have in Europe, but not in such quantities, because they

^a CHARDIN, tom. iii. p. 32. TAVERN. tom. i. l. v. c. 3. p. 423. CARRERI, tom. ii. p. 215.

they are chiefly bred and taken care of by the Armenians, who have frequently capons fattened to such a degree, that they are killed for nothing but their grease. There are, however, vast numbers of pigeons wild and tame; and as the dung of pigeons is the best manure for melons, they keep great numbers of them all over the kingdom; so that it may be on just grounds presumed, that no country in the world has such a number of pigeon-houses: they are most of them six times as large as any we have in Europe, built of brick, and plastered on the outside, every thing being disposed in the most convenient manner possible, for the preservation of these creatures. In the neighbourhood of Spaubawn they reckon more than three thousand of these pigeon-houses, chiefly erected for the preservation of the dung, which is sold for about three-pence the dozen pound: the Persians call this manure tchalgous; i. e. enlivening. It is a great diversion among the lower sort of people, in town and country, to catch pigeons, though it be forbidden; for this purpose, they have pigeons so taught, that, flying in one flock, they surround such wild ones as they find in a field, and bring them back with them to their masters. People who follow this trade are called kefter-perron, or pigeon-stealers; and there are some so addicted to it, that they will lie out whole days, in the very depth of winter, in order to carry on this foolish and wicked employment; for, under the notion of wild pigeons, they take every body's pigeons they can find. The partridges of this country are the largest and finest in the world, being generally of the size of our fowls. As to water-fowl, they have geese, ducks, cranes, herons, and many other sorts: but they are more plenty in the northern than the southern provinces. The singing-birds here are of the same kinds we have in Europe; the nightingale is heard there all the year, but chiefly in the spring; martlets, which learn whatever words are taught them; and another bird of the same size, called by them noura, which chatters continually, and repeats very pleasantly whatever it hears. As to birds of a larger size, the most considerable is the pelican, by the Persians called tacab, i. e. water-carrier, and also misc, i. e. sheep, because it is as large as one of those animals. Its feathers are white and soft, like those of a goose; its head is much larger in proportion than its body, and its beak from eighteen to twenty inches long, and as thick as a man's arm; under this beak it has a sack or pouch, in which it preserves a quantity of water, for moistening its food; it usually rests this long

long beak on its back, which would otherwise incommode it very much: the pelican lives chiefly upon fish, in taking of which it shews an admirable contrivance, by placing its beak in such a manner, under the water, as to catch them as it were in a net: when it opens its throat, the passage is large enough for a lamb: it is called the water-carrier, because in Arabia, and other places, where water is hard to be had, it makes its nest at a great distance from streams, or wells, foreseeing, as is supposed, that there will be less danger of disturbance in such places, though this situation obliges the bird to fly sometimes two days journey for a supply of water for her young, which she brings in the sack before-mentioned; and hence the fables of the ancients, of the pelican's tearing her breast open to feed her young. There are in Persia various birds of prey; and, in the mountains, about fifteen or twenty leagues from Schiras, there are some of the largest and finest in the world: the people take great pains in teaching them to fly at game; and the king has generally eight hundred of these birds, each of which has a person to attend it. The Persian lords are likewise great lovers of falconry, and even the common people practise it much; for neither this, nor shooting, nor hunting with dogs, is forbid to the meanest man in Persia^b.

WE shall divide the fishes of Persia into fresh and salt-Fish. water fish: As to the first, they are not very plenty, because there are no great rivers in Persia; however, there are of these three kinds, those of the lakes, of the rivers, and of the kerises, or subterraneous passages. Those in the lakes are carps and shads; the river-fish is chiefly barbel, which is also the sort of fish commonly met with in the subterraneous chanel; they are very large, but by no means good, and their eggs are particularly dangerous; which is generally attributed to their never beholding the light of the sun, but living altogether in these foul and cold streams. There are, in the river at Spaubawn, a great number of crabs, which crawl up the trees, and live night and day under the leaves whence they are taken, and are esteemed a very delicious food. As to sea-fish, no country is better served; the Caspian sea, as we have seen before, contains very fine fish on one side, and the Persian gulf, on the other, is believed to have more fish in it than any other sea in the world. They fish there twice a day, morning and evening;

^b CHARDIN, tom. iii. p. 38. TAVERN. tom. i. l. iv. c. 3. p. 225. CARRERI, tom. ii. p. 214.

evening; and such fish as are not sold by ten o'clock in the morning, or before sun-set, are thrown back into the sea. There are taken, on the coasts of this gulf, a sort of fish, for which they have no particular name; its flesh is of a red colour, very delicious; and some of them weigh two or three hundred pounds: its flesh will take salt, like beef, but it cannot be kept long, because the salt in this country is very corrosive: for which reason, whenever they intend to keep fish or flesh, the inhabitants content themselves with drying it, either in the air, or by the help of smoke ^c.

Natural
rarities.

As we have now examined the productions of the air, earth, and waters of Persia, we are next to speak of the natural rarities which are to be found in this large empire. Of these, the first we are to take notice of is a certain poisonous shrub, or plant, by the Arabians called chark, by the Persians gulbad-samour, i. e. the wind-poisoning flower; it flowers like the thistle, and has pods filled with a thick white liquor, of the consistence of cream, sharp and sour to the taste: it is affirmed, that where-ever the wind blows over a number of these plants, as it does frequently in Carmania the Desert, it thence contracts a poisonous quality, which proves mortal to the next that respire it ^d. There is likewise another shrub in the same country, viz. Carmania the Desert, singularly noxious; it is called kerzebre, i. e. asses poison, because those creatures are apt to eat of its fruit, which generally proves mortal. The very water that washes its roots is likewise held to be poisonous. The trunk of this shrub is as large as a man's leg, and it sometimes grows to the height of six feet; its bark is remarkably rough, and of a bright green colour, its leaves perfectly round, with a rising point in the middle; it bears a sort of flower exactly resembling the rose, of a kind of flesh-colour: whence it is apprehended, that the Greeks called it rhododendron. The Arabians, as well as the Persians, call it the gall, or poison of an ass. Some are of opinion, that it is the nerium of our herbalists, and the same plant that is called in French rosage ^e. The goats, both wild and tame, which feed on the shore of the Persian gulf, afford the bezoar so much esteemed in medicine; but the very best is taken out of these creatures, in the province of Corasson, or Bactria; and is thought to excel by far the bezoar of Golconda, and the rest of the Indies. The na-

^c CHARDIN, tom. iii. p. 44. TAVERN. tom. ii. l. iv. c. 11. p. 424. CARRERI, tom. ii. p. 210. ^d CHARDIN, tom. iii. p. 13. ^e Ubi supra.

turalists in Persia give it as their opinion, that the more dry and hard the food is on which the animal lives, the more salutiferous and efficacious the bezoar found in it proves. Corasson, and the coasts of the Persian gulf, are allowed to produce the dryest herbage in the world. It is no fable what has been reported, as to the formation of bezoar; for there is generally found in the core of such stones one or more pebbles, a little sprig of bramble, or other bush, sometimes a thorn-stick, &c. round which, by a continual accession of matter, the ball of bezoar conglomerates, and is formed: this stone is here found in sheep, as well as in goats; but it is not so in the Indies. Its very name is of oriental extract, and should be wrote pe-zaor, i. e. poison-killing; for the eastern people held it heretofore to be one of the strongest counter-poisons: quacks, however, were those who commended it most; and its virtues were rather taken upon trust, than supported by experience: the number of the credulous being great, raised its price very high; but of late years it is much sunk in its reputation, as well in the east as in Europe, it being now regarded chiefly as a sudorific, and even reckoned no very extraordinary thing in that class. The manner of giving it in Persia is thus; they either scrape or powder it, and put about two or three grains for a dose, into a spoonful of rose-water: while it was dear it was often counterfeited; and the materials made use of to this end were, generally speaking, some alexipharmic powders, mingled with resin and Spanish wax. It may not be amiss to observe, that the polish which bezoar-stones generally have, is artificial; for when they are taken out of the creature, their outside is of a rough greenish hue, just as the stone appears within ^f. The abmelec, or eater of locusts, or grasshoppers, is a bird which better deserves to be described, perhaps, than most others of which travellers have given us an account, because the facts relating to it are not only strange in themselves, but so well and so distinctly attested, that, however surprising they may seem, we cannot but afford them our belief. The food of this creature is the locust, or grasshopper: it is of the size of an ordinary hen, its feathers black, its wings large, and its flesh of a greyish colour; they fly generally in great flocks, as the starlings are wont to do with us: but the thing which renders these birds wonderful is, that they are so fond of the water of a certain fountain in Corasson, or Bactria, that where-ever

^f CHARDIN, tom. iii. p. 19.

that water is carried, they follow; on which account it is carefully preserved; for where-ever the locusts fall, the Armenian priests, who are provided with this water, bring a quantity of it, and place it in jars, or pour it into little chanel in the fields: the next day whole troops of these birds arrive, and quickly deliver the people from the locusts [§] (R). The river Mahmoudker, i. e. Mahmoud the deaf, is a surprizing natural rarity. At some distance from Spauhawn there is a range of rocks, plain and equal for a considerable space, except that here and there they have openings, like the embrasures in bastions, through which

§ CHARDIN, tom. iii. p. 40. TAVERN. tom. i. lib. iv. c. 3. p. 426.

(R) Sir John Chardin has given us, in his description of Persia, the following passage from an antient traveller, in relation to this bird (77). "In Cyprus, about the time that the corn was ripe for the sickle, the earth produced such a quantity of cavalettes, or locusts, that they obscured sometimes the splendor of the sun. Where-ever these came, they burnt and eat up all; for this there was no remedy, since, as fast as they were destroyed, the earth produced more: GOD, however, raised them up a means for their deliverance, which happened thus. In Persia, near the city of Cuerch, there is a fountain of water, which has a wonderful property of destroying these insects; for a pitcher full of this being carried in the open air, without passing through house or vault, and being set on an high place,

"certain birds which follow it, and fly and cry after the men who carry it from the fountain, come to the place where it is fixed. These birds are red and black, and fly in great flocks together, like starlings; the Turks and Persians call them musulinans. These birds no sooner came to Cyprus, but they destroyed the locusts with which the island was infested; but, if the water be spilt or lost, these creatures immediately disappear; which accident fell out when the Turks took this island; for one of them going up into the steeple of Famagusta, and finding there a pitcher of this water, he, fancying that it contained gold or silver, or some precious thing, broke it, and spilt what was therein; since which the Cypriots have been as much tormented as ever by the locusts (78)."

(77) Voyag. de Villamont, p. 97. ap. Chardin, tom. iii. p. 40. (78) Voyag. de Villamont, p. 97. ap. Chardin, tom. iii. p. 40.

the winds pass, with surprizing velocity : through these rocks falls the river we mentioned into a noble bason, partly wrought by the water itself, and partly formed by art. As one ascends the mountain, certain natural chinks shew the water at the bottom of it, like a sleeping lake, covered with rocks and mountains : it is thought to be of unfathomable depth ; and, when stones are thrown into it, they cause a most amazing noise, which almost deafens the hearers ; whence this river is supposed to derive its name. After its descent from the bason before-mentioned, it rolls along the plain, till at last it falls into the river Zenderoud. Some are of opinion, that this river does not derive its water from springs, but from the snow on the tops of the mountains, which, melting gradually, distils through the chinks of the rocks, into the vast lake before-mentioned : and this, they think, is in some measure proved from the acrimonious taste of these waters, which is, however, lost, after it joins the Zenderoud ^h. Under a certain mountain called Tagterustan, so called from the ruins of a building on the summit thereof, supposed to have been erected by the great Rustan, there runs a grotto, which deserves a place among the natural rarities of Persia. From the top of this grot there distils through the whole mountain, in two or three places, fresh water, which, falling into proper receptacles, forms two or three distinct streams, which issue from thence to water the plain. In this grotto, about the beginning of April, a great number of Indians assemble, to celebrate a feast in honour of an hermit or saint of theirs, who lived long here ; and the whole cave is full of shreds or rags of people's garments, who have come hither to be cured of their diseases, and have found relief. Not far from hence there is a mountain, where they pick up a sort of blue stones, very hard and shining, which they make use of in adorning their mosques, tombs, and other public buildings. We might add a multitude of other articles of this nature, if the description of Persia did not already begin to swell under our hands ; though we have used all the caution in our power to prevent its containing any thing which may not be useful and instructive, as well as entertaining, to the reader. Let us now pass to the artificial rarities of the country.

To begin then with the antient Persepolis, the ruins of A description which still testify the truth of what some antient writers ^{ption of} have affirmed, that, in the times of its prosperity, it was Persepolis.

^h CHARDIN, tom. ii. p. 2.

one of the most august cities in the world (plate I. and II.); when we consider all things, when we compare the descriptions of travellers with each other; when we consider what is recorded of other cities, and what is still to be seen of those that were most famed; we shall be induced to confess, that the Persian empire, in all its grandeur, could boast of nothing more glorious, nor have left any thing more astonishing to posterity, than the venerable ruins of this city. Should we pretend to give a full account of these noble remains, it would extend much farther than it is reasonable this chapter should go. We are writing a geographical description of Persia, in which we ought to omit nothing that may give the reader a distinct idea of this country, or which may give him a clearer light into the history which is to follow; but, in doing this, we are to remember, that this geographical description, and this history, are but sections of a far greater work; and therefore we must have a care, that it be of a piece, and not resemble a statue, with the body and arms of a man, and the hands, or even the fingers, of a giant. For this reason, we shall contract the many and diffusive accounts, which have been given us by eye-witnesses of these noble remains, into such a compass, as may give our readers an idea of their grandeur and magnificence, and shew them, at the same time, how useful fine draughts, and exact relations, of them may be towards settling many points of antient history, and giving us just notions of the spirit and genius of that nation, whose metropolis this was. In doing this, we shall not involve ourselves in the disputes of travellers, or attempt to decide, whether Le Brun be in the right in his criticisms, or whether they be not rather invectives against Sir John Chardin. Our business is to give a succinct detail of what has been said of Persepolis by authors antient and modern; and, as to what is controverted among them, we shall give it in a note (S), to avoid both
the

(S) In order to give the reader some idea of the difficulty we have met with in collecting this article, we shall here insert a concise account of such authors as have written on this subject, and whose descriptions we have perused. The first is Sir Thomas Herbert, who, in his travels, has a long relation not only of what himself saw at Persepolis, but of what has been said by antient authors on that head. He has given us also a specimen of the characters which are to be seen in the tablets belonging to these ruins, which agrees perfectly well with the drawings of Le Brun.

the swelling of the description, and interrupting the thread of the history.

THE

Brun. He has likewise inserted his conjectures concerning these antiquities, which are neither improbable nor injudicious; but as we shall be obliged to mention most of these from M. Le Brun, it would be unnecessary to trouble the reader with them here: we shall therefore only add to what we have already said concerning the remarks of our worthy countryman, that the draught which he has left us of these ruins, is far from being exact, and can hardly be said to bear any resemblance to the accurate descriptions of Chardin and Le Brun (79). Prior in point of time to Sir Thomas Herbert, but far inferior to him in every other respect, is the concise description of these remains of antiquity, given by our countryman Mr. Geofry Ducket, who, in 1658, passed this way. The main of what he says may be reduced to this, that Persepolis was 12 miles broad from gate to gate: whether this deserves any credit, or whether it was the slip of an inadvertent author, or credulous relator, we will not pretend to determine (80). John Albert de Mandelsloe, who observed these ruins in the year 1638, has left us a better description of them than most of the writers who went before him; and as there is something very plain and instructive in what he writes on this subject, it cannot but be agreeable to the reader to compare what he has said with what we have recorded in the text. The foundation or ground-work on which this vast structure was erected, is raised 22 geometrical feet, having, at each of its four corners, a pair of stairs of white marble, of 95 steps, so flat and broad, that twelve horses may go up conveniently together in a breast. Before you come to the main body of the structure itself, you pass through a square, where you see the ruins of a wall, and the remainders of two great gates, each of which have an horse harnessed and saddled after a very antic manner, carved on one side, and on the other two creatures resembling an horse, except that they have wings on each side; and the head is crowned, and like that of a lion. On the one side you see the ruins of 19 pillars of white and black marble, the least of which are 8, and some 10 ells high, without the bases; but whether they had been intended for the support of some large hall, or were built purely in the air, is not to be distinguished at this time. The same author, speaking of some unintelligible characters engraven on a square pillar, tells us, there are twelve lines of them so well proportioned, and

(79) Sir Thomas Herbert's travels, in Harris's collect. vol. i. p. 429.
 (80) Account of Mr. Geofry Ducket's travels, in Harris's collect. vol. i. p. 526.

THE plain, in which this famous city stood, is one of the finest in Persia, and indeed in all the east. Its length is nicely engraven, that they carry not in them the least mark of barbarity, but seem rather to have been wrought in a nice well-judging age: he complains of the rudeness of the inhabitants, who, without the least regard to so noble and so antient a palace, carry away large quantities of marble, and other stone, for the quicker dispatch of common and private buildings; he also deploras the want of perfect draughts of these wonderful fragments of the antient magnificence of Persia (81). Sir John Chardin, in the year 1674, took a view of these ruins, and examined them with great care and pains, as appears from the large and particular account of them inserted in the second volume of his travels. It is true, M. Le Brun, who stayed there a much longer time than he, and who had consequently a better opportunity of studying and describing what he saw, than this gentleman had, attacks him very warmly on the head of his description; but whoever reads, with calmness and candour, what Sir John Chardin, with great perspicuity, and without the least affectation of learning, has delivered on this head, will be of opinion, that, how much nicer and more exact soever the descriptions of M. Le Brun may be, yet both the narration and the cuts of Sir John Chardin are excellent in their kind, and serve to communicate to us a multitude of useful particulars, which are nowhere else recorded (82). Dr. Gemelli Carreri has written a whole chapter, under the title of A description of the palace of Darius, and the ruins of the antient Persepolis: it is concise, as all his descriptions are; and the observations he makes, are short and weighty, according to the custom of Italian authors. He has illustrated his narration with a few prints, which serve to give a competent idea of the magnificence of this antient city, and to demonstrate the conformity there is between the several accounts of these ruins, contained in the works of intelligent writers (83). M. Le Brun, who arrogates to himself a great superiority over all the writers on this subject, spent a long time in surveying, measuring, and drawing views of these fragments of antiquity: he has taken up more than thirty folio pages in describing what he saw, and remarking on the intentions of those who designed the several figures, of which he has given us copies, which are certainly very useful, as well as very beautiful ornaments to his book. Besides, he has written a long dissertation on the difference between his account

(81) J. A. Mandelsloe's travels, in Harris's collect. (82) Chardin. voyag.
tom. ii. p. 140—197. (83) Carreri voyag. tom. ii. p. 246.

C. XI. The History of the Persians.

99

is eighteen or nineteen leagues; its breadth in some places two, in others four, and, in some, six. It is watered by the great river Araxes or Bendemir, and by a multitude of rivulets besides. Within the compass of this plain, there are between a thousand and fifteen hundred villages, without reckoning those in the mountains, all adorned with pleasant gardens, and planted with shady trees. The entrance of this plain, on the west side, has received as much grandeur from nature, as the city it covers could do from industry or art. It consists of a range of mountains, steep and high, four leagues in length, and about two miles broad, forming two flat banks, with a rising terrace in the middle, the summit of which is perfectly plain and even, all of native rock. In this there are such openings, and the terraces are so fine, and so even, that one would be tempted to think the whole the work of art, if the great extent, and prodigious elevation thereof, did not convince one, that it is a wonder too great for aught but nature to produce. Undoubtedly these banks were the very places, where the advanced guards from Persepolis took post, and from which Alexander found it so difficult to dislodge them. One cannot from hence descry the ruins of the city, because the banks are too high to be overlooked; but one can perceive, on every side, the ruins of walls, and of edifices, which heretofore adorned the range of mountains, of which we are speaking.

and that of Sir John Chardin, wherein the antiquities of Persepolis are farther explained (84). From these materials a very copious description, and very curious observations, might have been thrown together; especially when we consider, that, besides travellers, several other writers of great eminence, have left us their thoughts on this subject; such as the most judicious Dr. Hyde, in his learned book of the religion of the ancient Persians; wherein he has explained, with great knowledge and learning, some of the enigmatical figures represented on the walls and pillars of these antient buildings (85); but it is our business to hint only where the curious and inquisitive reader may be informed at large, as to all the extraordinary particulars relating to these monuments of the Persian glory, our description being no more than the outlines of a regular dissertation on this head; for which, what has been said above, and what we have advanced in this note, will, we hope, serve for a sufficient apology.

(84) Le Brun voyag. tom. ii. p. 285. p. 344.

(85) Hyde hist. relig. vet. Pers.

On the west, and on the north, this city is defended in the like manner; so that, considering the height and evenness of these banks, one may safely say, with a late ingenious traveller, that there is not in the world a place so fortified by nature.^k The ancient palace of the kings of Persia, called by the inhabitants Chil-minar, i. e. forty columns, is situated at the foot of the mountain; the walls of this stately building are still standing on three sides; and it has the mountain on the east. The front is in extent six hundred paces from north to south, and three hundred and ninety from east to west, quite to the rock, without any stair-case on that side, till one comes to the mountain, where, by the help of certain ragged stones, it is easy to get to the lowest part of the wall, where it is not above eighteen feet seven inches in height, and, in some places, not so high. This curtain is four hundred and ten paces in length on the north, and one-and-twenty feet high in some places; but in most thirty, quite to the mountain, where is still a corner of a wall, and in the middle an entrance, by which one may get up to the top, by broken pieces of the rock. One finds also, before the west side, several rocks, which rise towards the north, till they are even with the wall, appearing like a kind of platform, extending eighty paces before it. It seems as if there had been a stair-case antiently on this side, and some buildings without this curtain, the rocks being very smooth in many places. On the top of this edifice, there is a platform of four hundred paces, which extends, in the middle of the front wall, quite to the mountain. Along this wall, and all the three sides, runs a pavement of two stones joined together, which fill up a space eight feet broad; some of these stones are eight, nine and ten feet long, and six in breadth; but the rest are smaller. The principal stair-case is not placed in the middle of the front, but much nearer the north end than the south, being six hundred paces distant from this, and only an hundred and sixty-five from that. This stair-case is composed of two flights of stairs, forty-two feet asunder at bottom. Its depth is twenty-five feet seven inches to the wall, from whence proceed the steps, which are as long as the stair-case is deep, within two inches. Each of these steps is four inches high, and fourteen in breadth; so that nothing can be more commodious: there are fifty-five on the north side, and fifty-three on the south; but the latter are not so whole

^k CHARDIN, tom. ii. p. 141. LE BRUN, tom. ii. p. 261.

as the former. Ascending thus high, one meets with a landing-place, fifty-one feet four inches broad, proportioned exactly to the breadth of the stair-case: the stones of this landing-place are of an extraordinary size. The two flights of the stair-case are separated by the wall of the front, but in such a manner, that they decline from each other from the bottom up to the middle; and incline towards each other from the middle to the top; which has a wonderful effect on the eye, and suits perfectly well with that magnificence which reigns throughout every other part of the building.

The upper-part of this stair-case consists of forty-eight steps on one side, and on the other, some of which are damaged, notwithstanding they are cut in the rock. At the top of these there is another landing-place, between the flights of stairs, seventy-five feet broad, paved with great stones, some thirteen or fourteen feet long, and seven or eight broad ¹. (T).

To

¹ LE BRUN, ubi supr. CHARDIN, ubi supr.

(T) In the description in our text, we have adhered pretty closely to M. Le Brun; and that for many reasons: First, because his profession, which was that of a painter, rendered him more capable of describing minutely, and of designing exactly, all the wonders of Persepolis, than any former traveller, whom either business or curiosity had led that way. Secondly, this gentleman had, as we have more than once hinted, determined with himself to consider more attentively, and to examine more nicely, these relics of Persian architecture, than any other author had done. Thirdly, he had not only all the authors we have mentioned in our last note, but Monf. Chardin's curious plans, to direct him, and, it may be, to correct him, in his notions on this head. Fourthly, there is such an agreement, in material points at least, between his accounts and those of Chardin, notwithstanding his affecting, on all occasions, to quarrel with that gentleman's sentiments, that we did not think it at all necessary to trouble the reader with any particulars of a dispute of no great importance in itself, and which, though prosecuted with warmth, seems to have been commenced out of vanity. It may not be amiss to observe here, that the fame of these ruins has for the two or three last centuries been so great, and the desires of the virtuosi to see exact plans of them so strong, that some have ventured to publish the conceptions of their own brains for the antiquities of Chelminar. Such was the view of Persepolis sent into the world by Sebastian Serlio, an Italian architect, in his account of noble buildings antient and modern,

The ruins of Perse-polis.

To speak now of what is to be seen when one is amongst these ruins: the first thing that salutes the eye in a strait line, forty-two feet distant from the front before-described, are two great porticoes, and two columns (plate III.). The pavement of the first is much damaged by time; and the second is sunk five feet lower than the former. These porticoes are twenty-two feet four inches in depth, and thirteen feet four inches in breadth. One sees, in the front of each pilaster, a large figure cut in bas-relief, twenty-two feet in length from its fore to its hind feet, and fourteen feet and an half high. The heads of these animals are intirely destroyed; their breast and feet project from the pilaster; and their bodies are very much damaged. Those of the first portico front towards the stair-case, and those of the second, which have wings on their bodies, towards the mountains. One sees, above the pilasters, certain characters; but they are so small, and so high, that one can make nothing of them (plate IV.). The first portico is still thirty-nine feet high, and the second twenty-modern, since therein are found just forty columns, adorned with chapiters of the Corinthian order, which no traveller ever had the happiness to see. In the voyages of John Struys, amongst a multitude of other strange things, and temerarious assertions, we have a wild description of these ruins, and a wilder plan, said in the title-page of the book to be drawn by the author's own hand; which, if it were, he certainly drew by guess, since it is not only quite different from the plans published by others, but contains also, such palpable mistakes as never could have been committed by an eye-witness of these noble works, especially one who looked on them with a design of describing them to the rest of mankind. We are not, however, to fancy, that where-ever travellers differ in their accounts, one of them must be mistaken. M. Le Brun and Sir John Chardin vary very little in what they say relating to the pillars yet standing at Persepolis; but there is a considerable difference, on this head, between what they say, and what we find recorded in the writings of Figuera, Herbert, and Thevenot; all of whom testify nearly to the same point. Time, and the barbarity of the modern Persians, who make very little account of these ruins, have made considerable alterations since they were first described; and it is very probable, that whoever sees them twenty years hence, will find them not exactly answerable to what is said of them by M. Le Brun (86).

(86) Chardin voyag. tom. ii. p. 152.

eight. The bases of the pilasters are five feet two inches high. The figures are not carved out of one stone, but out of three joined together for that purpose. In their present condition, it is not easy to decide what they were intended for, though many authors have given the world their conjectures, of which the reader will find some account in the authors cited at the bottom of the foregoing pages, will judge for himself which is the most probable of those taken notice of there.

THE two columns, which stand between the two porticoes, are more intire than any other part of the ruins. They are of white marble, fluted, and wonderfully beautiful, that is, as to their chapters, and other ornaments; for, as to their bases, they are covered with earth. They are twenty-six feet from the first portico, and fifty-six from the second, fourteen feet in circumference, and fifty-four high. There were certainly two others between these and the last portico, of which there are still some remains, great pieces of marble lying about half-buried in the earth. Fifty-two feet from the last-mentioned portico southward, there is a large cistern, cut out of a whole stone, twenty feet long, seventeen feet five inches broad, and three feet above the earth. From thence to the wall, there is a space of about an hundred and fifty paces, in which one finds nothing but broken pieces of stone, and the remains of a column, which appears to have been unfluted, and therein differs from all the rest. It is about two feet in compass, and twelve and an half long (plate V.). From it to the mountain, there is nothing to be met with, but wild heaps of broken stones.

TURNING from these porticoes to the south, one sees, at the distance of an hundred and seventy-two feet, another stair-case, consisting of two flights of steps, in the same manner as the former, one fronting towards the east, the other towards the west. The wall is still about six feet seven inches high; but, in the middle, it is almost intirely ruined. The extent of the east flight of stairs is eighty-three feet; and it is evident enough from the lowermost of them, that they were adorned with figures in bas-relief. On the top of the stair-case are still some foliages visible, with figures, in bas-relief, of a lion tearing a bull, larger than the life (plate VI.). The stair-case is half-buried in earth; and one sees certain small figures on the wall on both sides. The west flight consists of twenty-eight steps; the other, having suffered more by the accession of the earth, has now but eighteen, each seventeen feet long, three inches high, fourteen inches and an half broad. There are many of these, towards the top, broken, and two or three intirely destroyed, though cut out of the rock. At the end of the landing-place from this stair-case, there is another front, whereon there are three rows of small figures, one above another. Of the first row there is nothing now to be seen, but the parts below the girdle, the rest being destroyed by time. The second row, which is the best preserved, has, notwithstanding, received great injuries: and, as to the third, there is nothing now above ground, but their heads. These figures are two feet nine inches high; and the wall, of which there are still five feet three inches above ground, is ninety-eight feet in extent, from the first step to its left corner, where there is another stair-case, the steps of which are exactly of the same size with those before-described. From what remains of the inner wall, it appears, that it was also covered with small figures. At the end of the stair-case, there is another wall, which extends ninety feet beyond the landing-place. The corner turns a little to the south, and goes no farther, because the earth is there at the same height. Returning to the west flight of steps of the stair-case before-mentioned, we meet with a wall forty-five feet in length beyond the bottom of the stair-case, with an interval of sixty-seven feet to the west front. This side, like the former, is adorned with three rows of figures, and a lion tearing a bull, or an ass, with an horn in its forehead. Between these animals and the figures, there is a square space, filled with characters, of which the highest are quite effaced. The figures on this side are fairer than on the other, the ground being less elevated: there are twenty-five steps here. As for the figures on the stair-case, we refer the reader to the plates VII. and VIII. The wall, beyond the stair-case, is unadorned with figures.

At the step of the stair-case, between the two flights of stairs, there is an open place, paved with very large stones, between the stair-case and the first columns, which are twenty-two feet and two inches distant. They stand in two rows, each consisting of six columns, of which there is only one remaining intire; eight bases and some broken pieces of the rest. There are six rows of columns, seventy feet eight inches distant from these, each row consisting of six columns. These thirty-six columns are twenty-two feet two inches from each other, as the former are. There are still seven of these intire, with the bases of all the rest; but much broken and defaced. Of those which are left, there is one of the first row, one of the second, two of the third,

third, and one of each of the rest. One finds, between these columns and those before-mentioned, several large stones, heretofore part of some subterraneous building. Seventy feet eight inches west from these columns, towards the front of the stair-case, there were twelve columns more, disposed in two rows, of which there are only five remaining. The bases of seven more are visible; and the ground is covered with the ruins of those which are decayed. One can discover, however, among the fragments of those ornaments, which lie half-interred, that each of these columns was surmounted by the figure of a camel kneeling (plate I. p. 96.) To the south of these columns stands the edifice most elevated of any in these ruins; but it is necessary for us to observe, that, on the east, there are still discernible two rows of columns, consisting of six each, of which the bases of four or five remain still above the earth; and, in all appearance, these were opposed to other rows of columns, which were in the front. Advancing still towards the mountain, one finds the ruins of many buildings, consisting of windows, some of them filled with characters (plate IX.); passages, portals, &c (plates X. XI. XII. XIII.). The porticoes are adorned with figures: and these ruins take up a great space. But, to return to the edifice before spoken of: it extends an hundred and eighteen feet from the columns; and the wall of its front is yet five feet seven inches high, composed of one row of stones, some of which are eight feet broad, extending, from east to west, an hundred and thirteen feet. There are, before the edifice, certain stone foundations still visible; but, what end they served, cannot be guessed, since there is no stair-case on this side. This wall is adorned with no sort of ornament, as the rest are. There are however two stair-cases, one on the north, the other on the south side; but almost intirely ruined. On the landing-place, however, we still discover the remains of porticoes, which an earthquake threw down. All the rest of the building, which consists of great and little porticoes, is intirely ruined: the ground, covered with the fragments, is about an hundred and forty-seven feet in length, and nearly square. On the north, there are two porticoes, and three niches or windows walled up; and, on the south, a portico, and four windows open. There are two other porticoes, which are not covered, on the west, with two openings; and a third to the east, with three niches of windows walled up. Six of these openings are without cornices; and there remains but half an one to the east. One sees, under the two porticoes on the north, on each side, the figure of a man, and two women, from the knees upwards, their legs being covered with earth; under one of those, on the west-side, there is the figure of a man, fighting a bull, which has an horn in its forehead; the man holds this with his left-hand, and strikes a poniard into the belly of the beast with his right: on the other side the figures are the same, excepting only, that the man holds the horn with his right hand, and stabs the beast with his left. In the second portico there is the figure of a man holding and stabbing a beast, resembling either a deer or a lion, by such an horn in its forehead, and with wings upon its back (plate XIV.). Under the portico to the north, the same figures are visible; only the man combats here a true lion, which he holds by the mane with his right hand, and stabs with his left (plate XV.): these figures have half their legs buried under the earth. On both sides of the portico towards the south, there is the figure of a man, with an ornament on his head, resembling a crown, attended by two persons, one of whom holds an umbrella over his head, and the other has some ensign of authority in its hand (plate XVI.). Above these figures are three niches full of characters. On the pilasters of the first portico, which are out of their places, and lie near the flight of stairs last-mentioned, there are two men, each armed with a lance, which the one holds with both hands, the other only in his right (plate XVII.). One alone of these is intire. There are other pieces of pilasters, scattered up-and-down with various figures (plate XVIII. XIX. XX.), some of them very remarkable for the number of figures they contain, exhibiting, as some suppose, a royal audience, where the king appears sitting on his throne, with a footstool, a person with a kind of umbrella over his head, a petitioner before him, and his guards, with shields, lances, &c. attending him (plates XXI. XXII. XXIII.). Behind this edifice, one finds another of much the same kind, except that it is thirty-eight feet longer, with a niche or window blocked up, and another open, with two stones standing up, one on the right-hand, the other on the left. Of these, that towards the east is broken; the other, towards the west, is still twenty-eight feet high. There are, on the top of this stone, three niches or tablets, full of characters, and a fourth below, which seems to have been cut after the rest. The like inscriptions are seen in the niches or windows before-mentioned; each tablet consisting of one stone only. To the south there are two flights of stairs, the one to the east, the other to the west; but of these only five steps are remaining; and, on the wings, as well on the wall, which separates them, there are still visible some small figures and foliages, though half-buried in the ground. An hundred feet from thence, to the south, the last ruins are found of these edifices, consisting chiefly of porticoes, and inclosed spaces of ground; and, between these two heaps of ruins, another stair-case, of which only seven steps are remaining; which serve, however, to shew, that antiently they were adorned with figures and foliages. On the east side of this stair-case, there are certain subterraneous passages, in which the inhabitants imagine great treasures are hid. M. Le Brun entered them, as several travellers have done before; but was quickly obliged to return, without making any discoveries, the passages being so narrow, and so dark and moist, that it was impossible to go far. However, even these experiments are sufficient to shew, that the conjectures of the inhabitants are very indifferently founded, since, from the structure of these vaults, we are left to judge, they were rather intended for carrying off water, or some such-like purpose, than to be made repositories of the royal treasures ^m.

As to the conjectures of the learned concerning these remains of the magnificence of antient times; the processions delineated on the walls; the vases in the hands of many of the figures; the several tablets of unknown characters; and the many hieroglyphical representations which are still seen in these ruins; have led some great men into an opinion, that this antient structure was a temple, dedicated to the deities worshiped in Persia. Others, with much greater reason, have delivered it as their sentiment, that these ruins are the sad remains of the antient palace of Persepolis, which they think strongly confirmed by the descriptions, left us by antient authors, of that noble pile of building. As to the figures in procession, those who adhere to this notion say, that they represent a birth-day feast of one of the Persian emperors, when his courtiers were wont to bring him presents. As to the inscriptions, they are, generally speaking, illegible even by the Persees or antient Persians themselves; so that hardly any argument can be deduced from them. The hieroglyphics might as well serve for ornaments to a palace, as to a temple; and, it may be, were some of the spoils of Egypt, brought thence by Cambyse's army. However this be, certain it is, that the habits of these figures agree perfectly well with the descriptions of the old Median and Persian robes, as they are recorded in Greek writers. On the whole, therefore, it may be presumed, that, whatever this edifice was, it was actually erected by the kings of the first race, since nothing seen there carries the aspect of later times; but whether Cyrus was the founder, or whether this palace was begun by Darius, and finished by Xerxes, is a point not easily, if at all, to be determined. From a view of the figures visible on the walls, pillars, &c. it seems probable to us, that they were enigmatical representations, at least for the most part, of the course of the heavenly bodies, and of the effects produced by them. But of this, and of the reasons which incline us to believe it, we shall take occasion to discourse more largely in our section on the religion of the antient Persians. The traditions of the natives, in respect to these antiquities, are generally represented, by travellers, as confused, extravagant, and not to be depended on. This may, however, in some measure, arise from their want of acquaintance with oriental history, which is not always so fabulous and incoherent, as it is represented to be. There is, and there ever will be, a wide difference between the narrative stile of these eastern nations, and that in use amongst us. But, as we shall elsewhere shew, even in respect to these ruins, certainty may be deduced, as well from the hyperbolical relations of eastern writers, as from the artful memoirs of some of our western historians (V).

^m LE BRUN, vol. ii. p. 268.

AT

(V) In this note we intend to examine, in as short a compass as possible, what antient writers have delivered concerning the city and palace of Persepolis. To begin then with what is said by Dionodorus Siculus (87) on this subject: He relates, that, after passing the river Araxes, Alexander met with near 800 Greeks, most of them old men, some having their hands, others their feet, some their ears, and some their noses, cut off, which had been done by the Persians of that district. This fight so incensed him against the inhabitants of Persepolis, that he called, says our author, the Macedonians together, and told them, " That Persepolis, the metro" polis of Persia, had, of all

" the cities of Asia, done most
" mischief to the Greeks;
" and therefore he gave it up
" to the plunder and spoil of " the soldiers, except the king's " palace. This was the rich" est city of any under the " sun, and, for many ages,
" all the private houses were
" full of all sorts of wealth,
" and whatever was desire-
" able. The Macedonians,
" therefore, forcing into the " city, put all the men to the " sword, and rised and car" ried away every man's
" goods and estate; amongst

(87) Histor. l. xvii. c. 7.

" which

A two leagues distance from these ruins, there is a famous mountain, seated between two of the finest plains in

" which was abundance of " rich and costly furniture,
 " and ornaments of all sorts.
 " From this place were hur" ried away, here-and-there,
 " vast quantities of silver and
 " gold, great numbers of rich
 " garments, some of purple,
 " others embroidered with
 " gold; all which became a " plentiful prey to the rave" nous soldiers. And thus
 " the royal seat of the Persians,
 " once famous throughout the " world, was now exposed to
 " scorn and contempt, and
 " rifled from top to bottom.
 " For though every place was " full of rich spoil, yet the " covetousness of the Macedo-
 " nians was insatiably still " thirsting after more. And " they were so eager in plun" dering, that they fought
 " one with another with drawn " swords, and many who were " conceived to have got a
 " greater share than the rest,
 " were killed in the quarrel.
 " Some things, that were of " extraordinary value, they " divided with their swords,
 " and each took a share;
 " others in rage cut off the " hands of such as laid hold
 " upon a thing that was in " dispute. They first ravished
 " the women, as they were in " their jewels and rich attire,
 " and then sold them for
 " slaves: so that by how " much Persepolis excelled all
 " the other cities in glory and " worldly felicity, by so much
 " the more was the measure of " their misery and calamity.
 " Then Alexander seized up
 " on all the treasures in the " citadel, which was a vast
 " quantity of gold and silver,
 " of the public revenues that " had been heaping up, and
 " deposited there, from the " time of Cyrus the first king
 " of Persia, to that day; for
 " there were found an hundred " and twenty thousand talents,
 " reckoning the gold after the " rate of silver. Part of this " treasure he took for the use " of the war, and ordered
 " another part of it to be " treasured up at Susa. To " this purpose, he ordered,
 " that a multitude of mules,
 " both for draught and car" riage, and three thousand
 " camels, with pack-saddles,
 " should be brought out of " Babylon, Mesopotamia, and
 " Susa; and with these he " conveyed all the treasures
 " to the several places he " had appointed. For, by " reason of his great hatred
 " to the inhabitants, he was
 " resolved not to trust them
 " with any thing, but utter" ly to ruin and destroy Per-
 " sepolis; of whose palace, in " regard of its stately struc" ture, we conceive it will " not be impertinent, if we " say something. This state" ly fabric, or citadel, was sur" rounded with a treble wall:
 " the first was sixteen cubits
 " high, adorned with many " sumptuous buildings, and " lofty turrets. The second " was in the world, and which, by the inhabitants, is called by several names; sometimes they stile it Kabreston-Gauron,

i. e.

“ was like to the first, but as “ high again. The third was “ drawn like a quadrant four“ square, sixty cubits high, all “ of the hardest marble, and “ so cemented as to continue “ to the latest time. On the “ four sides are brazen gates, “ near to which there are cur“ tains, or palifades, of the “ same metal, twenty cubits “ high; these were raised as “ well to strike the beholder “ with terror, as for the “ strength and security of the “ place. On the east side of “ the citadel, about four hun“ dred feet distant, stood a “ mount, called the Royal “ mount; for here are the se-“ pulchres of the kings, many “ apartments, and little cells, “ being cut into the midst of “ the rock; into which cells
 “ there is made no direct pas“ sage, but the coffins, with “ the dead bodies, are, by “ machines, hoisted up, and “ so let down into these vaults.
 “ In this citadel were many “ stately lodgings, both for “ the king and his soldiers, of “ excellent workmanship, and “ treasury - chambers, most “ commodiously contrived for “ the laying up of money.
 “ Here Alexander made a “ sumptuous feast for the en“ tertainment of his friends, “ in commemoration of his “ victory, and offered magni“ ficent sacrifices to the gods.
 “ At this feast were entertain“ ed women, who prostituted “ their bodies for hire, where “ the cups went so high, and “ the reins were let so loose to “ drunkenness and debauch“ ery, that many were both “ drunk and mad. Among “ the rest, there was at that “ time a curtesan called Thais,
 “ an Athenian, that said, Alex- “ ander would perform the “ most glorious act of any “ that ever he had done, if, “ while he was feasting with “ them, he would burn the “ palace, and so the glory
 “ and renown of Persia might “ be said to be brought to no“ thing in a moment by the “ hands of women. This “ spreading abroad, and com“ ing to the ears of the young “ men (who commonly make “ little use of reason when “ drink is in their heads), one “ of them presently cried out, “ Come on, bring us fire-brands;
 “ and so incites the rest to fire
 “ the citadel, to revenge that “ impiety the Persians had “ committed in destroying the “ temples of the Grecians. At “ this others, with joy, set “ up a shout; but said, that “ so brave an exploit belong“ ed only to Alexander to per“ form. The king, stirred up “ at these words, embraced “ the motion; upon which as “ many as were present, left “ their cups, and leaping “ from the table, said, they “ would now celebrate a “ victorious festival to Bacchus.
 “ Hereupon multitudes of “ firebrands were presently got “ together, and all the women
 “ that

i. e. the sepulchres of the *Gaur*s; sometimes Nachs-Rustan, the pictures of Rustan; and sometimes Takt-Rustan,
i. e.

“ that played upon musical in“ struments, which were at “ the feast, were called for;
“ and then the king, with “ songs, pipes, and flutes, “ bravely led the way to this “ noble expedition, contrived
“ and managed by this whore, “ Thais, who, next after the “ king, threw a firebrand “ into the palace. This pre“ cedent was followed by the “ rest; so that, in a very short “ time, the whole fabric, by “ the violence of the fire, was “ burnt to ashes.” We have transcribed this long passage, to avoid a multitude of quotations; since several authors have either copied Diodorus, or the authors made use of by him. Plutarch, in his life of Alexander, gives us an account of this transaction, little different from that which we have just seen: indeed he speaks less confidently of the story of Thais than Diodorus does; whence some have suspected the truth of it, and whether Thais had any concern therein, or no. Arrian says, that Alexander seized at Passargaden on the money which had been laid up there by Cyrus; and then adds,
“ The royal palace of the Per- “ sian monarchs he burnt, “ much against the will of “ Parmenio, who intreated him “ to leave it untouched, not “ only because it was impro“ per to despoil and destroy

“ what he had gained by his “ valour, but that he would “ thereby disoblige the Asia- “ tics, and render them less “ benevolent to him; for they “ would then suppose, that he “ would not keep Asia in his “ possession, but abandon it as “ soon as it was conquered “ and laid waste. To which “ Alexander made answer, that “ he was resolved to avenge
“ the antient injuries his coun“ try had received from the “ Persians, who, when they “ arrived with their army in “ Greece, subverted Athens, “ burnt their temples, and “ committed many other bar“ barous devastations there.
“ But this, in my opinion,
“ seems to have been no pru“ dent or politic action of A- “ lexander, and was no revenge
“ upon the Persians at all (88).” Strabo speaks very concisely on this subject; his words are these: “ Alexander destroyed
“ the temple of Persepolis, in “ revenge of the injuries done
“ the Greeks, whose cities and “ temples the Persians had for“ merly destroyed with fire and “ sword (89).” Curtius has nothing singular upon this head, except the following observation: “ The city of “ Persepolis was so far from “ being rebuilt, that, unless “ the river Araxes ran near it,
“ there had not been the least “ sign left to have guessed “ where it stood; that it was

(88) Exped. Alex. lib. iii. c. 18.(89) Geogr. lib. xv. p. 730.

“ situated

i. e. the throne of Rustan. This Rustan, as we have observed before, is the Hercules of the east, or rather the Ama-dis ;

“ situated twenty stadia from “ the banks of this river, the “ inhabitants rather believe,
 “ than know with any certain“ ty (90).” In this point, however, he seems to have been mistaken ; for, first, he is the only author who says, that Persepolis was ruined. Diodo- rus says indeed, that it was plundered ; but, as to burning and destroying, what he relates is confined to the palace :
 besides, after the death of A- lexander, he informs us, that Antigonus, taking five thousand talents of silver out of the treasury at Ecbatana, marched into Persia, and, after twenty days, arrived at its capital Persepolis (91). Arrian also speaks of this city, as still standing after the destruction of the palace ; and, if we may believe the author of the book of Maccabees, it continued a great and noble city. What he says on this subject, stands thus in our translation : “ A“ bout that time came Antio- “ chus, with dishonour, out of “ the country of Persia : for “ he had entered the city call“ ed Persepolis, and went about “ to rob the temple, and to “ hold the city : whereupon “ the multitude, running to “ defend themselves with their “ weapons, put them to flight ;
 “ and so it happened, that An- “ tiachus, being put to flight
 “ of the inhabitants, returned

“ with shame (92).” In the first book of Maccabees, there is still a more extraordinary passage, in respect to the point before us : “ About that time, “ says the author, king Antio- “ chus, traveling through the “ high countries, heard say,
 “ that Elymais, in the country
 “ of Persia, was a city greatly “ renowned for riches, silver,
 “ and gold : and that there was “ in it a very rich temple, “ wherein were coverings of “ gold, and breast-plates and “ shields, which Alexander, son “ of Philip, the Macedonian “ king, who reigned first a“ mong the Grecians, had left “ there. Wherefore he came “ and sought to take the city,
 “ and to spoil it ; but he was “ not able, because they of the “ city, having had warning “ thereof, rose up against him “ in battle : so he fled, and “ departed thence with great “ heaviness, and returned to Ba- “ bylon (93).” That by Elymais the author meant Persepolis, we have all the reason in the world to believe, since we are certain, that the latter is only a Greek appellation, and not the true name of the city ; nor, in all probability, did the Greeks ever commit the Persian name thereof to writing. One thing we will venture to observe here, which has not hitherto been remarked by any author ; it is this : Persepolis, or Persepolis,

(90) Curt. lib. v. c. 7. (91) Diod. Sic. lib. xix. c. 3. (92) 2 Mac.
c. ix. ver. 1, 2. (93) 1 Mac. c. vi. ver. 1.—4.

signifies

dis; for the stories they tell of him are alike fabulous and romantic. Our business, however, is not with them, but with the mountain, which is an intire rock, harder and capable of a better polish than marble: it is levelled by art; its sides are perfectly perpendicular, so that it looks like a large wall; and upon it there are figures represented in bas-relief, with great skill and beauty. The first of these, which is about the height of a pike from the ground, represents a combat between two knights, mounted on horseback, each of them having an iron mace in his left-hand: he on the right has a bonnet on his head, and holds out in his right-hand a large ring of iron, of which the other knight seems to take hold with his right-hand. All these figures, as well of horses as of men, are gigantic: and, as to the meaning of the piece, if we trust tradition, and the Persian poets, it is thus to be understood: they say, that one of these cavaliers was Rustan, or Rustem, the son of Sal the white, the son of Sam, the son of Noramon king of the Indies; the second Rustan, or Rustem, the son of Tahmouss king of Persia. These two princes are said to have been engaged in long and bloody wars, and at last to have agreed to determine their quarrels by a combat: the manner in which this was to be performed was thus: one extended a ring of iron in his right-hand, which the other laid hold of, it being previously agreed, that whoever could wrench from the other this iron ring, should be esteemed the conqueror, and should be obeyed for the future by him who lost it. They say too, that the king of Persia, who is the person represented by the figure having a long beard, vanquished the king of the Indies in this engagement. Besides this ring and mace, these combatants have iron bullets, hanging by chains at the sides of their horses, which, it is to be supposed, they let fly at each other, in the same manner as peasants sometimes fight with their flails (plate signifies in Greek no more than the city of the Persians. Elymais signifies the same thing, as also Pharsabad, which Sir John Chardin conjectures to be its antient name in the Persic tongue: hence, therefore, we may, with probability, conclude, that its most antient name was Elymais, derived from the antient name of Per- sia, Elam; that, in process of time, when Persia was called Pharas, this city might be stiled Pharasabad; and that the Greeks might translate either of these appellations into their own language by the word Persopolis: all which we submit to the curious and inquisitive reader.

Tombs at Naxi Rufan.

XXIV.). Near this figure there are two others (plate XXV. XXVI.): but, as to their representation, it is impossible to say any thing with certainty, since we are furnished with no lights by antient writers, and the traditions of the modern Persians, on such subjects, are little to be depended on; though, to say the truth, the common people in Persia are rather more modest than elsewhere; for, when they are asked about the meaning of these figures, they generally say, GOD knows: nay, their men of learning content themselves with affirming, that they relate to the antient heroes of their country, without pretending to enter into particulars. At a small distance from these figures is the first tomb. At sixty paces from this tomb there is another; thirty paces from thence a third; and, at the distance of an hundred paces, a fourth; which is the last (plate XXVII. XXVIII. XXIX.). Not far from these tombs are two small edifices (plate XXX.). Near the third tomb are two inscriptions; one fifteen lines in length, in the character made use of in the inscriptions at the palace of Persopolis. There are many other curious representations carved on this mountain, some perfectly whole and sound, others much defaced, either through the injuries of time and weather, or the brutal zeal of the Mohammedans, who make it a piece of high merit to destroy all kind of imagery^a. Should we run into a long discourse on the conjectures which have been, or may be made, in relation to these sepulchres, it would certainly lead us far out of our road, and turn very little to the improvement of the reader. On the whole, therefore, we shall content ourselves with saying, that these stupendous monuments of antient magnificence are sufficient to fill us with high ideas of the wisdom and sublime genius of the antient Persians, before superstition and slavery took place (X).

THE

^a Vide CHARDIN, tom. ii. LE BRUN, tom. ii.

(X) Besides the tombs spoken of above, there are two near the ruins of the palace of Persopolis, which, Sir John Chardin says, appeared to him the most curious remnants of antiquity which he beheld there. They are about six hundred paces from the columns; and, in order to reach them, there is a necessity of climbing three hundred paces up the rock. These monuments are cut and hollowed into the rock. The one is on the north, over against the great stair-case of the palace; the front is seventy-two feet broad, and its height about one hundred and thirty (plate XXXI.). The plat-

THE great perfection which appears in these antient works, and those of Persepolis, leaves us no room to doubt,

platform is square, and like the landing-place of a staircase; it is about four feet deep, and is cut into the mountain: on each side there are six figures finely cut, and exactly resembling those in the procession; in the wall of the palace there are four columns fronting the spectator, and exactly in the middle there appears a door; but it is only the figure of a door cut in the rock, and does not seem ever to have been designed for a passage into any cavity behind it. Over this there is another fine piece of workmanship, full of figures; and, on the summit, there appears an altar, with fire burning on it, and a reverend person holding a bow in his hand, kneeling on a kind of ascent, over against it, as if at his devotions. In the corner of the piece, there is a round figure, which seems to represent the sun; and in the middle, as if in the air, there is a small figure of the same person, whom we see praying below, as if he were ascending into the heavens. The other tomb, which is on the east side, differs not much from this which we have described (plate XXXII.). It has four columns, a false door, and over it an altar with fire, and a prince or high-priest praying before it, with the decorations that have been mentioned before. Some inconsiderable differences there are in the architecture, and in the disposition of things, in this second tomb; but we do not think them of consequence to be mentioned here. Sir John Chardin tells us, that the inhabitants of the country say, that Nembroth, or Nimrod, was buried in the first, and Darab; i. e. Darius, in the second; but he thinks the first fabulous. And, as to Darius being interred here, he owns, it is, in some measure, warranted by the account given us by Arrian, that Alexander caused the body of that unfortunate prince to be embalmed, and to be sent to his mother, that she might cause it to be interred in the tomb of his ancestors. It is allowed, that the sepulchres of the kings of Persia were at Ecbatana in Media; and that at the time Alexander sent back Darius's body, that country was new-conquered, and in great disorder. It is not impossible therefore, that his mother might cause him to be buried at Persepolis. However, Sir John Chardin himself is of opinion, that the thing was otherwise, and that these tombs were actually closed up before the reign of Darius (94). It is the firm opinion of the present inhabitants of Persia, that in these tombs, and also in those described in the text, there are concealed great quantities of treasure, and valuable doubt, that those who were the authors of them, might, if they had so pleased, have left marks of their skill and genius effects. It must be said in favour of this vulgar notion, that it has antiquity on its side; since we know, that when Alexander conquered this country, it was expected that mighty sums would be found in the tomb of Cyrus (95). As on the other hand, we know that Josephus (96) reports a mighty mass of money to have been laid up in the sepulchre of David. As we are writing here a note only, and not a dissertation, we shall not expatiate further upon this subject, but confine ourselves to these very tombs in the mountain of Nachs-Rustem. It is certain, that not only the common people, but people of distinction and learning, concur in believing, that there are vast heaps of gold, silver, and other rich things, contained in these repositories of the dead; but at the same time they affirm this, they assert, with equal confidence, that the passages within the tombs form a kind of labyrinth, out of which a man can hardly ever find his way; so that many have perished in search of these supposed mountains of riches. Sir John Chardin, however, tells us a story of one who actually found and bore away some of these shining spoils: he had it from the mouth of the bailiff of Mirkaskoun, a little town in the neighbourhood of Persepolis. This man informed him, that about two hundred years before, when this country was subject to a prince of its own, who resided at Schiras, the farmer of his revenues, in this part of the country, having dissipated his effects, and not being in a condition to pay what was due from him to the royal treasury, was under the greatest dejection of mind, on the receipt of a message from the grand vizier, threatening him, in case he did not make a speedy payment, with a cruel death, and with the selling of his wife and children for slaves, in order to produce the sum he was in arrear. The poor man, distracted with fear, and knowing not which way to turn, was thinking of laying violent hands on himself; but, checking this thought on a sudden, he said in his mind, Why should I destroy myself, without attempting to throw off this load of misfortunes by some other means? In yon house of idols (so the Mohammedans call all places where there are figures in bas-relief) every body agrees there are vast quantities of wealth concealed: why should not I go look for it? If I succeed, I shall not only pay the king, but have wherewithal to live splendidly myself all the rest of my days; and, on the other hand, if I perish, I perish; death is the same thing in those nus in other parts of this empire also; or, at least, that their successors might have done something in the same way. We have already put ourselves under such restrictions as forbid a prolix prosecution of this hint; and therefore we shall content ourselves with remarking here, that M. Le Brun takes notice, in his travels, of some remains of antiquity, which he, with two English gentlemen, saw near a mountain, a league and an half from Schiras, on the left of the plain. There stood here a mosque, called the mosque of the mother of Solomon, square, and about twenty paces from one corner to the other, having three porticoes, exactly resembling those at Persepolis; the first on the east, the second on the north-west, and the third on the north-east: they are eleven feet high, and have on each pilaster the figure of a woman as big as the life, with something in her hand, in the same attitude with the figures on the wall, at Persepolis. North-east from this ruined mosque, the same author says, there are seen on the side of the rock nine small figures, much damaged by time, and only half of them appearing above-ground; and, on the north-west, a stone of prodigious magnitude, representtombs as here. Having taken this resolution, he provided himself with lights, and with some provisions, and then essayed to enter the tombs: in this exploit he was so lucky, that he fell into a path which led him to a large square room full of pieces of gold; of which he took as many as he could carry away, and returned home on the fourth day. But as the sum he brought back, was not quite sufficient to pay his debts, he determined to make another experiment, which proved as unfortunate, as his first had been happy; for, by some means or other losing his way, he perished in the mountain, and was never heard of more. Many travellers have taken great pains themselves, and, where their spirits have failed, have hired others to attempt the finding out the rooms which are said to be in this mountain; but most of them have toiled in vain, tho' not all; for Pietro della Valle, an author worthy of credit, affirms, that he saw a square room built in the form of a tower, close on all sides, except a door which was almost at the top, and altogether inaccessible; this he took to be a sepulchre. Sir John Chardin could find nothing like it, but he declares, he does not doubt the fact; and tells us farther of his own knowledge, that these subterraneous passages are really very perplexed, frequently cross each other, and are full of moist vapours, which quickly extinguish the lights (95).

(94) Chardin voyag. tom. ii. p. 166.

(95) Arrian. expedit. Alex. lib. vi. ult. Strab. geogr. lib. xv. c. 730.
 (96) Antiq. lib. vii. c. 15.

(95) Chardin voyag. vol. ii. p. 171.

ing a cask, or tun. All the ground thereabouts is covered with stones, and most of the pilasters are out of their places; which could not possibly have happened but by an earthquake: the cornice, however, of the middle one, is very little damaged. A quarter of a league farther, are seen the ruins of that wall which antiently surrounded this mosque. And about a league from the mosque, the same gentleman tells us, that he saw several figures cut in the rock, divided into three tables: the first table contains three figures, one of which is represented leaning with its hand on a great sword: the second represents a man with something not unlike a turban on his head: the third figure has a mitre on its head, and like the first, leans its hand on the guard of a great sword. They are very much broken and damaged, so that it is difficult to describe them particularly: for which reason we may suppose the author has omitted the descriptions of the other two tables. If we may be allowed to found any thing on the representations given us in the prints of this accurate traveller, we may say with some assurance, that these figures are neither so old, nor executed near so well, as those on the mountain of Nachs-rustem, which they resemble much more than any thing which is to be seen at Persepolis. M. Le Brun speaks frequently of the traditions of the inhabitants, relating to such things as these: but there is no necessity of examining their accounts here, since we shall be obliged to give an ample account of these matters when we come to speak of the Persian history, as written by oriental authors. In the mean time, the reader will be pleased to observe, that the foregoing relation is a direct proof of the opinion we advanced, that, on a strict inquiry, many more fragments of antiquity might be found in Persia, than those hitherto described, and so highly magnified.

§ LE BRUN voyag. vol. ii. p. 299.

S E C T.

S E C T. II.

Of the antiquity, government, customs, arts, learning, and trade, of the antient Persians.

THE Persians were, without all doubt, a very antient The origin of the Persians. nation. Their country was first peopled by Elam, or, of the Persians. as Josephus calls him^a, Elymus, the son of Shem; whence Persia is constantly called by the sacred writers Elam: nor does it appear, that it was known to the Jews before the captivity, by any other name. The descendants of Elam settled first in that province, which from them was called Elymais; and, by degrees, as their numbers increased, spread themselves into Susiana, and other adjoining provinces, as appears from Daniel, who places Susa, the metropolis of Susiana, in the province of Elam^b (A). All the Greek interpreters by Elam understand Persia, and, in the Acts, the Persians are called Elamites^c. Whence it is probable, that they were descended from Elam, of whom both the country and inhabitants borrowed their name. How this name was changed into that of Persia, we have already shewn^d.

THE government of Persia was monarchical, and the Their government. crown hereditary. The kingdom of Elam seems to have been pretty powerful, even in the time of Abraham; for Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, who was contemporary with that patriarch, is said in Scripture to have invaded the Zamzummims and Emims, who were of a gigantic race, and to have taken and pillaged the cities of Sodom and Gomorrab; tho' he was at last overthrown by Abraham, who came to the rescue of Lot, whom the Elamite had taken prisoner^e. In the time of Jeremiah, Elam must have been a great and potent kingdom, as is plain from the prophecy where he foretels the increase of Nebuchadnezzar's dominions; and

^a JOSEPH. antiquitat. c. 8. ^b Dan. viii. 2. ^c Acts ii. 9. ^d Vid. sup. p. 50. ^e Gen. xiv. 5. Deut. ii. 20, 21.

(A) And I saw in a vision, says the prophet (and it came to pass, when I saw that I was at Shushan in the palace, which is in the province of Elam), and I saw in a vision, and I was by the river Ulai. Shushan is, without doubt, the city of Susa in Susiana, which stood on the river Eulæus, or, as the prophet styles it, Ulai.

The majesty of their kings.

particularly, that he should subdue Elam, a kingdom on the river Ulai, to the eastward of the Tigris (B).

BUT, to speak here of Persia as the second of the four great empires (for, of the kings who preceded Cyrus, we shall have occasion to give some account hereafter); the Persian monarchs were under no controul, but governed by their own arbitrary will and pleasure: they were revered by their subjects like deities on earth, none daring to appear before their throne, without prostrating themselves on the ground, with a kind of adoration. Sperchies and Bulis, both Lacedemonians, refused to comply with this ceremony, as did also, according to Justin^f, Canon the Athenian; and Ismenias the Theban declined it, as we read in Ælian^g, by letting his ring drop from his finger, and then throwing himself on the ground to take it up: Timagoras, as we read in Valerius Maximus^h, was put to death by the Athenians for paying this veneration to a Persian monarch. In the time of Apollonius none were allowed to appear before the king, who had not done the same honours to his image. While they were in the king's presence, they were to hold their hands, so long as their audience lasted, within their sleeves; for neglecting this ceremony, Autofaces and Mitræus were put to death, as we read in Xenophon, by Cyrus the younger. None were suffered to enter the royal palace without the sovereign's leave, except the princes who slew Smerdis: all others, of what rank soever, before they set foot in the palace, were obliged to acquaint the king by a messenger, that they desired to attend him, and wait his royal pleasure. What respect and obedience his vassals paid him, we learn from Herodotus, who tells us, that Xerxes being once in

^f JUSTIN. l. vi. ^g ÆLIAN. var. histor. l. i. c. 21.
^h VALER. MAXIMUS, l. vi. c. 3.

(B) Behold, I will break the bow of Elam, the chief of their might. And upon Elam will I bring the four winds from the four quarters of the heaven, and will scatter them towards all those winds, and there shall be no nation whither the outcasts of Elam shall not come. For I will cause Elam to be dismayed before their enemies, and before them that seek their life; and I will bring evil upon them, even my fierce anger, saith the Lord; and I will send the sword after them; till I have consumed them. And I will set my throne in Elam, and I will destroy from thence the king and his princes, saith the Lord (1).

(1) Jerem. xlix. 35, & seqq.

great

great danger by sea, many, at the king's desire, strove who should be the first in leaping over-board, to lighten the vessel, and save their prince's life, at the expence of their own ^b. They all lived in no less dread of the king's wrath than of the anger of the gods: whence they looked upon the incurring of his displeasure as the greatest misfortune that could befall them in life; and were ready, at the least intimation given them by their prince, to become their own executioners. The crown was hereditary, and bestowed on the eldest of the deceased king's lawful children. In long or dangerous expeditions, to avoid all contests, the heir apparent was named by the reigning king, before he set out on his journey or march. The new king was crowned at Pasargada, or, as Pliny calls it, Pasaganda ^k, by the priests, who bore a great sway in the court of Persia. This ceremony was performed in the temple of the goddess of war, where the king used, first of all, to cloathe himself with the garment which Cyrus, the founder of the Persian monarchy, had worn before he was raised to the throne. Being thus attired, he used to eat some figs, with a small quantity of turpentine, and drink a cup full of sour milk; then the tiara, or crown, was placed on his head by one of the grandees, in whose family that right was hereditary, and deemed all over Persia the greatest honour a subject could enjoy. The king's tiara was by a peculiar name called cidaris, being a kind of turban rising up with a sharp point, without bending; whereas the other Persians wore their turbans bending downwards to their foreheads, in token of subjection: however, the descendants of those, who, with Darius the son of Hystaspes, slew the usurping Mage, were allowed to use a tiara bending to the middle of their head, and not, as that of the other subjects, reaching down to their eye-brows. Round the tiara the king wore a purple and white band, or diadem; for nothing else is meant by the word diadem, in the antient writers, but a band of this nature wreathed round the forehead ^m. This tiara, with the purple and white band, is the only ensign of royalty we find among the Persian kings of the first dynasty. The king's birthday was kept as sacred, and celebrated with public sports in the utmost pomp and magnificence. His death was bewailed by shutting the tribunals of justice for five days:

^b HERODOT. l. viii. c. 118. ^k PLIN. l. vi. c. 26. ^l PLUT. in Artaxerx. ^m DRUS. observat. l. xii. c. 12. BRIS. l. i. p. 44.

and that fire which was worshiped in families as a household-god, was, on that occasion alone, extinguished.ⁿ The kings abode was, according to the season, 7 months at Babylon, three at Susa (C), and two at Ecbatan^o: whence they are compared by Ælian^p to cranes; and by Aristotle to the Scythian Nomades, who, by often shifting their abode, always enjoyed a temperate season. They likewise removed to Pasargada, and sometimes to Persepolis; which, at last, became their ordinary residence. The king's court, ⁿ DIODOR. SICUL. lib. viii.

^o ZONAR. annal. lib. i.

^p ÆLIAN. hist. natur. lib. ii. c. 3.

(C) Susa, called in Scripture Shushan, was the metropolis of the province Sufiana. It was built on the banks of the river Eulæus, called by Daniel Ulai, by Memnon, as some say, the son of Tithonus, who was slain by the Theffalians in the Trojan war (2). Strabo (3), and Pausanias (4), compare the walls of Susa even with those of Babylon. Cassiodorus tells us, upon what authority we know not, and therefore give him no credit, that the walls of this city were cemented with gold. Polycletus, as we read in Strabo (5), would make us believe, that it had no walls; which is no less improbable, considering the kings of Persia resided there three months in the year, and that great part of the treasures were lodged in it, as Diadorus informs us (6). It was called Susa, from the many lilies which grew in that neighbourhood, says Stephanus, and in the Persian language bore that name. It is also called Memnonia by Herodotus (7), and others, from its founder Memnon. In Scripture it is constantly named (8) the palace; but, besides the king's palace, there was, without all doubt, a city, as is plain from all the profane writers. The city was sheltered by a high ridge of mountains from the northern winds, which rendered it very agreeable during the winter; but in summer the heat was so parching, that the inhabitants were forced to cover their houses, as Strabo writes, with earth two cubits deep (9). Susa was, in antient times, a wealthy and magnificent city: Alexander found in it fifty thousand talents of gold, besides jewels of an inestimable value, and an immense quantity of gold and silver vessels. Here Abasuerus kept his great feast, which lasted one hundred and eighty-three days. It lies now in ruins, and is known, as Tavernier informs us, by the name of Schouster, or Suster.

(2) Strabo, l. xv. p. 500.

(3) Strabo, ubi supra.

(4) Pausan.

Messen. c. 31.

(5) Ubi supra.

(6) Diad. Sic. l. xvii. c. 66.

(7) Herodot. l. v. c. 54.

(8) Dan. viii. 2. Nebem. i. 1. Esb. i. 2.

(9) Strabo, l. xv. p. 503.

or palace, had many gates, and each gate a body of guards, whose duty it was not only to defend the king's person, but to inform him of whatever they saw, or heard done, in any part of the kingdom: whence they were called, some the king's ears, others, as *Aristotle*⁹ informs us, the king's eyes. To these messengers were sent from the most remote provinces of the empire, when any thing happened worthy of the king's knowlege; and besides, they received immediate intelligence of any sudden commotion by means of fires, which were always ready at small distances from each other, and lighted when occasion required: so that they could, in one day, receive notice of any tumult, rebellion, or invasion, in what part soever it happened of that vast empire.

THE king's palace was deemed sacred, and respected as The king's a temple. It was extremely magnificent, and furnished palace de- with utensils of inestimable value. The walls and roofs of scribed. the rooms were all covered with ivory, silver, amber, or gold. The throne was of pure gold, supported by four pillars, richly set with precious stones. The king's bed was likewise of gold; and Herodotus^r mentions a plane-tree and vine of gold, presented to Darius by Pythius a Lydian, who, after the king of Persia, was accounted the richest man in the world (D). The body and branches of this vine, says Athenæus^s, were enriched with jewels of great value; and the clusters of grapes were all precious stones, which hung over the king's head as he sat on the throne. At his bed's head stood always a chest or coffer, containing five thousand talents, which was called the king's bolster; and another at his feet, with three thousand talents^t. Adjoining to the king's palace were large gardens

⁹ ARIST. l. de mundo.

^r HERODOT. l. vii. c. 27.

^s ATHEN. l. xii. Vide BUDÆUM de ass. l. iv. ^t BUDÆUS, ubi supra.

(D) Pythius, if we believe Herodotus⁽¹⁰⁾, entertained, at Calene in Phrygia, Xerxes and all his army, as he was marching against Greece; and moreover offered him, towards the charges of the war, two thousand talents of silver, and three millions nine hundred ninety-three thousand pieces of gold, all bearing the stamp of his father Darius. Xerxes, with no less generosity, not only refused the treasures offered him, but ordered seven thousand Darian pieces, or Darics, to be given to Pythius, as a reward of his affection and good will; nor did he leave Calene till the sum was paid.

(10) Herodot. l. vii. c. 27. & seq.

and parks, stocked with all sorts of game for his diversion. Tully tells us, out of Xenophon ^u, that Cyrus planted and cultivated one of these delicious gardens with his own hand. Alexander enriched them with trees and plants out of Greece. The Persian kings drank no other water but that of the river Choaspes, which was carried about with them in silver vessels whithersoever they went ^w (E). They drank only Calybonian wine, made at Damascus in Syria; and touched no bread but what was of the wheat of Affos in Phrygia; and their salt was brought from Egypt. The magnificence of their public feasts exceeded, as appears from holy writ ^x, what we read of in histories of other nations. Their table was daily served with somewhat of the product of each nation subject to them ^y. Among the ^u Cic. de senect. ^w HERODOT. l. i. c. 188. ^x Esth. i.

 ^y ATHEN. l. viii.

(E) It is matter of dispute among geographers, whether the Choaspes and Eulæus be one and the same, or two different rivers. Pliny (11) distinguishes them, and says, that they both rise in Media, but that the Choaspes discharges itself into the Pasitigris, and the Eulæus into the lake Characenus. Polycletus likewise, as we read in Strabo (12), supposes them to be two different streams, tho' he makes them disembogue themselves into the same lake. On the other hand, Salmasius (13) takes them to be one and the same river, under different names; for the Choaspes, rising in Media, buries itself under ground, and again appears not far from Susa. In Media, he thinks, it is called Choaspes, and, in the province of Susiana, Eulæus. This seems agreeable to what we read in Ptolemy (14), who mentions two springs of the Eulæus (for he no-where names the Choaspes), one in Media, and the other in Susiana. Besides, Herodotus tells us (15), that the Choaspes washed the walls of Susa, and that the Persian kings drank no other water; whence it is manifest, that the Choaspes and Eulæus are one and the same river, at least at Susa; and even Pliny (16), and the other writers who distinguish them, place the city of Susa on the banks of the Eulæus; and all the interpreters take the river Ulai, mentioned by Daniel (17), to be the Eulæus. Nor is there any thing more common, than that the same river should be known in different places, by different names: thus the Danube was called by the Latins Danubius and Ister, the Weser, Vierra and Visurgis, the Po, Padus and Eridanus, &c.

(11) Plin. l. vi. c. 27. (12) Strabo, l. xv. p. 501. (13) Salmas.
 in Solin. p. 493. (14) Ptol. l. vi. c. 3. (15) Herodot. l. i. c. 153.
 (16) Plin. ubi supra. (17) Dan. viii. 22.

prisoners taken by Parmenio at Damascus, were, as *Athenæus*² informs us, two hundred and seventy-seven cooks, twenty-nine who took care of the dishes, seventeen who ministered water, seventy who had in charge the wine, forty employed about ointments, and sixty-six whose province it was to prepare garlands, used, according to the custom of those times, in banquets. During their repast, their ears were feasted with the harmony both of vocal and instrumental music; and three hundred women, of the sweetest and most melodious voices, were in constant attendance to divert the king at his unbended hours. It was likewise their province to lull him asleep with the melody and variety of their notes, and recreate his mind as soon as he awaked in the morning³. Most of the Persian kings were so dissolved in pleasures, that they scarce minded any thing besides their own satisfaction. Xerxes was not ashamed to propose, by a public edict, an ample reward to any one who should devise a new pleasure^b. The king seldom admitted others to his table, besides his wife and mother. Such as received this honour were so placed, as not to see, but only be seen by the king; for they thought it was, in some degree, a degrading of their majesty to appear subject to the same necessities with other mortals. This desire of appearing above the level of other men, was the motive that confined them within their palaces, and scarce ever suffered them to appear abroad. Their lust and voluptuousness sufficiently appears from the book of Esther, and Tully^c adds, that the revenues of whole provinces were employed on the attire of some of their favourite concubines, one city being obliged to supply them with ornaments for their hair, another for their necks, &c. nay, Socrates^d mentions an ambassador, who, being sent into Persia, spent a whole day in traveling thro' a country, which was called the Queen's girdle, and another day before he reached the borders of a territory stiled the Queen's head-dress.

THE king's children, more especially the eldest, were, The king's children. presently after their birth, committed to the care of eunuchs. At seven years old they learnt, under experienced instructors, to ride and hunt; which were looked upon as the most manly exercises. At the age of fourteen, they were put under the discipline of four learned preceptors, of whom

² ATHEN. l. xii. ³ Idem ibid. ^b CIC. Tusc. quæst. VALER. MAXIM. l. ix. c. 2. ^c CIC. in Ver. act. v.
 ^d SOCRAT. in Plat. Alcibiad.

whom one was to teach them prudence, another justice, the third temperance, and the fourth fortitude.

The king's guard.

THE king's ordinary guard consisted mostly of Persians. Curtius mentions a guard which attended the king's person, consisting of fifteen thousand men, who were called the king's relations. There was also a body of ten thousand choice horsemen, all Persians, who accompanied him in all his expeditions, and were called Immortal. His guards received no pay; but were very plentifully provided with all necessaries of life.

BUT the grandeur and magnificence of the Persian kings appeared no-where greater, than on occasion of the public sacrifices, at which they often assisted, as we shall have occasion to take notice in the next section, as also of their funerals, and other religious ceremonies in use among the Persians.

The manners of the Persians. How they educated their children.

IT is time now to say something of the customs and manners of the antient Persians. They had a particular care of the education of their children above any other nation. A son was not admitted to the presence of his father, but was brought up by women of the best character, till he attained the age of five years, lest, if he should die before that time, his father might be too much grieved at his death. At five years old, the children of such as could afford it were committed to the tuition of learned masters or magis, who carefully taught them, more by examples than precepts, the practice of justice, patience, sobriety, abstinence, and all other virtues. They took great pains to implant in their breasts an aversion to all manner of vice, especially to lying, and contracting debts. They learned also to ride, to shoot with bows, and fight on horseback. This was their education till seventeen years of age, when the children of men of rank were admitted among the king's guards, and attended him at home when he went a-hunting, or abroad in his warlike expeditions. They were brought up with such an awful respect to their parents, that they never offered to sit down in their presence. Every father had power of life and death over his own children; but was restrained, by the laws, from exercising such severity for small faults, or for one crime alone.

The miscellaneous customs of the Persians.

THE Persians were antiently all trained up to military exercises, but more especially to handle a bow, which they did with great dexterity; whence it is, that we find the

* XENOPH. I. I. C. II. BRISSON. polit.

bow of Elam mentioned by the prophet Jeremiah^f, and the quiver of Elam by Isaiah^g, as the arms peculiar to this nation. From the age of five years, to that of twenty, they taught their sons chiefly three things, as Herodotus informs us^h; to manage an horse; to use the bow with dexterity; and to speak truth. A numerous issue was looked upon by them as the greatest blessing which the gods could bestow; and such as could shew a numerous offspring, received early presents from the king. They celebrated their birth-days with great pomp and magnificence, furnishing their tables, on such occasions, in a very plentiful manner, though, at other times, they lived very sparingly, at least under their first kings. In their diet they were very temperate; but were always inclined to drinking; they used even to debate the most important matters in their cups; but the master of the house, where they met to consult, proposed the same subject the next day, before they tasted any liquor, when the resolutions, taken the day before, were approved or rejected. When they met, they saluted with a kiss on the mouth, if they were equal; on the cheek, if one was somewhat inferior to the other; but those, who were of a much lower rank, used to prostrate themselves on the ground when they met or accosted their superiors. They shewed most value for those that lived next to them, and very little to such as lived at a great distance, as if men were more or less worthy, in proportion as they lived at a greater or less distance from them. No nation was ever more ready to adopt foreign customs. They no sooner conquered the Medes, but they assumed their dress. In war, they used the Egyptian armour, after they had subdued that kingdom; and imitated the Greeks, as soon as they became acquainted with them, in the worst of vices, as Herodotus himself owns. They were indulged many wives, besides as many concubines as they were able to maintain, those who had many children, being looked upon as heroes of as great prowess, as those who had distinguished themselves in military exploits. They bore such respect to their parents, that they thought it impossible a man should ever put to death his father or mother; whence no punishments were inflicted, by their laws, on such offenders: and, if any one was indicted for committing so heinous a crime, he was always declared by the judges spurious or supposititious. To affirm a falsehood was accounted the utmost infamy, and, next to that, the being in debt, because it exposed a man to the necessity of lying. If any among them happened to be infected with a leprosy, or any other distemper of that nature, he was not permitted to stay within the city, nor to converse with others, having, as they believed, drawn this punishment upon himself, by committing some offence against the sun. All strangers, that were subject to this distemper, were expelled the country. These customs, and some others relating to their funerals, of which we shall speak in the next section, we have learned from Herodotus ^m, who tells us, that he can, with certainty, affirm them to be true.

^f Jerem. xlix. 35—38. ^g Isa. xxii. 6. ^h HERODOT.

Their punishments.

THE most severe punishment, in use among the Persians, was that of shutting the offender up between two boats; which was done in the following manner: they made two boats on purpose, so equal, that one was neither broader nor longer than the other; then they laid him in one of them on his back, and covered him with the other, his hands, feet, and head, being left uncovered, and appearing through an opening made for that purpose. In this posture, he was supplied with victuals and drink by the executioners, who even forced him, by thrusting sharp iron tools in his eyes, to eat what was necessary to support nature, lest he should starve himself, and thereby put an end to his pain. On his face, that was placed full in the sun, they poured honey, which, inviting the flies and wasps, tormented him, no less than the swarms of worms that were bred in his excrements, and devoured his body to the very entrails. Under such a complication of unrelenting torments, the unhappy offender lived many days; for Plutarch, who describes this cruel manner of putting to death, tells us, that Mithridates, whom Artaxerxes condemned to this punishment, for pretending to have killed his brother Cyrus ⁿ, lived seventeen days in the utmost agony; and that, the uppermost boat being taken off at his death, they found his flesh all consumed, and swarms of worms gnawing his very bowels. Such as were convicted of high-treason were condemned to have their right-hand, and then their head, struck off; which sentence was, by order of Artaxerxes, executed even on the dead body of his brother Cyrus. But, by the ancient laws of Persia, the king was restrained from putting any man to death for a single crime; and besides, the judge

^m HERODOT. l. i. 133—140.
Artaxerxis.

ⁿ PLUTARCH. in vita

was to examine narrowly into the actions of the delinquent; and, if his faults were found to overbalance his former services, the king was allowed to punish him at pleasure; if not, he was either pardoned, or punished less severely ^p. Poisoners were pressed to death between two stones; which punishment we find inflicted upon Gigis, a woman greatly favoured by Parysatis, mother to Artaxerxes, for having conspired with her to poison queen Statira ^q.

THE Persians were, beyond any other people, jealous of Their marriages, and their wives and concubines. It was death to touch any of the king's women, to speak to them, or even to come near them, incestuous or their coaches, as they travelled. They were allowed to commerce. marry their own sisters and daughters: thus we are told, that Artaxerxes married two of his daughters, Amestris and Atossa, though he had promised them to others. Minutius Felix ^r reproaches them with marrying, or criminally conversing with, their mothers; and Eusebius quotes a saying of Bardesanes, which shews, that they were indulged, by law, to marry their sisters, daughters, and mothers. This incestuous custom they observed also in other countries, namely in Egypt, Phrygia, and Galatia, as Eusebius witnesses ^s, where they were, on that account, abhorred by the inhabitants, and nicknamed maguffæi, or addicted to magic ^t. They were the first that introduced those amphibious animals called eunuchs, which Petronius Arbitr ^u and Seneca ^w impute to their insatiable lechery.

THE first that caused gold and silver to be coined in Persia Their money was Darius the son of Cyaxares, or, as he is called in Scripture, Darius the Mede, the founder of the Medo-Persian monarchy (F). In his reign were coined those famous pieces of gold called daries, which, for many ages, were preferred, being of pure gold, to all other coins throughout the east. They were stamped on one side with an archer cloathed in a long robe, and crowned with a spiked crown, holding a bow in his left-hand, and an arrow in his right; on the other side

^p HEROD. l. i. c. 137. ^q PLUTARCH. ubi supra. ^r ARNOB. contra gentes. ^s EUSEB. de præp. evang. l. vi. c. 8. ^t Idem, ibid. ^u PETRON. ARB. satir. ^w SENECA controver. 4. l. x.

(F) We are told by Suidas, Harpocration, and the scholiast of Aristophanes (18), that the first pieces of gold were coined; not by Darius the father of Xerxes, but by a more antient Darius, who must necessarily have been Darius the Mede, that is, Cyaxares II. king of the Medes, since we know of no other Darius reigning so early in the east.

(18) Harpocrat. scholiast. Aristoph. p. 741, 742. Suidas in Δαρεικός.

was the effigies of Darius ^x. To these pieces alluded Agestaus, when, finding himself obliged to quit Asia, in order to suppress the tumults which Artaxerxes had, by dint of gold, stirred up in Greece, he said, that the king of Persia had driven him out of his dominions with thirty thousand archers ^y. The darics were of the same weight and value with the Attic stater. Darius seems to have learned the art and use of money from the Lydians; for the Medes had no money before they conquered Lydia ^z: whereas Cræsus king of Lydia had coined innumerable pieces of gold, called cræsei. As it was not reasonable, that the coin of Lydia should continue current after the downfall of the kingdom, we may suppose, that Darius recoined the cræsei with his own effigies, without altering their weight or value ^a. All these pieces of gold, that were afterwards coined, of the same weight and value, by the succeeding kings, not only of the Persian, but also of the Macedonian race, were called darics, from this Darius, in whose reign they were first coined (G).

Their arts, sciences,
&c.

THERE was, it seems, no great learning among the Persians before the time of Zoroastres, whom the Persians call Zerdusht or Zaratusb, who is supposed to have flourished under Darius Hystaspis, and was the greatest mathematician and philosopher of the age he lived in. The mages, being instructed in mathematics, astronomy, and natural philosophy, partly by him, and partly by Hystaspes, the father of Darius, were reputed, above all others, skilled in those arts. Hystaspes had travelled into India, and lived there some time among the brachmans, in order to learn their mysteries and sciences, for which they were famed at that time; and, on his return, communicated to the mages what he had learned, improving that sect not only in religion, but in all natural knowlege ^b. But this subject shall be treated more at length in the following section. We shall only add here, that this knowlege was locked up

^x PLUTARCH. in Artaxer. ^y Idem ibid. ^z HEROD. 1. i. c. 71. ^a Sir Is. NEWTON'S chronol. p. 320. ^b AMMIAN. MARCEL. 1. xxiii.

(G) In those parts of Scripture, that were written after the Babylonish captivity (19), these pieces are mentioned by the name of adarkonim, and by the Talmudists are called (20) darkomoth, both from the Greek δαρκαονοι, that is, darics. They were probably coined by Darius, during the two years he reigned at Babylon, while Cyrus was absent on his Syrian, Egyptian, and other expeditions. According to Dr. Bernard, a daric weighed two grains more than one of our guineas.

(19) 1 Chron. xxix. 7. Ezra viii. 27.

(20) Buxter. lex. rabbinic. p. 577.

among

among the priests, and seldom communicated to any, except those of the royal family, whom they were bound to instruct ^c.

THE poverty of the antient Persians, and their contempt Their of riches, shew them to have been quite strangers to trade and commerce, which are carried on with a prospect of gain. trade and navigation. Before the conquest of Lydia, they had no money, nor any cloathing, but skins. They used water for drink, and had neither wine, nor any other thing, but what their barren country produced, as appears from the excellent speech of Sandamis, to dissuade Cræsus from invading Persia ^d. After they subdued Lydia, and were masters of so many rich provinces, they very likely applied their minds to trade and navigation, to supply themselves with those commodities, which their country wanted, and at the same time to dispose of those, which they could easily spare. But, as we can advance nothing with respect to their trade, warranted by good authorities, we shall dismiss this subject, and hasten to their military discipline.

THE Persians learned, from their childhood, to ride, and Their handle the bow, as we hinted above; and, by the manly exercise of hunting, inured themselves to the toils of war ^e. They never parted with their swords, quivers, and bows, even in time of peace, but when they went to repose, and had them even then always ready at hand ^f; which custom the Romans, who never used any weapons but in the field, looked upon as unbecoming a civilized nation ^g. As soon as they were able to bear arms, they were obliged to enter themselves in the list of soldiers; but received no pay till the age of twenty ^h. In time of war, they were all bound, on pain of death, except such as were disabled by age or otherwise, to appear under their respective standards, and attend the king in his expeditions ⁱ (H). They used no mercenaries in the time of Herodian,

^c PLATO in Alcibiad. i. STOBÆUS, p. 496. CLEM. ALEXAND. in pædagogico. ^d HEROD. l. i. c. 71. ^e STRABO, d. xv.

^f AMMIAN. MARCELL. l. xxiii. ^g OVID. trist. l. v. ^h STRABO, l. xv. ⁱ HEROD. l. iv. c. 84.

(H) Herodotus tells us, that while Darius was marching from Susa, with his forces, against the Scythians; OEBaxus, a noble Persian, who had three sons in his army, begged that one of his sons might be left at home to comfort him in his old-age. The king received him with great demonstrations of kindness, and told him, that he would grant him more than he asked; for he designed to leave him all his sons. This answer gave the old man great joy; for he did not doubt but the king would be as good as his word. OEBaxus was scarce departed, when Darius

*dian, nor maintained a standing army; but were all obliged, when occasion required, to repair to their colours, returning to their respective homes when the war was at an end, without any other pay or reward, but their share of the plunder.

Their armour and discipline.

IN war they wore on the head a tiara or head-piece, so thick, that it was proof against all kinds of offensive arms; on the body a coat of mail, wrought in likeness of scales, and embellished with sleeves of various colours; their thighs were defended with cuisses; their shields, or rather targets, were of wicker; their javelins short; their bows of an uncommon length; their arrows of reeds: they wore short swords (I), hanging from a belt on the right side¹. Their horses were commanded the officers appointed for such purposes to put all his sons to death, and sent their dead mangled bodies home to their father's house (21). We have another, still more dreadful, instance of the Persian severity on such occasions. Pythius the Lydian, as we have hinted above, entertained, with great magnificence, Xerxes and all his army, and offered him two thousand talents of silver, and three millions nine hundred ninety-three thousand pieces of gold, to defray the expences of the war which he was carrying on against Greece. The king was so taken with his zeal and affection, that he promised to grant him whatever he should ask. Pythius had then no request to make; but, some time after, being frightened with an eclipse of the sun, and confiding in the merit of his late liberal offer, and the king's unlimited promise, intreated him to discharge the eldest of his five sons, who were all in his army, that he might have somebody to take care of him in his old-age, and of his estate. He had no sooner uttered this request, but the king, transported with rage, and forgetful both of his own promise, and the former merits of Pythius, commanded the body of his eldest son to be cut asunder, and one part laid on the right hand of the way, and the other on the left, that the army might pass between both (22). So heinous a crime it was, according to the Persian discipline, to exempt one's self from the service, or even ask an exemption for others.

* HERODIAN. l. iii. & v. ¹ HEROD. l. vii. c. 61. XENOPH. l. vii.

(I) These were rather daggers than swords; for Josephus (24) compares them to the poniards used by ruffians; and Darius, finding, in his first engagement with Alexander, that the length of the Macedonian swords did not contribute a little to the victory, caused the Persian swords, or acinaces, as the Latins call them, to be considerably lengthened (25).

(21) Herodot. l. iv. c. 84. Seneca, l. iii. de ira, c. 16. (22) Herodot. l. vii. c. 27. & 39. Seneca, l. iii. de ira, c. 17. (24) Joseph. antiq. l. xx. c. 7. (25) Dider. S. 6. l. xviii.

likewise covered with armour or thick hides, as we read in Xenophon^m, Curtius, Ammianus Marcellinus, &c. They were sure marksmen, and quicker than any other nation in discharging, especially on their flight, which was peculiar to them and the Parthians. However, in the time of Procopius, their arrows did but small execution, which he ascribes to the slackness of their bows; whereas no shield or armour was proof against the Roman arrowsⁿ. The number of their dead they knew only when the campaign was at an end; and in the following manner: before they took the field, they passed before the king, or commander in chief, each man throwing an arrow into a basket. These baskets were sealed up with the royal signet, till they returned from the campaign, when they passed muster in the same manner, every one taking an arrow out of the same baskets. When they were all passed, the remaining arrows were counted, and, from their number, they reckoned the number of their dead. This antient custom continued even in the time of Procopius^o. They wore, over their armour, great-coats of purple; but the king's was white, by which badge he was known, and often aimed at, by the enemies^p. They excelled all nations in horsemanship, being accustomed thereunto from their very infancy: among them it was disreputable to appear in public, but on horseback: on horseback they transacted all their private and public affairs, held their assemblies, visited their friends, &c.^q. This custom, in process of time, began to degenerate into luxury, the Persians striving to outdo each other in the richness of their caparisons, their very horses, as Dionysius expresses it^r, championing the purest gold. They fought not only on horseback, but likewise from chariots drawn by four, six, and sometimes eight horses^s. They were the first, if we believe Xenophon^t, that introduced the use of chariots armed with sithes (K).

*Manner of
mustering.*

^m XENOPH. l. viii. c. 190. ^p PROCOP. l. i. de bell. Perf. c. 18. ^o Idem, ubi supra. ^q HEROD. l. ix. XENOPH. l. vii. p. 136. PLUT. in Artaxerxe. ^r XENOPH. l. iv. p. 81. & l. viii. p. 190. JUSTIN. l. xii. c. 3. ^s DIONYS. de situ orbis. ^t XENOPH. Cyropæd. l. vi. p. 124. ^u XENOPH. Cyropæd. l. viii. prope finem.

(K) Xenophon ascribes to Cyrus the invention of chariots armed with sithes (26). But Diodorus tells us, out of the fabulous Ctesias, that Semiramis, in the war which she waged with the Bactrians, had, in her army, seven hundred chariots armed with sithes (27), and seems to make the Assyrian kings the first inventors of them. Whence it is plain from Xenophon and Diodorus, that Hesychius was mistaken, when he ascribed this contrivance to the Macedonians.

(26) Cyropæd. l. viii. prope finem.

(27) Diodor. Sic. l. iii.

K 3

When

Marching. When they went on any expedition, their wives, mothers, children, &c. followed the campⁿ; which custom was observed amongst all the eastern nations: their presence, they thought, inspired them with courage, since they were to lose at once whatever was dear to them in the world, if they did not behave as they ought. Their provisions and baggage were carried on camels, the soldiers being loaded with no other burden but that of their arms^w. In what manner they marched, we learn from Herodotus, who describes the march of Xerxes's army thus^x: the baggage, whether carried by servants, or beasts of burden, appeared in the front, and was followed^y by men of all nations, formed into a body, without distinction. Between these and the rest of the army was left an interval, that they might not mix with that part where the king was. Before him marched a thousand horsemen, and the like number of spearmen, with their spears pointing downwards. After these came ten great horses, bred in the plains of Media, called the Nisean plains (L), caparisoned with rich furniture, and consecrated to Jupiter. The chariot of that god immediately followed, drawn by eight white horses, the driver on foot, holding the reins, no mortal being allowed to mount the seat. After Jupiter appeared the king, in a chariot drawn by Nisean horses. A thousand chosen spearmen, all Persians, marched next to the king, and were followed by another body of horse, consisting of a thousand chosen men of the same nation. After the horse, ten thousand Persian foot advanced, and of these one thousand were armed with javelins, which, instead of the common ornaments, were embellished with pomgranates of gold. The other nine thousand had pomgranates of silver. The ten thousand foot were followed by ten thousand Persian horse, and at the distance of two stades. The rest of the forces advanced promiscuously. They computed the number of their forces in the following manner: ten thousand men were crowded into as narrow a piece of ground as they possibly could; and, a kind of furrow being drawn round them, they caused the like number to enter the ground, and continued so doing till the whole army was computed^y. When they intended to make war upon any nation, they sent heralds or

Manner of declaring war,

ⁿ CURT. l. iii. c. 8, 12. XENOPH. l. iv. p. 76.
l. viii. c. 57.

^x Idem, l. vii. c. 60. & seq.

^w HEROD.

^y Idem ibid.

(L) The Misean, or Nisean bred there (28'), and which alone fields in Media are celebrated the Persian monarchs used, after by all the antients, for the large, they became masters of that strong, and fleet horses that were country.

(28) Herodot. l. vi. Ammian, Mar. l. xxiii. Themistius, orat. v. &c.

embassadors to demand of them earth and water; that is, to command them to submit, and acknowledge the king of Persia as the sovereign lord of their country ^z (M). This manner of declaring war they borrowed of the Medes, as Plutarch informs us; and the Medes seem to have imitated in that, as in many other things, the Affyrians, who, as appears from the book of Judith ^a, used in that manner to require an intire submission. In time of action, the king was always in the centre ^b, and used to encourage his men with a speech ^c. The signal was given with the sound of trumpets, and followed by an universal shout of the whole army ^d. The watch-word was in use even among them; for Xenophon, speaking of Cyrus, tells us, that his was Jupiter our leader and protector ^e. The royal banner was a spread-eagle of gold, carried on the point of a long spear ^f. They reckoned those happy who died in the field,

^z DIOD. SIC. l. xi. HEROD. l. v. c. 17. vi. 48. vii. 133. ^a Judith, c. ii. ^b XENOPH. l. i. Αναβάσις. ^c STOBÆUS, ser. xlii. CURT. & C. ^d CURT. l. iii. DIOD. SIC. l. xvii. ^e XENOPH. Cyropæd. l. vii. p. 137. ^f Idem, l. vii. p. 136. PHILOSTRAT. iconum, l. ii. c. 32.

(M) Some have erroneously imagined, that, by this demand, nothing else was meant, but that those to whom it was directed, should furnish the Persian army with such a quantity of provisions. But the contrary is plain from all the antients, especially from Herodotus, who tells us, that Darius dispatched a messenger to Indathyrsus king of Scythia, commanding him to own the king of Persia for his sovereign, and to present him with earth and water in token of his submission. To this message the Scythian returned answer, that he acknowledged no other lords but Jupiter his progenitor, and Vesta queen of the Scythians; and that, instead of presenting him with earth and water, he would send him such a present as he deserved, and perhaps might make him repent of his insolence, in assuming the title of his master.

And accordingly he sent him, some time after, a messenger, to present him, on his part, with a bird, a mouse, a frog, and five arrows; which Darius would fain have interpreted as a tacit submission, and a giving him possession of the land and water: for, said he, the mouse is bred in the earth, and lives on the same food as man: a frog lives in the water; a bird may be compared to a horse; and by the arrows, they seem to deliver their whole force into my hands. But Gobrias was of opinion, that the king of Scythia gave them to understand by such a present, that unless the Persians could ascend into the air like a bird, or conceal themselves in the earth like mice, or plunge into the fens like frogs, they should inevitably perish by those arrows (29).

(29) Herodot. l. iv.

and inflicted exemplary punishments on such as abandoned their posts, or fled from their colours ^g. They used no stratagems, nor cared for any advantages, that were not owing to their valour ^h, or, as Ammianus Marcellinus expresses it, thought it unfair and base to steal a victory ⁱ. They never fought in the night, unless attacked by the enemy, nor marched before the rising of the sun ^k. Duels or single combats were in use among them, as is plain from the stories of Darius ^l and Polydamas ^m. This is what we have been able to gather from unquestionable authorities relating to the military discipline of the antient Persians.

Their
laws.

As to their laws, they are greatly commended by Xenophon, who prefers them to those of any other nation whatsoever ⁿ; and observes, that other lawgivers only appointed punishments for crimes committed, but did not take sufficient care to prevent men from committing them; whereas the main design of the Persian laws was to inspire men with a love of virtue, and abhorrence of vice, so as to avoid the one, and pursue the other, without regarding either punishment or reward. To attain this end, parents were not, by their laws, allowed to give their children what education they pleased; but were obliged to send them to public schools, where they were educated with great care, and never suffered, till they had attained the age of seventeen, to return home to their parents. These schools were not trusted to the care of common mercenary masters, but were governed by men of the first quality, and best characters, who taught them, by their example, the practice of all virtues; for these schools were not designed for learning of sciences, but practising of virtue. The youths were allowed no other food but bread and cresses, no other drink but water ^o, at least from the age of seven to seventeen. Those who had not been educated in those schools were excluded from all honours and preferments ^p (N). There were parti-

^g PLUTARCH. in Artaxerx. AMMIAN. MARCELLIN. I. xxiii.
^h JUSTIN. I. xi. ⁱ AMMIAN. MARCEL. I. xvii. ^k CURT.
 I. v. 12. 6. ^l DIOD. SIC. I. xvii. ^m PAUSANIAS in Eliac. ⁿ XENOPH. Cyropæd. I. i. ^o Idem ibid. JUS-TIN. I. xli. CIC. I. v. Tusculan. quæst. ^p XENOPH. ibid.

(N) These schools the Persians not afraid of those, who, in the called liberal markets; for they midst of their cities, have a place allowed no public place for buy- of public resort, where they ing or selling, as appears from cheat one another by mutual Cyrus's answer to the Lacedemo- oaths: which words, adds He- nians, telling them, that he was rodotus (30), were levelled at all

(30) Herodot. I. i.

the

particular laws against ingratitude; and whoever had done any one a good office, if he did not meet with a suitable return, could bring an action against the ungrateful person, who, upon conviction, was punished with great severity ^q (O). When any one went to give advice to the king, either of his own accord, or by the prince's order; in proposing his opinion, he stood upon an ingot of gold, which he was rewarded with, if his advice was found wholesome; if otherwise, he was publicly whipped ^r.

BEFORE we close this section, we shall add some particulars relating to the Persian kings, gathered from the best authors. The kings of Persia were, above all others, the most arbitrary and absolute, and looked upon their subjects, however distinguished by birth or fortune, as the meanest of slaves. None, their own children not excepted, durst address them with any other title, than that of lord, great king, king of kings ^s; which high-sounding titles they seem to have borrowed from the Assyrians; for Daniel ^t, in speaking to Nebuchadnezzar, gives him the title of king of kings. As the Persians imitated in this the haughtiness of the Assyrians, so did the Parthians that of the Persians ^u, and continued this stile even to the time of the emperor Constantius, to whom Sapor king of Parthia wrote himself king of kings, allied to the stars, brother of the sun and moon, &c. But to return to the Persian kings: as they assumed high titles to themselves, so they bestowed no other on their subjects, by what dignity soever distinguished, but that of slaves ^w, and treated them as such, not in words only, but in all other respects. To this slavish spirit, which is altogether inconsistent with true courage, Plato ascribes the downfall of the Persian monarchy ^x.
This

^q XENOPH. ibid. AMMIAN. MARCEL. l. iii. c. 5. THEMISTOCLES orat. 3. ^r ÆLIAN. var. hist. l. xii. c. 62. ^s DIO CHRYS. orat. iii. de regno. ARRIAN. l. vi. STRABO, l. xv. Ezra vii. 12. ^t Dan. ii. 37. ^u PLUTARCH. in Pomp. & Lucullo. ^w XENOPH. l. i. Αναβάσις. Q. CURT. l. v. ARISTOT. de mundo. ^x PLATO, l. iii. de legib.

the Greeks, who, in every city, had some public place for buying and selling; whereas the Persians allow of no such places, nor any place at all of public resort.

(O) Seneca therefore was mistaken, when he said, that laws against ingratitude were to be found among the Macedonians alone; excepta Macedonum gente, says he, non est in ulla data adversus ingratos actio (31); that is, in no nation, except the Ma-

(31) Seneca, l. iv. de benefic. c. 7.

The great respect paid to the Persian monarchs. This spirit of slavery prevailed to such a degree among the Persians, that even those who were, by the king's order, publicly whipped, used to return him thanks, for vouchsafing to remember them ^y. Whoever betrayed the least reluctance to put in execution the king's command, how difficult soever, was sure to forfeit his head and right-arm ^z. The custom of adoring their kings, and putting them on the same level with the gods, is, by Justin ^a, fathered upon Cyrus the Great. None durst appear before the king, without prostrating themselves on the ground; nay, they were all obliged, at what distance soever the king appeared, to pay him that adoration: nor did they exact it only of their own vassals, but also of foreign ministers and ambassadors, the captain of the guard being charged to inquire of those, who asked admittance to the king, whether they were ready to adore him. If they refused to comply with that ceremony, they were told, that the king's ears were open to such only, as were willing to pay him that homage; so that they were forced to transact the business they were charged with by means of the king's servants or eunuchs ^b. Nor did their pride and ambition stop here; they sometimes ordered the same reverence to be paid to their favourites, as appears from the history of Haman and Mordecai ^c; nay, even to their statues and images; for Philostratus acquaints us, that, in the time of Apollonius, a golden statue of the king was exposed to all those that entered Babylon, and that such only as adored it were admitted within the gates ^d. When they appeared before the king, their common salutation was, Live for ever ^e; let the king live for ever. To sit in the king's chair or throne (P), to wear any part of the apparel

^y STOBÆUS, ferm. ii. ^z STRABO, l. xv. p. 733. ^a JUSTIN. l. xi. c. 4. ^b PLUTARCH. in Themist. ^c ESTHER iii. 2. ^d PHILOSTRAT. l. i. de vita Apollonii. ^e ÆLIAN. var. hist. l. i. c. 32. Nehem. c. ii. iii. Dan. c. vi. 6, & alibi.

cedonian, ingratitude is actionable; where some read Medorum instead of Macedonum, but all the antient copies have Macedonum.

(P) Q. Curtius tells us (32), that, when Alexander marched his army thro' a certain province called Gabaza, one of his soldiers, arrived at the place where they were to encamp, was so benumbed with the excessive cold of the season and climate, that he had almost lost the use both of his limbs and senses. The king, who had likewise suffered greatly by the cold, and was then sitting by a fire which they had kindled in the open fields, no sooner saw the soldier in that pitiful condition, but, starting up, and, with his own hands,

(32) Q. Curt. l. viii.

rel which he had used (Q), to look into the litter wherein his concubines were conveyed from their habitation to the palace (R), to shoot in hunting, or strike at the game before the king (S), were all capital crimes ^f. Such as betrayed any secret, which they had been trusted with by the king, or gave intelligence to the enemies of his designs, were punished with great severity; whence Alexander, as his historian tells us ^g, could never have any notice beforehand of their designs, the captives chusing rather to suffer death, than betray the designs of their prince. Nobody, of what rank soever, appeared before the king without a present; which custom prevails among the orientals to this day. When he went on his progress, or hands, pulling off his armour, he placed him in the chair where himself was sitting. The soldier, by degrees, recovered, but was very near fainting away again, when he found himself seated in the royal chair, and the king standing by him. But Alexander encouraged him to lay aside all fear, saying, Do not fear, O fellow-soldier; but reflect how much happier is your condition under me, than that of the Persians under their king; had you rested in the Persian king's chair, it had cost you your life; to have rested in mine, has saved it. Hence it was, that Artabanus, as we read in Herodotus (33), though uncle to Xerxes, shewed so great reluctance to comply with his orders, when he commanded him to put on the royal robes, sit on the throne, and repose in his bed.

^f DIOD. SIC. l. xvii. VAL. MAXIM. l. v. c. 16. Q. CURT. c. xviii. FRONTIN. stratag. c. 6. PLUTARCH. in Artaxerx. & Themist. ^g Q. CURT. l. iv. & AMMIAN. MARCEL. l. xxi.

(Q) Plutarch tells us (34), that one Trebaxus, who was very familiar with Artaxerxes, whom he used to divert with his wit and humour, having one day begged of him an old gown, obtained what he demanded, but with this condition, that he should not wear it, that being contrary to the laws of Persia. Trebaxus, not minding the king's prohibition, or the laws of the realm, soon after appeared in it at court; which the Persians resenting as an affront against the majesty of their king, were for punishing him according to the rigour of the law. But Artaxerxes saved him, by telling them, that he had commanded Trebaxus to appear in that garb as his fool.

(R) In one of these litters Themistocles, who was desirous to have a private conference with Artaxerxes, was conveyed to the king's apartment, without being observed by the Persians, who began to be jealous of him (35).

(S) This law was abrogated, as we read in Plutarch, by Artaxerxes Macrochir (36), or Longimanus.

(33) Herodot. l. vii. c. 17, 18.

(36) Plutarch. in apoptobegmat.

(34) Plutarch. in Artax.

(35) Idem

marched

marched out with his army, all the inhabitants of the countries or provinces, through which he passed, were obliged to declare their vassalage by some present or other; even the inhabitants of the villages and fields flocked to him with their donatives, some offering sheep, oxen, corn, wine, &c. others milk, cheese, dates, &c. every one according to his ability ^h (S).

How they administered justice.

THE Persian kings frequently heard causes themselves, both civil and criminal; and, though transcendently vicious in other respects, were nevertheless very tender in point of justice and equity. After hearing the merits of the cause with great attention, they took several days to consider and advise with such as were conversant in their laws, before they gave sentence ⁱ. When they sat on life and death, they not only considered the crime of which the delinquent was impeached, but all the actions, whether good or bad, of his whole life; and condemned or cleared him, according as his crimes or deserts prevailed ^k (T). Their humanity and good-nature even towards those, who, according to the laws, deserved death, is very remarkable. Thus Artaxerxes Longimanus ordered, that the turbans of the condemned persons should be struck off,

^h ÆLIAN. var. histor. l. i. c. 32, 33. ⁱ PHILOSTRAT. l. i. de vita Apollon. EPIPHAN. l. ii. c. de Manichæis. ^k Idem ib. JOSEPH. antiquitat. l. xi. c. 3. HEROD. l. i. c. 137.

(S) We read in Plutarch (37), and Ælian (38), of one Sineta a Persian, who, meeting by chance Artaxerxes at a great distance from his poor cottage, and having nothing else to present him with, ran to the river, and, filling both his hands with water, made an offering of that to the king, which was by him graciously received.

(T) To this purpose Herodotus tells us (39), that Darius, having pronounced sentence of death against a corrupt judge, and afterwards finding, that his former deserts overbalanced his present crime, ordered him to be taken down from the cross, and set at liberty. This does not agree with what we read in Diodorus Siculus, who tells us, that the sentence of death, once pronounced, could not be repealed even by the king himself; for, after relating how Darius pronounced sentence of death against Charidemus, he adds, that the king immediately repented, as if he had been over-hasty in a matter of the utmost consequence; but it was not in his power to undo what he had done (40). Perhaps he means nothing else but that the king could not restore him to life again; for, as both he (41) and Xenophon (42) inform us, the sentence was no sooner pronounced, but the criminal was hurried away to execution.

(37) Plutarch in apophthegm & in Artax. (38) Ælian. var. Hist. l. i. c. 32. (39) Herodot. l. vii. c. 194. (40) Diod. Sic. l. xiv. (41) Idem, l. xii. (42) Xenoph. l. i. Anabasis. p. 105.

instead

instead of their heads; that the strings with which they tyed them should be cut, instead of their ears; and their garments whipt, instead of their persons^l. Beside the king, there were several judges, all men of unblemished characters, and well skilled in the laws of the kingdom. These were called royal judges, administered justice at stated times, in different provinces; and some of them attended the king whithersoever he went^m. The king often advised with them; and, in matters concerning himself, referred the whole to their judgmentⁿ. They were nominated by the king, who, as that employment was for life, took great care to prefer only such as were famed for their integrity (U).

THE Persian kings had several wives, besides what number Their concubines. of concubines they pleased. Darius maintained as many as the days of the year^o: Artaxerxes had by his concubines 115 children^p. The concubines were introduced to the king, each in their turn^q: whence some have concluded, that the antient Persian year consisted of 360 days, seeing that several of the Persian monarchs had the like number of concubines, who went to their kings in constant courses^r (W).

WE

^l PLUTARCH. in Artaxerx. & apophthegm. AMMIAN. MARCELL. l. xxx. ^m ÆLIAN. var. histor. l. i. c. 34. ⁿ HEROD. l. iii. ^o DIOD. SIC. l. xvii. ^p JUSTIN. l. x. ^q Esther ii. 12--15. ^r See WHISTON'S theory of the earth, book ii. p. 149.

(U) Artaxerxes raised one to that dignity, as Ælian (43) informs us, who was not a Persian, but a Mede, by birth, for having condemned his own son to death, according to the power which parents had in those days over their children. And Cambyses, being informed that one of the judges had received a bribe, caused him, upon conviction, to be flayed alive; and, having covered the seat, on which he pronounced sentence, with his skin, appointed his son in his room, ordering him to sit in the same chair when he pronounced sentence (44). These judges, according to Josephus (45) and Zonaras (46), were seven in number; which they gather from the commission of Artaxerxes to Ezra, who was sent of the king and his seven counsellors (47).

(W) This conjecture is not altogether groundless: but we cannot help thinking it somewhat strange, that the same writer should allege the authority of Q. Curtius, to prove, that the antient Persian year contained but three hundred and sixty days; when that author tells us, in express terms, that the Persian year consisted of three hundred and sixty-five days: his

(43) Ælian. l. i. var. histor. c. 34.
(45) Joseph. antiquit. l. xi. c. 6.
c. vii. per. 14. vid. & Esth. i. 14.

(44) Val. Maxim. l. vi. c. 3.
(46) Zonar. tom. i. (47) Ezra words

Their revenues.

WE shall end this section with some account of their revenues. Each province had its peculiar treasure, and treasurer, as is plain from all the antient writers, both sacred and profane: and from the great sums which Alexander found in several particular provinces or cities, we may judge of the immense treasures they possessed. In the city of Damascus he found 2600 talents, and silver uncoined, to the value of 500 more; in Arbela, 4000 talents; in Susa, 40,000, and 9000 darics; in Persepolis, 120,000; in Pasargada, 6000; in Ecbatan, 180,000 ^s. These immense sums arose from the tributes which each province was yearly obliged to pay, according to the assessment of Darius Hystaspis; for, during the reigns of Cyrus, and his son Cambyfes, no tributes were imposed, the people voluntarily contributing for the maintenance of the king and his army, what they thought fit. From the imposing of these taxes, and other things of the like nature, the Persians gave Darius the nickname of merchant. The sum total of the king's revenues, according to the computation of Herodotus ^t, amounted to 14560 Euboic talents ^u, besides other smaller sums. These revenues were gathered from the provinces of Asia only; but, in process of time, the islands of several provinces of Europe, with Egypt, Syria, &c. were likewise taxed; which increased the king's revenues to such a degree, that, if we believe Justin ^w, Alexander, after the conquest of Persia, received yearly from his subjects the sum of 300,000 talents. The Persian kings preserved their treasures in the following manner: they caused the gold and silver to be melted down, and poured into earthen vessels, which they broke when occasion required, and took such a quantity as

^s CURT. I. v. DIODOR. SIC. I. xviii. ARRIAN. I. iii. c. 16. PLUTARCH. in Alexandr.

^t HEROD. I. iii. c. 89. 95, 96.

^u See our preface to the first volume.

^w JUSTIN. I. xiii.

words are, Magos trecenti & sexaginta quinque juvenes sequebantur—diebus totius anni parcs numero; quippe Persis quoque in totidem dies descriptus est annus (48); that is, the mages were followed by three hundred and sixty-five youths, answering in number to the days of the year; for, among the Persians too, the year is divided into three hundred and sixty-five days. But

Curtius in this, as in many other particulars, was certainly mistaken; since Herodotus, whose authority is of more weight, in speaking of the tributes which Darius Hystaspis laid on the provinces subject to the Persian empire, says, that the Cilicians were obliged to furnish Darius with three hundred and sixty white horses, that is, one for every day of the year (49).

(48) Q. Curtius, I. iii. 3, 8, & seqq.

(49) Herodotus, I. iii. c. 90.

seemed

seemed necessary ^x. The lands of the Persians were free from all taxes; but other provinces, besides money, were obliged to contribute considerably, each something of their proper product, towards the maintenance of the king; and, in the time of war, of his army ^y. Thus the provinces of Syrene and Barca were, besides the ordinary taxes, assessed at such a quantity of corn as was sufficient to supply 120,000 men: the satrapæ of Babylon maintained the king and his court for four months; and moreover, paid him a yearly tribute of 500 young eunuchs: the Ethiopians, and adjoining people, made a present every third year of two chænixes (X) of gold, two hundred bundles of ebony, five Ethiopian children, and twenty elephants teeth, of the largest size: the Colchians, or Colchi, presented the king every fifth year with an hundred boys, and the like number of young women: the Arabians with a quantity of frankincense, answering the weight of 1000 talents, &c ^z. But it is now time to dismiss this subject, and hasten to the most entertaining and important point of the Persian history, their religion and religious ceremonies.

^x HERODOT. ibid. ^y Idem ibid. STRABO, l. xv.
XENOPH. l. iv. in Αναβάσις. p. 261. ^z HEROD. ubi supra.

(X) Chænix was a Greek measure of wheat, as served a man one day.

S E C T. III.

Of the religion of the Persians.

THERE is hardly any subject which hath employed the The impor- pens of authors antient or modern, that deserves to be tance of treated with greater accuracy, or to be read with more at- this sub- tention, than this which we are now about to discuss. The re- ject, and ligion of the Persians, if we may credit the most learned and the difficul- industrious writers ^a, is venerable from its antiquity, and worthy ties which occur in treating it.

^a Vid. hist. relig. vet. Persarum, per THOMAM HYDE, 4to, Oxon. 1700. The religion of the Perses by HENRY LORD, 4to, London, 1630. Relation de l'état present de Perse par SANS-SON, Paris, 1695. Hist. of Chaldaic philosophy, by THOMAS STANLEY, book ii. p. 67. London, folio, 1662. Philos. general. per THEOPH. GALÆUM, lib. i. c. 5. 8vo, London, 1676. Connection of the history of the Old and New Testament, by dean, PRIDEAUX, vol. i. p. 299. 8vo, London 1729. HERBERT'S, DELLA VALLE'S, TAVERNIER'S travels, &c.

of admiration, from its having subsisted now some thousand years, in as great, or greater purity, than any other religion known to us at this day. But the accounts, which are still extant, of the religion of the antient Persians, are far from corresponding exactly; and the descriptions which modern travellers have given us of those who profess this religion in Persia and India, even in our time, differ so widely, though not indeed in essential articles, that it requires no small degree of patience to separate the ore from the dross; and to present the reader with what is worthy of being known and believed, among heaps of fables and misrepresentations (A).

IF

(A) The accounts we have of the Persian religion are, as we have stated them above, of two sorts: first, such as have been collected from books; and these again may be divided into two classes, one extracted from the Greek and Latin writers, the other from oriental historians: the second consists of what travellers deliver from their own knowledge, concerning the doctrines and practices of the present Persians, who themselves affirm, and are allowed by others, to practise the religion of their ancestors, with little or no variation. As to such as have drawn their materials from books, they have been, as we shall frequently have occasion to shew, prodigiously misled in their opinions by authors, who have too confidently delivered their own on this subject: for, as to the Greek writers, such as Herodotus, Strabo, &c. they delivered what they had from others, and that likewise under this disadvantage, that, being polytheists themselves, they, of course, conceived, that other nations had variety of gods, as well as their own; and therefore reported, that the Persians worshipped the fire, because they prayed before it: the air, because, in their devotions, they lifted up their eyes towards it: and the sun, because they professed to reverence that glorious planet (1). Nor was this all; they forged, for the sake of making their histories uniform, such sacrifices, and other religious rites, as seemed to correspond best with the notions they had framed of the Persian religion, and attributed them to the Persians. Thus Herodotus, speaking of the passage of Xerxes into Greece, relates impossible things of the magi, with as much boldness as if he had been eye-witness of them. "The country (says he) that lies about the mountain Pangæus, is called Phyllis; on the west side, extending to the river Angites, which falls into the Strymon itself. At their arrival, the magi offered a sacrifice of white horses to this river; and, after they had thrown them into the stream with a composition of various drugs, the army broke up, and marched to the Nine Ways of the Edonians, where they found bridges prepared for

(1) Herodotus, l. i. c. 131. Strab. geograph. lib. xv. Diogen. Laert. in proem.

" their

IF we had still any considerable collection of the ancient Persian records, we should doubtless find in them what would satisfy

“ their passage over the Strymon.
 “ But, being informed that this “ place was called by the name “ of the Nine Ways, they took “ nine of the sons and daugh“ ters of the inhabitants, and “ buried them alive, as the man“ ner of the Persians is. And I “ have heard that Amestris, the “ wife of Xerxes, having at“ tained to a considerable age, “ caused fourteen children of “ the best families in Persia to “ be interred alive, for a sacri“ fice of thanks to that god, “ who, they say, is beneath the “ earth (2).” We have shewn in the text, that the Persians were indeed reverencers of water as well as fire; but that they sacrificed to it, or threw any thing into a running stream, is a flat contradiction to this very notion of theirs, which consisted in preserving the purity of those elements, and not in polluting them with blood, and dead carcases. And, in respect to sacrifices, Herodotus himself, in another place, ac-knowleges as much (3). 2.
Curtius, speaking of the chariot in which Darius appeared in the field against Alexander, describes it thus: “ It was ad“ orned, says he, with images “ of their gods in silver and “ gold; the axle-tree thereof “ glittered with precious stones; “ upon it were two images of “ gold, the one representing “ Ninus, the other Belus, of a “ cubit stature each: between “ them was an eagle of gold,

“ displaying her wings over “ both, &c (4).” All this is downright fiction; Ninus and Belus were never worshiped by the Persians; they were not wont to erect images, or to worship them. What makes it probable, that Curtius was the inventor of this whole story, is this; that Arrian (5), an author of great accuracy, and who wrote from excellent materials, says not one word of all this;
 nor indeed does any other an-tient historian. But Curtius was so great a rhetorician, that he could not write plainly; but, on the contrary, loaded all his descriptions with ornaments, without any regard to probability or truth. As to the relations of travellers, we need not wonder, that they differ about the religious opinions, rites and ceremonies of the Persians, or, as some call them, Persees, since they very seldom agree exactly, even in their descriptions of less intricate things than these. As for Henry Lord, whose small treatise, in relation to these people, has been received as a kind of oracle, merely because he ventured to talk very authoritatively therein; it is scarce possible to determine from what he says, whether they are idolaters or not: he calls them so, it is true, and speaks of their worshiping
 the fire in an idolatrous manner:
 yet the better part of his book, which consists of what he heard from one of their priests, contains nothing which can justify

(2) Herodotus, l. vii. c. 113. 114.
Curt. lib. iii. cap. 3.

(3) Idem, l. i. c. 138.

(4) 2.

(5) Lib. ii. cap. 11.

satisfy us as to the primitive doctrines of their wise men; but as these are most of them either long since destroyed, or at least hidden from us, we must be content to follow such lights as yet remain; and where we cannot make the reader understand things as clearly as we would, it is our duty to make them, however, as clear as we can. This is certain, that the Persians have preserved the worship of one God, and other essential articles of true religion ^b, through a long course of years, without suffering themselves to be drawn over by fraud, or submitting through force, to any new faith, though they have so often changed their masters: a thing very singular, and in some sort commendable, if we consider how much they have been depressed since the death of Yezdegherd, the last king of their own religion, and the opprobrious treatment they have met with from the Mohammedans, who are wont to call them, and christians, with like contempt, infidels; though the principles of the former, as well as the latter, are far more reasonable than the ill-connected legends of the Arabian impostor; and though the modern Persians (taking that proper name in a religious, not a civil sense) are unanimously acknowledged to be as honest, as charitable, and inoffensive a people, as any upon earth. So that, in GOD's due time, we have just reason to believe they will, at last, acknowledge the truth of the gospel dispensation, and be included within the pale of the Christian church (B).

WE

^b Hist. relig. veter. Persar. c. 33. Connection of the Old and New Testament.

his opinion (6). On the whole, we have thought it necessary to peruse, and shall, on occasion, make use of, whatever is related by Herbert, Ovington, Tavernier, Thevenot, Chardin, or other travellers, concerning the Persees, their tenets and customs; but it is our happiness to follow a more capable guide than any of these, the very learned and judicious Dr. Thomas Hyde, who, from the mighty stores of various learning which he possessed, as well as from the curious observations

he in his travels had made, composed his valuable history of the religion of the antient Persians, wherein every thing he lays down, is supported by antient monuments, or by the express authority of that law which this people professed to have received from Zerdust, a compendium of whose writings, contained in the book Sad-der, the enchiridion of the modern Persees, is annexed to the doctor's treatise (7).

(B) Since the introduction of the Mohammedan religion into

(6) Lord's History of the Persees, p. 10, 44. (7) Magorum liber Sad-der Zoroastris præcepta & canones continens: in usum ecclesiæ magorum, & fidelium eorum omnium.

WE have heretofore shewn, that the original inhabitants Origin of of Persia descended from Elam the son of Shem ^c: and from the Persian these two patriarchs it is most probable they derived the true religion.
religion,

^c Vol. i. p. 267.

Persia, the antient inhabitants have been exposed to various persecutions on account of their religion; for the Mohammedans being, generally speaking, bigots, they are not content with giving these unhappy men always ill language, but, on every occasion, are stirring up their princes to oppress and destroy, under colour of religion, these relicts of the antient Persians. It is true, the Mohammedan Persians have, in all ages, had amongst them some men of learning and genius; yet few or none have ever inquired thoroughly into the doctrines of these poor people: on the contrary, they are as ready as any to load them with opprobrious names, and such as they no way deserve: thus they call them Nogusba, i. e. Zabian, or deserter of the true faith; Ghebri, i. e. infidel: this word is differently spelt as it is differently pronounced; the most usual way of writing it is Gbour: they likewise style an antient Persian Atesb-perest, i. e. fire-worshiper; Philiv or Caliv, i. e. fool or madman: the most gentle term they make use of is Mogb, that is, magian; but then they frequently say, that a Mogb is Atesb-perest and Zindik, that is, a fire-worshiper and a Sadducee; for among other calumnies with which they load these poor men, that of denying a future state is one. However, tho' they may, amongst themselves, destroy their good name, yet, with strangers, their aspersions do the Persians no hurt; for they, looking on the innocence and integrity of these poor peoples lives, cannot avoid affording them both pity and esteem. It would be an easy matter to support all that has been advanced in this note, by quotations from the best accounts we have of Persia and the Indies; but, instead of fatiguing the reader, it may perhaps answer the same end, if we here set down the five precepts which these Persians acknowledge as the rule of life, which every bebedin or layman is bound to obey, as they are reported by Mr. Lord.

I. "To have shame ever with them, as a remedy against all sin; for a man would never oppress his inferiors, if he had any shame; a man would never steal, if he had any shame; a man would never bear false witness, if he had any shame; a man would never be overcome with drink, if he had any shame. But because this is laid aside, men are ready to commit any of these: and therefore the bebedin, or layman, must think of shame."

II. "To have fear always present with them; and that every time the eye twinkled, or closed its lids together, they should stand in fear at those times of their prayers, lest they should not go to heaven; the thought of which should make them fear to commit sin, for that God sees what manner of religion, which, at first, flourished among them with the utmost purity, but, in process of time, was corrupted by an intermixture of superstitious rites, and heretical opinions, at such time as the rest of the oriental nations were overspread with that deluge of false religion which generally goes under the name of Zabiiism. From this it is affirmed by some antient authors they were thoroughly recovered by the patriarch Abraham, who, they say, undertook the reformation of their religion; and, having freed it as well from the pernicious doctrines they had imbibed, as from the superfluous ceremonies they had adopted, left it them once more in its pure and primitive condition and simplicity, wherein he transmitted it to his own descendants^d. But if this were so, they were a second time corrupted, and engaged, if not in idolatrous practices, yet in suspicious acts of reverence to the heavenly bodies, and in practices inconsistent with the true faith (C).

The Persians pretend to derive their religion from Abraham.

How-

^d Hist. relig. vet. Persar. c. 2. & 3. Connection of the Old and New Testament, part i. book iv. p. 25. 8vo.

“ ones they are, that look up “ towards him.

III. “ That whensoever they “ are to do any thing, to think “ whether the thing be good or “ bad that they go about, whe“ ther commanded or forbidden
“ in the Zundavastaw; if pro“ hibited, they must not do it;
“ if allowed by the book of re“ ligion, they may embrace and “ prosecute the same.

IV. “ That whatsoever of “ God’s creatures they should “ first behold in the morning, “ it should be a monitor to put “ them in mind of their thank“ givings to God, that had given “ such good things for mens ser“ vice and use.

V. “ That whensoever they “ pray by day, they should turn “ their faces towards the sun;
“ and whensoever they prayed
“ by night, they should incline “ towards the moon: for that “ they are the two great lights
“ of heaven, and God’s two “ witnesses: most contrary to “ Lucifer, who loveth darkness

“ more than light.”

(C) That the Persian, as well as other religions, receded by degrees from its first principles, and suffered by the introduction of some superstitions, cannot seem strange to any considerate person. The Persians themselves confess it, and acknowledge, that their famous lawgiver Zerdust came to restore their primitive doctrines, and to purge away those errors, which time, and the industry of Zabian heretics, had introduced. In what these errors consisted, the superstitious ceremonies which attended them, and the pains it cost this restorer of magism, to root these foolish superstitions out, will be delivered in the life of Zoroaster or Zerdust, which we shall give the reader at large in our history of the Persians, from the oriental writers under the reign of that monarch, in whose days

HOWEVER the splendor of their religion might be darkened They were with these spots, yet it was never so far obscured as to admit always any degree of comparison between it and the worship of neigh- zealous in bouring nations (excepting the Jews); for the Persians con- the service tinued zealous adorers of one all-wise and omnipotent GOD, of one God. whom they held to be infinite and omnipresent; so that they could not bear, that he should be represented by either molten or graven images; or that the Creator and Lord of the universe should be circumscribed within the narrow bounds of temples. On this account they overturned the statues, and places of public worship among the Greeks, as unworthy of the deity, and not, as they have been falsely charged by the Greeks, from any sacrilegious contempt of the gods of other countries. In the decline, indeed, of the antient Persian empire, the worship of Venus was introduced by one of their princes; but it was condemned by the magi^f, who remained firm to this great article of their faith, There is one GOD; and took care to transmit it religiously to their posterity.

THE only objection to which the antient and modern Per- An account of the na- ture of that respect shown by them to fire and to the sun. sians have rendered themselves liable, flows from the respect which they have constantly paid to fire, and to the sun: yet if this matter be seriously and impartially considered, it will be found, that there is nothing of idolatry in this respect of theirs, but that they only worship GOD in the fire, and not fire as a god. That they should have an extraordinary veneration for the element of fire, and make choice rather of it than of any of the rest, to be the symbol of the divine nature, will appear less extraordinary, if we consider, that a never-dying fire was kept on the altar of burnt-offerings at Jerusalem^g; that GOD revealed himself to Moses by a flame in a bush^h; and chose to testify his presence, in the host of Israel, by a pillar of fire, which went before them in the night, and which appeared only as a column of smoke in the dayⁱ. As to their veneration of the sun, it is founded on their belief, that he is the noblest creature of the Almighty visible to us, and that his throne is placed therein. Nor need we wonder either at the mistakes of antient writers, or at the stories told us by some Mohammedan authors on this head, since it was very difficult days he flourished; for to have inserted so long a digression here, must have rendered this chapter very prolix, and at the same time obliged us to frequent recapitulations in the subsequent history.

^e Hist. relig. vet. Persar. p. 3. HERODOTUS, l. i. c. 131.

^f Hist. relig. vet. Persar. p. 90. ^g 2 Chron. vii. 1. Levit. x. 1.

^h Exod. iii. 2. Acts vii. 30. ⁱ Exod. xiii. 21. Numb. xiv. 14. Nehem. ix. 19. Psalm lxxviii. 14. 1 Cor. x. 1.

for them to get a true knowledge of the religious tenets and customs of this people, because they were forbidden by their legislator Zoroaster, or Zerduſht, as appears from the book Sadder, to teach either their antient language, or its character, to strangers, or to instruct them in their religion ^k. If any farther regard had been had to the sun in antient times, it would certainly have descended with the other parts of their religion to the modern Persians: but that it never reached them, the learned and judicious doctor Hyde assures us; for an intimate friend of his being by him requested to inquire concerning the worship of Mithra (so the Persians call the sun), he accordingly asked some of the priests of the Persians settled in India, at what seasons, and with what ceremonies, they adored the sun. They answered, that they never adored the sun, or paid any sort of divine honours to that luminary, to the moon, or to the planets; but only turned themselves towards the sun when praying, because they looked upon it to come nearest to the nature of fire. The same excellent author observes, That, among the precepts of Zoroaster, his disciples are directed to pay daily to the sun certain niyâsh, i. e. salutations, consisting only in words (and those too addressed to GOD) without any mention of priestish, i. e. worship by bowing of the body. Yet if any custom of this sort prevails, it ought not to be interpreted as a mark of idolatrous adoration; for the Persian Mohammedans, who are zealous detesters of that impiety, and the Armenians who dwell in Persia, are wont to pray in like manner, the latter making the sign of the cross, and bowing profoundly low at the sight of the rising sun ^l. To say the truth, adoration, that is, prostrating or bowing the body, was, even among the Hebrews, a civil as well as a religious rite; or, to speak more properly, the same word, viz. השתחווה Hishtabhavaah, was used to express this act of reverence, when applied to GOD or man. An eminent rabbi says, that this, as an act of devotion, was not to be performed out of the sanctuary, that is, out of the temple ^m: it is forbid, by the second commandment, to be paid to idols; but, as a civil rite, the Jews were at liberty thus to testify their respect to angels, and to persons of very high dignity. On the whole therefore, there can be no more reason to suspect these Persians of idolatry on this account, than any other of the oriental nations, since the sun is no more than the Kibla (D) of the Persians, as the temple of Jerusalem was to the

^k Hist. relig. vet. Perf. p. 5. ^l Idem, p. 5, & 6. ^m IARCHI supra. Levit. xxvi. 1.

(D) That is, the point of adoration, such as Daniel in particular is said to have practised, when he prayed with his face towards the Jews, and that of Mecca is to the Mohammedans, who in this respect are so scrupulous, that they have tables to determine the bearing of *Mecca*ⁿ, from whatever place they are in.

As to the notions which the Persians have of the sun, they ^{The Mi-}are not, as we shall see hereafter, perfectly agreed in them; ^{thra of the}some believing the throne of GOD placed therein, and that it ^{Persians}is the seat of paradise; others entertaining a different opinion ^{never}as to paradise, but praying nevertheless towards the sun, as a ^{esteemed a}symbol of the Deity, on account of its purity. It is farther ^{deity;}certain, that the Persians never called Mithra a god, or ascribed to it any name of the divinity; and, so far from directing any petitions thereto, they constantly begin and end the ejaculations pronounced before the sun with the praises of the most high GOD, to whom alone their prayers are addressed °. As to the fire before which the Persians worship, ^{nor the}taking that word in an extended sense, they acknowledge no ^{fire;}thing of divinity therein; but, esteeming it a symbol of the deity, they first prostrate themselves before it, and then, standing up, they pray to GOD. Thus, among the ruins of the ancient palace at Persepolis there are seen many marble statues of kings standing praying to GOD before the figures of the sun and fire, which are also placed on the wall before them; only one figure is seen kneeling, with the same symbols before it as the rest. As the fire in the temple was reputed sacred among the Jews, so the Persians might from them take this custom of praying before sacred fires: which is the more likely, since it was the manner of GOD's chosen people to prostrate themselves before the altar, and then to offer up their petitions. It was also a custom among the Persians to tender oaths before the

ⁿ Hist. relig. vet. Perf. p. 95. ° Idem, cap. 5.

towards the holy city (7). This is not a proper place to inquire, how such a notion of directing one's prayers towards any holy place, or peculiar point of the compass, became so generally received. If the inquisitive reader would have a more exact account of this matter, than it is proper in such a note as this to give him, he may have recourse to the works of the learned Mr. John Gregory of Oxford (8), who, in treating of two texts of Scripture which seem to have some relation to this point (9), hath shewn a consummate knowlege in various kinds of literature, as well as a genius perfectly well turned for such intricate and abstruse inquiries. For us, it is sufficient, that the fact is as we have stated it; since, whether it be right or wrong, the Persians must be as much in the right, or as little in the wrong, as any other nation which hath fallen into this way of thinking.

(7) Dan. vi. 10. (8) 4to, London, A. D. 1684. p. 73. (9) Zech. iii. 8.

fire upon the altar, in which also they agreed with the Jews, as they did farther in offering their victims, and other offerings, either by or upon it; and in preserving it from being polluted by impure fuel, in which last case the Persians went so far as to punish offenders with death. Their kings also, and principal persons, were wont sometimes to feed the sacred fires with precious oils, and rich aromatics, stiling these epulae ignis, or fire-dainties: but still all things done to or by fire, were performed to the honour of GOD, and terminated solely in him; at least, if we may credit the concurring testimonies of Persic writers yet remaining, and the constant asseverations of those who still profess this religion (E).

THERE

9 HYDE, c. 22. p. 290.

(E) When we consider the point in dispute, which is plainly this, Whether the antient Persians had rational or irrational notions of the Deity; and what degree of evidence there is on each side; it may seem surprising, that it is yet made a matter of dispute among the learned. Herodotus, who elsewhere tells us strange stories of the religious ceremonies of the Persians on hearsay, speaking expressly on this head, says all that can be wished or desired in their favour; for he owns, that the antient Persians had neither temples, altars, nor images: and therefore we ought rather to regard this than the other parts of his book; wherein he manifestly relates what other Greek writers, full of spleen against Xerxes, and his successor, had written of their inhuman sacrifices, and other acts of religious cruelty (10). Xenophon's authority would be of great weight in the present case, if he had written decisively, and spoken things of his own knowledge; but the high commendations he has given the Persians, and the mighty character he hath afforded their laws, hath begot a doubt in the minds of the learned, whether he did not mingle his own ideas with the accounts he gives us of the customs and manners of the Persians (11). Plutarch, in a passage hereafter more fully cited, speaks very respectfully of Zoroaster, and ascribes nothing to him unworthy of a very wise man. There were some, he tells us, of the antients, who asserted two supreme beings, the one the author of all good, the other of all evil; others, who admitted but one God, the father of good, but who acknowledged there was a demon, from whom all evil proceeded: this last, says he, was the doctrine of Zoroaster, who flourished four thousand years before the Trojan war (12). The same author then proceeds to a succinct account of the doctrine of the magi, which we shall have occasion to insert in our text. Dr. Hyde has produced an authentic relation of the sentiments of the antient Persians on this subject,

(10) Herodot. l. i. c. 131.

(11) Vide Cyropædiam.

(12) De Isid. & Ofr-

THERE is yet another point, in which the Persians are to be vindicated, before we can leave the learned reader satisfied, that they never were idolaters. It is this: they had amongst them, after the time of Zoroaster's reformation of their religion, certain caves, adorned not only with figures of the sun, but of the planets, and other heavenly bodies; which symbolical representations were called Mithriac figures, and nor any other symbolical representations. were afterwards introduced into other nations, where they became objects of idolatrous worship; but they were far from being so among the Persians, who were a wise and well-instructed people; for, with them, they served only as mathematical symbols for preserving the true system of the universe, to which end, and to no other, they were used, and perhaps invented by Zoroaster himself, as we shall hereafter have occasion to prove, when we come to speak of the life, doctrines, and writings, of that famous man^r.

HAVING thus shewn, in general, the nature of the Persian religion, and that it was far preferable to any of the systems received in other nations, either in the east or in the west, the Jews excepted, we shall proceed to shew what the Persians themselves have taught concerning the establishment of their religion, as well as what are the doctrines as to essential points universally received among them.

THE great fame of Abraham, which, from a concurrence of various causes, had diffused itself through the whole east, induced the Persians, as well as the Zabians, to ascribe the system of doctrines received by them to that venerable patriarch, stiling their faith at all times Kish-Abraham. They like-

^r HYDE, c. 4. p. 118.

ject, as collected from their successors the Persees settled in India, an abstract of which will likewise be inserted in our text (13); and the curious reader may peruse the whole of it in the treatise of the excellent author before-mentioned. In the same place may be found the testimony of Sbaristan, who wrote in Arabic an account of the religions of the east, and who, in speaking of the faith of the Persians, does them all the justice that can be (14); but, what is of far greater consequence to us than any authority of friends or enemies whatsoever, the book Sadder, containing the canon of the Persian faith, is not only extant amongst the Persees, but even amongst ourselves; and every page therein affords us instances of Zoroaster's wisdom, and of the rectitude of the religion he established, as to fundamental points, and especially as to the belief of one infinitely wise, eternal, self-existent Being (15).

(13) Relig. veter. Persar. c. 22. p. 292. liber magorum, apud Hyde relig. vet. Persarum.

(14) Ibid.

(15) Vide Sadder

Whether Abraham was the author of the Persian religion. wise ascribe the books, which they hold sacred, to this father of the faithful; and as much believe him to be the author of their sofb or bible, as we believe the gospel to have come to us from CHRIST, or the Mohammedans, that GOD revealed to Mohammed his koran^s. In attributing books to Abraham, they agree with the Jews, and with the Mohammedans, the latter ascribing to him no less than ten treatises, perhaps all with the like reason. The Persians say farther, that Abraham, while he resided amongst them, dwelt in the city of Balch, which they, from thence, stile the city of Abraham. But, though it must be allowed, that the old Persian religion agreed, in many great points, with the religion of Abraham; and tho' it should be admitted, that his fame might, even in his lifetime, be, with very advantageous circumstances, published throughout all Persia; yet it is so far from being evident, that it is scarce probable, he went himself into that country, much less that he executed the office of a prophet there, and resided at Balch. On the contrary, it is far more credible, that this notion took rise from the suggestion of Zoroaster, who had his learning and his divinity out of the book of Moses, and other sacred books among the Jews; and that the city of Balch received the appellation of the city of Abraham from Zoroaster, on account of his making it the residence of the archimagus, or high-priest, of the religion of Abraham, and not from that patriarch's being supposed to live there at all in ancient times^t.

The other elements revered by the Persians. THOUGH fire was held the symbol of the Divinity among the Persians, yet the other elements were also highly honoured by them; insomuch that the Greeks, and other foreigners, who knew not their religious principles, called them worshipers of the elements; which was a flagrant calumny, since all the respect they paid them arose from their conceiving them to be the first seeds of all things: wherefore they studied, by every method possible, to preserve each of them in its primitive purity. On this account, they prevented, as much as they could, the air from being infected by ill smells: and, for their officiousness on this head, Herodotus, according to his usual custom, represents them as believing the air a deity. They hold (says he) the whole expanse to be Jupiter^u. That they might, in like manner, preserve the earth from impurities, they would not bury their dead therein; but suffered them to be devoured by birds and wild beasts, that, finding a tomb in their bowels, they might not infect the air. In fine, the preserving all the elements pure, was by them esteemed an act of high piety, and, as such, meriting the divine favour in this world, and in the world to come; for, in all things, they were great affecters of cleanliness, and studious, in an especial manner, of avoiding whatever might pollute them. Fire and water, however, were, in a peculiar manner, the objects of their care, because they were the most liable to be contaminated; and hence the Greeks, mistaking the degree of reverence they paid them, declared them, without scruple, worshipers of those elements; and tell us formal stories of the sacrifices offered to both. It is very true, that kings often do extravagant things, and such as are contrary to the civil and religious laws of the countries they govern; so that it is not impossible, that some of the Persian princes might be guilty of what is laid to their charge: but it is not likely, because the Persians universonally held, that whoever wilfully polluted either fire or water, deserved death in this world, and everlasting punishment in that to come; and that whoever threw the bones of dead creatures into waters were certainly damned. For these reasons, the magi, where-ever they were, took care to have all the waters in their neighbourhood watched, assigning them keepers, whose sole office it was to look carefully to this matter, and to see, that no filthy thing was thrown or dropped into them; and for this they had stated and well-settled salaries: for, abhorring as they did, to represent the almighty LORD of heaven and earth by artificial images of stone or metal, they chose to preserve fire and water in their utmost purity, that they might serve as symbols of the divine nature, and put them in mind of the infinite purity of GOD. As they held the imitation of angels, so they believed, that one of these celestial guards was appointed to watch over the waters in general. This angel they called Ardisur or Arduisur, for whom a particular niyâish or salutation was prescribed; the title of which, in their antient books, runs thus, Hymn to Ardisur, for the benefits received from the sea, rivers, wells, and fountains. In this hymn, they praised him for taking care of all these places, and prayed that he might continue so to do, returning GOD thanks for the various uses made of water, and the mighty advantages resulting to mankind from his wise disposition thereof throughout the earth. They were of opinion, that, in paradise, such people were peculiarly blessed, as had been cautious of defiling water, and had, in this sense, preserved a respect for that element, during their lives; for which cause, they recommended the care of this element, as well as fire, to their women, that is, their private fires, and the water used in their houses: for it does not appear, that they ever admitted women to minister in religious matters, except in the mysteries

^s HYDE, c. 2. p. 28. ^t Connection of the Old and New Testament, part i. book iv. p. 225. ^u HYDE, c. 3. D'HERBELOT, art. Balkhe. HERODOT. l. i. c. 131.

*The purity
with which they preserved the elements.*

ries of Venus; which, as we observed before, was an heresy, and, as such, detested by the orthodox magians. This love to purity, and especial regard to water, may stand sufficiently justified by the practice of the Jews, and the precepts in their law for corporal purification, as well as by the great advantage of preserving cleanliness in those excessive hot climates; especially if we consider, that, in washing the hands, &c. and putting on the garments, they were bound to use solemn forms of prayer, as indeed there were set ejaculations to be used in the most ordinary actions of human life ^u.

Their
priests.

WITH respect to the use they made of fire in their national religion, the priests, who attended it, by no means deserved the appellation of ignarii sacerdotes, i. e. fire-priests; for they were truly sacerdotes Dei, priests of the Almighty, who, tho', like the Jewish priests, they waited on, and took care to preserve the sacred fire from being extinguished, were far from making this their only duty; for these, as well as those, read every day public prayers, and did other sacerdotal offices, as we shall hereafter declare more largely: yet such has been the hard fate of these people, that, because their principles were not known, and their ceremonies ill understood, they have been branded with the name of atesh-pereft, i. e. fire-worshipers; so dangerous a thing it is to carry to any excess even innocent ceremonies. They never confessed their sins to any, but to GOD, nor besought a remission of them from any, but from Him; yet they inclined to perform these public acts of devotion before the symbol of the Deity, that is, before fire, or before the sun, as the witness of their actions. In like manner, the Jews confessed their sins to GOD in the temple, the fire flaming on the altar near them; so that there was nothing of idolatry in this, though it might not be altogether free from superstition (F).

IN

^u HYDE, c. 6. p. 137.

(F) If we were to undertake a critical review of what modern authors have written about these people, and their opinions, it would require a far larger treatise than this whole chapter. This assertion, bold as it may seem, shall give such a pregnant instance of it, as will sufficiently prove the truth of our observation. Mr. Tavernier has spent about fifteen pages in his account of these people, in which there are at least fifty capital mistakes, which any man may discover, who is at all versed in oriental literature. In his section of the origin and prophets of this sect, he confounds Zerduft with Abraham, in such a manner, that it would cost a great deal of time to determine what part of the story belongs to the one, and what to the other.

He

IN the most antient times, the Persians had no temples at all; but reared altars, whereon they preserved their sacred fires,

He tells us of a king, whom he calls Neubrout, probably Nimrod; and ascribes to him things that nobody ever heard of before; nay, the very name he has given the prophet, is sufficient to shew how much he was confused on this subject; and consequently, how little credit is due to what he relates of the religion of the Gaurs or Gabres, as he calls them. Their prophet's name, as set down by him, was Ebrabim-zer-Ateucht; he tells us of books he received from heaven, that they contain the religious precepts of these people; and that he himself has seen a great book which was attributed to him. But we must desire the reader to take notice, that we do not arraign Mr. Tavernier's sincerity, as to facts which lay within the compass of his judgment; on the contrary, we are persuaded, that he wrote nothing which he did not take to be true, as appears by the following account of their worship of the fire, which is the title of one of his sections: "The Gaurs render no such honours to the fire, as agree with this term of worship; they are not idolaters; they acknowledge one God, the Creator of the heaven and of the earth; and him only they worship." In the rest of his sections he speaks distinctly enough of what he saw; but he relates what he heard in such a manner, that a person who knew as little of the matter as he, could not fail of being deceived (16). Sir John Chardin, whom we have often commended, and who, without all question, was one of the most intelligent men that ever obliged the public with an account of his travels, speaks very contemptibly of these people; and would have us believe there is no sort of learning amongst them, but a little astrology: he says, their priests talk confusedly of their religion, and that they were not positive themselves as to the place where their sacred fire was kept (17). But though this gentleman was not so happy as to meet with intelligent persons of this religion, others have; and the accounts they have written, are clear and satisfactory, nay, supported by undeniable evidence. Monsieur Le Brun, by the interposition of the English agent, had a conversation with one of their priests, from whom he learned many things exactly conformable to what we have delivered. It would therefore be needless to insert that conversation here; but it will not perhaps be amiss to give the answer of the priest to Mr. Le Brun's first question, what he thought of the creation of the world, and the power of God. He said, He believed God to be the Being of beings, a Spirit of light, above the comprehension of human understandings, infinite, in (16) Tavern. lib. iv. c. 8. p. 480.(17) Chardin, tom. ii. p. 179.

Their pyrea, or temples.

fires, on the tops of mountains, and other solitary places *. It was Zoroaster who persuaded them, for the sake of preserving these fires more conveniently, to erect over each of them a pyreum, or fire-temple; but this had no relation to Mithra, or the sun, towards whom they could better testify their respect in the open air: neither did it subvert their antient principle, that the LORD of the universe ought not to be inclosed within walls; for their pyrea did not circumscribe what they esteemed an image or semblance of the Divinity, but only the symbol of his purity, and, as it were, a shadow of his nature. The overturning therefore of the Greek temples by Xerxes, and other acts of a like nature, were perfectly consistent with their reverence for fire, and their respect for the sun. Of this tho' many Greek and oriental writers were intirely ignorant, and were consequently prone to misrepresent them, yet authors of great candour, and more extensive knowlege, have readily assented to it, and testified, to the honour of the Persians, that they worshiped only one GOD, without representing him by any image or picture whatsoever †.

Their notions of good and evil beings

THE Persians, in early times, acknowledged one eternal and omnipotent Being, the creator and preserver of all things: him they called Yezad, Izad, or Izud; also Ormuzd, Hormuz, or Hormizda: joining this with the modern name, they say, Hormizda Chodâ, O supreme GOD. They acknowledged also an evil-created being, whom they stiled abariman, abreman, or abriman, and, in verse, abrimanan, which signifies amongst them the devil. To shew their detestation of this wicked being, his name, in the antient Persian books, was thus written, uwwi.ıppqv, to intimate, that, as he was the implacable and per-all places, almighty, from whom nothing could be hid, and against whose will nothing could be done. This conference happened in the month of January, 1707 (18). As to the pyrea, or fire-temples, they were formerly as frequent as parish-churches in other countries; but since the destruction of the antient Persians, these structures are by no means common. The Persees content themselves with saying their prayers before the common fires, and their priests officiate before them likewise. They have, however fire-temples, or fire-chapels, still in some places; and the chief of them is supposed to be in the province of Kermân, where there are more Gaurs than in any other part of Persia. Antiently their temples were splendid, and said to have been dedicated not only to the sun, but to the rest of the planets; in which, however, there was no more idolatry than there is in our dedicating churches to this or that saint (19).

* HEROD. l. i. c. 131. † Shahrifan, &c. apud HYDE, c. iii. p. 105.

(18) Le Brun, tom. ii. p. 387.

(19) Hyde relig. veter. Pers. c. 29. p. 253.

petual enemy of mankind, they maintained an everlasting enmity against him, and all his works. The modern Persians call the devil div ².

SOME have asserted, that the antient Persians held a co-eternity of these two principles; but writers, better acquainted with the true tenets of this nation, agree, that Ahariman was created out of darkness, and that Oromasdes first subsisted alone; that by him the light and darkness were created; that, in the composition of this world, good and evil are mixed together, and so shall continue till the end of all things, when each shall be separated, and reduced to its own sphere. Plutarch, who was a very ingenious, and a very inquisitive man, hath given us a long account of the doctrines of Zoroaster, very conformable to what has already been said, and agreeing perfectly well with the religion of the antient patriarchs, except in a few strokes of fable, which were either inserted by the mistake of the reporter of that abstract, or were invented by Zerdusht, to account for those things which surpass human understanding ². Some have endeavoured to account for the origin of the prince of darkness thus: Oromasdes, say they, said once within his mind, How shall my power appear, if there be nothing to oppose me? This reflection called Ahriman into being, who thenceforward opposed all the designs of God, and thereby, in spite of himself, contributes to his glory. The souls of men, according to them, were at first unbodied spirits; but the Almighty, resolving to make use of them in warring against Ahriman, clothed them with flesh, promising them, that the light should never forsake them, till Ahriman and all his servants were subdued; after which, the resurrection of the dead is to follow, with the separation of the light from the darkness, and the coming of the kingdom of peace. To say the truth, the notions they have of the beginning of all things, the state of our first parents, the attempts made on them by the prince of darkness, the last judgment, the salvation of the good, and the punishment of the bad, differ very little from what is delivered to us in the Scripture on these heads; only they have a long account of the war between God and the author of evil, which, they say, ended in a complete victory gained over the latter, and his adherents, who were constrained to surrender at discretion: that the Almighty did not annihilate his enemies, because, without opposition, his attributes could not have appeared with such lustre as they now do (G):
that

² HYDE, c. II. 13.

² PLUTARCH. de Iside & Osiride.

(G) In the course of ages, it is not to be wondered, that false notions crept into their religion in some places; as among the magi

Of the duration of the world. that the world had existed three thousand years before this decisive battle, the whole of its duration being fixed to twelve thousand: that, after this defeat, GOD, by holding up three fingers, gave the evil one leave to chuse which three thousand years of the nine thousand yet to come he would please to take, wherein to trouble and vex mankind; whereupon he chose the middlemost. Before, say they, this power was given to abriman, man lived in a state of innocence; but that, since his fall, war, and all other evils, have been introduced; that these however shall, in time, pass away, and man live again, for a certain space, in peace and glory. They place the day of judgment at the end of twelve thousand years: and, as to the damned, they assert, that they shall be punished, according to the heinousness of their crimes, two angels being appointed to be the inspectors of their sufferings. At last however even these are to be pardoned; but never to be admitted to the joys of the blessed, but to remain in a certain place by themselves, and to wear, in their foreheads, a black mark, as a badge of that state, from whence, through the mercy of GOD, they were freed ^b.

^b HYDE, c. 9.

magi of Cappadocia, who not only worshiped, with idolatrous circumstances, their sacred fires, but also introduced images in their temples. But that heresy, which, of all others, threatened the religion of Zoroaster most, was Manicheism; for Manes, that arch-heretic, resided long in Persia, and there broached his absurd notion of two eternal self-existent beings; and, by mingling the doctrines of magic and Christianity, made up a monstrous system of incredible doctrines, attended with very ridiculous practices (20). However, these notions were rooted out, as will be hereafter shewn, by the authority of the civil magistrates; so that the present Persees have amongst them none of these whimsical chimeras, but retain the doctrine of their ancestors in all its purity, and are a religious as well as a most inoffensive people, tenacious of their own principles, but complaisant to other people, though very reserved; from whence proceed the many mistakes that have been made about them. When they speak, they never fail to express themselves in such a manner as fully purges all suspicion of their being idolaters; but they cannot help shewing, on such occasions, an inveterate dislike against two persons, celebrated by the greatest part of mankind as heroes and conquerors, but looked on by them as murderers and robbers. These are Alexander the Great, and Mohammed, both capital enemies of their country and nation (21).

(20) Hyde relig. vet. Pers. c. 21. p. 275.

(21) Chardin, tom. ii. p. 180.

THE point in which the Persians differ most from us, is as Of its crea- to the manner of GOD's creating the world, which, they say, ation.
happened not in six days, but in six seasons, each season containing many days; the first of these they stile Mid-yuzeram, containing forty-two days; in this, say they, the heavens were created, with all things belonging to them: the second they stile Mid-yusham, containing sixty days, wherein the waters were created: the third is by them named Pitishabim, including seventy-five days; in this the earth was made: the fourth they called Iyaseram, including thirty days, wherein were made the trees: the fifth goes under the name of Midi- yarim, containing eighty days, in which all living creatures received being. The last they stile Hamespitamidim, comprehending seventy-five days, wherein was made man ^c.

It is now time for us to speak of the rites and ceremonies Their cere- of the Persians, antient and modern, in the exercise of their monies and religion, and every thing relating thereto. They have a re- public gular clergy, and are very zealous in asserting an uninter- worship.
rupt succession of persons instructed in their sacred mysteries, from the time of Zerduht to this day. Their ordinary priests are obliged to live according to certain rules, much more severe than those given to the laity, as the reader will perceive at the end of the following page: their high-priests were under still stricter obligations; and all of them were bound to discharge their sacerdotal offices with mighty exactness and devotion ^d.
As to their public worship, it was and is still thus performed:
In every pyreum, or fire-temple, there stood an altar, on which burnt the sacred fire, which was always kept alive by the priest: when the people assembled, in order to their devotions, the priest put on a white habit and a mitre, with a gause or cloth passing before his mouth, that he might not breathe on the holy element: thus he read certain prayers out of the Liturgy, which he held in one hand, speaking very softly, and in a whispering sort of tone, holding in his left-hand certain small twigs of a sacred tree, which, as soon as the service was over, he threw into the fire. At these times all who were present put up their prayers to GOD, for such things as they stood in need of; and, when prayers were finished, the priest and people withdrew silently, and with all other tokens of awful respect. All these rites are still observed: but, to prevent, as far as possible, the people from falling into idolatry, the priest now informs them, when they are going from their devotions, of the reasons why they worship before the fire, and all the obligations they are under to treat it with reverence. This ex-

^c LORD's religion of the Perses, c. 8. p. 41.
account of the Persian religion.

^d LORD'S

hortation runs usually in these words: "Forasmuch as fire
 " was delivered to Zerduſht by the Almighty, as the symbol " of his majesty; wherefore it was required, that we should " esteem it holy, and respect it as an emanation from the " fountain of light; and that we should love all things which " resemble it, especially the sun and moon, the two great wit" nesses of GOD, the sight of which should put us in mind of " his omniscience; therefore let us, without superstition, keep
 " the command given us, evermore praising GOD for the great
 " usefulness of this element; and beseeching him to make us
 " always bear in mind the obligations we are under to do our " duty towards him; which is as necessary to the health and " happiness of the soul, as light and fire are to the ease and " welfare of the body" (H)."

THEY

* BEAUCHAMP'S essays on important subjects, sect. iii.

(H) Among the antient magi, there were three degrees of priests, ordinary priests, overseers of these, and an archimagus, like our archbishop, or rather a metropolitan, who was acknowledged for the successor of Zoroaster, and held the supreme head of their church. These, in the old Persian language, were stiled Mugh, i. e. Magus; Mubad, i. e. superintendent; and Mubad, Mubadan, or high-priest (22). Lord, in his account of the religion of the Persians, calls them by other names, viz. Darros, Herboods, and Distecoos; the last he makes equivalent to Mubad Mubadan; and says, there is never any more than one chief of the clergy of the Persees at a time. As to the duty of their priests, the same writer tells us, that it is comprised in the eleven rules following; viz. 1. The observing the rites prescribed in the liturgy of Zoroaster, because GOD is best pleased with that form of prayer which he has prescribed. 2. To keep his eyes from coveting that which is another's; for GOD having given to every man what seems meet for him in his eyes, to desire that which is another's, is not only shewing a dislike of GOD's providence, but is likewise affronting him, by challenging that for our due which he hath denied us. 3. To have a care always to speak the truth; for all truth cometh from GOD, all lyes from the devil: all priests therefore should speak truth, because they are the servants of the GOD of truth, and, as such, are credited in what they say. 4. To keep close to his business, and not meddle with worldly matters; for it belongs to the layman to see the priest wants nothing that is necessary, and to the priest, not to desire any thing which is superfluous. 5. To get the book of the law by heart, that he may be always able to instruct the poor layman, and that he may see just

(22) Hyde relig. vet. Pers. c. 28. p. 348.

THEY keep yearly six festivals, each of five days continu- Festivals.
 ance, in memory of the six seasons, wherein all things were created : after each of these feasts, they keep a fast of five days, in memory of GOD's resting five days, as they believe, at each of those seasons. As often as they eat either flesh, fowl, or fish, they carry a small part of it to the temple, as an offering to GOD, beseeching him that he would pardon them for taking away the lives of his creatures, in order to their own subsistence.
 They have none of those out-of-the-way notions relating to cleanness and uncleanness in meats, which expose some religions to ridicule ; but, as they are a very complaisant as well as inoffensive people, they abstain from swines-flesh, and from the flesh of kine, that they may neither offend the Mohammed- ans nor the Banians, among whom they are obliged to live :
 they eat alone, for the sake of purity and cleanliness ; they likewise drink every man out of his own cup^f.

WHEN their children are initiated into their religion, they Education send for a priest ; and this is usually done as soon as the child is of children.
 born. The priest calculates its nativity ; afterwards he asks what name is to be given it. This being agreed on by the father and its relations, the priest telleth it to its mother, who then says, My child is called so or so ; with which the ceremony ends at that time. The child is afterwards carried to the pyreum, where the priest first pours some water into the rind of a holy tree, and thence into the mouth of the child, beseech-

^f LORD'S religion of the Persians, p. 40. HYDE relig. vet. Pers.
 c. 29.

cause to reverence his priest. 6. To keep himself pure and undefiled, because GOD loves the pure and undefiled ; and this way only one man can excel another. 7. To be ready to forgive all injuries, shewing himself a pattern of meekness, that he may be thought one come from GOD ; for we offend GOD every day : yet he giveth us things that are good, though we deserve, that he should pour on us evil for evil. 8. To teach the common people to pray according to the law ; to go and pray with them for public bene- fits, when they desire it, and to perform constantly the known duties of his function. 9. To give licence for marriage to join the man and woman together ; and to take care, that parents do not marry their children without his approbation. 10. To spend the greatest part of his time in the temple, that he may be ready to assist all who come to him, because thereto God hath appointed him. 11. To believe no other law than that given by Zerdust ; to add nothing thereto, nor to take any thing from it, seeing to this end it was revealed (23).

(23) Lord's religion of the Persians, p. 32.

ing GOD to cleanse the tender infant from whatever seeds of corruption it may have received from its father, and from the impurities derived from its mother. At seven years of age the child is led to church to be confirmed there: the priest teaches him some prayers, and instructs him in the first principles of religion. These are repeated daily, till he is well acquainted with the articles of his faith: then he is permitted to pray for the first time before the holy fire; after which the priest gives him water to drink, and a pomgranate-leaf to chew; then he causes the lad to wash his body with clean water; after which he puts on a linen cassock next his skin, which descends below his waist, and is girt with a girdle of camel's hair, woven by the priest's own hand. These ceremonies over, the priest blesses him, bids him be a true Persee all the days of his life, to beware of falling into idolatry, or breaking any of the pre-Marriages cepts given by Zerdust & (I). Of their marriages we are told by

§ LORD's religion of the Persees, p. 45. HYDE relig. vet. Perf. c. 34.

(I) As to the high-priest, he, over and above the duties in-joined the priests in general, is desired to observe the following thirteen precepts (24): 1. He must take care not to pollute himself in any manner, because GOD hath chosen him to be holy. 2. In order to do this, he must do all things for himself, to preserve himself from being contaminated by the uncleanness of others; as also to shew his humility in so high a station. 3. He is to take the layman's tythe, i. e. the tenth of all that he has, but not to his own use; for he is to consider himself as the almoner of GOD, who makes use of him only to dispense to the poor the tribute paid by the rich. 4. That this may appear to be fairly done, he must avoid all pomp and superfluity, and, at the year's end, must give away the last farthing, since his revenue is settled, and always paid with good will. 5. His house must be near the temple, and he must give a good example to his flock, by staying much at home, and by giving himself up to prayer. 6. As in his public, so in his private life, he must be extremely frugal and temperate in all things. 7. He must not only be acquainted with the law, but with all the sciences; seeing he is to instruct all others of his religion, clergy and laity. 8. He must keep a low diet, because high eating, or strong liquors, disturb the faculties of the mind, and discompose that serenity of disposition, which should be always found in the man of GOD. 9. He must fear only GOD, and hate nothing but sin. 10. As he is supreme in all spiritual causes, he must reprove sinners without any regard to their rank; and they must hear him patiently, since he speaks not in his own

(24) Hyde relig. vet. Perf. c. 13.

by a very intelligent author, that they have five sorts: First, that of children in their minority: Secondly, that of widowers with a second wife: Thirdly, of such persons as marry by their own choice: Fourthly, the marriage of the dead, which is occasioned by an opinion they have entertained, that married people are peculiarly happy in the other world: wherefore, when a young person dies in celibacy, they hire one to be married to him, or her; which ceremony is performed a little after the burial: The last kind of marriage is where a person adopts either a son or a daughter, and then gives him or her in marriage; which is also founded on a religious opinion, that all men ought to leave heirs behind them, either natural or adopted. As to the ceremonies made use of on this occasion, they are very singular, but, at the same time, have nothing in them wild or irrational: the parties designing to contract matrimony are seated together on a bed, about midnight; opposite to them stand two priests, the one for the man, the other for the woman, holding rice in their hands, to intimate the fruitfulness which they wish the new-married couple; on each hand of the priests stand the relations of the bride and bridegroom. Things being in this situation, the bridegroom's priest lays his forefinger on the woman's forehead, and says, Wilt thou have cause, but God's. 11. He must above all things study to distinguish truth from error. 12. Though, in consequence of his high office, he may, for his consolation, receive visions and other manifestations from God, yet he is not to publish them; for that would but confound the people, who are to adhere to the written law. 13. He must preserve the ever-living fire brought by Zerdusht from heaven, that it may endure through all ages, till the world shall be destroyed by that element (25).

It is very possible, that the reader, in the perusal of this section, may incline to wish, that in some things we had delivered ourselves more copiously; and therefore it may not be amiss to inform him, that, in treating of the Persian history, as delivered by the oriental writers, we shall take occasion to retouch various points relating to the religion of the antient Persians; because much of their history depends upon them, as to inconsiderable customs, such as wearing this or that colour, this or that kind of cap; these we have purposely omitted, as deeming them not worthy of being mentioned in so great a work as this. Let us however note one thing, that their priests at confirmation sell the youth a girdle, which he is bound to keep all his life long, and to use it constantly, because, when he lays it aside, he no longer enjoys the benefits of the priest's benediction. Dr. Hyde is of opinion, that the English saying ungirt, unblest, has some allusion to this (26).

(25) Lord's religion of the Persians, p. 36.

(26) Relig. Nat. Pers. c. 33.

this man to be thy wedded husband? The woman assenting, her priest lays his fore-finger on the man's forehead, and asks the like question: which being answered in the affirmative, the parties then join hands; the man promises, that he will provide her a suitable maintenance; the woman acknowledges, that all she has is his: the priests then scatter rice over them, wishing that they may be fruitful, and beseeching GOD, that they may have many sons and daughters, that they may live in unity of mind, and arrive at a good old age, in possession of all the joys of wedlock. The ceremony over, the woman's parents pay the dowry, and a feast of eight days is kept for joy of the marriage ^h.

Their burials.

As to their burials, two things are remarkable; first, the place; secondly, the manner. First, as to the place, they have a round tower erected, on the top of which the bodies of the dead are laid, to be devoured by the fowls of the air: some affirm, that they have separate towers for the good and for the bad; others, that men, women, and children, are placed on several towers. The reason of thus exposing them we have elsewhere given; viz. the preserving the elements pure; for they conceive, that by not interring the dead they avoid polluting the earth, and by leaving the corpse unprotected from birds of prey they provide, in some measure, against the infection of the air. However, this custom was antiently esteemed so barbarous by other nations, that one of the ⁱ apologists for the Christian faith, speaking of the good effects it had on mens minds, in reforming them from brutal and wicked habits, mentions this expressly, that the Persians, since they had received the Christian doctrines, no more exposed the bodies of their dead, but afforded them a decent burial. Before we part with this subject, it may not be amiss to observe what is practised among them when a man is on his death-bed: a priest is in such a case always sent for; and he, drawing near the bed, prayeth thus, in the ear of the sick man: "O Almighty LORD, thou hast commanded we should not offend thee; this man hath offended: thou hast ordained, that we should do good; yet this man hath done evil: thou hast required, that we should duly and exactly worship thee; which, however, this man hath neglected. Now, O merciful GOD, at the hour of death forgive him his offences, his misdeeds, and his neglects, and receive him to thyself!" When he is dead, the priest comes not near him; but the corpse is put on an iron bier, and carried to the place of interment, the bearers being forbid to speak as they go along, out of decency, and also because in the grave there is an unbroken silence: the dead body being placed on the tower, the priest, standing at a distance, performeth the funeral service, which he concludes thus; "This our brother, while he lived, consisted of the four elements: now he is dead, let each take his own; earth to earth, air to air, water to water, fire to fire." They suppose, that the spirit wanders for three days, after its departure from the body, and is in that space pursued and tormented by the devil, till it is able to reach their sacred fire, to which he cannot come. They therefore pray morning, noon, and night, during these three days, for the soul of their deceased brother, beseeching GOD to blot out his sins, and to cancel all his offences: on the fourth day, supposing his fate to be decided, they make a great feast; which closes the ceremonies used on this occasion ^k.

^h LORD's religion of the Perfes, p. 48. ⁱ THEODOR. de curand. Græc. affectib. serm. ix. de leg. p. 128.

THUS far we thought necessary to say, on this copious and controverted subject, chiefly to justify the much misrepresented Persees from the charge of so senseless an idolatry as the worshiping either the luminaries, planets, or elements. To have enlarged more upon it, would have led us too far, and exceeded the bounds we must prescribe ourselves in so extensive a work. The curious reader may, however, from the authors quoted in the margin, collect himself such a system of the Persee religion, both with relation to their doctrine and practices, as will amply reward all his pains and study. But it is time for us to pass to another part of their history.

^k LORD'S religion of the Persees, p. 49.

S E C T. IV.

The reigns of the kings of Persia.

AS we know but very little of the state of Persia before Cyrus's time, we shall not pretend to give an account of the kings who preceded that prince. We have already shewn ^a, before Cyrus, that Elam, or Persia, was governed in the earliest times by its own kings, and those very powerful. Chedorlaomer, the first king of Elam, mentioned in Scripture, extended his conquests over many provinces of Asia; for Bera king of Sodom, Birsha king of Gomorrab, Shinab king of Admah, Shemeber king of Zebojim, and the king of Bela or Zoar, were his tributaries ^b. These five princes lived twelve years in subjection to Chedorlaomer; but, in the thirteenth, uniting their forces, made an attempt towards the recovery of their former liberty.

^a See before, p. 50. ^b Gen. xiv. 4, & JOSEPH. antiq. l. i. c. 10.

The king of Elam no sooner heard, that they were up in arms, but, entering into an alliance with Amraphel king of Shinar, Arioch king of Ellasar, and Tidal king of nations, he marched out against them; and, having first reduced the Rephaims, the Zuzims, the Emims, the Horites, the Amalekites, and the Amorites of Hazezontamar, at last he fell upon the revolters, put their army to the rout, killed the kings of Sodom and Gomorrhah; and, having pillaged their cities, marched back towards Elam, loaded with the spoils of the conquered nations. Lot, who, as Josephus^d informs us, assisted the Sodomites, had themisfortune to be taken prisoner on this occasion; and had been carried into captivity, had he not been timely rescued by Abraham, who, pursuing the enemy with a small body of chosen men, came up with them at Dan the fifth day after their victory, put them to flight, and returned in triumph, with his brother and all his family, redeemed from the insults of a victorious foe. By this overthrow Chedorlaomer lost the sovereignty of the Pentapolis, but retained his other conquests, which were very considerable. From the reign of this prince to that of Cyrus, we know nothing to be relied on but what we have already hinted at in the history of the Medes; viz. that the Elamites or Persians were a great and powerful nation; that they were in all likelihood subdued by the Affyrians, but afterwards recovered their antient liberty, and were governed by princes of their own nation till the sixth year of Nebuchadnezzar, when they were again brought under subjection by that great warrior, and his ally Cyaxares king of Media. While they lived in subjection to the Affyrians, Medes, and Babylonians, the throne was still filled with natives of Persia, though tributaries to those greater powers. The only great family we find upon record is that of Achæmenes, which must have been very conspicuous, since Xerxes, when at the height of his glory, was proud to derive from thence his pedigree, which he does in the following manner^e;

| | | |
|-------------------|--------------------|-------------------|
| Achæmenes, | Teispes, | Hystaspes, |
| Cambyfes, | Ariaramnes, | Darius, |
| Cyrus, | Arjames, | Xerxes. |

Of this great family there were two branches: from the first was descended Cyrus the great, whose issue male failed in his two sons Cambyfes and Smerdis. Some place his ancestors in the following manner^f;

| | | |
|-------------------|-------------------------|------------------|
| Perses, | Cyrus, | Cambyfes, |
| Achæmenes, | Cambyfes, | Smerdis. |
| Darius, | Cyrus the great, | |

^d JOSEPH. antiq. l. ii. c. 10.

^e HEROD. l. vii. c. 11.

^f REINECC. hist. Jul. p. 37.

They

They will have Perses, of whom, say they, Persia borrowed its name, to be the first of this family that reigned in Persia. We are told, that Achæmenes was nursed by an eagle^h: and of this fabulous eagle the no less fabulous wolf of Romulus was, perhaps, a transcript. Darius is mentioned by the scholiast of *Aristophanes*ⁱ; and supposed by some to have coined the famous darics, or stateres darici. Cyrus had two children, Cambyfes and Atossa: Atossa married Pharnaces king of Cappadocia^k, and Cambyfes Mandane the so-much celebrated daughter of Astyages king of Media, by whom he had Cyrus the Great (A). But as nothing occurs worthy of notice, especially that we can depend upon, in the history of the Persian kings before Cyrus, we shall proceed, without dwelling on so dark and barren a subject, to the reign of that great and glorious prince.

THE name of Cyrus is equally famous in sacred and profane Cyrus. history: in the latter, his valour and conquests have rendered his memory immortal, as has, in the former, his kind treatment of the captive Hebrews, whom he restored to their antient state, country, and temple, having been by the divine will appointed thereunto by name^l, many years before he appeared in the world: an honour bestowed upon none but him, and that excellent prince Josiah^m king of Judah. Profane historians are at no small variance with each other touching the birth of this prince, his education, and accession to the crown. Herodotus and Xenophon are the only two original authors, as we may call them, whom we can quote and follow in what relates to the life and exploits of this prince; for other writers have copied after them, some adopting the accounts of the one, and some of the other: they are both very minute in their relations, and agree in some particulars, but widely differ in others. We shall, in the first place, hear Herodotus, the father of history, as Tully calls him; but whether his accounts be genuine, or rather interwoven, and seasoned to the Greek taste, with several fabulous and surprizing incidents, is what we shall have occasion to examine afterwards.

^h ÆLIAN. de animal. l. xii. c. 21.
ad eccles. ver. 741, 742.

ⁱ Scholiast. Aristoph.

^k DIOD. SIC. in fragm. l. xxxi.

^l Isa. xlv. 28. & xlv. 1.

^m 1 Kings xiii. 2.

(A) Ovid (1) mentions one Orchamus king of Persia, and makes him the seventh after Belus.

Septimus a prisco numeratur origine Belo.

Rexit Achæmenias urbes pater Orchamus, isque

As this king is no-where to be found but in Ovid's metamorphoses, what is said of him deserves no more credit than they do.

(1) Ovid, metamorph. l. iv.

Account of the birth, education,
&c. of Cyrus, according to Herodotus.

ASTYAGES, the last king of the Medes, being warned by a dream, that the son who was to be born of his daughter Mandane, should one day be lord of all Asia, resolved to marry her, not to a Mede worthy of her bed, but to a Persian; and accordingly chose one Cambyfes, sprung from an antient family, but of a peaceable disposition, and, as he thought, inferior in rank to a Mede, even of a middling condition. A year after they were married, Astyages was frightened by another dream, portending anew, according to the interpretation of the mages, the empire of Asia to his grandson (B). Hereupon Astyages sends for his daughter, then big with child; and, upon her arrival in Media, puts her under a guard, determined to destroy the child she should be delivered of; for the mages had assured him, that the issue of his daughter was to fill his throne. Mandane, not long after her confinement, was brought to bed of a son, whom Astyages, mindful of the interpretation of the mages, delivered to one Harpagus, injoining him, as he tendered his own life, to take the new-born son of Mandane, to carry him to his house, and there dispatch him with his own hands, in what manner he should think best. Harpagus promised to put the king's orders in execution; and, having received from the guards the infant, richly dressed, went home under great concern, to see himself employed in so hateful and inhuman an office: he acquainted his wife, as soon as he came home, with what had passed between Astyages and himself; and resolved not to execute the sentence with his own hands, but to transfer his charge to another. With this design he immediately sent for one of the king's herdsmen, who kept his cattle in pastures lying at the foot of certain mountains on the north of Ecbatan, towards the Caspian sea: the herdsman's name was Mithridates, and his wife's Spaco, in the language of the Medes, which signifies a bitch, and answers to her Greek name Cyno. Mithridates, without delay, waited upon Harpagus, who commanded him, in the king's name, to take the infant, and expose it in the most dangerous and abandoned part of the mountains, upon pain of dying in the most exquisite tortures that could be invented: he added, that the king had charged him to see his orders put in execution. The herdsman, not daring to make any remonstrance against the king's command, returned with the child to his cottage, where he found

(B) His first dream was, that his daughter Mandane had voided so great a quantity of water, as not only filled the metropolis of the kingdom, but overflowed

all Asia. In the other he saw a vine shooting from the womb of his daughter, and extending its branches over all Asia (2).

(2) Herodot. l. i. c. 107, 108.

his wife just delivered of a son: during her husband's absence, she had been in great trouble and perplexity, on account of the message from Harpagus, who had never before sent for him; so that he no sooner set his foot within the door, but she asked him in great surprize, why Harpagus had sent for him in such haste. He told her he had been in the city, where he had heard and seen such things as grieved him beyond expression; that, when he arrived, the house of Harpagus was all in tears; and that, as he went in, he was struck with horror, at the sight of an infant, dressed in gold and the richest colours, panting and crying on the floor; that Harpagus had commanded him to carry away this child, and expose it on the mountains to the mercy of the wild beasts, upon pain of incurring the king's displeasure, and undergoing the severest punishments that could be inflicted; that, at first, he had supposed the unhappy infant to belong to some person of the family of Harpagus; but that he had been afterwards informed by the servant that attended him out of the city, and delivered the babe into his hands, that it was born of Mandane the king's daughter, and was son to Cambyses of Persia; and that Astyages had commanded it should be put to death ^l.

HAVING thus spoken, he disclosed the child to his wife; Cyrus ^{pre-} who no sooner saw it, but, being ravished with the innocent ^{serv'd and} smiles of the infant, she embraced her husband, and, with many ^{nursed by a} tears, intreated him not to execute the orders he had received. ^{shepherd.} But he remonstrating the absolute necessity he was under of obeying, or forfeiting his own life, since the spies of Harpagus would, without fail, keep a watchful eye over him, and see whether he performed what had been so strictly enjoined him, she suggested to him to take their own child, that was still-born, to expose it instead of the other, and bring up the son of Mandane as their own; for, by that means, said she, we shall sufficiently consult our own safety, without injuring others, the dead child will be honoured with a royal sepulchre, and the surviving infant be preserved from an untimely death ^m.

MITHRIDATES approved of this expedient, and, delivering the infant he was charged to destroy into his wife's hands, dressed the dead child in the rich apparel of the living; and carried it, in the same basket in which he had brought the other, to the most unfrequented part of the mountains. Three days after, he acquainted Harpagus, that, if he pleased, he could shew him the body of the dead infant; and he accordingly dispatched some of his friends, in whom he most confided, to see that the sentence had been put in execution, † HEROD. l. i. c. 107, & seq.

^m Idem ibid.

and

and to inter the royal infant. Thus was Cyrus, for so was the infant afterwards called, delivered from the snares of his grandfather, and educated by the herdsman's wife as her

Gives ear- own ⁿ.

ly marks of his royal spirit.

WHEN he attained to the age of ten years; as he was one day playing in the pastures with other children of his age, he was chosen king by his companions; and, having, in virtue of that dignity, distinguished them into several orders and classes, the son of Artembares, a lord of eminent dignity among the Medes, who was one of his companions in the play, refused to obey his orders: whereupon Cyrus commanded him to be immediately seized, and whipped very severely. The boy, with many tears, complained to his father of what he had suffered from the herdsman's son; and the father, highly resenting the affront, hastened, with his son, to the king's palace; and, shewing that prince in what a cruel and ignominious manner his child had been abused by the son of a slave, intreated him to avenge, by some very exemplary punishment, the indignity offered to him, and his whole family. Astyages promised to give him full satisfaction; and, commanding both the herdsman and his son to be brought before him, asked Cyrus, how he, who was the son of so mean a man, had dared to abuse the child of one of the chief lords in the kingdom. Cyrus replied, that he had done no more than he had a right to do; for, the boys of the neighbourhood having made him their king, because they thought him the most worthy of that dignity, and performed what he, in virtue of that character, had commanded them, the son of Artembares alone had slighted his orders; and, for his disobedience, had suffered the punishment he deserved. As the boy was pleading his cause, with an eloquence far superior to his years and education, Astyages took particular notice of his mien and features; and, thinking that he resembled himself, began to reflect on the time that his grandson was exposed, which he found to agree with the age of the herdsman's supposed son. Being perplexed with this thought, he dismissed Artembares, assuring him, that his son should have no cause to complain, and commanded his guards to conduct Cyrus into the palace. Being then in private with the herdsman, he asked whose boy Cyrus was, and from whose hands he had him. Mithridates affirmed, that he was his own child; and that the boy's mother, who was still living, would come, if he pleased, to attest it. But Astyages, giving no credit to what he averred, commanded his guards to seize him; whereupon he discovered, without reserve, the whole matter, and implored the king's mercy ^a.

Discovered to Asty-ages.

^b HEROD. l. i. c. 114.

^a Idem ibid. c. 116.

ASTYAGES was not so much incensed against the herdsman, as against his favourite Harpagus, whom he ordered the guards to bring, without delay, to the palace. Upon his arrival, the king, in a violent passion, asked him, in what manner he had put to death the son of his daughter Mandane. When Harpagus saw the herdsman, he thought he should but aggravate his crime, by attempting to elude the storm that threatened him by any sort of falsehood, and therefore openly confessed what he had done; adding, that he thought he had taken the most effectual means he could to put his orders in execution; and that he truly believed the child was dead, since the most trusty among his friends had assured him, that they had seen and interred the body ^p.

ASTYAGES, dissembling his resentment, acquainted Harpagus with what the herdsman had confessed; adding, that the child was still alive, and that he was very well pleased his orders had not been executed; for he had been under great concern ever since he issued that cruel command, and had not been able to bear the reproaches of his daughter. He then ordered Harpagus to send his son to wait on the young Cyrus, and to come himself that night to sup with him, since he intended to offer a sacrifice to the gods, in thanksgiving for the care they had taken of his grandson ^q.

HARPAGUS, overjoyed at the king's speech, returned home; and, acquainting his wife with what had passed, immediately sent his only son to attend Cyrus, as he had been commanded. His son, who was about thirty years old, no sooner entered the palace, but he was seized, barbarously murdered, and cut in pieces, by order of Astyages; who gave directions, that the mangled body, variously dressed and disguised, should be served up at supper. Harpagus, and the rest of the guests, repaired Harpagus's to the palace at the hour appointed: the others were splendidly entertained; but the table, where Harpagus supped, was dreadful served only with the flesh of his son. When he had done, the punishment, and king asked him, whether he had been pleased with his victuals; policy. and, Harpagus answering, that he had never tasted any thing more delicious, the officers, appointed for that purpose, brought in a basket, containing the head, hands, and feet of his son, desiring him to uncover the basket, and take what he liked best. He did as they desired, and beheld the remains of his only child, without betraying any sort of concern or resentment at so shocking a sight; such was the command he had of his passions. The king inquired, whether he knew with what kind of meat he had been entertained: Harpagus replied, he knew very well, and was always pleased with whatever his sovereign thought fit to ordain. Having thus replied, with a surprizing temper, he collected the mangled parts of his innocent son, and went home, as our author conjectures, to inter them ^r.

^p HEROD. lib. i. c. 117.

^q Idem ibid. c. 118.

Cyrus sent back to his real parents. ASTYAGES, having thus vented his rage upon the unfortunate Harpagus, began to consider with himself what he should do with Cyrus; and, having again consulted the mages, their answer was, that, if the boy lived, he must of necessity be king. Astyages then acquainted them, that he was still alive; adding, as a very material circumstance, that he had been chosen king by the boys of the neighbourhood where he lived, and performed all the parts of a real king with the utmost rigour and severity. Hereupon the mages replied, that the prediction of his reign was already accomplished, in the choice which the boys had made of him for their king, and that he would never reign a second time; for dreams, said they, often end in things of small importance, and are fulfilled by trifling events. They advised him therefore to divest himself of all fear, and send the boy to his parents in Persia ^s.

ASTYAGES, well pleased with this answer, called Cyrus; and, owning how much he had been wanting in the affection which he ought naturally to have had for him, by reason of an insignificant dream, desired him to get ready for a journey into Persia, where he would find his real father and mother, in circumstances very different from those of the poor herdsman Mithridates, and his wife Spaco ^t.

THUS Astyages, after many kind expressions, dismissed his young grandson, attended by several lords of the first rank. Upon his arrival at his father's house, he was received by his parents with a tenderness and joy, which is more easy to conceive, than express. As they had long given him over for dead, they asked him, in what manner his life had been preserved. He then acquainted them, that he had lived in an intire ignorance of his condition, and had been unacquainted with his true birth, believing himself the son of the king's herdsman, till those, who attended him on his journey into Persia, informed him of all that had passed. He related how he had been educated by the herdsman's wife, and, frequently repeating the name of Cyno, commended her on all occasions: and this name his parents made use of, as our author informs us, to persuade the Persians, that the preservation of their son was, in a very particular manner, owing to the immortal gods, since he had been nourished, as they industriously spread abroad, and was commonly believed, by a bitch ^u.

^r HEROD. lib. i. c. 119. ^s Idem ibid. c. 120. ^t Idem ibid. c. 121. ^u Idem ibid. c. 122.

WHEN Cyrus attained to the age of manhood, and was become very popular in his own country, and famous in Media, Harpagus, who had never forgot the inhuman murder of his son, began to court his friendship, with a design to join with him, who had been equally injured, in revenging so barbarous a treatment. At the same time, he solicited the leading men among the Medes, who were highly dissatisfied with the tyrannical government of Astyages, to take up arms, and redeem themselves, and their unhappy country, from the calamities they groaned under, by deposing Astyages, and advancing his grandson Cyrus to the throne. They all to a man shewed themselves disposed to second his designs: whereupon he thought it high time to discover his intentions to Cyrus, who was to act the chief part in this revolution; and accordingly he acquainted him with them by a letter, which, as all the roads leading to Persia were guarded by the king's troops, he conveyed to him in the belly of an hare; the hare he delivered to one of his most trusty domestics, dressed in the habit of an hunter, injoining him to desire Cyrus not to open the letter in the presence of any person whatsoever.

THE messenger executed his orders; and Cyrus, opening the hare with his own hands, found a letter, reminding him of the care which the gods had had of his preservation against the wicked designs, and barbarous attempts, of his grandfather, and encouraging him to stir up the Persians to a revolt, and, at the head of their forces, to invade Media, where all the chief commanders were ready to join him, and determined, at all events, to advance him to the throne, instead of his unnatural grandfather. He took care to put him in mind of what he had suffered on his account, and how barbarously he had been punished for not executing the king's bloody orders. Cyrus, having read the letter, began to consider what measures he should take, to induce the Persians to revolt; and, after various schemes, fixed upon the following as the most proper: he feigned a letter from Astyages, appointing him commander in chief of all the Persian forces. This he read in a general assembly of the nation, and, in virtue of his new commission, commanded them all to attend him, every man with an hatchet. He was obeyed; and, being all met, in pursuance to his orders, he injoined them to clear, in one day, a spot of ground, containing eighteen or twenty furlongs, overgrown with thorns and briars. This laborious piece of work being performed, not without some reluctance, he dismissed them, with orders to attend him again the next day. In the mean time, he caused all his father's flocks and herds to be killed and dressed, provided wine, and bought all the dainties Persia could supply him him with. They all assembled the next day, expecting to be employed as they had been the day before; but, contrary to their expectations, Cyrus ordered them to sit down on the green turf, and entertained them with a great feast. When they had solaced themselves with dainties, which to that time they had been strangers to, the young prince asked them, whether they would chuse to live always in that manner, or as they had done the day before. They all answered readily, that, as mirth and pleasure were greatly preferable to toil and labour, they would gladly chuse the condition of the present day before that of the preceding. Upon this answer, Cyrus acquainted them, that, if they hearkened to his advice, they should enjoy these, and far greater pleasures, without any kind of servile labour: but, if they refused to follow him, they must undergo innumerable hardships, like those they had complained of the day before. He then disclosed to them his true design of delivering his country from the Median bondage, and encouraged his countrymen to join him in so great and glorious an enterprize, by telling them, that some divine power had brought him into the world, and miraculously saved his life, that he might be one day the author of their happiness. The Persians, who had lived for many years, with the utmost reluctance, in subjection to the Medes, declared him, with one accord, their leader, and protested, that they would stand by him in so good a cause, even at the expence of their lives *.

Astyages being informed of what was doing in Persia, dispatched a messenger to Cyrus, injoining him to repair forthwith into Media; but Cyrus, by the same messenger, returned this resolute answer, that he would come sooner than Astyages desired. Whereupon the king drew together all his forces, and, forgetful of his cruelty towards Harpagus, appointed him general of the army. The two nations came to a general engagement; but the chief officers among the Medes passing over to Cyrus, with the bodies under their command, the rest of the army was routed with great slaughter. When Astyages heard of this defeat, he flew into a violent passion; and, vowing that Cyrus should not long enjoy the pleasure of his victory, he first caused the mages, who had interpreted his dream, to be impaled; and then, arming all the Medes, marched out himself at the head of them. Both armies came to a second engagement, in which the Medes were again defeated, and the king himself taken prisoner. Astyages, in this state, was reproached and insulted by the revengeful Harpagus, who, among other things, asked him, what he now thought of his tragical feast, when he compelled him to devour the flesh of his own son, for which inhuman and barbarous action he had now fallen from the throne to a prison. Astyages, in return, fixing his eyes on Harpagus, asked him, whether he had been instrumental in bringing about this revolution. He answered, that it was chiefly owing to him, since he had the first encouraged Cyrus to this undertaking. Then, replied Astyages, you are the weakest and most unjust Brave and of all men; the weakest, in giving the kingdom to another, swor to the when you might have seized on it yourself, since you have insulting been able to effect this change; the most unjust, in enslaving Harpagus your country, to revenge a private injury; for, if you were gus determined to depose me, and confer the kingdom on another, without taking the power into your own hands, you might, with more justice, have advanced a Mede to that dignity, than a Persian: whereas the Medes, who were before lords of Persia, and no-way concerned in the injury, are now, by your means, reduced to the condition of slaves; and the Persians, who were servants to the Medes, are now become their lords. In this manner, concludes our author, Astyages was deprived of the kingdom, after he had reigned thirty-five years; and, through his cruelty, the Medes became subject to the Persians, after they had ruled over all those provinces of Asia, that lie on the other side the Halys, for the space of an hundred and twenty-eight years, including the time of the Scythian dominion over that part of Asia. As for Astyages, Cyrus kept him prisoner in his palace till he died, without practising any fur- His death. ther severity upon him ^x.

* HERODOT. l. i. c. 123—127.

THIS is the account Herodotus gives us; which every impartial and judicious reader must conclude to be an arrant romance, composed perhaps by some admirer of Cyrus, and adopted by our author, as more agreeable to the depraved taste of his countrymen, who took greater delight in surprising, though fabulous, events, than in the relation of plain historical truths.

WHAT the same author relates of the death of this great hero, deserves, in our opinion, no more credit than what he has told of his birth, education, and advancement to the crown. This prince, according to him ^y, invaded the Massagetes; and having, in the first battle, feigned a flight, left a great quantity of provisions, especially of wine, in the field. The barbarians did not fail to seize on the booty, and indulged themselves in drinking to such an excess, that they all fell asleep on the spot. In this condition Cyrus returned upon them, obtained an easy victory, and took a great many prisoners, among whom was Spargapises the son of queen Tomiris. This heroine, being informed of the defeat of her troops, and capti-

^x HERODOT. l. i. c. 127—130. ^y Idem ibid. c. 211—213.

Cyrus's defeat and death, according to the same author.

vity of her son, sent an herald to Cyrus, intreating him to release the young prince; which he refusing to do, Spargapises, preferring death to slavery, laid violent hands on himself: whereupon his mother Tomyris, animated with an eager desire of revenge, gave the Persians battle a second time; which, says our author, was the most obstinate and bloody that ever was fought by the barbarians. Many fell on both sides; but, at last, the Massagetes carrying the day, the greatest part of the Persian army was cut in pieces, and Cyrus himself killed in the field, after having reigned twenty-nine years. Tomyris, having found his body among the slain, caused his head to be cut off, and thrown into a vessel filled with human blood, insulting the memory of the dead prince with these words, Glut thyself with the blood which thou hast so insatiably thirsted after ².

WHAT the same historian relates of his childish revenge upon the river Gyndes (C), while he was on his march to besiege Babylon, is utterly repugnant to the idea we have of that wise and experienced commander: for he tells us, that one of the sacred horses of Cyrus being drowned in that river, that prince, highly resenting such an affront, immediately caused the Gyndes to be cut by his army into three hundred and sixty channels; a work which employed his army the whole summer, and obliged him to postpone the siege of Babylon to the spring ensuing. Who can imagine, that a commander of so great experience, and such an extraordinary moderation, as Cyrus is, even by Herodotus himself, represented to have been, while he was marching to the conquest of Babylon, should so idly waste his time, and spend the ardour of his troops in such an unprofitable piece of work?

Cyrus's
history, according to Xenophon, more consonant with the sacred writings.

WE shall now give what we look upon as the true history of Cyrus, being extracted out of Xenophon, whom we choose to follow in what concerns that great conqueror, and excellent prince, seeing his accounts are far more agreeable to holy writ, the standard of truth, than those of Herodotus. We are told, for instance, in Scripture, that the Babylonians were reduced by the united forces of the Medes and Persians; and this is what we read in Xenophon: whereas Herodotus raises the Persian empire on the ruins of that of the Medes; which is repugnant to Scripture. It is true, that most of the antients have chosen to follow Herodotus rather than Xenophon: but that we can easily account for. The relations of the former are interwoven with events far more strange and surprising, and consequently more diverting and acceptable to the reader; whence they were preferred to those of the latter, in which we find nothing calculated to raise admiration. This natural inclination in a writer, to adopt such accounts as he thinks will prove most agreeable to his reader, has been too much Xenophon's countenanced by Plato ², who, in giving a character of Xenophon's Cyropædia, tells us, that he rather described, in that writings work, what a worthy and just prince ought to be, than gave and character. us a true history of what that prince really was. From this passage Diogenes Laertius concludes ², that Plato looked on the institution of Cyrus as a fiction: Tully passes the same judgment on this performance, saying ^b, that Xenophon's Cyrus was not intended for a true history, but to serve as a model of a just empire. Most of the modern critics have declared themselves of the same opinion; and we must own, that as Xenophon was both a great commander and philosopher, he has woven into that history many of his own maxims of war and policy: but it does not follow from hence, that the ground-plot of the work, and the most material transactions he relates, may not be called a true history. That he intended it for such, is plain; for, in the very beginning of the work, he acquaints us, that he had taken great care and pains to inform himself of Cyrus's birth, education, and character: and that it is really such, its conformity with holy writ sufficiently shews: wherefore, 'bating his military and political descants and digressions, the remaining part, bare matters of fact, is to be looked upon as a true history. He was esteemed by the antients ^c a writer of great judgment and penetration; and, having lived in the court of Cyrus the younger, had opportunities of being better informed of what he wrote concerning that great prince than Herodotus could have: and as he confined himself to this subject alone, no doubt but he examined all matters relating to it, with more care and exactness than the other, who wrote of so many different subjects and nations. And these are the motives that have induced us to follow Xenophon, in what relates to Cyrus, rather than Herodotus, or those who have copied after him (D).

² HEROD. l. i. c. 14.

(C) The river Gyndes rises on the hills of Matiene, and, passing through Dardania, falls into the Tigris.

² PLATO de legib. l. iii.

^a DIOG. LAER. in vit. philosophi.

^b Epist. i. ad Quintum fratrem.
Xenophon.

^c See DIOG. LAERT. in vita

(D) Scaliger thinks that the Cyropædia contains nothing but fables and fictions, if we except two or three events, which are related also by Herodotus; and Erasmus will not even allow Xenophon to have given us an exact model of a just government, but rather to have drawn a cunning and-deceitful prince: so fond are they of the surprizing incidents related by his antagonist Herodotus.

The true
history of Cyrus.

Year of
the flood 1749.
Bef. Chr.
599.

CYRUS was the son of Cambyfes, either king of Persia, or a man of the first rank in that country, and of Mandane the daughter of Astyages king of the Medes (E). He was born a year after his uncle Cyaxares, the brother of Mandane. He lived the first twelve years of his life with his parents, in Persia (F), where he was educated after the Persian manner, and inured to hardships, and such exercises as might enable him to go through the toils and fatigues of war. When he was twelve years old, his mother Mandane took him with her into Media, to his grandfather Astyages, who, from the many things he had heard of that young prince, had a desire to see him. During the time of his residence at this court, the sweetness of his temper, his generous behaviour, and constant endeavour to oblige all men, gained him the affections of the Medes, and such an interest among the leading men of that nation, as did afterwards much contribute to the erecting of the great empire he afterwards founded d.

His early prowess.

WHEN he was about sixteen years of age, he first entered the school of war, and gave extraordinary proofs both of his courage and conduct, as we have related elsewhere. The next year he returned to his father in Persia, where he remained till he was forty years of age, when he was recalled to the assistance of his uncle Cyaxares e.

ASTYAGES king of the Medes, was succeeded, as we have shewn in the history of that people, by his son Cyaxares, brother to Mandane, Cyrus's mother f. This prince was scarce seated on his throne, when he was informed, that Neriglissar king of Babylon was preparing a powerful army to invade Media; that he had already engaged several princes, and, amongst others, Cræsus king of Lydia; and that he had dispatched ambassadors into Cappadocia, Phrygia, Caria, Paphlagonia, Cilicia, and even to the Indies, to instil jealousies into the several

d XENOPH. Cyropæd. l. i. p. 36.
l. i. p. 44, 45, &c.

e XENOPH. Cyropæd.
f See before, p. 41.

(E) Both Herodotus and Xenophon agree in this, viz. that the mother of Cyrus was Mandane, daughter to Astyages; but Ctesias would have us believe, that Cyrus was no ways related to Astyages, or Astigas, as he is pleased to call him.

(F) The name of Persia at that time extended only to one province of that large empire, which was afterwards known by the name of Persia; for the whole Persian nation could at that time raise but 120,000 men (2). But, after the conquests of Cyrus, it took in that vast tract, which extended east and west from the Indus to the Tigris, and north and south from the Caspian sea to the ocean.

(2) Cyropæd. l. i.

princes of those countries, and to stir them up against the Medes and Persians, as aspiring to an universal monarchy. Cyaxares therefore called Cyrus, out of Persia, to his assistance; and, upon his arrival with a body of thirty thousand Persians, appointed him commander in chief both of the Medes and Persians ^h (G).

HE had not been long in Media before Cyaxares had occasion to employ him. The king of Armenia, who had hitherto lived in subjection to the Medes, looking upon them as ready to be swallowed up by the powerful alliance formed against them, thought fit to lay hold of that opportunity, and shake off the yoke: accordingly, he refused to pay the usual tribute, and to send his quota of auxiliaries, which he was obliged to furnish in time of war. As this was a matter of dangerous consequence, and which might prompt other dependent states to do the same, Cyrus thought it necessary to crush this revolt with the utmost expedition; and therefore marching immediately with a chosen body of horse, and covering his design as if he intended only to hunt on the hills of Armenia, he entered that country before the inhabitants had any intelligence of his march; surprised the king, and all his family; and, having obliged him to pay the usual tribute, and send his quota of auxiliaries, restored him to his kingdom, and returned in triumph to his army in Media ⁱ.

Year of
the flood 1791.
Bef. Chr.
557.

Reduces
Armenia.

BOTH parties had now been employed three years together, in forming their alliances, and making preparations for war. In the beginning of the fourth year, the confederate armies on

^h XENOPH. l. i. p. 58.

ⁱ Idem, l. iii. p. 62—76.

(G) This army consisted of 30,000 men, all infantry; for the Persians had yet no cavalry; but they were all chosen men, and raised after a particular manner. First of all, Cyrus chose out of the nobility two hundred and one officers; each of these was ordered to chuse four more of the same rank, which made a thousand in all; and these were called ἀρότιμοι, or men of the same dignity, and eminently distinguished themselves on all occasions. Every one of these was ordered to raise among the people ten pikemen lightly armed, ten slingers, and ten bowmen, which amounted in the whole to 31,000 men (3). From the year in which Cyrus, arriving in Media at the head of these troops, was vested with the command of the confederate army, those begin their computation, who will have this prince to have reigned thirty years. For, from this time, he was looked upon by all foreign nations as king of Persia and Media; tho' the regal power, as to the latter, was solely in Cyaxares, and Cyrus was only general of the united forces.

(3) Cyropæd. l. i.

Defeats
the Babylonians.
Neriglif-far killed.
Cræsus defeated.

both sides took the field; and, being come in sight of each other, a battle soon ensued, which proved very unfortunate for the Babylonians; for Nerigliffar their king was killed, and Cræsus king of Lydia, who, upon his death, took upon him the command of the army, was obliged to quit the field, and retire in the utmost confusion to his camp, from which he was driven the next day by Cyrus, at the head of the Hyrceanians, who had revolted to him the night before ^k. Cyrus reserved for himself all the horses that were taken, in order to form a body of cavalry for the Persian army, which hitherto they had wanted. The richest and most valuable part of the booty he set apart for Cyaxares; and, as for the prisoners, he allowed them to return home to their respective countries, without imposing any other condition upon them, than that they should deliver up their arms, and engage no more in war against him and his allies ^l.

The Babylonians revolt to Cyrus.

NERIGLISSAR was succeeded by Laborosoarchod, in whose reign two Babylonian lords, Gobryas and Gadates, provoked by his cruelty, went over, with the provinces they governed, to Cyrus, who by that means got footing in Assyria, which greatly contributed to the reduction of Babylon ^m. Laborosoarchod marched out against Gadates, but was by Cyrus driven back with great slaughter to his metropolis, where he continued, suffering Cyrus to ravage the whole country unmolested, till the season of the year obliged him to put an end to the campaign, which he did with the reduction of three fortresses on the frontiers of Media ⁿ.

LABROSOARCHOD was soon after murdered by his own subjects, who raised Nabonadius to the throne, in his room. Xenophon represents him as a wicked prince ^c: and that such was his character, sufficiently appears by what is said of him in Daniel; but while he attended his pleasures, his mother Nitocris, a woman of great understanding, and a masculine spirit, took those precautions which we have mentioned in the Babylonian history, for the security of the metropolis and empire.

WHILE the queen was thus employed, Cyaxares came to Cyrus's camp; and, after several consultations, they determined to alter their method; and, instead of contenting themselves only with ravaging the enemy's territories, they thought it was necessary to employ their troops in taking of towns and fortresses, that so they might make themselves masters of the country, and distress the city of Babylon, by intercepting their provisions ^q. Accordingly, they took many cities, and brought

^k See before, p. 41.

^l XENOPH. Cyropæd. l. iv. p. 87—104.

^m See before, p. 41. ⁿ XENOPH. Cyropæd. l. v. p. 123—140.

^o Ibid. l. vii. ^p Cyropæd. l. vi. p. 156.

under subjection intire provinces, without meeting with any Cyrus's considerable resistance from the Babylonians. The progress ^{success} Cyrus made in those conquests roused at last Nabonadius, who, ^{against} taking along with him great part of his treasures, left Babylon, ^{the Baby-} and repaired to Cræsus king of Lydia, by whose assistance and ^{lonians.} interest he concluded a formidable alliance with the Egyptians, Greeks, Thracians, and all the nations of the Lesser Asia. These ^{Cræsus} various nations, under the conduct of Cræsus, who was by the ^{commands} king of Babylon appointed chief commander of all his forces, ^{the confe-} assembled near the river Pactolus, and from thence advanced ^{derates.} to Thymbra, which was the place appointed for the general rendezvous. Cyrus, being informed of these vast preparations by one of his intimate friends, who by his order had fled over to the enemy as a deserter, put himself in a condition to oppose them: and, having increased the number of his forces by new levies, he took leave of Cyaxares, who remained in Media with a third part of the troops, that the country might not be left intirely defenceless; and marched forwards to meet the confederate forces in their own territories, in order to consume their forage, and disconcert their measures by the quickness of his march, and boldness of his undertaking. After a long march, he came up with the enemy at Thymbra, a city of Lydia, not far from Sardis, the metropolis of that country. Cy- ^{The army} rus's army was one hundred and ninety-six thousand strong, ^{of Cyrus;} horse and foot; besides these troops, he had three hundred chariots, armed with sithes, each chariot drawn by four horses abreast, covered with trappings that were proof against all sorts of missive weapons: he had likewise a great number of other chariots of a larger size, upon each of which he placed a tower about eighteen or twenty feet high; and in each tower were lodged twenty archers: these chariots were drawn by sixteen oxen, yoked abreast. There was, moreover, a considerable number of camels, each mounted by two Arabian archers, the one looking towards the head, and the other towards the hinder-part, of the camel. The army of Cræsus was twice as ^{of the con-} numerous as that of Cyrus, amounting in the whole to four ^{federates.} hundred and twenty thousand men. Both armies were drawn up on an immense plain, which gave room for the extending of their wings to the right and left; and the design of Cræsus, upon which alone he founded his hopes of victory, was to surround and hem in the enemy's army: he placed the Egyptians, who alone made a body of one hundred and twenty thousand men, and were the main strength of the army, in the centre.

⁹ XENOPH. Cyropæd. l. vi. p. 156, &c.
p. 167—172.

^r Idem, l. vi.

Battle of Thymbra

Year of
the flood

1800.
Bef. Chr.

548.

WHEN the two armies were within sight of each other, Cræsus, observing how much the front of his army exceeded that of Cyrus, made the centre halt, and the two wings advance, with a design to inclose Cyrus's army, and begin the attack on both sides at the same time. When the two detached bodies of the Lydian forces were sufficiently extended, Cræsus gave the signal to the main body, which marched up to the front of the Persian army, while the two wings attacked them in flank; so that Cyrus's army was hemmed in on all sides, and, as our author expresses it, inclosed, like a small square drawn within a great one ^P.

THIS motion did not at all alarm Cyrus; who, giving his troops the signal to face about, attacked in flank the enemy's forces, that were marching to fall upon his rear, and put them into great disorder. In the same moment, a squadron of camels was made to advance against the enemy's other wing, consisting mostly of cavalry. Their horses, upon the approach of the camels, were so frightened, that most of them threw their riders, and trod them under foot; which occasioned a great confusion. While they were thus in disorder, Artageses, an officer of great experience, at the head of a small body of horse, charged them so briskly, that they could never afterwards rally; and, at the same time, the chariots armed with sithes being furiously driven against them, they were intirely routed. Both the enemy's wings being put to flight, Cyrus commanded Abradates, his chief favourite, to fall upon the centre with the chariots we have mentioned above. The first ranks, consisting mostly of Lydians, not being able to stand so violent a charge, immediately gave way; but, the Egyptians being covered with their bucklers, and marching so close, that the chariots had not room to penetrate their ranks, a great slaughter of the Persians ensued; Abradates himself was killed, his chariot overturned, and most part of his men cut in pieces, after having signalized themselves in a very extraordinary manner. Upon his death, the Egyptians, advancing boldly, obliged the Persian infantry to give way, and drove them back quite to their engines. There they met with a new shower of arrows and javelins, discharged upon them from the towers; and, at the same time, the Persian rear, advancing sword in hand, obliged their archers and spearmen to return to the charge. In the mean time Cyrus, having put to flight both the horse and foot on the left of the Egyptians, pushed on to the centre, where he had the mortification to find his Persians again giving ground; and, judging that the only way to stop the Egyptians, who were pursuing them, would be to attack them in the rear, he did so; and, at the same time, the Persian cavalry coming up to his assistance, the fight was renewed with great slaughter on both sides; for the Egyptians, facing about, defended themselves with incredible bravery. Cyrus himself was in great danger; for, his horse being killed under him, he fell in the midst of the enemies; but, being saved by his Persians, who, alarmed at his danger, threw themselves headlong upon those that surrounded him, the battle became more bloody than ever. At length Cyrus, admiring the valour of the Egyptians, and concerned to see such brave men perish, offered them honourable conditions, letting them know at the same time, that all their allies had abandoned them. They accepted the terms offered them; and, having agreed with Cyrus, that they should not be obliged to carry arms against Cræsus, in whose service they had been engaged, surrendered themselves to the conqueror, and, from that time, served him with the utmost fidelity ⁹ (H).

^P XENOPH. Cyropæd. l. vi. p. 173.

THE engagement lasted till night, when Cræsus retired with his troops to Sardis; and the other nations made the best of their way to their respective countries. Cyrus did not think fit to pursue them; but, the next morning, advanced towards Sardis. Cræsus, hearing of his approach, marched out with his Lydians (for the auxiliaries were already retired) to give him battle. Their principal strength consisted in cavalry; which Cyrus being sensible of, made his camels advance against them, whose smell the horses not being able to endure, they were immediately put in disorder. However, the Lydians, who, at that time, were one of the most warlike nations of Asia, dismounting, fought on foot; but, after having kept their ground very obstinately for some time, were forced to make their retreat to Sardis, where they were immediately closely besieged by Cyrus ¹ (I).

THE

⁹ XENOPH. Cyropæd. l. vii. p. 172—178.
l. i. c. 80.

¹ HERODOT.

(H) Xenophon observes here (4), that Cyrus gave them the cities of Larissa and Cyllene on the sea-coast, and other lands within the country, which were inhabited by their descendants in his time; and adds, that these places were called the cities of the Egyptians. This observation, and many others he makes in his Cyropædia, in order to prove the truth of the things he advances, shew plainly, that he wrote that piece as a true history of Cyrus, at least with respect to the substance of it, and greatest part of the transactions.

(I) While Cyrus lay encamped before Sardis, he performed the exequies of Abradates, and Pan-

(4) Cyropæd. l. vii. p. 179.

Sardis taken.

Cyrus's generosity to Cræsus.

THE night after he invested the city, he made himself master of the citadel, being conducted to it, in the dead of the night, by a Persian slave, who had been a servant to the governor of that place. At break of day he entered the city, where he found no resistance, the Lydians having dispersed at the news of the citadel's being taken. Cyrus's first care was to save the town, which was the most wealthy of all Asia, from being plundered. With this view, he acquainted the inhabitants, that their lives should be spared, and neither their wives nor their children touched, provided they brought him all their gold and silver. This condition they readily complied with; and Cræsus himself, who was taken and brought to Cyrus, set them an example, by delivering his immense treasures up to the conqueror. Cyrus, touched with compassion at the king's misfortune, and admiring his constancy in so great a change, treated him with great clemency, suffering him to enjoy both the title and authority of king, under the sole restriction of not having power to make war. From that time, he took him with him in all his expeditions, either out of esteem for that prince, or out of policy, that he might be more secure of his person * (K).

CYRUS,

* XENOPH. Cyropæd. l. vii. DIOD. SIC. in excerpt. Valef. p. 241. PLUTARCH. in Solon. POLYÆN. strat. l. vii. SOLIM. in Polyhist. c. 1. HERODOT. l. i. c. 88, 155, 156.

thea his wife. Abradates was prince of Susham under the Babylonians, and had revolted to Cyrus about two years before; being induced thereunto by his wife, a woman of extraordinary beauty, whom Cyrus had taken prisoner in his first engagement with the Babylonians, and treated in a most obliging manner. This kind treatment drew over her husband to Cyrus, and he being killed in the engagement with the Egyptians, as we have mentioned above, Panthea, out of grief, slew herself upon his dead body; and Cyrus caused them both to be interred with great pomp, and a stately monument to be erected over them near the river Pactolus, where it was to be seen many ages after (5).

(K) The taking of Cræsus is differently related by Herodotus, and those who have copied after him (6). According to these, Cræsus, being shut up in Sardis, dispatched ambassadors to all his allies, intreating their assistance. But, in the mean time, Cyrus pursued the siege with such vigour, that he took the city before any succours could arrive, and the king in it, whom he condemned to be burnt alive; and accordingly placed him on a great pile of wood, accompanied by fourteen young Lydians. The design of Cyrus in so doing was, according to He-

(5) Cyropæd. l. vi. § vii.

(6) Herodot. l. i. c. 85—83.

CYRUS, after the conquest of Lydia, continued in Lesser His con-Asia, till he had subdued the several nations inhabiting that quests.

Herodotus, to offer this sacrifice to some god as the first-fruits of his victory, or to perform a vow, or perhaps to see, as he had heard of his piety towards the gods, whether any of them would save him from the fire. When Cræsus had ascended the pile, notwithstanding the weight of his misfortunes, he recollected the words of Solon, who had told him, that no man could be called happy before his death. Revolving these words in his mind, he cried out, with a great sigh, three times, Oh Solon, Solon, Solon! Which when Cyrus heard, he commanded his interpreter to ask him, whose assistance he implored. Upon this, Cræsus acquainted him, that Solon, an Athenian philosopher, having formerly visited him, and viewed his immense treasures, had despised all, and plainly told him, instead of applauding his happiness, that he could not pronounce any man happy so long as he lived, because no man could foresee what might happen to him before his death; of the truth of which being now sadly convinced by his present calamity, he could not forbear calling upon the name of Solon. This raised in Cyrus a lively sense of the uncertainty of all human felicity, and such compassion for Cræsus, that he commanded the fire to be presently extinguished, and the unfortunate king taken down. Accordingly all endeavours were used to execute his orders, but the fire could not be mastered. In this distress, Cræsus being informed that Cyrus designed to save his life, but seeing his Persians attempted in vain to extinguish the flame, burst out into a flood of tears, and, with a loud voice, invoking Apollo, besought that god to deliver him from the present danger, if any of his offerings had ever been agreeable to him. He had scarce ended his prayer, when clouds were seen gathered in the air, which before was serene, and a violent storm of rain ensuing, quite extinguished the flame. Cyrus, understanding by this miraculous event, that Cræsus was a pious prince, and greatly favoured by the gods, not only spared his life, but allowed him a very honourable maintenance, and made use of him ever after as one of his chief counsellors; and at his death recommended him to his son Cambyfes, as the person whose advice he would have him chiefly to follow.

The same writer tells us, that, upon the taking of the city of Sardis, a certain Persian, not knowing Cræsus, advanced to kill him. As he, not caring to survive that disaster, did not attempt to avoid the blow, his son, who was born dumb, seeing the soldier ready to strike, was moved with such fear and tenderness for the life of his father, that in that instant he cried out, Soldier, spare the life of Cræsus. These were the first words he ever uttered; but from that time he continued to speak readily (7). Thus far Herodotus.

(7) Herodotus, l. i. c. 85.

Babylon
taken.

Year of
the flood

1812.

Bef. Chr.

536.

great continent, from the Egean sea to the Euphrates. From thence he marched into Syria and Arabia; and, having brought those nations likewise under subjection, he again entered Assyria, and marched towards Babylon, the only city in all the east that now held out against him; but was reduced, after two years siege, in the manner we have related in the history of Babylon. The king of Babylon being killed, and those who were about him put to flight, the rest voluntarily submitted; and Cyrus, without any further resistance, became master of the place, and concluded his conquests, after a war of twenty-one years ^u. The taking of Babylon put an end to the Babylonian empire, and fulfilled the predictions, which the prophets Isaiab, Jeremiah, and Daniel, had uttered against that proud metropolis, and of which we have already given a particular account ^w.

UPON the death of the king of Babylon, Darius the Mede is said, in Scripture, to have taken the kingdom ^x. By Darius the Mede is meant Cyaxares king of the Medes, and uncle to Cyrus, as we have fully proved in the history of Media ^y: for Cyrus, as long as his uncle lived, held the empire with him in partnership; nay, so far did he carry his complaisance, that he let him enjoy the first rank. Cyrus, having settled his affairs at Babylon, returned into Persia, to pay a visit to his father and mother, who were still alive ^z; and, after a short stay there, went back to Babylon, together with Cyaxares. On their arrival, they concerted together the settling of the whole empire; and, having divided it into an hundred and twenty provinces, the government of these was given to such as had distinguished themselves during the war.

Cyrus's
numerous army.

THE civil government being thus settled, Cyrus ordered all his forces to join him at Babylon. On a general review, he found they consisted of an hundred and twenty thousand horse, two thousand chariots armed with sithes, and six hundred thousand foot. Of these having distributed into garisons such a number as he judged necessary for the defence of the several parts of the empire, he marched, with the remainder, into Syria, where he settled the affairs of that province, and then reduced the other nations, as far as the Red sea, and the confines of Ethiopia ^b. In this interval of time, Daniel was, by order of Darius, who remained at Babylon, cast into the lions den, as we have related in the history of Media ^c.

ABOUT two years after the reduction of Babylon, Cyaxares dying, and also Cambyfes king of Persia, Cyrus returned to Cyaxares's death.

^u Cyropæd. l. vii. p. 189—192. ^w Idem, l. viii. ^x Dan. v. 31. ix. 1. xi. 1. ^y See before, p. 41, 42, 44, and note (C). ^z Cyropæd. l. viii. ^b Cyropæd. l. viii. p. 233. ^c See before, p. 44.

Babylon,

Babylon, and took upon him the whole government of the empire^d, which he held for the space of seven years (K).

IN the first of these seven years expired the seventy years of the Babylonish captivity, when Cyrus published the famous edict, whereby the Jews were allowed to return to Jerusalem. There is no doubt but this edict was obtained by Daniel, who was in great credit and authority at court. That he might the more effectually induce the king to grant him that favour, he shewed him the prophecies of Isaiah^e, naming him, an hundred and twenty years before his birth, as one appointed by GOD to be a great conqueror, a king over many nations, and the restorer of his people, by ordering their temple to be rebuilt, and Jerusalem and Judea to be re-possessed by their antient inhabitants.

Year of the flood 1814.
Bef. Chr.
534.
Cyrus puts an end to the Jewish captivity.

CYRUS having issued out his decree for the restoring of the Jews to their country, and the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem, the captive Hebrews assembled out of the several provinces of the Babylonian empire, to the number of four thousand two hundred and thirty-six persons, with their servants, who amounted to seven thousand three hundred and thirty-seven more, and set out for Judea: and thus was the state of Judah and Jerusalem again restored, after they had lain desolate seventy years (L). Cyrus restored, at the same time,

^d Cyropæd. l. viii. p. 233.

^e Isaiah xlv. 28. xlv. 1.

(K) The reign of Cyrus is reckoned from his first coming out of Persia, to the assistance of his uncle Cyaxares, at the head of the Persian army, to have lasted thirty years; from the taking of Babylon nine years, and from his being sole monarch of the whole empire, after the death of Cyaxares in Media, and Cambyfes in Persia, seven years. Tully (8) reckons by the first account, Ptolemy (9) by the second, and Xenophon (10) by the third. The first of these seven years is the first year of Cyrus mentioned by Ezra (11), wherein an end was put to the captivity of Judah, and liberty granted them to return to their country, the seventy years of captivity being then expired.

(L) It may not be improper, in this place, to insert the famous edict of Cyrus, in favour of the Israelites; an edict, for which, it may be presumed, that GOD endowed him with so many heroic virtues, and blessed him with a constant series of prosperity and victories.

In the first year of Cyrus king of the Persians, that the word of the LORD might be accomplished, that he had promised by the mouth of Jeremy, the LORD raised up the spirit of Cyrus, the king of the Persians; and he made proclamation through all his kingdom, and also by writing, saying:

(8) Cic. de divinat. l. ii. h. viii.

(11) Ezra i. 1.

(9) Ptolem. in canone.

(10) Cyropæd.

Thus

time, to the Jews all the vessels of the temple, which Nebuchadnezzar had brought from Jerusalem, and lodged in the temple of his god Baal.

AFTER the return of the Jews, the Samaritans, their declared enemies, did all that lay in their power to prevent the building of the temple; and though they could not alter Cyrus's decree, yet they prevailed, by bribes, with his chief officers that were in Judea, to obstruct the execution of it; so that, for several years, the building went on but very slowly: and it seems to have been out of grief to see the pious intentions of Cyrus thus disappointed, that, in the third year of that prince, Daniel gave himself up to mourning and fasting for three weeks together §.

BUT to return to Cyrus: this prince, being equally beloved by his own natural subjects, and those of the conquered nations, peaceably enjoyed the fruits of his labours and victories. His new-erected empire was bounded on the east by the river Indus; on the north by the Caspian and Euxine seas; on the west by the Egean; and on the south by Ethiopia, and the sea of Arabia. He kept his residence in the heart of these countries, spending the seven cold months at Babylon, by reason of the warmth of that climate; three months in the spring at Susa; and two months, during the heat of the summer, at Ecbatan h.

HAVING spent seven years in this state of tranquillity, and established his empire with such wisdom, that, upon the strength of this foundation alone, it stood above two hundred years, notwithstanding the rash and impolitic proceedings of his successors, he died, in the seventieth year of his age i, equally regretted by all the nations of his vast spreading dominions. He had reigned, from his first taking upon him the command of the Persian and Median armies, thirty years, as we hinted

§ Dan. x. 1—3.

h Cyropæd. l. viii. p. 233.

i CICERO

de divin. l. i.

Thus saith Cyrus king of the Persians, The LORD of Israel, the most high LORD, has made me king of the whole world, and commanded me to build him an house at Jerusalem in Jewry. If therefore there be any of you that are of his people, let the LORD, even his LORD, be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem that is in Judea, and build the house of the LORD of Israel; for he is the LORD that dwelleth in Jerusalem. Whosoever then dwell in the places about, let them help him (those, I say, that are his neighbours) with gold and with silver, with gifts, with horses, and with cattle and other things, which have been set forth by vow for the temple of the LORD at Jerusalem (12).

(12) 1 *Esdra*s ii. 1, & seqq.

in

The extent of his empire.

Cyrus
dies.

in a late note ^k; from the reduction of Babylon, nine ^l; and, from his being sole monarch of the east, after the death of his uncle Cyaxares, or Darius the Mede, seven years ^m. Authors strangely differ with each other as to the manner of his death. Xenophon's account, who makes him die in his bed, as fortunately as he lived, amidst his friends, and in his own country, seems to us by far the most probable; for all authors agree, that he was buried at Pasargada in Persia, where Xenophon says he died; and his monument was to be seen in the time of Alexander the Great. Had he been slain in Scythia, as Herodotus and Justin relate, and his body mangled, as they would have us believe, how could it ever have been rescued out of the hands of those enraged barbarians, and buried at Pasargada? Besides, it is by no means probable, that such a wise man as Cyrus is represented to have been, and so far advanced in years, would have engaged in so rash an undertaking as the Scythian expedition is described to have been by those who relate it: neither can it be conceived, how, after so great an overthrow, the Persian empire could have subsisted, especially in the hands of such a successor as Cambyses was; for Herodotus tells us, that Cyrus was killed, and his whole army, consisting of two hundred thousand men, cut in pieces (M).

Year of
the flood 1819.
Bef. Chr.
529.

^k See p. 189. (K).
l. viii. p. 233.

^l PROL. in canon.

^m Cyropæd.

(M) Diodorus Siculus (13) tells us, that he was taken prisoner by Tomiris queen of the Massagetes, and by her orders crucified. Ctesias (14) says, that in a battle against the Derbicans, a people bordering upon Hyrkania, he was wounded in the thigh by a certain Indian, of which wound he died three days after. John Malela of Antioch, out of a forged book ascribed to Pythagoras, acquaints us, that he was slain in a sea-fight by the Samians.

Some writers tell us (15), that, after the reduction of Babylon, Cyrus, having a victorious army at his devotion, and Cyaxares being returned from Babylon into Media, revolted from Cyaxares, in conjunction with the Persians under him, who were incited thereunto by Harpagus a Mede, and Artabazus, who had assisted Cyrus in subduing Asia Minor, and had been injured by Darius. Harpagus was sent by Cyaxares with an army against Cyrus; but in the heat of the battle revolted with great part of the army to Cyrus. Cyaxares raised a new army, and was again defeated near Pasargada in Persia, and taken prisoner. By this victory, say they, the monarchy was translated from the Medes to the Persians. But this account we have already rejected, as not agreeing so well with holy writ as that which we read in Xenophon.

(13) Lib. ii.

(14) Lib. x.

(15) Vide Suidam in Aristarchos.

Names for ON his death-bed, he appointed his son Cambyfes to succeed his fuceffor him; who accordingly took poffeffion of that vast empire. To Cambyfes his other fon Smerdis he left feveral confiderable governments.

Cambyfes was fcarce well feated on the throne, when he refolved upon a war with the Egyptians. But of this expedition, and the good fuccefs that attended it, we have fspoken at length in the history of Egypt; and therefore fhall only add here, in a note, an extraordinary circumftance, related by Herodotus, on occafion of a battle fought at this time, whereof he was himfelf an eye-witnefs (N).

THE next year, which was the fixth of his reign, he refolved upon three different expeditions, the firft againft the Carthaginians, the fecond againft the Hammonians, and the third againft the *Ethiopian*s; but he was forced to drop the firft project, by reafon the Phaenicians, without whofe help he could not carry on that war, refufed to affift him againft the Carthaginians, who were defcended from them, Carthage being originally a Tyrian colony. But his heart being fet on the other two, he fent embaffadors into Ethiopia, who, under that character, were to act as fpies, and give him intelligence of the ftate and ftrength of the country. But the *Ethiopian*s, being well apprifed of the errand on which they were come, treated them with great contempt: however, the Ethiopian king, in return for the prefents they brought him from Cam-
byfes, fent him back his own bow, advifing him to make war

• See vol. ii. p. 94, & feq. & HERODOT. l. iii. c. 1-4.

(N) That writer tells us (16), that the bones of the Persians and Egyptians were in his time ftill to be feen in the place where the battle was fought, but feparated from each other. The fkulls of the Egyptians, fays he, were fo hard, that they could fcarce be broken by the violent blow of a large ftone; whereas thofe of the Persians were fo foft and weak, that they were broke with the leaft blow of a pebble.
This difference, as our author tells us, was owing to the Egyp- tian cuftom of fhaving the heads of their children early; by which means the bones were rendered thicker and ftronger through the heat of the fun, and the head preferved from baldnefs; there being fewer people bald in E- gypt, as Herodotus obferves, than in any other country. As the heads of the Egyptians were ftrengthened by this method, fo thofe of the Persians were foft-ened by the contrary cuftom;

for they were not expofed to the fun, but always covered with caps and turbans. Our author adds, that he obferved the fame thing at Papremis, in thofe who, together with Achamenes, the fon of Darius, were defeated by In- rus king of Libya.

(16) Herodot. l. iii. c. 12.

upon the Ethiophians when the Persians could as easily bend that bow as they. Before he delivered the bow to the Persian embassadors, he addressed them with this speech: "It is not from The Ethio-
 "any consideration of my friendship, that the king of Persia pian king's
 "sent you with these presents: neither have you spoken truth, noble mes-
 "but are come into my kingdom as spies. If your master sage to
 "were an honest man, he would desire no more than his own, Cambyfes
 "and not attempt to enslave a people who had never done him
 "any injury: however, give him this bow from me; and let "him know, that the king of Ethiopia advises the king of "Persia to make war upon the Ethiophians when the Persians
 "shall be able thus easily to bend so strong a bow; and, in "the mean time, to thank the gods, that they have never in"spired the Ethiophians with a desire of extending their do-
 "minions beyond their own country P."

CAMBYSES, being informed by his embassadors, of all that Camby- passed, flew into a violent passion, and ordered his army imme- fes's rash diately to begin their march, without considering, that they expedition were furnished neither with provisions, nor any other neces- against saries for such an expedition. He left the Greek auxiliaries Ethiopia.
 behind him, to keep the new-conquered countries in awe, during his absence; and, with the whole body of his land- Year of forces, began his march. When he arrived at Thebes, in the the flood Upper-Egypt, he detached fifty thousand men against the Ham- monians, ordering them to ravage the whole country, and 1824.
 burn the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, while he, with the rest of Bef. Chr.
 his army, should march against the Ethiophians. But, before 524.
 he had marched a fifth part of the way, his provisions were consumed, and the army reduced to the necessity of eating their beasts of burden. Cambyfes, notwithstanding these difficulties, pursued his rash attempt; and the soldiers fed upon herbs and grass, so long as they found any in their way: but, when they His army arrived in the sandy deserts, they were brought to such ex- famished in tremities, as to be obliged to devour one another; every tenth the deserts.
 man, upon whom the lot fell, being doomed to serve as food for his companions: a food, says Seneca, more to be dreaded than famine itself⁹. The king still persisted in his mad design, till, at last, being apprehensive of the danger his own person was in, he gave over the enterprize, and retreated to Thebes, after having lost great part of his army in this wild attempt^r.

As for that part of the army which was sent against the Am- monians, they marched from Thebes; and, by the help of their guides, arrived at the city of Oasis, inhabited by Samians, and seven days march distant from Thebes. Nobody doubts, as

^P HEROD. l. iii. c. 20—22.

⁹ SENECA de ira, l. iii. c. 20.

^r HEROD. ubi supra, c. 25, 26.

His other army perish.

our author informs us ^s, but they arrived at that place: but what was their fate afterwards, is uncertain; for they never returned either to Egypt, or their own country. The Ammonians informed Herodotus, that they marched from Oasis; and that, after they had entered the sandy desert, which lies beyond that city, a violent wind began to blow from the south; at the time of their dinner, and raised the sands to such a degree, that the whole army was overwhelmed, and buried alive.

He destroys all the Egyptian
temples.

CAMBYSES, on his return to Thebes, caused all the temples, which, in that superstitious city, were very rich and numerous, to be pillaged, and burnt down to the ground. We may judge of the richness of those temples by the remains saved from the flames, which amounted to the sum of three hundred talents of gold, and two thousand three hundred talents of silver. He likewise carried away the famous circle of gold that incircled the tomb of king Ozymandias, being three hundred and sixty-five cubits in circumference, and on which were represented all the motions of the several constellations.

Cruelty at Memphis.

FROM Thebes Cambyfes marched back to Memphis, where he discharged the Greek mercenaries, and sent them to their respective countries. On his entry into this city, finding the citizens all in mirth and jollity, because their god Apis had then appeared among them, he was highly provoked, as supposing that they rejoiced because of his unsuccessful expedition. He therefore called the magistrates, to learn of them the cause of that public mirth. They gave him a true account of the whole matter; but he, not believing what they said, caused them all to be put to death. He sent afterwards for the priests, who made him the same answer, telling him, that it had been always their custom, when their god appeared amongst them, to celebrate his appearance with the greatest demonstrations of joy they could express. To this he replied, That, if their god was so kind and familiar as to shew himself to them, he too would be willingly acquainted with him; and therefore commanded the deity to be brought forthwith before him. He was brought accordingly; but, no sooner did he appear before Cambyfes, that the king, seeing a calf, and not, as he expected, a deity, flew into a violent passion; and, drawing his dagger, wounded the Apis in the thigh; and, reproaching the priests for their stupidity, in worshiping a brute, ordered them severely to be whipt, and all the Egyptians at Memphis, that should be found celebrating the feast of Apis, to be slain. The Apis, after he had languished some time, died

Kills their god Apis.

^s HEROD. ibid.

^t DIOD. SIC. l. i. p. 43—46.

of his wound in the temple, and was buried by the priests, who carefully concealed his death from Cambyfes ¹.

THE Egyptians say, that after this sacrilegious action, which was looked upon by them as the greatest instance of impiety that ever was committed amongst them, Cambyfes was immediately seized with lunacy, and grew mad. But his actions shewed, that he was so long before, of which he gave several instances: we find the following upon record.

Instances of that monarch's madness and cruelty.

HE had a brother, by the same father and mother, called by Xenophon, Tanaoxares, Smerdis by Herodotus, and by Justin, Mergis. He attended Cambyfes on his Egyptian expedition; but being the only person in the army that could bend the bow, within two fingers breadth, which the king of Ethiopia had sent, Cambyfes from hence conceived such a jealousy of him, that, being no longer able to bear him in the army, he sent him back into Persia. After his departure, Cambyfes dreamed, that a messenger arriving from Persia told him, that Smerdis was seated on the throne, and touched the heavens with his head: whereupon suspecting, that his brother aspired to the crown, he dispatched Prexaspes, one of his confidants, into Persia, with orders to put him to death; which he accordingly executed ².

THIS murder was followed by another, still more criminal. Cambyfes had with him, in the camp, his youngest sister, by name Meroe. As this princess was very beautiful, he fell violently in love with her; and was desirous to marry her: but, being convinced of the novelty of his design, he summoned all the royal judges of the Persian nation, whose office it was to interpret the laws, to know whether there was any law allowing a brother to marry a sister. The judges being unwilling to authorize such an incestuous marriage, and, at the same time, dreading the effects of the king's violent temper, should they contradict him, returned this crafty answer: That they, truly, knew of no law allowing a man to marry his own sister, but had a law which gave the king of Persia liberty to do whatever he pleased. Upon this answer, he solemnly married her; and thereby gave the first example of that incest which was afterwards practised by most of his successors, and by some of them carried so far as to marry their own daughters. This sister he took with him in all his expeditions, and gave her name to an island in the Nile, between Egypt and Ethiopia, which he conquered on his wild expedition against the Ethiopians. The occasion and manner of her death are reported in the following manner: As Cambyfes was one day diverting himself, in seeing a young dog, and the whelp of a lion, fighting, the dog being overmatched, another of the same litter, breaking loose, came to his assistance; by which means the lion was mastered. Whilst the king was mightily pleased with this adventure, Meroe, who sat by him, began to weep: and, being obliged to tell her husband the cause of her grief, she confessed, that this accident put her in mind of the fate of her brother Smerdis, whom nobody had been good-natured enough to assist. There needed no more than this to excite the rage of that brutal prince, who, notwithstanding her being with child, gave her such a blow with his foot on the belly, that she miscarried, and soon after died (N).

He marries his sister.

¹ HEROD. 1. iii. c. 28, 29.

² Idem ibid. c. 30.

and kills
her.

Prexaspes's son shot to death.

Year of
the flood 1825
Ref. Chr.
523.

He caused also several of the chief lords of his court to be buried alive, and daily sacrificed some of them to his wild fury. He one day asked Prexaspes, who was his chief favourite, what the Persians said of him, and what character they gave him in their private conversations. Prexaspes answered, that they highly applauded his actions in general; but thought him too much addicted to wine. I understand you, replied the king: they pretend, that wine deprives me of my understanding; but whether this charge be true or not, you shall be judge. Upon which he began to drink to a far greater excess than he had ever done before: then, ordering the son of Prexaspes, who was his cup-bearer, to stand upright at the farther end of the room, with his left-hand upon his head, and turning to Prexaspes, If I shoot, said he, this arrow through the heart of your son, the Persians, you must own, have slandered me; but, if I miss, I shall willingly allow them to have spoken the truth. He had no sooner uttered these words, than, drawing his bow, he shot the arrow through the body of the young man. Then, commanding him to be opened, and finding the arrow had pierced his heart, he asked the father, with great joy, and in an insulting manner, whether he had ever seen a man shoot with a more steady hand, and whether or no the Persians had injured his character, by saying, that wine deprived him of his reason. The unfortunate father, being under great apprehensions for his own life, answered, that a god could not have shot more dextrously (O).

HEROD. l. iii. c. 31, 32.

(N) The Egyptians, as our author informs us (17), relate the matter in a different way. They say, that as Cambyfes and his sister were at table, she took a lettuce, and pulling the leaves asunder, asked her husband, whether an intire lettuce was not more beautiful than one pulled in pieces. He answered, it was; whereupon Meroe replied, that he had represented the broken lettuce, by dismembering the house of Cyrus. Upon these words, Cambyfes struck her with his foot; which, as she was big with child, occasioned her death.

(17) Herodotus, ubi supra, c. 32.

WHILE he was proceeding in this furious manner, Cræsus king of Lydia thought fit to lay before him the bad consequences that might attend so tyrannical a government; which provoked him to such a degree, that he ordered him to be put to death: but the officers, who received his orders, suspended the execution of the sentence, and concealed Cræsus, thinking, that, if Cambyfes should inquire for him, and repent of his rash resolution, they should be well rewarded for saving his life; but, if they found, that Cambyfes neither altered his mind, nor desired to see him, they might still put him to death, pursuant to their orders. The very next day he asked for Cræsus; which the officers hearing, acquainted him, that the king of Lydia was still alive. Cambyfes was transported with joy, when he heard, that his orders had not been put in execution; but at the same time commanded all those who had saved him to be immediately put to death, because they had not obeyed his orders.

CAMBYSES, in the beginning of the eighth year of his reign, left Egypt, in order to return to Persia. On his coming into Syria, he met an herald, sent from Susa to the army, to acquaint them, that Smerdis the son of Cyrus was proclaimed king, and commanding them all to acknowledge and obey him. This event was brought about in the following manner: Cambyfes, at his departure from Susa on the Egyptian expedition, had left the administration of affairs, during his absence, in the hands of Patizithes, one of the chief of the mages. This Patizithes had a brother, who very much resembled Smerdis the son of Cyrus, and was, perhaps on that account, called by the same name. As soon as he was fully assured of the death of that prince, which had been carefully concealed from most others, and at the same time informed, that Cambyfes indulged his tyrannical temper to such a degree, that he was grown insupportable, he placed his own brother on the throne, giving out, that he was the true Smerdis the son of Cyrus; and immediately dispatched heralds into all the parts of the em-

Herod. l. iii. c. 35.

Idem. ibid. c. 36.

(O) Seneca (18), who copied this story from Herodotus, after shewing his detestation of such a barbarous and cruel action, condemns still more the monstrous flattery of the father, with these memorable words; Sceleratius tulum illud laudatum est, quam mislum.

(18) Seneca de ira, l. iii. c. 14.

pire, to give notice of Smerdis's accession to the crown, and require all the provinces to pay him their obedience. The herald, who was dispatched to Egypt, finding Cambyses, with his army, at Ecbatan in Syria, placed himself in the midst of the army, and openly proclaimed the orders of Patizithes. Cambyses caused him to be seized; and, having strictly examined him in the presence of Prexaspes, who had received orders to kill his brother, he found, that the true Smerdis was certainly dead; and that he, who had usurped the throne, was Smerdis the mage. The mention of that name greatly affected Cambyses, and revived in his memory the dream, in which he had seen a messenger, who came to acquaint him, that Smerdis was seated on the throne. Reflecting how unjustly he had murdered his brother, he burst out in a flood of tears, and immediately ordered his army to march, with a design to suppress the growing rebellion; but, as he was mounting his horse, his sword slipped out of the scabbard, and wounded him in the thigh. Being thus wounded, he asked the name of the city; and, being informed, that the place was called Ecbatan, he said, in the presence of all, Fate has decreed, that Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, shall die in this place. For, while he was in Egypt, having consulted the oracle of Bitus, which was famous in that country, he was told, that he should die at Ecbatan; which he understanding of Ecbatan in Media, resolved to save his life, by avoiding that place: but what he thought to avoid in Media, he found in Syria; and therefore, being acquainted, that the place where he received the wound was called Ecbatan, and taking it for certain that he must die there, he assembled the chief Persian lords that served in the army, and, representing to them the true state of the case, earnestly required them never to submit to the impostor, or suffer the sovereignty to pass again from the Persians, to the Medes, of which nation Smerdis the mage was, but to use their utmost endeavours to place on the throne one of their own blood. But the Persians, suspecting all this was said by him out of hatred to his brother, had no regard to it; and, Cambyses dying a few days after of his wound, which mortified, they quietly submitted to the person whom they found on the throne, supposing him to be the true Smerdis. To this delusion Prexaspes greatly contributed, by saying, that he had not killed Smerdis the son of Cyrus with his own hand.

Cambyses accidentally wounded.

Dies.

Year of the flood 1826. Bef. Chr. 522.

Cambyses reigned seven years and five months. When he came first to the crown, the Samaritans begged of him, that he would put a stop to the building of the temple at Jerusalem. And their application was not in vain; for though he had so much respect for the memory of his father, as not openly to revoke his decree, yet, in a great measure, he frustrated the design of it, by laying the Jews under such difficulties, that they could not pursue the work.

THIS prince is called, in Scripture ⁹, Artaxerxes, by Herodotus, Smerdis; by Æschylus, Mardys; by Ctesias, Spendada-the Mage tes; and, by Justin, Oropastes. As soon as he had taken up-^{mounts the} on him the sovereignty, he granted to all his subjects an ex-^{throne.}emption from taxes, and all military service, for three years, and treated them with such beneficence, that all the nations of Asia, the Persians only excepted, expressed great sorrow on the revolution that happened a few months after: and, further to secure himself on the throne, he married Atossa, the Marries daughter of Cyrus, thinking, that, in case of a discovery, he ^{the daugh-} might hold the empire by her title. She had been before mar-^{ter of Cy-}ried to her brother Cambyses, who, upon the above-mentioned ^{rus.} decision of the royal judges, having married one of his sisters, took to wife also the other; and the mage, pretending to be her brother, married her upon the same footing. But the precautions he made use of to prevent his being discovered, only increased the suspicion, that he was not the true Smerdis. He had married all his predecessor's wives, and, among the rest, Phedyma, the daughter of Otanes, a Persian noble-^{Suspected} man of the first rank. Otanes, to be fully satisfied in this ^{by Otanes.} matter, sent a trusty messenger to his daughter, to know of her, whether the king was really Smerdis the son of Cyrus, or some other man. Phedyma returned answer, that, as she had never seen Smerdis the son of Cyrus, she could not satisfy his curiosity. Otanes, by a second message, desired her to inquire of Atossa, who could not but know her own brother, whether this were he, or not. But his daughter let him know, that she was not allowed to speak with Atossa, or see any other of the women; because the king, whoever he was, had, from the very beginning of his reign, lodged his wives in distinct and separate apartments. This answer greatly increased the suspicion of Otanes; who thereupon sent a third message to his daughter, directing her, when she should be next invited to his bed, to take the opportunity, while he was asleep, of feeling, whether he had ears, or not; for, Cyrus having formerly caused the ears of Smerdis the mage to be cut off for a crime he had been guilty of, he told her, that, if the king had ears, she might be sure, that he was Smerdis the son of Cyrus; but, if otherwise, he could be no other than Smerdis the mage; and therefore unworthy of possessing the crown, or her person. Phedyma answered, that the danger was very great;

⁹ Ezra iv. 7, 11, 23.

Discovered
by him.

Darius
declares
the true
Smerdis
dead.

because, if the king had no ears, and should surprise her, endeavouring to find out such a truth, he would not fail putting her to death: nevertheless, in obedience to the commands of her father, she would make the attempt, and take upon her to satisfy his doubt; and accordingly, the next time she was called to his bed, as soon as she perceived him fast asleep, she took the opportunity of making the trial; and, finding he had no ears, early next morning acquainted her father therewith; whereby the imposture was discovered. Otanes, upon this information, imparted the whole affair to Gobryas and Aspathines, Persians of great distinction, and whose honour he could rely on. These three agreed among themselves, that each of them should name one of his most trusty friends to be admitted into the secret. Pursuant to this resolution, Otanes named Intaphernes; Gobryas, Megabyzus; and Aspathines, Hystarnes. In the mean time Darius, the son of Hystaspes, arriving at Susa from Persia, where his father was governor, they all agreed to make him privy to their resolutions; which they did accordingly. Darius, at their first meeting, told them, that he thought no man in Persia, but himself, had known, that Smerdis the son of Cyrus was really dead, and the crown usurped by a mage; and therefore he was come with a design to kill the usurper, without imparting his design to any other, that the glory of such an action might be intirely his own; but, since others were apprised of the imposture, he was of opinion, that the usurper should be dispatched with all expedition, delays being, in such cases, very dangerous, and the best-concerted designs easily disappointed. Otanes, on the other hand, was for putting off the execution of their design till some better opportunity offered, and not attempting the enterprize, till they had increased their number. But Darius remonstrating the danger there was of being discovered and betrayed, if they let the present opportunity slip, or imparted their design to others, and openly protesting, that, if they did not make the attempt that very day, he would prevent any one from accusing him, by disclosing the whole matter to the mage, it was unanimously agreed, that they should not separate, under any pretence whatsoever, but immediately upon the breaking up of their meeting, go to the palace, and either put the usurper to death, or die in the attempt.

WHILE they were concerting their measures, the two mages, in order to remove all suspicion, engaged Prexaspes in their interests, and, with great promises, prevailed upon him to give his word, and oblige himself by oath, never to discover the fraud they had put upon the Persians. Prexaspes, as we have

* HERODOTUS, l. iii. c. 67, & seq.

have related above, knew that Smerdis, the son of Cyrus, was not living, having, by the command of Cambyses, put him to death with his own hand. The mages, having engaged Prexaspes to be silent, acquainted him farther, that, having determined to assemble all the Persians under the walls of the palace, they desired he would ascend a certain tower, and from thence publicly declare, that the king upon the throne was truly Smerdis the son of Cyrus. Prexaspes having taken upon him this office, the mages summoned the Persians together, and commanded him to mount the tower, and from thence harangue the people. Prexaspes began his discourse with the genealogy of Cyrus; and then put the Persians in mind of the great favours the nation had received from that prince. After having extolled Cyrus, and his family, to the great astonishment of all, he sincerely declared all that had passed; and told the people, that the apprehensions of the danger he must inevitably run, by publishing the imposture, had constrained him to conceal it so long; but now, his remorse no longer suffering him to act such a dishonourable part, he acknowledged, that he had been compelled by Cambyses to put his brother to death with his own hand; and that the person who possessed the throne was Smerdis the mage. He then begged pardon of the gods and men, for the crime he had committed by compulsion, and against his will; and, fulminating many imprecations against the Persians, if they should neglect to recover the sovereignty, and punish the usurper, he threw himself headlong from the top of the tower, and died on the spot. It is easy to imagine what confusion the news of this accident occasioned in the palace.

IN the mean time, the conspirators, not knowing what had happened, were going to the palace, determined to execute their design. On their way they were informed of what Prexaspes had said and done, which obliging them to retire, and confer together, Otanes earnestly desired them anew to defer the enterprize: but Darius still insisting upon the immediate execution, and rejecting all proposals of delay (P), they fell in with his opinion, and went directly to the palace. The guards, respecting their dignity, and not suspecting persons of their rank and figure, permitted them to pass, without asking them any questions: but, as they came near the king's apartment,

HEROD. I. iii. c. 74, 75.

(P) Herodotus (19) tells us, that as they were contending, seven couple of hawks appeared pursuing two couple of vulturs in the air, and tearing them to pieces; which when the seven Persians observed, they accepted the omen; all to a man fell in with Darius, and marched straight to the palace.

(19) Herodotus. I. iii. c. 76.

the Smerdis

the mage murdered by Darius.

The ma-ges massacred.

Samaritans obstruct the rebuilding of the temple.

the eunuchs, who attended there to receive messages, refused them admittance, and threatened the guards for permitting them to pass. Upon this the seven Persians, encouraging each other, drew their swords, killed all that opposed their passage, and penetrated to the very room where the two mages were consulting about the late affair of Prexaspes. They no sooner heard this tumult and uproar, but the one taking up a bow, and the other a javelin, the weapons that came first to hand in that confusion, they engaged the conspirators. He who had the bow, soon found that weapon of no use in so close an action; but the other, with his javelin, wounded Aspathines in the thigh, and struck out the eye of Intaphernes: one of the brothers being killed, the other retired into a room adjoining to the place where they fought, with a design to shut himself in; but was so closely pursued by Darius and Gobryas, that they broke into the room with him: Gobryas, having seized him, held him fast in his arms; but, as it was quite dark in that place, Darius stood still, not knowing how to direct his blow, and fearing to strike, lest he should kill his friend instead of the enemy: which Gobryas perceiving, desired him to strike, though he should kill them both. Upon this, Darius resolved to put all to the venture; and, by good fortune, killed the usurper. Having thus dispatched the two brothers, they cut off their heads; and, leaving their two wounded companions to secure the palace, the other five, carrying the heads of the two mages, with their hands all smeared with blood, marched out of the palace, exposed the heads to the eyes of the people, and declared the whole imposture. The Persians, being informed of what had passed, were so enraged against the impostors, that they fell upon the whole sect, and killed every mage they met; and, if night coming on had not put an end to the slaughter, no one of that order had been left alive. The day, on which this happened, was ever afterwards celebrated by the Persians with the greatest solemnity, called by the name of magophonia, or the slaughter of the mages. On that festival the mages durst not, for many years after, appear abroad; but were obliged to shut themselves up in their houses.

SMERDIS reigned only eight months, during which time a stop was put to the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem; for, as soon as he was seated on the throne, the Samaritans acquainted him, that the Jews were rebuilding their city and temple; that they had always been a rebellious and stubborn people; and that, if he allowed them to finish that work, they would, without doubt, withdraw their obedience from the king, whereby he would lose all the provinces on that side

‡ HEROD. ibid. c. 76-79.

the

the Euphrates. For the truth of what they said concerning the ungovernable temper of the Jews, they referred him to the records of his predecessors, which they desired him to inquire into touching this matter. And accordingly Smerdis, upon these remonstrances, having caused the records to be carefully examined, and finding with what difficulty the Jews had been reduced by Nebuchadnezzar, issued an edict, forbidding them to proceed any farther in the work they had begun, and charged the Samaritans to see it put in execution. Hereupon the work was laid aside, till the second year of the reign of Darius Hystaspis, that is, for the space of two years ^u (Q).

BUT, to return to the conspirators. When the tumult and disorders which attend such events, were appeased, they met, to consult what form of government they should introduce. Otanes was for a republic, Megabyzus spoke for an oligarchy, and Darius declared for monarchy. The opinion of the latter was, after a long debate, embraced by all, except Otanes, who, finding his sentiments over-ruled, told them, That, since they were resolved to set up a king, he would not be their competitor for a dignity which he abhorred; and that, being determined not to govern as a king, he would not be governed by one: and therefore was willing to give up his right to the crown, on condition, that neither he, nor his posterity, should be subject to the royal power. The other six granted him his demand: whereupon he immediately retired, and his descendants alone retained their liberty, which they enjoyed even in our author's days, being then no farther subject to the king than it suited their conveniency, and only obliged to conform to the customs and manners of the country ^w.

UPON his departure, the other six began to deliberate in what manner they should proceed to the election of a new king. But, in the first place, they unanimously agreed, That whosoever of them should be chosen, he should every year present Otanes, and his posterity, with a Median vest; a mark of great distinction among the Persians, because he had been the chief author of the enterprize. In the next place, they de-^u Ezra iv. 7--24.

^w HEROD. 1. iii. c. 80--83.

(Q) That Cambyfes was the Abasuerus, and Smerdis the Artaxerxes of Scripture, is plain from their obstructing the work of the temple; for they are said in the sacred history to have reigned between Cyrus and Darius, by whose decree the temple was finished. But none reigning between Cyrus and Darius, except Cambyfes and Smerdis, we must conclude that none but Cambyfes and Smerdis could be the Abasuerus and Artaxerxes, who are said in Ezra (20) to have put a stop to this work.

(20) Ezra iv. 5, 6, 7.

terminated,

Year of 1827. Bef. Chr. 521.

terminated, That the seven should have full liberty to enter into all the apartments of the palace, without being introduced; and that the king should not be allowed to marry a woman out of any other family than of the seven conspirators. Then taking the future election into consideration, they thought fit to refer it to Providence; and, accordingly, they all agreed to meet the next morning, by the rising of the sun, on horseback, at an appointed place in the suburbs of the city; and that he whose horse first neighed should be king: for the sun being greatly revered by the Persians, they imagined, by this method, to refer the election to him. Oebares, who had the charge of Darius's horses, hearing of this agreement, led a mare overnight to the place appointed, and brought to her his master's horse. The next morning the six Persians repairing to the place, pursuant to their agreement, Darius's horse, remembering the mare, immediately neighed; and his competitors, dismounting, adored him as king.

Darius chosen king by a stratagem of his groom.

THE Persian empire being thus restored, by the valour of these seven lords, they were raised by the new king to the highest dignities, and honoured with most ample privileges: in all public affairs, they were the first to deliver their opinions; and ever afterwards the Persian kings of this race had seven chief counsellors, privileged in the same manner; and by whose advice all the public affairs of the kingdom were transacted. Under this character we find them often mentioned in Scripture.

His pedigree, &c.

DARIUS was the son of Hystaspes, a noble Persian, of the royal family of Achæmenes, who had attended Cyrus in all his wars, and was, at that time, governor of the province of Persia. Darius is called, in the writings of the modern Persians, Gushtasph, and his father Lorasph; and are famous among the Persians to this day. Darius, the better to establish himself on the throne, married the two daughters of Cyrus, Atossa and Artystona. The former had been wife to her brother Cambyses, and also to the mage; but Artystona had not been married before, and proved the most favoured and beloved of all his wives: for to these he added Parmys the daughter of the true Smerdis, and Phedyma the daughter of Otanes, who detected the mage. Having thus confirmed his power, he divided the whole empire into twenty satrapies, or governments, and appointed a governor over each division, ordering them to pay an annual tribute. Persia alone was exempted from all manner of taxes: the Ethiopians, and inhabitants of Division of the empire.

* HEROD. l. iii. c. 84--87. Ezra vii. 14. Esth. i. 14. &c.

2 HEROD. l. iii. c. 88. & l. vii. c. 2. JUSTIN. l. i. c. 10.

3 PLATO l. iii. de legib.

Colchis, were enjoined only to make some presents, and the Arabians to furnish yearly such a quantity of frankincense, as was equal in weight to a thousand talents. By this establishment, Darius received the yearly tribute of fourteen thousand five hundred and sixty Euboic talents, besides several other sums of small consequence.

DARIUS, in the very beginning of his reign, put to death Intaphernes, one of the seven conspirators, on the following occasion: Intaphernes went to the palace to confer with Darius; but attempting to enter, pursuant to the agreement above-mentioned, in virtue of which they were to have free access to the king at all hours, except when he was alone with some of his wives, he was stopt by the doorkeeper, and a messenger, under colour that the king was in company with one of his wives. Intaphernes, not believing them, drew his scymetar, and, having cut off both their noses and ears, fastened their heads in a bridle, and so left them. In this condition they went in, and, shewing themselves to the king, acquainted him with the cause of the ill usage they had received. Darius, apprehending that this attempt might have been concerted by the six, sent for them, one after another, and asked, whether they approved the action; but, finding that Intaphernes alone was guilty, he caused him to be seized with his children and family, left his relations, whom he suspected should raise a rebellion. While they were under confinement, the wife of Intaphernes made such loud complaints and lamentations at the gates of the palace, that Darius, touched with compassion, granted her the life of any one of her relations, leaving her the choice of the person. She, after some deliberation, chose her brother. Which Darius hearing, asked her, why she had so little regard for her husband and children, as to save the life of her brother rather than theirs. The woman readily answered, that she could get another husband, and have by him other children, if she should be deprived of those she had; but could never have another brother, her father and mother being already dead. The king was so well pleased with this answer, that he not only pardoned her brother, but saved also her eldest son. The others were all put to death with Intaphernes, without any regard to his late deserts.

In the beginning of the second year of Darius, the Jews resumed the work of the temple, being exhorted thereto by the prophet Haggai; which the Samaritans understanding, applied themselves to Tatnai, whom Darius had appointed governor of Syria and Palestine, acquainting him,

¹ HEROD. l. iii. c. 85-97. ² Idem ibid. c. 118, 119. ³ Hagg. i. 1. that

The building of the temple resumed by a new edict of Darius.

Year of the flood 1832.
Bef. Chr. 516.

The Babylonians revolt.

that the Jews were not authorized to pursue that work which, if perfected, would encourage them to shake off the Persian yoke. Upon these remonstrances, Tatnai, accompanied by Setharboznai, who seems to have been governor of Samaria, went up to Jerusalem; and, after viewing the work, inquired of the elders, by what authority they had resumed it. The elders produced the decree of Cyrus. Whereupon the governor, who was a man of great justice and probity, wrote to the king, fairly stating the case, and desiring, that seal might be made into the archives for the decree of Cyrus, which the Jews produced, to justify themselves in what they were doing. The king, upon the receipt of this letter, ordered the archives of Babylon and Ecbatan to be carefully examined, and the decree being found in those of the latter, for Cyrus was at Ecbatan in Media when he granted it, the king commanded it to be strictly observed in every particular; and, having sent it to Tatnai and Setharboznai, enjoined them to see it fully and effectually put in execution; decreeing, that whosoever should attempt to alter the edict, or prevent its being put in execution, should have his house pulled down, and, a gall being made of the timber of it, should be hanged thereon. At the publication of this decree at Jerusalem, the work of the temple went on very successfully, and the state of the Jews in Judea and Jerusalem was entirely restored.

ABOUT the beginning of the fifth year of Darius, the Babylonians, not being able to live any longer in subjection to the Persians, who not only loaded them with heavy taxes, but removed the imperial seat from Babylon, formerly the mistress of the east, to Susa, and thereby greatly diminished the splendor of that city, attempted to retrieve their ancient grandeur by setting up for themselves against the Persians, as they had done in former times against the Assyrians. With this view taking advantage of the troubles that had happened, first the death of Cambyses, and afterwards, on the murder of the usurper Smerdis, they had privately stored their city with a manner of provisions for many years; and, at last, broke out into an open rebellion, which drew Darius, with all his forces, to besiege the city. The Babylonians, seeing themselves shut up by so numerous and powerful an army, turned all their thoughts to the supporting of a long siege, which they imagined would tire out the enemy's troops. To prevent the consumption of their provisions, they took the most desperate and barbarous resolution that ever was put in execution by any nation. They agreed among themselves, to get rid of all unnecessary mouths; and therefore, drawing together all women, old men, and children, they strangled them without Their de- distinction, whether wives, fathers, mothers, or sisters, every perate po- one being allowed to save only the wife he liked best, and a licy.

 maid-servant, to do the work of the house.

DARIUS, having lain before Babylon a year and eight months, and being no less tired than his army, with so tedious a siege, endeavoured, by various stratagems and artifices, to take the place; among others, he made use of that which had succeeded so well with Cyrus: but all his efforts were rendered ineffectual, by the unwearied vigilance of the Babylonians. When he was ready to break up the siege, and return to Persia, Zopyrus, one Zopyrus's of his chief commanders, put him in possession of the town, by strange the following contrivance: he cut off his nose and ears; and, stratagem having mangled his body, in a most cruel manner, with stripes, to betray led to the Babylonians, thus disfigured, feigning to have been them. treated by Darius, for advising him to raise the siege. The Babylonians, seeing a man of that distinction so barbarously used, believed all he said against Darius; and, assuring themselves of his fidelity, gave him the command of some forces. With these he sallied out, and having surrounded ten thousand Persians, which Darius, by agreement, had posted near the walls, he cut them all in pieces on the spot. A few days after, in another sally, he killed two thousand more; which pleased the Babylonians, that he was appointed commander in chief of all their forces. Being vested with this command, he made a third sally, and put four thousand more Persians to the sword. Upon this success, Zopyrus acquired such credit, that the guard of the city was intirely committed to his care. Not long after, Darius, pursuant to the agreement they had made, advanced with the whole body of his army, and surrounded the city. The Babylonians, mounting the walls, made a vigorous defence; but, in the mean time, Zopyrus, opening the gates of Belus and Cissia, introduced the Persians, and delivered the city up to Darius, who, without this stratagem, could never have mastered it. Thus Babylon was taken Babylon second time; and Darius, being put in possession of it, beat taken by down the walls from two hundred cubits high to fifty: and of his means, these walls only Strabo ^d is to be understood to speak, where he tells us, that the walls of Babylon were only fifty cubits high. As for the inhabitants, after having impaled about three thousand of the most guilty and active in the revolt, he pardoned the rest. And, because the Babylonians had destroyed their women, he took care to furnish them with wives, injoining the neighbouring provinces to send fifty thousand women to Babylon, without which supply the place must soon have become depopulated. As for Zopyrus, he was deservedly rewarded by Darius with the highest honours he could heap upon him, during the whole course of his life. That prince frequently used to say, that he would willingly lose twenty Babylons, rather than see Zopyrus so disfigured. Besides many other ample rewards, he bestowed upon him the revenues of Babylon for life, free from all charges and taxes; and could never after behold him, without shedding many tears^e.

^c HEROD. l. iii. c. 150, 151.

^d STRABO, l. vi.

Darius's
expedition against the Scythians.

Year of
the flood 1834.
Bef. Chr.

514.

His vast army.

Darius
over-reached by the Scythians.

AFTER the reduction of Babylon, Darius undertook an expedition against the Scythians inhabiting those countries which lie between the Danube and the Tanais. His pretence for this war was, to revenge the calamities which they had brought upon Asia, when they invaded that country about one hundred and twenty years before, and held it in subjection for the space of twenty-eight years, as we have related in part, in the history of Media^f, and shall more fully in that of the Scythians. This he gave out, as the motive inducing him to a war, which his ambition alone, and desire of extending his conquests, prompted him to. Having made vast preparations for this expedition, and levied an army of seven hundred thousand men, he marched to the Thracian Bosphorus; and, having there passed over a bridge of boats, he reduced all Thrace. From Thrace he advanced to the Ister, or Danube, where he had appointed his fleet to join him. Here he marched over another bridge of boats, and entered Scythia. The Scythians, after having conferred together about the measures they should take to oppose so powerful an enemy, determined not to venture an engagement in the open field, but to withdraw themselves from the frontiers, in proportion as the Persians advanced, laying waste the country, and filling up the wells and springs. Pursuant to this resolution, they met Darius on the frontiers, and, finding him disposed to give them battle, they retired from country to country, till his army was quite tired with such tedious and fatiguing marches. At last he began to be sensible of the danger he was in of perishing, with all his forces; and, having resolved to give over that rash enterprize, and retire home, he lighted, in the night, a great number of fires, and, leaving the old men and sick behind him in the camp, he marched off with all possible expedition, in order to reach the Danube. The Scythians, perceiving the next morning, that the enemy was decamped, detached a considerable body to the Danube, who, as they were well acquainted with the roads, arrived at that river before Darius. The Scythians had sent expresses beforehand, to persuade the Ionians, whom

^e HEROD. ibid. c. 154—160. & JUSTIN. l. i. in fine. ^f See before, p. 33, & seq.

Darius had left to guard the bridge, to break it down, and retire to their own country. Now they pressed them to it more earnestly, representing to them, that, as the time prescribed by Darius was expired, they were at liberty to return home, without breaking their word, or being wanting to their duty; for Darius had given them leave to break down the bridge, and withdraw to their own country, if he did not return at a prefixed time, which was already elapsed. Hereupon the Ionians began to consult among themselves, whether or no they should comply with the request of the Scythians. Miltiades, prince of the Chersonesus of Thrace, having the public interest more at heart than his own private advantage, was for embracing so favourable an opportunity of shaking off the Persian yoke, breaking down the bridge, and thereby cutting off Darius's retreat. All the other commanders fell in with him, except Hystieus prince of Miletus, who represented to the Ionian chiefs, that their power was linked with that of Darius, since it was under his protection: that each of them was lord in his own city: and that the cities of Ionia would not fail to depose them, and recover their liberty, if the Persian power should sink, or decline. This speech made a deep impression upon the Ionian generals; and, private interest prevailing over the public good, they determined to wait for Darius. But, in order to deceive the Scythians, and prevent them from using any violence, they declared, that their design was to retire, pursuant to their request: and, the better to impose upon the enemy, they began to break down the bridge, encouraging the Scythians to return back, meet Darius, and defeat him. They readily complied with the Ionians request, but missed Darius, who arrived safe at the bridge, repassed the Danube, and returned into Thrace. Here he left Megabyzus, one of his chief generals, with part of his army, to complete the conquest of that country. With the rest of his troops he passed the Basporus, and took up his quarters at Sardis, where he spent the winter, and the greatest part of the year following, to refresh his army, which had suffered extremely in that rash and unsuccessful expedition ^f.

MEGABYZUS, having brought all Thrace under subjection, dispatched seven Persian noblemen, that served under him, to Amyntas king of Macedon, injoining him to acknowledge Darius for his master, by the delivery of earth and water. Amyntas not only complied with their request, but received them into his house; and, having prepared a sumptuous feast, entertained them with great magnificence. At the end of the en-

^f HEROD. l. iv. c. 1: 85, 86, & seqq. JUSTIN. l. ii. c. 5. CORNEL. NEP. in Miltiad.

The Persian lords massacred by Alexander.

Year of
the flood 1835.
Bef. Chr.
513.

Thrace plundered by the Scy-thians.

Darius's conquest of India.

Year of
the flood 1839.
Bef. Chr.
509.

tainment, the Persians, being heated with wine, desired Amyntas to bring in his concubines, wives, and daughters. Though this was contrary to the custom of the country, the king, fearing to displease them, did as they required. But the Persians not observing a due decency on that occasion, the king's son, by name Alexander, being no longer able to see his mother and sisters treated in such a manner, contrived to send them out of the room as if they were to return immediately; and, at the same time, had the precaution to get his father out of the company. In the mean time, he caused a like number of young men to be dressed like women, and armed with poniards, under their garments: these he brought into the room, instead of the others; and, when the Persians began to use them as they had treated the women, they drew their poniards, fell upon the Persians, and killed both the noblemen and their attendants. Great search was made by Megabyzus for these noblemen: but Alexander having, with large presents, bribed Bubares, who was sent to inquire after them, their death was concealed, and the whole matter stifled.

THE Scythians, to be revenged on Darius for invading their country, having passed the Danube, laid waste all that part of Thrace which had submitted to the Persians, as far as the Hellepont; and, loaded with booty, returned home, without meeting with any opposition.

DARIUS, having sufficiently refreshed his troops, after the Scythian expedition, began to think of extending his dominions eastwards; and, in order to facilitate his design, resolved, in the first place, to make a discovery of those countries. With this view, he caused a fleet to be built and equipped at Casparyrus, a city on the river Indus. The command of this fleet he gave to Scylax, a Grecian of Caryandia, a city of Caria, who was well versed in maritime affairs. His orders were to sail down the current, and make the best discoveries he could of the countries lying on either side of the river, till he arrived at the southern ocean: from thence he was to steer his course westward, and that way return back to Persia. Scylax, having exactly observed his instructions, and sailed down the river Indus, entered the Red sea by the straits of Babelmandel; and, on the thirtieth month from his first setting out, landed in Egypt, at the same place from whence Necho king of Egypt formerly sent out the Phœnicians who were in his service, to sail round the coasts of Africa. From hence Scylax returned to Susa, where he gave Darius a full account of his observations. Darius hereupon entered India at the head of a numerous army; and, reducing that large country, made it the twentieth province of the Persian empire. Our author gives us no account of this important war: he only says, that Darius received from the provinces he conquered in this expedition, an annual tribute of three hundred and sixty talents of gold, according to the number of the days of the Persian year, at that time ^h (S).

DARIUS, after his return to Susa from the Scythian expedition, had appointed his brother Artaphernes governor of Sardis, and given Otanes the government of Thrace, and the adjacent countries along the sea-coast, in the room of Megabyzus. In the mean time, a sedition happening in Naxos, the chief island of the Cyclades in the Egean sea, now called the Archipelago, the principal inhabitants, being overpowered by the populace, were banished the island. In their distress they had recourse to Aristagoras, beseeching him to restore them to their country. Aristagoras at that time resided at Miletus, and governed that city as deputy to Hystiaeus (T), to whom he

^h HEROD. l. iv. c. 44, & seqq.

(S) This payment was made, according to the standard of the Euboic talent, the same with the Athic, and therefore, by the lowest computation, amounted to one million and ninety-five thousand pound sterling.

(T) Darius, on his return to Sardis, after his unhappy expedition against the Scythians, being informed, that he owed his own safety, and that of his whole army, to Hystiaeus, who had prevailed upon the Ionians not to destroy the bridge upon the Danube, sent for that prince, and desired him freely to ask what favour he pleased, for the eminent service he had done him. Hystiaeus desired the king to grant him the Edonian Myrcinus, a territory upon the river Strymon in Thrace, with the liberty of building a city there. His request being granted, he returned to Miletus, and, having there equipped a fleet, he sailed for Thrace, took possession of the territory granted him, and began the intended city. Megabyzus, who was then governor of Thrace for Darius, being apprised how prejudicial that project might prove to the king's affairs, on his return to Sardis, represented to Darius, that this new city stood upon a navigable river; that the country round about it afforded abundance of timber for the building of ships; that it was inhabited by several nations, both Greeks and barbarians, which could furnish great numbers of men fit both for the sea and land service; that if once these nations should be governed by such a skilful and enterprising prince as Hystiaeus, they might soon become so powerful both by sea and land, that the king of Persia would not be able to keep them in subjection, especially since they might be supplied with gold and silver from the mines, with which that country abounded, to carry on any enterprize. Darius, being, by these remonstrances, made sen-

Aristagoras's attempt upon Naxus frustrated by Mega-bates.

Year of
the flood 1844.
Bef. Chr.
504.

he was both nephew and son-in-law. When Aristagoras understood their case, he resolved to improve the opportunity, and attempt to make himself master of Naxus. With this view, he promised to give the exiles all the assistance he could; but, not being powerful enough to accomplish his design himself, he communicated the matter to Artaphernes the king's brother, governor of Sardis, representing to him, that this was a fair opportunity of reducing Naxus: that, if he were once master of that island, all the rest of the Cyclades might be easily brought under subjection: that the isle of Eubœa lying very near the other, would be an easy conquest; and from thence the king would have a free passage into Greece. Artaphernes was so well pleased with these proposals, that, instead of the hundred ships which Aristagoras demanded, he promised him two hundred, provided the king approved of the enterprize. And accordingly, having obtained the king's consent, he sent the next spring to Miletus the number of ships which he had promised, under the command of Megabates, a noble Persian, of the Achæmenian family: but his commission being to obey the orders of Aristagoras, and the haughty Persian not brooking to be under the command of an Ionian, a dissention arose between the two generals; which was carried so far, that Megabates, to be revenged on Aristagoras, gave the Naxians secret intelligence of the design that was carrying on against them. Hereupon they made such preparations for their defence, that the Persians, after having spent four months in besieging the chief town of the island, and consumed all their provisions, were obliged to retire. The project having thus miscarried, Megabates threw all the blame upon Aristagoras; and his false accusations being more favourably heard than the just defence of the other, Artaphernes condemned him to defray all the charges of the expedition, giving him to understand, that they would be exacted with the utmost rigour. As he was not able to pay sible of the mistake he had committed, dispatched a messenger to Hystæus, injoining him to repair to Sardis, in order to deliver his advice concerning matters of the utmost consequence. Having thus drawn him to Sardis, he took him with him to Susa, pretending that he wanted such an able counsellor, and faithful friend, to be always about him; and telling him, that he should be able to find him something in Persia, which would make him ample amends both for Myrcinus and Miletus. Hystæus, finding himself under a necessity of complying, attended Darius to Susa, and left Aristagoras governor of Miletus, in his absence. To this Aristagoras the banished Naxians applied for relief (21).

so large a sum, he forefaw that this must end not only in the loss of his government, but his utter ruin. This desperate situation made him entertain thoughts of revolting from the king, as the only expedient whereby he could extricate himself from his present difficulties. No sooner had he formed this design, but a messenger arrived from Hystieus, who confirmed him in it (U). Hystieus, after several years continuance at the Persian court, being weary of the manners of that nation, and desirous to return to his country, thought this the most likely means to accomplish his desire; for he flattered himself, that if any disturbances should arise in Ionia, he could prevail with Darius to send him thither, to appease them, as in effect it happened. Aristagoras, finding his own inclinations backed by the orders of Hystieus, imparted his design to the leading men of Ionia, whom he found ready to come into his measures: and therefore, being now determined to revolt, applied himself wholly to make all manner of preparations for so great an undertaking.

THE next year Aristagoras, to engage the Ionians more resolutely to stand by him, reinstated them in their liberty, and all their former privileges. He began with Miletus, where he divested himself of his power, and gave it up into the hands of the people. He then undertook a journey through all Ionia, where, by his example and credit, he prevailed upon all the other petty princes, or, as the Greeks then called them, tyrants, to do the same. Having thus united them all into one common league, of which he himself was declared the head, he openly revolted from the king; and made great preparations both by sea and land, for carrying on a war. To strengthen himself the more against the Persians, in the beginning of the following year, he went to Lacedæmon, to engage that city in his interest: but, not being able to prevail upon Cleomenes (W); who

HEROD. I. v. c. 30—37.

(U) Hystieus, being desirous to impart his design to Aristagoras, and finding no other means, by reason all the passages leading into Ionia were guarded, shaved the hair of one of his servants, in whose fidelity he most confided, and, having imparted the message on his head, kept him at Susa till his hair was grown again. He then dispatched him to Miletus, without any other instructions, than that, upon his arrival, he should desire Aristagoras to cut off his hair, and look upon his head (22).

(W) Cleomenes having appointed him a time and place for an interview, Aristagoras represented to him, that the Lacedæmonians and Ionians were country-

(22) Herodot. ibid. c. 35.

Is joined by the Athenians.

who was at that time king of Lacedæmon, to send him any succours, he proceeded to Athens, where he met with a favourable reception; for he had the good fortune to arrive there at a time when the Athenians were disposed to close with any measures against the Persians, being highly exasperated against them, on the following occasion: Hippias, the son of Pisistratus, tyrant of Athens, having been banished about ten years men; that Sparta being the most powerful city of Greece, it would be much to their honour to concur with him in the design he had formed, of restoring the Ionians to their antient liberty; that the Persians, their common enemy, were not a warlike people, but extremely rich, and consequently would become an easy prey to the Lacedæmonians; that, considering the present spirit and disposition of the Ionians, it would not be difficult for them to carry their victorious arms even to Susa, the metropolis of the Persian empire, and the place of the king's residence. At the same time, he shewed him a description of all the nations and cities through which they were to pass, engraved on a plate of brass, which he had brought along with him. Cleomenes desired three days time to consider of the matter; which being expired, he asked Aristagoras in how many days one might travel from the coast of Ionia to the city where the king resided. Aristagoras, though an artful man, and far superior in all respects to Cleomenes, yet made a slip, as our author observes, in his answer to this demand; for as he designed to draw the Spartans into Asia, he ought to have lessened the distance from the coasts of Ionia to Susa; whereas he told him plainly, that it was a journey of three months; which Cleomenes no sooner heard, than, interrupting him from proceeding in his discourse concerning the way, commanded him to depart Sparta before sun-set, for advising the Spartans to take a march into Asia, not to be performed in less than three months after their landing. Cleomenes then withdrew; but Aristagoras, taking an olive-branch in his hand, after the manner of suppliants, followed him home to his house, and endeavoured to prevail upon him by arguments of another nature, that is, by presents; but before he made any offer, he desired him to bid his daughter Gorgo, a child about eight or nine years old, to withdraw; but Cleomenes, telling him, that he might speak freely without apprehending any thing from so young a child, Aristagoras began with the promise of ten talents, in case Cleomenes would comply with his request; and, receiving a denial, proceeded gradually in his offers till he came to the sum of fifty talents; and then the girl cried out, Fy, father, fy, else this stranger will corrupt you. Cleomenes was so well pleased with the child's admonition, that he immediately retired to another apartment, and ordered Aristagoras that instant to depart his dominions (23).

(23) Herodot. l. v. c. 51.

before,

before, and tried, in vain, several other ways to bring about his restoration, at length applied himself to Artaphernes, at Sardis; and, having insinuated himself into his favour, did all that lay in his power to stir him up against them. The Athenians, having intelligence of this, sent ambassadors to Sardis, desiring Artaphernes not to give ear to what any of their outlaws should insinuate to their disadvantage. The answer of Artaphernes to this embassy was, that, if they desired to live in peace, they must recal Hippias. This haughty message incensed the Athenians to a great degree against the Persians; and Aristagoras, arriving there just at this juncture, easily obtained whatever he desired. The Athenians ordered a fleet of twenty ships to be immediately equipped, and sent to the assistance of the Ionians.

THE Ionians having, at last, drawn together all their troops, and being reinforced with the twenty Athenian ships, and five more from Eretria, a city in the island of Eubœa, they set sail for Ephesus; and, having left their ships there, they marched by land to the city of Sardis, which they easily made themselves masters of. As most of the houses were built with reeds, an Ionian soldier having accidentally set one of them on fire, and the flame spreading, the whole city was reduced to ashes; but the citadel, whither Artaphernes had retired, was preserved. After this accident, the Persians and Lydians, drawing together their forces, and other troops coming to their assistance, the Ionians, who had not been able to force the citadel, judged it was high time for them to withdraw; and accordingly marched back with all possible expedition, in order to reembark at Ephesus: but, before they had reached that place, they were overtaken by the enemy, and defeated with great slaughter. The Athenians who escaped, immediately hoisted sail, and returned home; nor could they ever afterwards be prevailed upon to concern themselves in this war: however, their having engaged thus far, gave rise to that war which was carried on afterwards for several generations by the two nations, and ended at last in the utter destruction of the Persian empire; for Darius, being informed of the burning of Sardis, and hearing that the Athenians had been concerned in that undertaking, determined from that time to make war upon Greece: and, that he might never forget his resolution, he commanded one of his officers to cry every day to him, with a loud voice, while he was at dinner, three times, Remember the Athenians. In the burning of Sardis, the temple of Cybele, the chief goddess of that country, accidentally taking fire, was intirely consumed. This accident

Sardis taken and burnt by the Ionians.

Year of the flood 1848. Bef. Chr. 500.

Ionians defeated.

Darius's resentment against the Athenians

^l HEROD. l. v. c. 38—102.

^k Idem ibid. c. 105.

served afterwards as a pretence to the Persians for burning all the temples of Greece. But the true motive which led them to this, we shall have occasion to mention hereafter.
 The Ionians, though deserted by the Athenians, and considerably weakened by their late overthrow, did not lose courage, but pursued their point with great resolution. Their fleet sailed to the Hellepont and the Propontis, where they reduced the city of Byzantium, and most of the other Greek cities on those coasts. As they were sailing back, they made a descent on Caria, and obliged the inhabitants to join them in this war; the people of Cyprus likewise entered into the same confederacy, and openly revolted from the Persians.
 The Persian generals in those quarters, finding that the revolt began to be universal, drew together what troops they had in Cilicia, and the neighbouring provinces; and, at the same time, enjoined the Phœnicians to assist them with their whole naval power. The Ionians, as they were sailing to Cyprus, fell in with the Phœnician fleet, attacked and dispersed them.
 But at the same time the Persian troops, that were landed in Cyprus, having gained a complete victory over the rebels, and killed in the engagement Aristagoras himself, the leading man and first author of the revolt, the Ionians reaped no advantage from their victory by sea; for the whole island of Cyprus was again brought under subjection.
 AFTER the reduction of Cyprus, Daurises, Hymies, and Otanes, three Persian generals, and all sons-in-law to Darius, having divided their forces into three bodies, marched three different ways against the revolters. Daurises held his course to the Hellepont, and from thence, after possessing himself of the revolted cities, marched against the Carians, whom he overthrew in two successive battles; but, in a third, being drawn into an ambuscade, he was slain, with several other Persians of distinction, and his whole army cut in pieces. Hymies, after having taken the city of Cius in Mysia, reduced all the Asian coast; but, falling sick at Troas, soon after died.
Artaphernes and Otanes, with the rest of the Persian generals, finding that Miletus was the centre of the Ionian confederacy, resolved to march thither with all their forces, concluding that, if they could carry that city, all the others would submit of their own accord. Pursuant to this resolution, they entered Ionia and Æolia, where their main strength lay, and took the city of Cleomena in Ionia, and Cyma in Æolia, which was such a blow to the whole confederacy, that Aristagoras, not finding himself in a condition, after that loss, to make head against the enemy, resolved to abandon Miletus, and consult his own safety, by retiring to some distant place. Accordingly, he embarked with such as were willing to follow him, and set sail for the river Strymon in Thrace, where he seized on the territory of Hyficus, which had been formerly given by Darius to Hyficus; but, as he was besieging a place situated beyond those limits, he was killed by the Thracians, and all his army cut in pieces. On his departure from Miletus, he left the government in the hands of Pythagoras, an eminent citizen; who, being informed that Artaphernes and Otanes designed to bend all their force against Miletus, summoned a general assembly of the Ionians. In this meeting, it was agreed, that they should not attempt to bring an army into the field, but only to fortify and store their city with all manner of provisions for a siege, and to draw all their forces together, to engage the Persians at sea, thinking themselves, by reason of their skill in maritime affairs, most likely to have the advantage in a naval engagement. The place appointed for their general rendezvous was Lada, a small island, over-against Miletus; where accordingly they met with a fleet of three hundred and fifty-three sail. At the sight of this fleet, the Persians, tho' double their number, avoided engaging, till, by their emissaries, they had secretly corrupted the greatest part of the confederates, and engaged them to desert the common cause. When they came to an engagement, the Samians, Lesbians, and several others, hoisting sail, returned to their respective countries. As the remaining fleet of the confederates did not consist of above an hundred ships, they were quickly overpowered by the Persians, and almost intirely destroyed. The city of Miletus was immediately besieged both by sea and land, and soon taken by the conquerors, who rased it to the ground, the sixth year after the revolt of Aristagoras. All the other towns that had revolted, returned, either by force, or of their own accord, to their duty. Those that stood out were treated as they had been threatened beforehand. The handsomest of their youths were made eunuchs, and their young women sent into Persia: their cities and temples were reduced to ashes. Such were the calamities the Ionians drew upon themselves, by seconding the ambitious views of two enterprising men, Aristagoras and Hyficus.

* HEROD. l. v. c. 98—103. † Idem ibid. c. 108—116.

The Ionians defeated at sea, and reduced.

Miletus taken by the Persians.

Year of the flood 1851. Bef. Chr. 497.

Hyficus crucified.

THE latter had his share in the general calamity; for, being taken by the Persians, and carried to Sardis, he was immediately crucified by order of Artaphernes, who hastened his execution, without consulting Darius, lest his affection for him should incline him to pardon one, who, if he were again let loose, would not fail to create new disturbances. It afterwards appeared, that Artaphernes's conjecture was well-grounded; for, when Hystieus's head was brought to Darius, he expressed great displeasure against the authors of his death, and caused his head to be honourably interred, as the remains of a person, to whom he professed infinite obligations. He was the most bold, restless, and enterprising genius of his age; with him all means were good and lawful, that served to promote the end he had in view, acknowledging no other rule of his actions, than his own interest and ambition, to which he readily sacrificed the good of his country, and the lives of his nearest relations. But we shall have occasion to bring him again upon the scene in the history of Ionis, and the Greek colonies in Asia.

^m HEROD. l. v. c. 122, & seqq. & l. vi. c. 18.

Darius's
unsuccessful expedition against Greece.

THE Phœnician fleet having reduced all the islands on the coast of Asia, Darius recalled all his other generals, and appointed Mardonius, the son of Gobryas, a young Persian nobleman, who had lately married one of his daughters, to be commander in chief of all the forces quartered on the coasts of Asia, ordering him to invade Greece, and revenge, on the Athenians and Eretrians, the burning of Sardis. Mardonius, having rendezvoused his forces at the Hellepont, marched, pursuant to his orders, through Thrace into Macedonia, ordering his fleet first to reduce Thasus, and then to coast along the shore, as he marched by land, that they might be at hand to act in concert with each other. On his arrival in Macedonia, all the country, terrified at such a mighty army, submitted; but the fleet, in doubling the cape of mount Athos, in order to gain the coasts of Macedonia, was intirely dispersed by a violent storm, which destroyed upwards of three hundred ships, and twenty thousand men. His land-army met, at the same time, with a misfortune no less fatal; for, being encamped in a place not sufficiently secured and fortified, the Bryges, a people of Thrace, attacking him in the night, broke into his camp, slew a great number of his men, and wounded Mardonius himself, who, being disabled, by these losses, to prosecute his design either by sea or land, marched back into Asia, without reaping any advantage for his master, or glory for himself, in this expedition.

Mardonius defeated and recalled.

Year of
the flood 1854.
Bef. Chr.
494.

DARIUS, hearing of the ill success of Mardonius, and ascribing it to his want of experience, thought fit to recall him, and appoint two other generals in his room, Datis a Mede, and Artaphernes his own nephew, being the son of Artaphernes the king's brother, and late governor of Sardis. But, before he would

* HEROD. l. vi. c. 29—30.

° Idem ibid. c. 43, 45.

would make any further attempts upon Greece, he judged it expedient first to sound the Greeks, and try how those different states stood affected to, or were averse from, the Persian government. With this view, he sent heralds to all their cities, to demand earth and water, in token of submission. On the arrival of these heralds, many of the Greek cities, dreading the power of the Persians, complied with their demands; as did also the inhabitants of Ægina, a small island over-against, and not far from, Athens; but, at Athens and Sparta, they did not meet with so favourable a reception, being, in one place, thrown into a deep ditch, and, in the other, into a well, and bid to fetch earth and water from thence. This they did in the heat of their passion; but, when they came to a cooler temper, they were ashamed of what they had done, looking upon it as a violation of the law of nations; and accordingly sent ambassadors to the king of Persia at Susa, to offer him what satisfaction he pleased for the affront they had put upon his heralds. But Darius, declaring himself fully satisfied with that embassy, sent the ambassadors back to their respective countries, though those of Sparta voluntarily offered themselves as victims, to expiate the crime which their countrymen had been guilty of.

DARIUS, being intirely bent upon the reduction of Greece, hastened the departure of his generals Datis and Artaphernes. Their instructions were to plunder the cities of Eretria and Athens, to burn down to the ground all their houses and temples, to make all the inhabitants of both places slaves, and send them to Darius; for which purpose they went provided with a great number of chains and fetters. The two generals, having appointed their fleet to meet at Samos, set sail from thence with six hundred ships, and five hundred thousand men, steering their course to Naxos; which island they easily made themselves masters of, and, having burnt the chief city and all the temples both of this and the other islands in those seas, they stood directly for Eretria, a town in Eubœa, which they took, after a siege of seven days, by the treachery of Euphorbus and Philagrus, two chief citizens. Having taken Eretria, pillaged the city, set fire to the temples, in revenge for those that had been burnt at Sardis, and enslaved the inhabitants, pursuant to their orders, they sailed to Attica. Hippias, the son of Pisistratus, who, as we have said above, had fled to the Persians, conducted them, after they had landed, to the plains of Marathon. Hence they sent heralds to Athens, acquainting the citizens with the fate of Eretria, in hopes ¶ HEROD. l. vi. c. 46—49. & l. vii. c. 133.

in moral. p. 829.

¶ PLUTARCH.

that

that this news would frighten them into an immediate surrender. The Athenians had sent to Lacedæmon, to desire succour against the common enemy; which the Lacedæmonians granted; but they could not set out till some days after, by reason of an antient and superstitious custom which obtained at Sparta, and did not allow them to begin a march before the full moon. Not one of their allies offered to assist them, such terror had the Persian army struck into the cities of Greece. The inhabitants of Plataea alone furnished them with a thousand men. In this extremity, the Athenians were obliged to arm their slaves; which was contrary to their practice on all other occasions.

THE Persian army, commanded by Datis, consisted of one hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse; that of the Athenians amounted, in the whole, but to ten thousand men. It was commanded by ten generals, one of which was Miltiades, whom we shall have occasion to mention often in the history of Greece. These ten generals were to have the command of the army, each for one day in his turn. When the army was assembled, a dispute arose among them, whether they should venture an engagement in the field, or only fortify and defend the city. They were all for the latter opinion, except Miltiades; who declared, that the only way to raise the courage of their own troops, and strike a terror into the enemy, was to advance boldly, and attack them with intrepidity. Aristides, convinced by the speech of Miltiades, embraced his opinion, and brought over to it some of the other commanders. Callimachus likewise, who had been very sanguine at first against such a rash enterprize, fell in at last with Miltiades; and a resolution was taken to engage the enemy in the open field. All the commanders, who were for venturing a battle, when their turn came to command the army, yielded that honour to Miltiades, all sentiments of jealousy giving way to the public good; but, though he accepted the power, he would not hazard an engagement before his own day. As soon as that came, he endeavoured, by the advantage of the ground, to make up what he wanted in strength and number. He drew up his army at the foot of a mountain, that the enemy might not surround him, or fall upon his rear. He covered his flanks with large trees, which he caused to be cut down for that purpose, and to render the Persian cavalry useless.

Miltiades's brave resolution.

The battle of Marathon.

Year of the flood 1858. Bef. Chr. 490.

The Athenian forces were so drawn up, that they were equal in front to the Persians; but, because they had not a sufficient number of men in the centre, that part was extremely weak, the main strength of the army consisting in the wings.

All things being thus disposed, and the sacrifice, according to the custom of the Greeks, performed, Miltiades, without waiting the motions of the Persians, commanded the signal for the battle to be given; when the Athenians fell upon the enemy with such courage and resolution, as can hardly be expressed. The Persians, seeing the Athenians advance, imputed their conduct to folly and despair, being not only few in number, but intirely destitute of horse; and, without stirring, prepared themselves to receive them. After a long and obstinate fight, the Persians and Sacæ broke the centre of the Athenians, having made their greatest efforts against that part. The centre was commanded by Aristides and Themistocles, who, with great intrepidity, made head against the whole Persian army, till, being born down by numbers, and quite overpowered, they were obliged to give ground. But the Athenians and Platæans, who were in the two wings, having defeated the wings of the enemy, came up to the relief of their centre, just as they were betaking themselves to a precipitate flight, after having maintained a running fight for some hours. At their arrival, the scale was quickly turned; for, attacking the enemy in flank, they soon put them in disorder, and obliged them, with great slaughter, to fly to their fleet, whither they pursued them, took seven of their ships, and burnt a great many more ^p. In this action, several Athenians of great distinction were slain, and, amongst others, Callimachus and Stasileus, two of the chief commanders, with only two hundred private men; whereas the Persians left, even according to Herodotus, who makes it much less than any other author, above six thousand dead on the field of battle; and besides, a great many more were killed in the flight, burnt in their ships, and drowned in the sea, as they attempted to save themselves on board their vessels (X). Hippias was killed in slain.

Persians defeated by the Athenians.

^p HEROD. l. vi. c. 101--117. JUSTIN. l. ii. c. 9. VAL. MAX. l. v. c. 3. PLUTARCH. in parall. sub init. ÆMIL. PROB. in Miltiad.

(X) Justin tells us (24), that the Persians lost on this occasion, what by the sword, what by shipwreck, two hundred thousand men; on the other hand, Herodotus, who flourished very near these times, makes the loss of the Persians, if no error has crept into his copy, to have amounted only to six thousand three hundred; which bears no proportion to the vastness of their army, and one hundred and ninety-two Athenians. The whole Persian army, according to Valerius Maximus (25), consisted of three hundred thousand men. Plutarch seems to insinuate the same (26), Justin (27) and Qrosius say, that they were in all six hundred

(24) Justin. l. ii. c. 9. — (25) Val. Max. l. v. c. 3. (26) Plutarch. in parall. (27) Justin, ubi supra.

in the battle, that ungrateful citizen, who, in order to recover the unjust dominion usurped by his father Pisistratus, had put himself at the head of those who were come with a design to reduce to ashes that city to which he owed his birth^a. Immediately after the battle, an Athenian soldier, stained all over with blood, hastened to Athens, to acquaint his fellow-citizens with the good success of their army at Marathon. When he arrived at the public palace, where the magistrates were assembled, he was so spent, that, having uttered these words, Rejoice, rejoice, the victory is ours, he fell down dead at their feet^r. The Persians were so sure of the victory, that they had brought marble along with them to Marathon, in order to erect a trophy there. This marble the Athenians seized, and caused a statue to be formed of it, by the famous Phidias, in honour of the goddess Nemesis, whose province it was to punish unjust actions^s.

Their design against Athens frustrated. AFTER this defeat, the Persian fleet, instead of sailing by the islands, in order to return to Asia, doubled the cape of Sunium, with a design to surprise Athens before the return of the army: but the Athenian troops being apprised of their design, decamped from the plains of Marathon, and marched hundred thousand men. Emilius Probus (28) tells us, that they were one hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. Of the Athenians there were ten thousand, and a thousand Platæans, say Justin and Orosius; but Probus assures us, that the Athenians, with their auxiliaries, were in all but one thousand. This ever-memorable victory was gained, if we believe Plutarch (29), upon the sixth day of Boedromion, the third month in the Attic calendar, after the summer solstice, Phanippus being at that time prætor at Athens; that is, in the third year of the seventy-second Olympiad, four years before the death of Darius, as we read in Severus Sul-

^a JUSTIN. l. ii. c. 9.

^r PLUTARCH. de glor. Athen. p. 347.

^s PAUS. l. i. p. 62.

pitius (30), and ten years before Xerxes passed over into Greece, as Thucydides informs us (31). Most authors tell us, that Hippias was slain in this battle; but Suidas says, that he escaped, and died afterwards in the island of Lemnos. Themistocles, who became afterwards so famous, on this occasion first entered the school of war. We cannot omit, in this place, the glorious behaviour of one Cenegyrus, an Athenian soldier, who, having first his right and then his left hand cut off, while he was endeavouring to prevent one of the enemy's ships from putting off, took hold of it at last with his teeth.

(28) Emil. Prob. in Miltiada.
l. ii. sac. bist.

(29) Plut. in Camill.

(30) Sever. Sulp.

(31) Thucyd. l. i.

with

with such expedition, that they arrived at Athens before the enemy's fleet; and, by that means disappointed their measures.

DATIS and Artaphernes arriving in Asia, that they might seem to have reaped some advantage from this expedition, sent the Eretrian captives to Susa. Darius had expressed great indignation against the Eretrians before the reduction of their city; and charged them with the guilt of beginning the war; but, seeing they were now his prisoners, and intirely in his power, he could not find in his heart to do them any harm, but gave them a village in the country of Cissia, to inhabit, which was but a day's journey distant from Susa. Here Apollonius Tyanicus found their descendants, a great many ages after.

As soon as the day of the full moon was over, the Lacedaemonians began their march with two thousand men, and arrived in three days on the confines of Attica, having marched in so short a time, one thousand two hundred stades; such was their eagerness to be present at the battle: but a silly and ridiculous superstition prevented their having a share in the most glorious action recorded in history; for the battle was fought the day before they arrived: however, they proceeded to Marathon, where they found the fields covered with dead bodies; and, having congratulated the Athenians on the happy success of the battle, they returned home.

DARIUS, upon the news of the unsuccessful return of his army, was so far from being discouraged by such a disaster, that he added the defeat at Marathon to the burning of Sardis, as a new motive spurring him on to pursue the war with more vigour. He therefore resolved to head the army in person; and issued orders to all his subjects, in the several provinces of the empire, to attend him in this expedition: but, after he had spent three years in making the necessary preparations, a new war broke out, occasioned by the revolt of Egypt. This gave him no small uneasiness: however, as he was wholly bent on his expedition against Greece, he resolved not to lay that aside, but, at the same time, to send part of his forces to reduce Egypt, and, with the rest, to march in person against his old enemies the Greeks (Y). But, when he had prepared all things for

HEROD. l. vi. c. 116. u Idem ibid. c. 119. w PHILO-WRAT. in vita Apollonii, l. i. c. 117. x ISOCR. in paneg.
p. 113. y Idem ibid.

(Y) Diodorus Siculus (32) seems ed into Egypt to reduce the to insinuate, that Darius march- rebels, and that he succeeded

(32) Diod. Sic. l. i. p. 84, et 85.

The contest of his two sons about the succession.

for these two expeditions, a great contest arose between his sons, concerning the succession; for, according to an ancient custom among the Persians, the king was obliged, before he set out on any expedition, to name his successor: a custom wisely established, to prevent the many inconveniencies that attend an unsettled succession. Darius thought himself the more obliged to comply with this custom, as he was already advanced in years, and two of his sons seemed to have a just claim to the crown, upon his demise. Darius had three sons by the daughter of Gobryas, his first wife, all born before he came to the crown; and four more by Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, all born after his accession to the throne: of the first Artabazanes was the eldest; of the latter, Xerxes: and these two were competitors for the succession. Artabazanes, or, as Justin calls him, Artamenes, urged, that he was the eldest son: and therefore, according to the custom of all nations ought to be preferred in the succession to the younger. On the other hand, Xerxes alleged, that he was the son of Atossa daughter of Cyrus, who had founded the Persian monarchy, and claimed the kingdom in the right of his mother; it being more agreeable to justice, said he, that the crown of Cyrus should devolve upon one who was a descendant of Cyrus, than upon one that was not. Darius had not yet declared in favour of either, when Damaratus king of Sparta, being driven out by his subjects, arrived at Susa; and, hearing of this dispute, secretly suggested to Xerxes another argument to support his pretensions; namely, that he was born after his father was invested with the royal dignity; whereas Artabazanes was only the son of Darius, a private man: to him therefore the crown belonged, as the king's eldest son, and not to Artabazanes the eldest son of Darius. He further supported his argument by the example of the Lacedæmonians, who excluded from the

in the enterprize. That historian relates, that, upon Darius's desiring to have his statue placed before that of Scosfris, the chief priest of the Egyptians told him, that he had not equalled the glory of that conqueror; and that the king, no ways offended at the Egyptian priest's freedom, replied, that he would endeavour to surpass it. He adds further, that Darius had several conferences with the Egyptian priests, upon matters of religion and government; and that, having learned of them, with what gentleness their ancient kings used to treat their subjects, he endeavoured, after his return into Persia, to form himself upon their model. But Herodotus, more worthy of belief in this particular than Diodorus, only observes, that Darius resolved to make war at the same time upon Egypt and Greece, and to invade Greece in person, while part of his troops were employed in the reduction of Egypt.

crowns the children that were born before their father's accession, if they had any to succeed born after their advancement to the throne. These reasons appeared so just to Darius, that he declared Xerxes heir apparent to the crown. Our author Xerxes is of opinion, that Xerxes was named to the succession, not so much by the strength of this plea, as by the influence his mother Atossa had over the inclinations of Darius, who, in this matter, was intirely governed by her authority ² (Z).

THE succession being thus settled, and all things ready both for the Egyptian and Grecian expedition, Darius died, in the second year of the revolt of Egypt, after having reigned thirty-six years ². This prince was endowed with many excellent qualities: his wisdom, clemency, and justice, are greatly commended by the antients. He had the honour to have his name recorded in holy writ ^b, as a favourer of God's people, a restorer of the temple, and a promoter of the true worship at Jerusalem (A). His kindness towards the Israelites was rewarded

² HEROD. I. vii. c. 2, & 3. ^a Idem ib. c. 4: JUSTIN. I. ii. c. 10. PLUTARCH. in Artaxerx. & apophthegm. ^b Ezra iv. & pass. Haggai & Zechar. pass.

(Z) Justin and Plutarch (33) place this dispute after the decease of Darius, and both take notice of the prudent conduct of the two brothers on so nice an occasion. Artabazanes, according to them, was absent when the king died; and Xerxes immediately took all the ensigns of royalty, exercising all the functions of the regal dignity; but, upon his brother's returning home, he quitted the diadem and tiara, went out to meet him, and shewed him all imaginable civility. They agreed to make their uncle Artabanus the arbitrator of their difference, and to acquiesce, without any further appeal, to his decision. During the whole time this dispute lasted, all the demonstrations of an intire and fraternal affection passed between the two competitors: and when it was decided, as the one did not insult, so the other did not repine or express any dissatisfaction at the sentence; but, immediately prostrating himself before him, acknowledged him for his master, and placed him upon the throne with his own hand. He continued all his life firmly attached to his interest, and at last died in his service at the battle of Salamis.

(A) The Jews (34) have a tradition, that the prophets Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, died in the last year of Darius; and that, on their death, the spirit of prophecy ceased among the Jews; which was the sealing up of vision and prophecy, spoken of by Daniel (35): And, misled by the same tradition, they tell us, that the kingdom of Persia ended the same year; for they warded with a numerous issue, a long reign, and great prosperity; for, though the Scythian and Greek expeditions proved unsuccessful, yet he was very fortunate in all his other undertakings, having not only restored, and intirely settled, the empire of Cyrus, which had been very much shaken by the unpolitic government of Cambyfes, and usurpation of Smerdis, but also added many great and rich provinces to that prince's conquests, namely India, Thrace, Macedonia, and the isles of the Ionian sea.

(33) Justin. I. ii. c. 10. Plutarch. de frat. amor. p. 448. (34) Abr. Zacut. in Juchasin. Dav. Ganz. in Zemach. David. Seder Olam Zuta, &c. (35) Dan. x. 24.

Xerxes succeeds Darius.

Year of
the flood 1863.
Bef. Chr.
485.

Reduces
Egypt.

Declares his design of invade-ing Greece

XERXES, succeeding his father, employed the first year of his reign in carrying on the preparations for the reduction of Egypt, which his father had begun. He confirmed, upon his first accession to the crown, all the privileges granted by his father to the Jews, and particularly that, which assigned them the tribute of Samaria, for furnishing them victims to be offered in the temple ^b.

IN the second year of his reign, he marched against the Egyptians; and, having reduced the rebels, and brought the country to a worse condition of slavery than what they had felt under his predecessors, he appointed his brother Achamenes governor of that province, and returned to Susa ^c. Puffed up with this success against the Egyptians, he determined to invade Greece; but, before he engaged in an enterprize of that importance, he thought fit to assemble his council, and take the advice of the most illustrious persons of his court. When they were assembled, he laid before them the design he had of invading Greece, and acquainted them with the motives that prompted him to that expedition (B). Mardonius, the same person

^b JOSEPH. antiquitat. l. xi. c. 5.

^c See vol. ii. p. 99.

confound this Darius with the other, who was conquered by Alexander; and will have the Persian empire to have lasted only fifty-two years, which they reckon thus: Darius the Mede reigned one year, Cyrus three, Cambyfes, according to them, the Abasuerus who married Esther, thirty-two years. This last Darius they take to be the same with Artaxerxes, who sent Ezra and Nehemiah to Jerusalem, to restore the Jews to their antient state; for they tell us that Artaxerxes was a name common to the Persian kings, as that of Pharaoh was to those of Egypt. This shews how little they were acquainted with the Persian history; and their countryman, Josephus, seems to have been as much in the dark, with respect to Persia, as they were.

(B) These were, the desire of following the footsteps of his predecessors, who had distinguished their names and reigns by noble enterprizes; the obligation he was under to be revenged on the Athenians, who, without any provocation, had fallen upon Sardis, and burnt down the sacred groves and temples;

person who had been so unsuccessful in the reign of Darius, hoping, that the command of the army would be bestowed upon him, not only approved of the king's determination, but extolled him above all the kings that had preceded him, and endeavoured to set forth the indispensable necessity they all lay under of revenging the dishonour done to the Persian name at Sardis and Marathon. The rest of the council, perceiving, that the flattering discourse of Mardonius pleased the king, durst not venture to contradict it; but all kept silence for some time. At last Artabanus, the king's uncle, a prince venerable both for his age and prudence, addressing Xerxes, used all his endeavours to divert him from his present resolution; and, at the same time, reproached Mardonius with want of sincerity, and shewed how much he was to blame for desiring rashly to engage the nation in a war, which nothing but his own ambitious and self-interested views could tempt him to advise. He concluded with these words: "If a war be resolved upon, let the king remain in Persia, and our children be deposited in his hands: then go on with your expedition, attended by the best forces you can chuse, and in what numbers you think fit. If the issue be favourable, I am willing to forfeit my own life, and the lives of my children; but, on the contrary, if the event be such as I have foretold, then let your children suffer death, and you also, if ever you return." Artabanus expressed his sentiments in very respectful and inoffensive terms; but nevertheless Xerxes was extremely chagrined, and replied with indignation, that, if Artabanus were not his uncle, he should suffer that moment the due punishment for such an audacious behaviour; and commanded him to stay at home among the women, whom he too much resembled, while he marched, at the head of his troops, where his duty and glory called him. However, when the first emotion of his anger was past, he owned that he had been to blame for treating his uncle with such harsh language; and was not ashamed to repair his fault, ple; the eager desire he had to wipe off the dishonour his country had received at Marathon; and lastly, the prospect of many great advantages that would accrue to him from this war, which would be attended by the conquest of Europe, the most rich and fertile country in the universe. He added, that this war had been resolved on by his father Darius, and that he meant only to execute his designs. He concluded his speech, with promising ample rewards to such as should distinguish themselves in this expedition, and desiring them to deliver their opinions in this matter with freedom (36).

(36) Herodot. l. vii. c. 5, 6.

by openly confessing, that the heat of his youth, and want of experience, had made him trespass against the regard that was due to a prince so worthy of respect as Artabanus ^c. At the same time, he declared, that he was ready to follow his advice, and lay aside the design of invading Greece, notwithstanding a phantom had appeared to him the night before in his sleep, and warmly exhorted him to undertake the war. All the Persians, who composed the council, were overjoyed to hear the king speak in that manner; and, prostrating themselves before him, strove to outdo each other in extolling the prudence of his conduct. But he did not long continue in that mind; nay, Artabanus himself, the only man who had openly disapproved the expedition, whether frightened by a dream (C),

^c HERODOT. l. vii. c. 8—12.

(C) Herodotus tells us, that Xerxes, reflecting in the night-time on the opinion of Artabanus, was very much perplexed, and concluded at last, that a war with Greece could not turn to his advantage. Having thus altered his resolution, he fell asleep, and saw in a dream a man of an uncommon stature and beauty standing by him, and uttering these words: "Have you then changed your design of leading an army into Greece, after having ordered the Persians to assemble their forces? You have not done well to alter your resolution, nor will you find any man of your opinion: resume, therefore, without delay, the enterprize you determined to undertake." The phantom, having pronounced these words, disappeared; and the next morning, Xerxes, neglecting his dream, summoned the council, and acquainted them, that he had altered his mind with regard to the Grecian expedition, and wished them joy of the advantages of peace, which they were to reap at home. But the night following, the same phantom appeared again to Xerxes, telling him, that if he did not undertake, without delay, a war against Greece, he should become little and contemptible in as short a time as he had been raised to greatness and power. The king, terrified with this second dream, sent for Artabanus, acquainted him with what had happened, and intreated him to put on the royal robes, to sit on the throne, and pass the night in his bed. Artabanus at first begged to be excused, as not deserving the honour of sitting in the king's throne; but, being pressed by Xerxes, who was persuaded, that if the dream was from the gods, Artabanus would see the same vision, he at last complied with his desire, and cloathed himself with the royal robes. As he slept in the king's bed, the same phantom appeared to him, threatening him with the greatest calamities, if he continued to oppose the king's intentions. This so terrified Artabanus, that he came over to the king's first opinion, believing or dreading the king's displeasure, became a most sanguine and zealous promoter of the war ^d.

Becomes a zealous

XERXES, being now resolved to attack Greece, that he might omit nothing which could contribute to the success of his undertaking, entered into an alliance with the Carthaginians, who were, at that time, the most powerful people of the west; whereby it was agreed, that, while the Persians invaded Greece, the Carthaginians should fall upon the Greek colonies in Sicily and Italy, that thereby they might be diverted from helping each other. The Carthaginians appointed Hamilcar their general, who not only raised what forces he could in Africa, but, with the money sent him by Xerxes, hired a great many mercenaries in Spain, Gaul, and Italy; so that his army consisted of three hundred thousand men, besides a proportionable number of ships for transporting his forces, and the necessary provisions ^e. And thus Xerxes, agreeable to the prophecy of Daniel ^f, having, by his strength through his riches, stirred up all the nations of the then known world against the realm of Greece, that is, all the west under the command of Hamilcar, and all the east under his own banners, set out from Susa, to enter upon this war, in the fifth year of his reign, after having spent three years in making vast preparations throughout all the provinces of his wide-spreading empire. From Susa he marched to Sardis, which was the place appointed for the general rendezvous of all his land-forces, while his navy advanced along the coasts of Asia Minor towards the Hellespont.

promoter of it.

The Carthaginians ally with Xerxes.

Two things Xerxes commanded to be done before he came to the sea-side; the one was a passage to be cut through mountain Athos. This mountain reaches a great way into the sea, in the form of a peninsula, and is joined to the land by an isthmus twelve furlongs over. The sea, in this place, is very tempestuous, and the Persian fleet had formerly suffered shipwreck in doubling this promontory. To prevent the like disaster, Xerxes caused a passage to be cut through the mountain, broad enough to let two galleys, with three banks of oars each, pass in front. By this means he severed from the continent the cities of Dion, Olophyxus, Acrothoon, Thyfus, and Cleone. Our author observes, that Xerxes undertook this enterprize only out of ostentation, and to perpetuate the memory of his name,

The mountain Athos cut through.

^d HEROD. l. vii. c. 17, 18, & seqq. ^e DIOD. SIC. l. xi. p. 1.

^f DAN. xi. 2.

ing that there was something divine in these repeated visions; and the war against Greece was resolved on (37).

(37) Herodot. l. vii. c. 17, 18.

since he might, with far less trouble, have caused his fleet to be conveyed over the isthmus, as was the practice in those days † (D).

A bridge built over the Hellespont. HE likewise commanded a bridge of boats to be laid over the Hellespont, for the passing of his forces from Asia into Eur-ope. The sea which separates Sestos and Abydus, where the pont,

† HEROD. l. vii. c. 22—24.

(D) This prince, believing that the very elements were under his command, wrote to mount Athos in the following terms: “Athos, “thou proud and aspiring mountain, that liftest up thy head to “the very skies, I advise thee not “to be so audacious as to put “rocks and stones, that cannot “be cut, in the way of my “workmen. If thou makest “that opposition, I will cut “thee intirely down, and throw “thee headlong into the sea “(38).” Our modern travellers tell us, that they can perceive no traces of this great work, and most of them are of Juvenal’s opinion, expressed in these words; Perforatus Athos, & quicquid Græcia mendax Audet in historia. The directors of this enterprize were Bubaris, the son of Megabyzus, and Artacheus the son of Arbæus, both Persians. It was carried on in the following manner: All the forces on board the fleet were employed in the undertaking; they first drew a line before the city of Sana, situated at the foot of mount Athos towards the land, and then divided the ground among themselves, each nation having their portion allotted them. When the trench was considerably sunk, those who were at the bottom, continued to dig, delivering the earth to their companions standing on ladders, who handed it to such as stood higher, till it was conveyed to those that waited to receive it at the edge of the canal, and by them carried to another place. Our author observes (39), that by digging perpendicularly, and making the bottom of equal breadth with the top, all the workmen, except the Phœnicians, had double the labour, by reason the earth fell down continually in great quantities from the upper parts. But the Phœnicians opened the ground, which was assigned to them, twice as large as others had done, and sloped the ground gradually, till they came to the bottom. In a large meadow adjoining to this place, there was a court of justice, and a market furnished with corn and other necessaries brought from Asia. This work does not seem to us so very surprising and incredible, as some would make it, when we consider the number of hands, and the time, that were employed in perfecting it; for Herodotus tells us, that three whole years were spent in the undertaking, and an infinite number of workmen obliged to labour day and night in their turns. Besides, the canal was not cut through, as Juvenal seems to insinuate, but behind mount Athos, where the isthmus was a mile and an half over, and broad enough only to let two galleys pass in front.

(38) Plutarch. de ira cobib. p. 455.

(39) Idem ibid. c. 34.

bridge was built, is seven furlongs over. The work was carried on with great expedition by the Phœnicians and Egyptians, who had no sooner finished it, but a violent storm arising, and prebroke it in pieces, and dispersed or dashed against the shore the vessels of which it was composed: which when Xerxes heard, he fell into such a violent transport of anger, that he commanded three hundred stripes to be inflicted on the sea, and a pair of fetters to be thrown into it, injoining those who were trusted with the execution of his orders, to pronounce these words: Thou salt and bitter element, thy master has condemned thee to this punishment, for offending him without cause; and is resolved to pass over thee, in spite of thy billows, and insolent resistance. The extravagant folly and madness of this prince did not stop here; he commanded the heads of those who had the direction of the work, to be struck off.

In their room he appointed more experienced architects to build two other bridges, one for the army, the other for the beasts of burden, and the baggage. When the whole work was completed, and the vessels which formed the bridges secure against the violence of the winds, and the current of the water, Xerxes departed from Sardis, where the army had wintered, and directed his march to Abydus. When he arrived at that city, he desired to see all his forces together; and, to that end, ascending a stately edifice of white stone, which the Abydenians had built, on purpose to receive him in a manner suitable to his greatness, he had a free prospect to the coast, seeing at one view both his fleet and land-forces. The sea was covered with his ships, and the large plains of Abydus with his troops, quite down to the shore. While he was surveying the vast extent of his power, and deeming himself the most happy of mortals, his joy being all on a sudden turned into grief, he burst out into a flood of tears; which Artabanus perceiving, asked him, what had made him, in a few moments, pass from an excess of joy to so great a grief. The king replied, that, considering the shortness of human life, he could not restrain his tears; for, of all these numbers of men, not one, said he, will be alive an hundred years hence. Artabanus, who neglected no opportunity of instilling into the young prince's mind sentiments of kindness towards his people, finding him touched with a sense of tenderness and humanity, endeavoured to make him sensible of the obligation that is incumbent upon princes, to alleviate the sorrows, and sweeten the bitterness, which the lives of their subjects are liable to, since it is not in their power to prolong them. In the same conversation, Xerxes asked his uncle, whether, if he had not seen the vision which made

§ HEROD. l. vii. c. 34-36.

Q 4

made him change his mind, he would still persist in the same opinion, and dissuade him from making war upon Greece. Artabanus sincerely owned, that he still had his fears, and was very uneasy concerning two things, the sea and the land; the sea, because there were no ports capable of receiving and sheltering such a fleet, if a storm should arise; the land, because no country could maintain so numerous an army. The king was very sensible of the strength of his reasoning; but as it was now too late to go back, he made answer, That, in great enterprizes, men ought not to enter into so nice a discussion of all the inconveniencies that may attend them: that bold and daring undertakings, though subject to many evils and dangers, are preferable to inaction, however safe: that great successes are no otherwise to be obtained than by venturing boldly; and that, if his predecessors had observed such scrupulous and timorous rules of politics, the Persian empire would never have attained to so high a degree of glory and grandeur ^h.

Marches over the Hellespont.

Year of
the flood 1868.
Bef. Chr.
480.

ALL things being now in readiness, and a day appointed for the passing over of the army, as soon as the first rays of the sun began to appear, all sorts of perfumes were burnt upon the bridge, and the way strewed with myrtle. At the same time, Xerxes, pouring a libation into the sea out of a golden cup, and addressing the sun, implored the assistance of that deity, begging that he might meet with no impediment so great as to hinder him from carrying his conquering arms to the utmost limits of Europe. This done, he threw the cup into the Hellepont, with a golden bowl, and a Persian scymitar; and the foot and horse began to pass over that bridge, which was next to the Euxine, while the carriages and beasts of burden passed over the other, which was placed nearer the Ægean sea. The bridges were boarded, and covered over with earth, having rails on each side, that the horses and cattle might not be frightened at the sight of the sea. The army spent seven days and seven nights in passing over, though they marched day and night, without intermission, and were, by frequent blows, obliged to quicken their pace. At the same time, the fleet made to the coasts of Europe. After the whole army was passed, Xerxes advanced with his land-forces, through the Thracian Chersonesus to Doriscus, a city at the mouth of the river Hebrus, in Thrace: but the fleet steered a quite different course, standing to the westward for the promontory of Sarpedon, where they were commanded to attend farther orders. Xerxes, having encamped in the large plains of Doriscus, and judging them convenient for reviewing and numbering his troops, dispatched orders to his admirals to bring the fleet to the adjacent shore, that he might take an account both of his sea and land-forces. His land-army, upon the muster, was found to consist of one million and seven hundred thousand foot, and fourscore thousand horse; which, together with twenty thousand men that conducted the camels, and took care of the baggage, amounted to one million eight hundred thousand men. His fleet consisted of twelve hundred and seven large ships, and three thousand gallies and transports: on board all these vessels, there were found to be five hundred seventeen thousand six hundred and ten men ⁱ. So that the whole number of sea and land-forces, which Xerxes led out of Asia to invade Greece, amounted to two millions three hundred and seventeen thousand six hundred and ten men. Our author tells us, that, on his passing the Hellepont, to enter Europe, an inhabitant of that country cried out: O Jupiter, why art thou come to destroy Greece, in the shape of a Persian, and under the name of Xerxes, with all mankind following thee; whereas thy own power is sufficient to do this, without their assistance? After he had entered Europe, the nations on this side the Hellepont that submitted to him, added to his land-forces three hundred thousand more, and two hundred and twenty ships to his fleet, on board of which were twenty-four thousand men. So that the whole number of his forces, when he arrived at Thermopylae, was two millions six hundred and forty-one thousand six hundred and ten men, without including servants, eunuchs, women, sutlers, and other people of that sort, who were computed to equal the number of the forces: so that the whole multitude of persons that followed Xerxes in this expedition, amounted to five millions two hundred eighty-three thousand two hundred and twenty ^k (E).

^h HEROD. l. vii. c. 45—48.

Among

ⁱ HEROD. l. vii. c. 60, 72, 87.

^k Idem, ubi supra.

(E) This is the computation of Herodotus, and with him agree Plutarch (40) and Isocrates (41); but Diodorus Siculus (42), Pliny (43), Ælian (44), and others, fall short of this number, making the army which Xerxes led against Greece, not much more numerous than that with which his father invaded Scythia. These probably mistook the one for the other. Herodotus is the most antient author that has written of this war, and lived in the very age wherein it happened: wherefore we have preferred his account to that of others, the rather because we find it to be the general opinion of all the antients, whether Greeks or Latins, that this was the greatest army that ever was brought into

(40) Plutarch. in Themist.

(41) Isocr. in Panathenaico.

(42) Dio-

dor. Sicul. l. xi.

(43) Plin. l. xxxiii. c. 10.

(44) Ælian. var. b. l.

l. xiii. c. 3.

His generals.

Among these millions of men, there was not one that could vie with Xerxes, either in comeliness or stature, or that seemed more worthy of that great empire &. But this is a poor commendation, when it is not accompanied with other qualifications. Accordingly, Justin, after he has mentioned the number of his troops, emphatically concludes, But this vast body wanted a head. Besides the subordinate generals of each nation, who commanded the troops of their respective countries, the whole army was under the command of six Persian generals; viz. Mardonius, the son of Gobryas; Triatacæchmes, the son of Artabanus; Smerdones, the son of Otanes (the two latter were cousins to Xerxes); Masistes, the son of Darius by Atossa; Gergys, the son of Ariazus; and Megabyzus, the son of the celebrated Zopyrus. The ten thousand Persians, who were called the Immortal band, obeyed no other commander but Hydarnes. The fleet was commanded by four Persian admirals: and likewise the cavalry had their particular generals and commanders.

XERXES, having thus numbered his sea and land-forces at Doricus, marched from thence through Thrace, Macedon, and Theffaly, towards Attica, ordering his fleet to follow him along the coast, and to regulate their motions according to the motions of the army. Where-ever he came, he found the field; and the account of Herodotus best agrees with the verses engraved on the monument of those Greeks that were slain at Thermopylæ, where it is said, that they fought against three millions, as we read the inscription in Herodotus; or against two, as we find in Diodorus Siculus (45). Josephus (46) tells us, that his countrymen too bore a part in this expedition, and proves it from a passage out of Chærilus (47), where it is said, that Xerxes was attended by a people who used the Phœnician language, and dwell in the Solymæan land on hills near a great lake. As Jerusalem was also called Solyma, and all the country thereabouts was mountainous, and lay near the great lake Asphaltites, commonly called the lake of Sodom, this description seems plainly to suit the Jews. But Scaliger (48), Cunæus (49), and Bochart (50), understand those verses of Solymi in Pisidia. However, Salmasius (51) maintains the contrary opinion; and truly it is not at all likely, that when Xerxes obliged all the other nations to send their quotas of men, the Jews alone should be exempted. Whether, therefore, those mentioned by Chærilus were Jews or not, it must be allowed, that they also bore part in this expedition.

& HEROD. l. vii. c. 187.

(45) Herodot. l. vii. c. 222. Diodor. Sic. l. xi. p. 26. (46) Joseph. contra Apion. l. i. (47) Chæril. apud eundem. (48) Scaliger in notis ad fragm.
 (49) Cunæus de rep. H. br. l. ii. c. 18. (50) Bochart. geogr. sacra, part ii.
 l. i. c. 2. (51) Salmas. in linguæ Hellenisticæ affilegio.

provisions prepared before hand, pursuant to the orders he had sent : and each city was obliged to entertain him ; which cost immense sums, and gave occasion to the saying of a citizen of Abdera, after the king's departure, that his countrymen might thank the gods for Xerxes's moderation, in being satisfied with one meal a day ^h.

IN the mean time, Lacedæmon and Athens, the two most Athenians powerful cities of Greece, against which Xerxes was most ex- and Spar- asperated, having had intelligence of the enemy's preparations tans pre- and motions, sent ambassadors to Argos, into Sicily, to the pare a- islands of Corcyra and Crete, to desire succours, and conclude gainst him. a league against the common enemy. The people of Argos offered a very considerable number of troops, on condition they should have an equal share with the Lacedæmonians in the command. The latter consented, that the king of Argos should have the same authority as either of the kings of Sparta: but this offer did not satisfy the Argians, who thereupon ordered the ambassadors to depart the territories of Argos before sunset. From Argos they proceeded to Sicily, where Gelo, the most powerful prince in all the Greek colonies, offered to assist them with a very numerous army, and a mighty fleet, provided they appointed him commander in chief of all their forces, both by sea and land. This proposal was rejected by the Athenian ambassadors, who told him, that they did not want a general, but an army ; and, without pressing him any further, departed. The inhabitants of Corcyra, now Corfu, immediately put to sea with a fleet of sixty ships, but advanced no farther than the coasts of Laconia, where they waited the issue of an engagement, designing to side afterwards with the conqueror. The people of Crete, having consulted the oracle, to know what resolution they should take on this occasion, absolutely refused to enter into the league. Thus were the Lacedæmo- Forfaken nians and Athenians abandoned by all their countrymen, by all the except the Thespians and Platæans, who sent small bodies to other their assistance. The first thing they took care of, in so criti- Greeks. cal a conjuncture, was to put an end to all intestine divisions and discords ; and accordingly, a peace was concluded between the Athenians and the people of Egina, who were actually at war. In the next place, they appointed a general, the Athenians choosing Themistocles, and the Spartans conferring the supreme command of their forces upon Leonidas, one of their kings. The only thing that now remained, was to determine in what place they should meet the Persians, in order to dispute their entrance into Greece. After various proposals and disputes, it was resolved, that they should send a body of

^h HEROD. l. vii. c. 120.

Thermopylæ defended by Leonidas.

Year of
the flood 1868.

Bef. Chr.
480.

four thousand men to Thermopylæ, which is a narrow pass, being but twenty-five feet broad, between the mountains that divide Theffaly from Greece, and the only way through which the Persians could enter Achaia, and advance by land to Athens. The command of this small body was given to Leonidas, a prince of extraordinary courage, who accordingly marched with all possible expedition to his post, determined either to stop the innumerable army of Xerxes with that handful of men, or die in the attempt. Such was also the resolution of the three hundred Spartans who attended him, and had been all chosen by himselfⁱ.

In the mean time Xerxes, advancing near the streights, was strangely surpris'd to find, that the Greeks were resolv'd to dispute his passage; for he had always flattered himself, that, on his approach, they would betake themselves to flight, and not attempt to oppose his innumerable forces with so small a body, their whole army consisting of but eleven thousand two hundred men, and of these scarce four thousand being employ'd to defend the pass. He sent out a scout on horseback to view their numbers, and discover how they were encamp'd. The scout brought back word, that the Lacedæmonians were some performing their military exercises, and others putting their hair in order; for their custom was, as Damaratus (F), who was then in the Persian camp, inform'd the king, to comb and put in order their hair, when they were to expose their lives to the greatest dangers. However, Xerxes, entertaining still some hopes of their flight, wait'd four days, without undertaking any thing, on purpose to give them time to retreat. During this time, he us'd his utmost endeavours to gain and corrupt Leonidas, promising to make him master of all Greece,

ⁱ HEROD. l. vii. c. 148—163.

(F) Damaratus was one of the two kings of Sparta, who, being banish'd by the adverse party, had sought refuge at the Persian court, where he was entertain'd with the greatest marks of honour and distinction. As the courtiers were one day expressing their surprize, that a king should suffer himself to be banish'd, Damaratus told them, that at Sparta the laws were more powerful than the king.

This prince was in great esteem at the Persian court; but neither the injustice of the Spartan citizens, nor the kind treatment of the Persian king, could make him forget his country. He no sooner knew that Xerxes design'd to invade Greece, but he secretly acquainted the Greeks with his resolution; and on all occasions spok'd his sentiments to the king with a noble freedom and dignity (52).

(52) Plutarch. in apoph. Lacon. p. 220.

if he would come over to his party. His offers being rejected by that public-spirited prince with contempt and indignation, the king ordered him, by an herald, to deliver up his arms. Leonidas, in a stile, and with a spirit, truly laconical, answered His noble in a few words; Come thyself, and take them ^{k.} Xerxes, at answer to this reply, transported with rage, commanded the Medes and Xerxes. Cissians to march against them, take them all alive, and bring them in fetters to him. The Medes, not able to stand the shock of the brave Greeks, soon betook themselves to flight, and shewed, as our author observes, that Xerxes had many men, but few soldiers. In their room, Hydarnes was ordered to advance with that body which was called Immortal, and consisted of ten thousand chosen men; but, when they came The Per- to close with the Greeks, they succeeded no better than the sians re- Medes and Cissians, being obliged to retire with great slaugh- pulsed at ter. The next day, the Persians, reflecting on the small num- Thermo- ber of their enemies, and supposing so many of them to be pylæ. wounded, that they could not possibly maintain a second fight, resolved to make another attempt; but could not, by any efforts, make the Greeks give way: on the contrary, they were themselves put to a shameful flight. The valour of the Greeks exerted itself, on this occasion, in such an extraordinary manner, that Xerxes is said to have three times leaped out of his throne, apprehending the intire destruction of his army ^{l.}

XERXES, having lost all hopes of forcing his way through troops, that were determined to conquer or die, was extremely perplexed and doubtful what measures he should take in this posture of affairs; when one Epiates, the son of Eurydemus, Epiates in expectation of a great reward, came to him, and discovered rescues a secret passage to the top of the hill, which overlooked and Xerxes out- commanded the Spartan forces. The king immediately ordered of his dan- Hydarnes thither, with his select body of ten thousand Per- gersous situ- sians; who, marching all night, arrived at break of day, and ation. possessed themselves of that advantageous post. The Phocæans, who defended this pass, being overpowered by the enemy's numbers, retired with precipitation to the very top of the mountain, prepared to die gallantly. But Hydarnes, neglecting to pursue them, marched down the mountain with all possible expedition, in order to attack those, who defended the streights in the rear. Leonidas, being now apprised, that it was impossible to bear up against the enemy, obliged the rest of his allies to retire; but staid himself, with the Thespians, Thebans, and three hundred Lacedæmonians, all resolved to die

^k PLUTARCH. in LACON. apoph. p. 225. ^l HEROD. l. vii.

c. 211, 212. DIOD. SICUL. p. 6. CTESIAS in Persicis, c. 23.

with their leader; who, being told by the oracle, that either Sparta should be destroyed, or the king lose his life, determined, without the least hesitation, to sacrifice himself for his country. The Thebans indeed remained against their inclination, being detained by Leonidas as hostages; for they were suspected to favour the Persians. The Thespians, with their leader Demophilus, could not, by any means, be prevailed upon to abandon Leonidas and the Spartans. The augur Megistias, who had foretold the event of this enterprize, being pressed by Leonidas to retire, sent home his only son; but remained himself, and died by Leonidas. Those who staid did not feed themselves with any hopes of conquering, or escaping, but looked upon Thermopylæ as their graves; and when Leonidas, exhorting them to take some nourishment, said, that they should all sup together with Pluto, with one accord they set up a shout of joy, as if they had been invited to a banquet^m.

Leonidas's valour,

and death.

The Lacedæmonians defend his body with singular valour.

XERXES, after pouring out a libation at the rising of the sun, began to move, with the whole body of his army, as he had been advised by Epiates. Upon their approach, Leonidas advanced to the broadest part of the passage, and fell upon the enemy with such undaunted courage and resolution, that the Persian officers were obliged to stand behind the divisions they commanded, in order to prevent the flight of their men, who, not being able to stand so violent a shock, would, without that precaution, have immediately turned their backs. Great numbers of the enemy, falling into the sea, were drowned; others were trampled under foot by their own men, and a great many killed by the Greeks; who, knowing they could not avoid death upon the arrival of those who were advancing to fall upon their rear, exerted their utmost efforts. In this action fell the brave Leonidas; which Abrocomes and Hyperanthus, two of the brothers of Xerxes, observing, advanced, with great resolution, to seize his body, and carry it in triumph to Xerxes. But the Lacedæmonians, more eager to defend it than their own lives, repulsed the enemy four times, killed both the brothers of Xerxes with many other commanders of distinction, and rescued the body of their beloved general out of the enemy's hands. But in the mean time, the army that was led by the treacherous Epiates, advancing to attack their rear, they retired to the narrowest place of the passage, and, drawing all together, except the Thebans, posted themselves on a rising ground. In this place they made head against the Persians, who poured in upon them on all sides, till at length,

^m HERODOT. l. vii. c. 213—225, & seqq. DIODOR. SICUL. p. 7. CTESIUS, ubi supra, c. 24.

not vanquished, but oppressed and overwhelmed by numbers, Over- they all fell, except one who escaped to Sparta, where he powered was treated as a coward and traitor to his country, every and van- one avoiding his company, and giving him the ignominious quished. nick-name of Aristodemus the run-away (G); but not long after he made a glorious reparation of his fault in the battle of Platæa, where he distinguished himself in an extraordinary manner. Those who signalized themselves most among the Lacedæmonians, were Alpheus and Maron, both sons of Oristphantus; among the Thebians, Dithyrambus, but, above all, Leonidas and Dieneces. Dieneces was a Spartan, and distinguished himself on this occasion above all his country-signal men, the king excepted. When a Trachinian told him before bravery. the battle, that the army of the barbarians was so numerous, that, with one flight of their arrows, they would hide the sun, he answered, without betraying the least fear, that he was

(G) Some say, as our author informs us (53), that Eurytus and Aristodemus, both Spartans, being obliged by a violent distemper in their eyes to retire to Alpeni, were there some time in suspense whether they should return to Sparta, or to Thermopylæ, and there die with the rest of their countrymen. At last Eurytus, hearing that the Persians had gained the top of the mountain, called for his armour, and ordered his servant to lead him into the field of battle (for he had almost quite lost his sight) where he was killed. But Aristodemus, wanting courage, staid at Alpeni, and after the battle returned safe to Sparta. Others say, that both Eurytus and Aristodemus had been dispatched somewhere with orders from the army; and that the latter might have been back before the fight, but delayed on purpose to avoid the danger; whereas his companion arrived in due time, and died in the field. It is also said, that another of the three hundred Spartans, by name Pantites, survived this action, and returned to Sparta; but, not being able to bear the reproaches of the Spartans, he laid violent hands on himself. As for the Thebans, and their general Leontides, they were obliged for some time to fight against the Persians in conjunction with the other Greeks. But they no sooner saw the Persians descending the hill to attack them in the rear, but they abandoned the rest of their allies, and, approaching the Persians with their arms stretched out, told them, that they had been the first among the Greeks to present them with earth and water, and that they were come to Thermopylæ against their will, and no ways guilty of the loss they had sustained. Thus the Thebans saved their lives, though the enemies killed many of them as they advanced to surrender themselves. Many others were, by command of Xerxes, branded with the royal mark as slaves, and among these was Leontides their general (54).

(53) Herodot. l. vii. c. 229--231.(54) Idem, ubi supra, c. 233.

Xerxes's
indignity to the body of Leonidas.

glad to hear it, because he liked to fight in the shade. Xerxes, enraged at Leonidas to the last degree for daring to oppose him, caused his head to be struck off, and his body to be put up upon a cross; which barbarous treatment redounded more to his own ignominy, than to the dishonour of that great heroⁿ. Some time after, a magnificent monument was erected at Thermopylae, in honour of those brave defenders of Greece, with two inscriptions; the one general, and relating to all those who died on this occasion, importing, that the Greeks of Peloponnesus, to the number only of four thousand, made head against the Persian army, consisting of three millions: the other related to the Spartans in particular, and was composed by the poet Simonides, to this purport: Go, passenger, and acquaint the Spartans, that we died here in obedience to their just commands. At those tombs a funeral oration was yearly pronounced in honour of the dead heroes, and public games performed with great solemnity, wherein none but the Lacedaemonians and Thespians had any share, to shew, that they alone were concerned in the glorious defence of Thermopylae ° (H).

XERXES, on this occasion, lost twenty thousand men; and, being sensible that so great a loss was capable of alarming and discouraging his friends, he caused all those that were killed, except a thousand, whose bodies he left in the field, to be privately buried; and then proceeded in his march through Bœotia to Attica, where he arrived four months after he had passed the Hellespont.

The famed sea-fight of Artemisium.

THE very same day, on which happened the glorious action at Thermopylae, the two fleets engaged at Artemisium, a promontory of Eubœa. That of the Greeks consisted of two hundred and seventy-one sail; but the Persian fleet was far more numerous, though they had lost, a few days before, in a violent storm, which continued four days, above four hundred ships. Notwithstanding this loss, they sent two hundred ships, with orders to sail round the island of Eubœa, and encompass the Grecian fleet, that none of their ships might escape. The Greeks, having intelligence of this design, set sail in the night-time, in order to attack them by day-break. But, hav-

° HEROD. l. vii. c. 238.

• Idem ibid. & seqq.

(H) There was, besides these inscriptions, a third relating to the augur Megistias, expressed in these words: "Under this stone lies divine Megistias, slain by

" the Medes; with an undaunted
" heart he saw his fate approach" ing, and refused to live when
" the Spartans had resolved to " die (55)."

ing missed this Squadron, they advanced to Apheta, where the whole Persian fleet lay; and, after several encounters, in which the Athenians gained considerable advantages, they came to a general engagement, which was very obstinate, and the success pretty equal: however, the Greeks found it necessary, their ships having suffered a great deal, to retire to some safer place, to refit; and accordingly, steered their course to the straits of Salamis, a small island very near, and over-against Attica. Though the engagement at Artemisium did not bring matters to an absolute decision, yet it contributed greatly to encourage the Athenians, who were now convinced, that the enemies, notwithstanding their great number, were not invincible ^m.

As Xerxes entered Attica, the Athenians, not being in a Athens condition to make head against so powerful an army, were deserted by prevailed upon by Themistocles to put all the citizens on board its citi- the fleet, to secure their wives and children in Salamis, Ægina, sens. and Træzene, and to abandon the city of Athens, which they were no-ways in a condition to defend. The Persians, arriving in the neighbourhood of Athens, wasted the whole country, putting all to fire and sword. A detachment was sent to plunder the temple of Apollo at Delphos, which was exceeding rich, by reason of the many offerings and donatives sent thither from all the parts of the east. If we may believe what Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus relate of this matter, the Persians no sooner advanced near the temple of Minerva, but a violent storm arising, accompanied with impetuous winds, thunder and lightning, two great rocks rolled down from mount Parnassus, and crushed the greatest part of that detachment ⁿ. The main body of the army arriving at Athens, found it deserted by all its inhabitants, except a small number of citizens, who literally interpreting Apollo's oracle, That Athens should be saved by wooden walls, had fortified that place with boards and palisadoes. They defended themselves with Taken and incredible courage and resolution; and, at last, as they would burnt by hearken to no terms of accommodation whatsoever, were all the Per- cut in pieces. Xerxes burnt the city, and all its temples, down fians. to the ground; and immediately dispatched a messenger to Susa, with the agreeable news of his success to his uncle Artabanus, in whose hands he had left the government, during his absence ^o.

In the mean time, the Grecian fleet being reinforced by a great many ships, which joined them from several parts of Greece, to the number of three hundred sail, Eurybiades, commander in chief of all the naval forces, summoned a council, in order to consult about the measures that seemed most proper in the present state of affairs. In this council, a great debate arose among the commanders; some, and among these Eurybiades, were for retiring to the isthmus of Corinth, that they might be nearer the army which guarded that passage, under the command of Cleombrotus the brother of Leonidas. Others, at the head of whom was Themistocles, who commanded the Athenian fleet, was for remaining at Salamis, the most advantageous place they could choose to engage the numerous fleets of the enemies: for in the streights of Salamis the Persians could not, by reason of the narrowness of the sea, extend their line beyond that of the Greeks; and consequently, would be obliged to fight upon equal terms, without reaping any advantage from their numbers. After many warm disputes, Eurybiades, with all the other commanders, came over to the opinion of Themistocles, fearing that the Athenians, whose ships made up above one half of the fleet, would separate from the allies, if they abandoned that post, as Themistocles in his speech had insinuated. It was therefore unanimously resolved, that, in the streights of Salamis, they should wait for the Persian fleet, and there engage them.^P

^m HEROD. l. viii. c. 1—18. ⁿ Idem ibid. c. 37. ^o Idem ibid. c. 51—53.

The Grecian fleet at Salamis.

Artemisia dissuades the Persians from engaging at sea.

A council of war likewise was held on the side of the Persians, in order to determine whether they should hazard a naval engagement, or not. All the commanders were for engaging, because they knew this advice to be most agreeable to the king's inclinations. Queen Artemisia was the only person that opposed this resolution. She was queen of Halicarnassus, and followed Xerxes in this war with five ships, the best equipped of any in the fleet, except those of the Sidonians. This princess distinguished herself, on all occasions, by her singular courage, and still more by her prudence and conduct; for our author observes, that there was not one who gave Xerxes so good advice as this heroine. She represented, in the council of war we are speaking of, the dangerous consequences of engaging a people that were far more expert in maritime affairs than the Persians, alleging, that the loss of a battle at sea would be attended with the ruin of their army; whereas, by spinning out the war, and advancing into the heart of Greece, they would create jealousies and divisions among their enemies, who would separate from one another, in order to defend each of them their own country: and that the king might, almost without striking a blow, make himself master of Greece.^Q This advice, though very prudent, was not followed, but an engagement unanimously resolved upon. Xerxes, in order to encourage his men with his presence, caused a throne to be erected on the top of an eminence, whence he might safely behold whatever happened, having several scribes about him, to write down the names of such as should signalize themselves against the enemy. The approach of the Persian fleet, with the news, that a strong detachment from the army was marching against Cleombrotus, who defended the isthmus, struck such a terror into the Peloponnesians, that they could not, by any intreaties, be prevailed upon to stay any longer at Salamis. Being therefore determined to put to sea, and sail to the isthmus, Themistocles privately dispatched a trusty friend to the Persian commanders, informing them of the intended flight; and exhorting them to send part of their fleet round the island, in order to prevent their escape. The same messenger assured Xerxes, that Themistocles, who had sent him that advice, designed to join the Persians, as soon as the battle began, with all the Athenian ships. The king, giving credit to all he said, immediately caused a strong squadron to sail round the island, in the night, in order to cut off the enemy's flight. Early next morning, as the Peloponnesians were preparing to set sail, they found themselves encompassed on all sides by the Persian fleet; and were, against their will, obliged to remain in the streights of Salamis, and expose themselves to the same dangers with their allies. The Grecian fleet consisted of three hundred and eighty sail, that of the Persians of two thousand, and upwards. Themistocles avoided the engagement, till a certain wind, which rose regularly every day at the same time, and was intirely contrary to the enemy, began to blow. As soon as he found himself favoured by this wind, he gave the signal for battle. The Persians, knowing that they fought under their king's eye, advanced with great resolution; but the wind blowing directly in their faces, and the largeness and number of their ships embarassing them, in a place so streight and narrow, their courage soon abated: which the Greeks observing, used such efforts, that, in a short time breaking into the Persian fleet, they intirely disordered them, some flying towards Phalerus, where their army lay encamped, others saving themselves in the harbours of the neighbouring islands. The Ionians were the first that betook themselves to flight. But queen Artemisia distinguished herself above all the rest, her ships being the last that fled: which Xerxes observing, cried out, that the men behaved like women, and the women with the courage and intrepidity of men. The Athenians were so incensed against her, that they offered a reward of ten thousand drachmas to any one that should take her alive; but she,

^P HEROD. l. viii. c. 45, 57, 60, 65.

^Q Idem ibid. c. 68.

† HEROD. l. viii. c. 74—76.

* Idem ibid. c. 83—85.

in spite of all their efforts, got clear of the ships that pursued her, and arrived safe on the coast of Asia. In this engagement, which was one of the most memorable actions we find recorded in history, the Grecians lost forty ships, and the Persians two hundred, besides a great many more that were taken, with all the men and ammunition they carried. Many of their allies, dreading the king's cruelty, made the best of their way to their respective countries. Xerxes, being under no small apprehension lest the conquerors should sail to the Hellepont, and there obstruct his return, left Mardonius in Greece, with an army of three hundred thousand men, and marched with the rest towards Thrace, in order to cross the Hellepont. As no provisions had been prepared beforehand, his army underwent great hardships during the whole time of his march, which lasted five-and-forty days. The soldiers were obliged to live upon herbs, and even the bark and leaves of trees; which occasioned innumerable distempers, that swept off the greater part of them. The king, finding that his army was not in a condition to pursue the march so expeditiously as he desired, advanced with a small retinue, leaving the rest behind; but, when he arrived at the Hellepont, he found the bridge broken down by the violence of the storms; and was reduced to the necessity of crossing over in a fishing-boat. From the Hellepont he continued his flight to Sardis, where he took up his quarters for the ensuing year.

*Xerxes's
retreat
and distress*

THE first thing the Athenians took care of after the battle, was to send the first-fruits of their victory to Delphos, where they enriched the temple with the spoils of those who not long before had pillaged it. Their next thought was, to reward those who had signalized themselves above the rest. It was a custom in Greece, that, after an engagement, the commanding officers should declare who, in their opinion, had most distinguished themselves during the conflict, by writing down the names of the person that deserved the first, and of him who deserved the second prize. On this occasion, each captain, being ambitious of that honour, wrote down his own name in the first place, and, in the second, the name of Themistocles; which plainly proved, that he deserved the preference to all. And accordingly, he was distinguished with honours, which, to that time, had never been bestowed upon any other, as we shall have occasion to relate, in the history of Greece.

Themistocles gains the prize of his valour.

ABOUT the same time that the actions of Thermopylae and Salamis happened, the formidable army of the Carthaginians, consisting of three hundred thousand men, was intirely defeated by Gelo king of Syracuse. We shall give a particular account of this victory, in the history of the Carthaginians.

¹ HEROD. I. viii. c. 86—88, & 92. JUSTIN. I. ii. c. 12. HEROD. I. viii. c. 122, 123.

ON Xerxes's departure out of Greece, Mardonius, having passed the winter in Theffaly and Macedonia, marched early in the spring into Bœotia: from thence he sent Alexander king of Macedon, with very advantageous offers to the people of Athens, in order to draw them off from the common alliance. The offers he made were, to rebuild, at the king's charges, their city, and whatever other edifices had been demolished the year before in Attica; to suffer them to live according to their own laws; to reinstate them in all their former possessions; and to add to them whatever other lands they should desire. Alexander, as being their antient friend, exhorted them, in his own name, to lay hold on so favourable an opportunity of settling their affairs, representing that they were not in a condition to stand out against so powerful an enemy. But the Athenians could not, by any means, be prevailed upon to desert the interest of Greece. Whereupon Mardonius marched, Attica with all his army, into Attica, wasting and destroying what-^{wasted by} ever he found in his way. The Athenians, not being in a con-^{Mardo-} dition to withstand such a torrent, retired to Salamis, Ægina,^{nus.} and Troezen; and the second time abandoned their city. Mardonius entered Athens, and demolished whatever had escaped their fury the preceding year ^w. In the mean time, the joint-forces of Greece being drawn together on the isthmus of Corinth, Mardonius thought fit to march back into Bœotia: for that, being an open and level country, was more fit for him to engage in than Attica, which was rough, craggy, full of hills, and narrow passes. On his return into Bœotia, he encamped on the banks of the Asopus. The Greeks followed him thither, under the command of Pausanias king of Sparta, and of Aristides, commander in chief of the Athenians. The Per-^{The} sian army, according to the computation of Herodotus, con-^{strength of} sisted of three hundred and fifty thousand men; according to ^{the Per-} Diodorus, of five hundred thousand men: that of the Grecians ^{Grecian} did not amount to the number of one hundred and ten thou-^{army.} sand. Mardonius, in order to try the courage of the Greeks, sent out his cavalry, in which the main strength of his army consisted, to skirmish with the enemy. The Megarians, who were encamped on a plain, sustained the first onset; but, in spite of all their resolution, were forced to give way, being overwhelmed with the enemies arrows. As they were giving ground, a detachment of three hundred Athenians, with a small number of bowmen, advanced to their relief. Mesistius, general of the Persian horse, and one highly esteemed in Per-

^w HEROD. l. viii. c. 113, 114. & l. ix. c. 3, 13, 14.

Masiftius
defeated
and killed.

Spa, seeing them advance in good order, commanded his cavalry to face about, and attack them. The shock was very violent, both parties endeavouring to shew, by the issue of this encounter, what might be the success of a general engagement. The victory was a long time doubtful, but, at last, Masiftius being killed, the Persians betook themselves to flight. The death of Masiftius was greatly lamented by the Persians, who, to shew their concern for the loss of so brave a commander, cut off their hair, and likewise the manes of their horses, filling the camp with loud cries and lamentations. After this encounter, the two armies continued for the space of ten days only looking at one another. At last, Mardonius, who was of a fiery temper, not being able to bear any farther delays, and his provisions being almost consumed, called a council of war, in order to deliberate whether they should give battle, or retire till such time as they were supplied with fresh provisions. Artabazus, a nobleman of great distinction and experience, was of opinion, that they should not hazard a battle, but retire under the walls of Thebes, where they should be in a condition to lay in stores of provisions and forage. He alleged that, by delaying, they might cast a damp upon the ardour of the enemies; and, in the mean time, by sending rich presents to their leaders, prevail upon them to betray the common liberty, without hazarding a battle. The Thebans were of the same opinion; but that of Mardonius, who was for engaging, prevailed, none of the other commanders daring to contradict him; and the result of their deliberations was, that they should give battle the next day. Alexander king of Macedon, who in his heart favoured the Greeks, came secretly, about midnight, into their camp, and informed Aristides of all that had passed.

Both armies re-solve to engage.

THE Greek generals, upon this notice, ordered their officers to prepare for battle. Before they engaged, Pausanias thought fit to change the order of battle, and place the Albanians, who were in the left wing, on the right, that they might stand opposite to the Medes and Persians, whom they had formerly conquered at Marathon, while he, with his Spartans, engaged the Thebans and other Greeks, who served in the Persian army, and had been often routed by the Spartans. But Mardonius, upon the intelligence he had of this new disposition, made the like change; which obliged the Greeks to return to their former stations; and the Persians likewise ranged their army according to their first disposition. Thus did all that day pass without any action. In the evening, the Greeks held a council of war, in which it was resolved, that they should

¶ Herod. l. ix. c. 22, 24.

¶ Idem ibid. c. 43.

should decamp, and retire to some other place more conveniently situated for water. Night coming on, and the officers endeavouring, at the head of the bodies they commanded, to make what haste they could to the new camp that was marked out for them, great confusion happened, some going one way, and some another, without observing any order in their march. At last they stopped near the little city of Plataea. Mardonius, being informed that the Greeks were retired by night, drew up his army in battle-array, and pursued them with great shouts, as if he were not to fight, but to strip and plunder a flying enemy. He did not fail on this occasion to insult Artabazus, reproaching him with his cowardly prudence, and the false notion he had conceived of the Lacedæmonians, who never fled, as he pretended, before the enemy. Having passed the Asopus, he came up with the Lacedæmonians and Tegeans, who were separated from the body of the army, to the number of fifty-three thousand men. Pausanias, finding himself thus attacked by the whole Persian army, dispatched a messenger to acquaint the Athenians, who had taken another route, with the danger he was in. The Athenians immediately put themselves on their march to succour their distressed allies; but were attacked, and, to their great regret, prevented, by those Greeks, who sided with the Persians. The battle being thus fought in two different places, the Spartans were the first who broke into the very centre of the Persian army, and, after a most obstinate resistance, put them to flight. Mardonius, mounted on a white horse, signalized himself on this occasion, and, at the head of a thousand chosen men, made a great slaughter of the enemy; but, he falling, the whole Persian army was easily routed; which those Greeks, who had engaged the Athenians, hearing, retired with precipitation, leaving the Athenians masters of the field. The Persians fled to their former camp, which they had fortified with an inclosure of wood. The Lacedæmonians pursued them; but were not able to force the intrenchment, not being accustomed to besiege towns, or storm fortified places. The Athenians, hearing that the Persians were thus shut up in their camp, gave over pursuing the Greeks, and hastened to the assistance of the Lacedæmonians, whom they found busied in forcing the enemy's camp with more valour than skill: wherefore they took upon themselves that labour, and soon made a breach in the wall, through which entering, together with the Lacedæmonians, they made such a dreadful slaughter of the enemy, that, of three hundred thousand, scarce three thousand made their escape. Artabazus, who, from Mardonius's imprudent conduct, had but too well foreseen the misfortune that befel them, after having distinguished himself in the engagement, made a timely retreat,

Year of
the flood 1869.
Bef. Chr.
479.

The Persians defeated.

Mardonius killed.

The Persian camp forced by the Athenians.

The immense spoil of it.

with the forty thousand men he commanded; and, being arrived safe at Byzantium, from thence passed over into Asia. During the whole engagement, the Spartans lost but ninety-one men, the Tegeans sixteen, and the Athenians fifty-two. When they came to determine who had behaved with most courage, they all gave judgment in favour of Aristodemus, who was the only one that had saved himself at Thermopylae, and had now wiped off the blemish of his former conduct by a most glorious death. The spoil was immense, consisting in vast sums of money, in gold and silver cups, vessels, tables, bracelets, rich beds, and all sorts of furniture. They gave the tenth of all to Pausanias, who behaved in a very extraordinary manner; and the others were rewarded each according to his merit^s. Thus was Greece delivered not only from the present, but all future invasions of the Persians, who henceforward never appeared on this side the Hellepont.

The Persians defeated before Mycale.

THE same day that this battle was fought at Plataea, the Grecian fleet gained as memorable a victory at Mycale, a promontory in Asia, over the remainder of the Persian navy; for, at the same time that the land-forces of Greece rendezvoused on the isthmus of Corinth, their fleet met at Aegina, under the command of Leotychides the other king of Sparta, and Xantippus the Athenian. Thither ambassadors came to their commanders from the Ionians, inviting them into Asia, to deliver the Greek colonies from the Persian yoke. On this invitation, they immediately set sail for Asia, steering their course by Delos, where they were met by other ambassadors from Samos, who brought them intelligence, that the Persian fleet, which had wintered at Cuma, was then at Samos, where it might easily be destroyed, earnestly intreating them at the same time not to neglect so favourable an opportunity. Hereupon they sailed forthwith to Samos; but the Persian fleet, receiving timely notice of their design, retired to Mycale, where the army lay encamped, consisting of an hundred thousand men, the remainder of those Xerxes had brought back out of Greece the year before. Here they drew their ships ashore, and threw up an intrenchment quite round, which they fortified with palisadoes, being determined to sustain a siege. The Greeks, arriving at Mycale, found all the enemy's ships within the circumvallation, and a numerous army disposed along the coast; but, however, did not meet with the least opposition in landing their men, and drawing them up in battle-array; which when they had done, they attacked the enemy with such vigour, that they obliged them to fly to their intrenchments, and pursued them so close, that they entered the camp at the same time.

^s HEROD. l. ix. c. 31-69.

When the enemy saw their intrenchments forced, all the auxiliaries betook themselves to flight; but the Persians, though reduced to a small number, still continued to dispute the entrance of their camp against the Greeks pouring in on all sides. But, in the mean time, the Lacedæmonians, who had taken a wider compass, arriving with other troops of the allies, the Persians likewise abandoned their post, and saved themselves by flying to the passages of the neighbouring hills. Before the engagement, they had appointed the Milesians to guard the narrow passages of the mountains, that they might have a safe retreat, in case they were put to flight, and sure guides to conduct them through the mountains, the Milesians being well acquainted with the country; but they treacherously brought back, by other ways, to the enemy, such as fled to them, which means a very small number escaped the general slaughter of that day. The two Persian generals, Mardonius and Tigranes, died in the field, with many other commanders of great distinction. The Greeks, having made a prodigious havoc of the enemy both in the action, and in the pursuit, set fire to their ships, burnt the whole camp, and sailed for Samos, loaded with an immense booty, consisting of seventy chests of money, besides many other things of inestimable value. And thus ended all the great designs of Xerxes in a most miserable disappointment, a small number of those millions of men now remaining, with which the year before he marched so proudly over the Hellepont.

THE battle of Platæa was fought in the morning, and that of Mycale in the afternoon of the same day; and yet all the Greek writers pretend, that the victory at Platæa was known at Mycale before the engagement began there, though those two places were parted by the whole Ægean, a sea of several days sail. But Diodorus Siculus clears up this matter, telling us, that Leotychides, observing his troops to be in great pain for their countrymen at Platæa, lest they should be overpowered by the numerous army of Mardonius, in order to raise their spirits and courage, caused a report to be spread in the army, that the Persians were defeated at Platæa, though, at that time, he knew nothing of the matter.

XERXES, upon the news of these two overthrows, left Sardis with the same hurry and precipitation as he had left Athens after the battle of Salamis, making all the haste he could towards Persia, that he might get as far as possible out of the reach of the conquering enemy. But, before he set out, he gave orders, that all the temples of the Greek cities in Asia should be destroyed.

^t HEROD. l. ix. c. 89, 96, 99 - 103.

^u DIOD. SICUL.

l. xi. p. 28.

should

should be burnt and demolished; and his orders were so far executed, that not one was left standing, except that of Diana at Ephesus.^w (I).

Xantippus conveys the Persian spoils to Athens.

THE Grecian fleet, after the battle of Myale, steered their course first to Samos, and thence to the Hellespont, in order to possess themselves of the bridges, which Xerxes had caused to be laid over those streights; but, finding them broken by storms, Leotychides, with his Peloponnesian forces, sailed home. Xantippus, with the Athenians, and his allies the Ionians, remaining there, made himself master of Sestos, and the whole Thracian Chersonesus, where the army was enriched with an immense booty, which, on the approach of the winter, they carried home, every one returning then to their respective countries. Xantippus, finding all the materials of the bridges at Cardia, whither they had been conveyed by order of Xerxes, carried them with him to Athens, where they were preserved for many years, as a monument of the many victories, which the Greeks obtained in this war^x. From this time, the Ionian cities in Asia, shaking off the Persian yoke, recovered their antient liberty, and maintained it as long as that empire subsisted.

Persians
driven out of Cyprus.
Year of
the flood 1871.
Bef. Chr.
477.

THE Greeks, having settled their affairs at home, resolved to pursue the war, and drive the Persians out of all the Greek cities in Asia, and the neighbouring islands. With this view, they equipped a powerful fleet, which, sailing to Cyprus, under the command of Pausanias and Aristides, drove the Persians out of that island, and restored the inhabitants to their antient liberty^y.

^w STRABO, l. xiv. CURT. l. vii. c. 5. SOLIN. c. 40. ^z HEROD. l. ix. c. 118, 119, 120. & DIOD. SIC. l. xi. ad ann. 2. olymp. 75. ^y DIOD. SIC. ad ann. 4. olymp. 75. & THUCYD. l. i. & PLUTARCH. in Aristide.

(I) We will not pretend to determine whether Xerxes's resentment, after so many defeats, prompted him to this, or a singular zeal for the institution of the mages, in whose religion he had been thoroughly instructed by Zoroastres; for, that religion expressing a great detestation of worshipping God by images, its zealots were for destroying all idolatrous temples where-ever they came: and, to keep Xerxes steady in their party, not only several of the chief doctors of the mages, but Ostanes himself, who was then at the head of the whole sect, attended him during the whole time of this expedition (56): so that, if we may credit Cicero (57), it was at their instigation, that all those temples were destroyed.

(56) Clem. Alexandrin. in protrept. Laert. in prodem. Pocock. Specim. bist. Arabe. p. 148, 149. (57) Cic. de legib. l. ii.

WHILE

WHILE Xerxes resided at Sardis, he conceived a violent passion for the wife of his brother Masistes, a prince of extraordinary merit, and who had served the king with great zeal and fidelity. As she was a woman of great virtue, and had a singular value for her husband, she could, by no solicitations, be prevailed upon to defile his bed. However, the king, still flattering himself, that, by heaping favours upon her, he might at last conquer her virtue, married his eldest son Darius, whom he appointed his successor to the crown, to Artaynta, this princess's daughter. As this was the greatest favour he could bestow on the mother, he expected it would engage her to comply with his desires. But Xerxes, finding her virtue proof against all temptations, changed his inclinations for the mother, and fell passionately in love with the daughter, who was now the wife of his own son, and did not follow the glorious example of her mother's firmness and virtue. While this intrigue was carrying on, Hamestris, wife to Xerxes, having wrought a very rich and curious mantle, presented it to the king; which he, being wonderfully pleased with it, put on when he first visited his mistress. In the conversation he had with her, he desired her to ask whatever favour she pleased; binding himself by an oath to deny her nothing. Hereupon Artaynta desired him to give her the mantle. Xerxes, foreseeing the bad consequences that would necessarily ensue from his complying with her request, did all that lay in his power to dissuade her from insisting upon her first demand. He offered her immense treasures, with cities, and an army, to be solely at her disposal; which was one of the greatest presents that the Persian kings could make. But, not being able to prevail upon her, and thinking himself bound by his imprudent promise, and rash oath, he yielded to her demand, and gave her the mantle; which she immediately put on, and publicly wore, as a trophy of her power over the king's affections. Hamestris, being now confirmed in the suspicion she had entertained, was incensed to the highest degree; but, instead of venting her rage against the daughter, who alone was faulty, resolved to be revenged on the mother, whom she looked upon as the author of the whole intrigue, though she was no ways privy to it. For the better executing her design, she waited the great festival, which was annually celebrated on the king's birth-day: on which occasion the king, according to the established custom of the country, used to grant the queen whatever she demanded. This day being come, she asked, that the wife of his brother Masistes might be delivered into her hands. Xerxes, who apprehended the queen's design, was struck with horror at her demand, both out of regard to his brother, and because he knew, that his wife was

*Xerxes's
incestuous intrigue with his daughter-in-law.*

Hamestris's cruelty to the innocent wife of Masistes.

quite innocent; and therefore at first withstood her request; but, being at last overcome by her importunity, he consented with the utmost reluctance to her request; and, ordering his guards to seize the innocent princess, delivered her into the hands of the revengeful and enraged Hamestris, empowering her to treat her as she pleased. In consequence of this power, Hamestris caused her breasts, tongue, nose, ears, and lips, to be cut off, and thrown to the dogs before her face; and then sent her home in that miserable condition to her husband. In the mean time, Xerxes had sent for his brother, to prepare him for this melancholy and tragical adventure. He first told him, that he must part with his wife, and that he designed to supply her place with one of his own daughters. But Masistes, who was passionately fond of his wife, could not be induced, by any offers whatsoever, to divorce her. Whereupon Xerxes, in great warmth, told him, that, since he refused his daughter, he should neither have her, nor his own wife; and, with this inhuman reply, dismissed him. Masistes, from this speech, apprehending some great misfortune, made all the haste he could home, to see what had passed during his absence. On his arrival, he found his wife in that deplorable condition we have described; and, being exasperated to the highest degree, as the case did justly deserve, he immediately assembled all his family, servants, and dependents; and set out with all possible expedition for the province of Bactriana, of which he was governor, with full resolution, as soon he arrived there, to induce the Bactrians to revolt, and revenge such a barbarous usage in the severest manner. But Xerxes, hearing of his sudden departure, and suspecting from thence his design, sent a party of horse after him; who, overtaking him, cut him in pieces, with his wife, children, and all his retinue. There is another action no less cruel and impious related of Hamestris: she caused fourteen children of the best families in Persia to be buried alive, as a sacrifice to the infernal gods *.

Masistes, and his wife and family, massacred by Xerxes.

A fresh instance of Hamestris's cruelty.

UPON the death of Masistes, Xerxes appointed Hystaspes, his second son, to be governor of Bactria; which, obliging him to live at a distance from court, gave his younger brother Artaxerxes an opportunity of mounting the throne before him, as will be seen in its proper place.

Byzantium taken from the Persians.

THE Grecian fleet, having driven the Persians out of Cyprus, failed from thence to the Hellespont, and reduced the city of Byzantium, where they took several prisoners of eminent note, and some nearly related to Xerxes himself; but they were all treacherously released by Pausanias, pretending they had made their escape ^y, as we shall relate more at length in the history Year of of Greece. A few years after, the Athenian fleet, under the the flood command of Cimon the son of Miltiades, took Eione on the 1872.

* HEROD. l. ix. c. 107, 112.

river Strymon, and brought again under subjection the islands Bef. Chr.
of Scyrus and Naxus, which had revolted ^z. Cimon, encour- 476.
aged with this success, passed over to the coasts of Asia; and, having driven the Persians out of all the maritime cities of Caria and Lycia, he sailed from thence in quest of their fleet; The Per- and, finding it riding at the mouth of the river Eurymedon on sian fleet the coast of Pamphylia, while the army was encamped on the and army shore, he first attacked the fleet, and then the army, over- defeated by threw both, and gained two victories on the same day, whereof Cimon.
the one was equal to the victory of Salamis, and the other to that of Plataea ^z. The next year, Cimon drove the Persians Year of out of the Thracian Chersonesus, subdued the Thasians, who the flood had revolted from the Athenians, and then, landing his army, 1878.
on the opposite shore of Thrace, seized on the gold-mines on Bef. Chr.
those coasts, and reduced all that country as far as Macedon ^b, 470.
as we shall relate at length in a more proper place.

XERXES, being wholly discouraged by a continual series of heavy losses, and shameful defeats, gave over all thoughts of war and conquests, and never afterwards suffered his ships to appear in the Aegean sea, or his forces on the coasts. He gave himself intirely up to luxury and ease, minding nothing, but the gratifying his lusts and vitious inclinations. This dissolute manner of life drew upon him the contempt and hatred of his subjects; which induced Artabanus, a native of Hyrkania, Artaba- captain of his guards, and who had long been his chief favour- nus's ite, to conspire against him. He prevailed upon Mithridates, treachery one of the eunuchs of the palace, to engage in the conspiracy; and, being by him let into the king's bed-chamber, murdered Xerxes him, in the twenty-first year of his reign, while he was murdered. asleep (K). He then went to Artaxerxes the king's third son, Year of and the flood
and

^y THUCYD. l. i. ^z DIODOR. l. ii. PLUTARCH. in Cimone. 1892.
^a DIODOR. & PLUT. ibid. THUCYD. l. i. ÆMIL. PROB. in Cimone. Bef. Chr.
^b PLUTARCH. ibid. 456.

(K) Archbishop Usher places the death of Xerxes, and consequently the accession of Artaxerxes, in the year of the world 3530, before Christ 474; taking thereby nine years from the reign of the former, and adding them to the reign of the latter, and of his son Xerxes, whom he supposes to have reigned a year. The primate is herein countenanced, in some degree, by the authority of Thucydides (57). But as that historian is contradicted by Ptolemy's canon, Diodorus Siculus, Africanus, Eusebius, and all

(57) Vide Uss. ad A. M. 3531, 3532.

who

Darius
murdered.

Artaxerxes mounts the throne.

Artabanus discovered, and put to death.

and charged Darius his elder brother with the murder, as though an eager desire of ascending the throne had prompted him to that execrable crime. He told him at the same time, that he designed to cut him off next, in order to secure the crown to himself; and therefore he ought to guard against all dangers. Artaxerxes, being then a very young man, rashly believed whatever Artabanus told him; and, without further examination, went immediately to his brother's apartment; and there, being assisted by Artabanus and his guards, murdered him. The next heir was Hystaspes, the second son of Xerxes; but, as he was then in Bactriana, of which province he was governor, Artabanus placed Artaxerxes on the throne, but with a design to let him enjoy the sovereignty only till such time as he had formed a party strong enough to drive him from it, and seize it himself. His great authority had gained him many dependents; and besides, he had seven sons, who were all of robust bodies, courageous, and raised to the highest dignities of the empire. His confidence in these inspired him with this design; but, while he was hastening to put it in execution, Artaxerxes, being informed of the whole plot by Megabyzus, who had married one of his sisters, was beforehand with him in a counter plot, and killed him, before his treason was ripe for execution. His death secured to Artaxerxes the possession of the kingdom ^d (K). He is said to have been

^c DIOD. SIC. I. xi. p. 53.
c. 2. JUSTIN. I. iii. c. 1.

^d Idem ibid. p. 52. CTESIUS, who have written of those times, we are inclined to think he was mistaken in this particular: for, tho' he is universally allowed to be very exact in the affairs of Greece, of which he professedly writes, yet he might be mistaken in those of Persia, which he speaks of only by-the-by. What induced the archbishop to prefer the authority of Thucydides to that of all other writers, was, its wonderfully helping his hypothesis concerning the computation of the seventy weeks of Daniel's prophecy. For if we place the twentieth year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, from whence he reckons the beginning of the seventy weeks, nine years higher than others do, the middle of the last week will exactly fall in with the time when CHRIST was crucified. But the authority of Thucydides, especially as it is contradicted by all the antients, is not, in our opinion, a sufficient foundation for an hypothesis of this nature.

(K) Whether Artabanus possessed himself of the throne, and held it seven months, as some authors affirm, or was killed by Artaxerxes before he accomplished his design, is no easy matter to determine with any certainty. The seven first months, however, of the reign of Artaxerxes (58), are, by Eusebius, assigned to Artabanus; but whether because

(58) Euseb. in chron.

been the handsomest man of the age he lived in, and a prince of a very mild and generous disposition. By the Greeks he is called, or rather nicknamed, Macrocheir, that is, long-handed, by reason of the more than ordinary length of his hands (L); but, in Scripture, he bears the name of Abasuerus, as well as that of Artaxerxes, and is the same who had Esther for his queen (M).

cause he ruled so long in his name, or on what other account, is not easy to determine.

(L) Strabo (59) tells us, that he was so called, because his hands were so long, that when he stood upright, he could touch his knees with them; but, according to Plutarch (60), he had that name, because his right hand was longer than his left.

He is named by the Latins Longimanus, which answers the Greek Μακροχειρ.

(M) Some are of opinion, that Darius Hystaspis was the king Abasuerus who married Esther; and that Atossa was the Vashti, and Artystona the Esther of Scripture (61). But this opinion is quite inconsistent with what we read of these persons in profane history; for Herodotus tells us (62), that Artystona was the daughter of Cyrus, and therefore she could not be Esther; and that Atossa had four sons by Darius, all born after he had ascended the throne (63); and therefore she could not be that queen Vashti, whom the king divorced in the third year of his reign (64); nor he, consequently, that king Abasuerus. Besides, Atossa had such an ascendant over the king, that he was influenced by her, on his death-

HAVING, bed, to disinherit his elder sons by a former wife, and settle the crown on Xerxes her son; whereas the Abasuerus of Scripture divorced Vashti by an unalterable decree, and therefore could never admit her again to his bed (65). What induced the learned primate of Ireland to be of this opinion, was, that Abasuerus, in the book of Esther (66), is said to have laid a tribute on the land, and on the isles; and the same is said of Darius Hystaspis by Herodotus (67); but this, Strabo ascribes to Darius Longimanus (68), as we read in the printed copies; and the surname of Longimanus, with the description of the person in that place, plainly shews, that Darius was there, by mistake of the transcribers, put instead of Artaxerxes, seeing no Darius ever bore that name; and what is said there of Darius, is applicable to none but Artaxerxes.

Scaliger is of opinion (69), that Xerxes was the Abasuerus, and his queen Hamestris the Esther of Scripture; induced thereunto by the similitude he finds between Hamestris and Esther. But the dissimilitude of their characters is a stronger proof, that Hamestris could not be Esther, as must appear from (59) Strabo, l. xv. p. 735.

A. M. 3485.

(62) Herodot. l. iii. c. 88. & l. vii. c. 69.

(64) Esther i. 3.

(65) Ibid.

(68) Strabo, l. xv. p. 735.

(61) Usher. ad

(63) Idem,

(66) Ibid. x. v.

(69) Scal. de

(67) Herodot. l. iii. c. 95, 96.
emendat. temp. l. vi.

Artaxerxes Longimanus.

HAVING, by the death of Artabanus, removed one dangerous competitor, he had still two great obstacles in his way, viz. his brother Hystaspes in Bactria, and the party of Artabanus at home, which gave him the first trouble. Artabanus, as we have hinted above, had seven sons, and many partisans, who immediately gathered together to revenge his death. Whereupon a bloody conflict ensued, in which many Persians of distinction fell on both sides. But at length Artaxerxes, having prevailed, put to death all those who were privy to the plot; those especially, who had any hand in the murder of his father, were punished in a most severe and exemplary manner. The eunuch Mithridates, who betrayed him, was boated; a punishment which was in use among the Persians, and we have already described where we give an account of the manners of that nation. Artaxerxes, having thus crushed the faction of Artabanus at home, was in a condition to send an army into Bactria, which had declared in favour of his brother. But here he was not attended with the like success; for, what we have already related of queen Hamestris, and shall have occasion to add in the sequel of this history. A woman of so vile a character cannot have been that queen of Persia, who, by the name of Esther, is so renowned in holy writ, and is celebrated there as the instrument by whom God was pleased, in so signal a manner, to deliver his people from that utter destruction which was designed against them. Besides, we are told by Herodotus (70), that Xerxes had a son by Hamestris, who was marriageable in the seventh year of his reign; and Esther was not till that time married to Abasuerus (71).

Crushes the faction of Artabanus.

There being no such objections as to Artaxerxes Longimanus, he must, in our opinion, have been the Abasuerus who married Esther. This we find confirmed by the Septuagint, by the apocryphal additions of the book of Esther, and by Josephus. The Septuagint, throughout the whole book of Esther, translate Abasuerus by Artaxerxes. The apocryphal additions to that book constantly call Esther's husband Artaxerxes; and, from several circumstances related of him both in the canonical and apocryphal Esther, it is very plain that this Artaxerxes could not be Artaxerxes Mneemon. Josephus (72) tells us in express terms, that Esther's husband was Artaxerxes Longimanus. Several Sulpitius, and many others, both antient and modern writers, fall in with Josephus. The extraordinary favour and kindness, which Artaxerxes Longimanus shewed the Jews, beyond all other kings that reigned in Persia, is a convincing proof, that they had such a powerful advocate as Esther to intercede for them (73).

(70) Herodot. l. ix. c. 107. (71) Esther ii. 16. (72) Joseph. antiquit. l. xi. c. 6. (73) See Prid. connect. part i. book iv. at the end, & Calmet dict. under Assuerus.

the two armies engaging, Hystaspes stood his ground, and, though he did not carry the day, he sustained no considerable loss, both parties retiring, with equal fortune, to prepare for a second encounter. The next year, Artaxerxes, drawing together a far more powerful army, as having the greater part of the empire at his devotion, overpowered Hystaspes, and, by a complete victory, secured to himself the quiet possession of the empire. To prevent all further disturbances, he removed such governors of cities and provinces as he suspected to be affected to either of the factions he had overcome, putting others in their room, whom he could safely trust. He afterwards applied himself to the reforming of many abuses and disorders that had crept into the government; whereby he gained great reputation, and won the hearts of his subjects throughout all the provinces of the empire^a. Artaxerxes, being now settled in the peaceable possession of the whole Persian empire, appointed rejoicings and feasts to be made for the space of an hundred and eighty days in the city of Susa, on the conclusion of which, he gave a grand entertainment to all the princes and people that were then in that city, which lasted seven days^b. Vashti the queen at the same time made a like feast in her apartment for the women. And here the history of Hadassah or Esther; for which we refer the reader to that book, takes place.

In the fifth year of Artaxerxes's reign, the Egyptians revolted, and, making Inarus, prince of the Libyans, their king, recalled in the Athenians to their assistance, who, having, at that time, a fleet of two hundred ships lying off the island of Cyprus, laid hold of that invitation, looking upon it as a very favourable opportunity of weakening the Persian power, by driving them from so rich a kingdom. But how fatal this war proved both to them, and their Egyptian allies, we have related elsewhere^c.

THE Athenians; having equipped another fleet of two hundred sail; after the loss of that in Egypt, gave the command of it to Cimon, injoining him to drive the Persians from the island of Cyprus. Cimon; in pursuance of his orders, took Citium, Malum, and several other cities of that island; and from thence sent sixty sail to the assistance of Amyrtæus, in the fens of Egypt. Artabazus being then in those seas, with a fleet of three hundred ships, Cimon, as soon as his squadron returned from Egypt, fell upon him; took one hundred of his ships, destroyed many others; and pursued the remainder to the coasts of Phœnicia. Being flushed with his success, on his return he

The Egyptians revolt, assisted by the Athenians.

Year of the flood, 1888.

Bef. Chr. 460.

Simon's success in Cyprus, and against the Persian fleet.

^a PLUTARCH. in ARTAXERX. CTES. c. 31. DIOD. SIC. l. xi. p. 54.

^b Esth. i. JOSEPH. antiq. l. xi. c. 6. ^c Vol. ii. p. 99—101.

landed his men in Cilicia, where he found Megabyzus, with an army of three hundred thousand men, marched against him; and, having put him to flight, with a great slaughter of his men, returned to Cyprus with a double triumph ^f.

Artaxerxes makes peace with the Athenians.

ARTAXERXES, tired with a war in which he had sustained so great losses, resolved, with the advice of his counsellors and ministers, to put an end to so many calamities, by coming to an accommodation with the enemy. Accordingly, he sent orders to his generals, who were charged with the management of the Cyprian war, to conclude a peace with the Athenians on the best terms they could. Hereupon Megabyzus and Artabazus sent embassadors to Athens, to propose an accommodation, which was agreed upon by the deputies of both sides, on the following terms: 1. That all the Greek cities of Asia should be made free, and allowed to live according to their own laws. 2. That no Persian ships of war should enter those seas that lie between the Cyanean and the Chelidonian islands; that is, from the Euxine sea to the coasts of Pamphylia. 3. That no Persian general should come, by land, within three days march of those seas. 4. That the Athenians should not commit any hostilities in the territories of the king of Persia. These articles being sworn to by both parties, peace was proclaimed. Thus ended this war, which had lasted, from the burning of Sardis by the Athenians, fifty-one years complete, and destroyed numberless multitudes both of Greeks and Persians ^g.

Inarus crucified.

Megabyzus revolts, and defeats Osiris.

ARTAXERXES, being continually importuned, by his mother, for five years together, to deliver to her Inarus, and the Athenians who had been taken with him in Egypt, that she might sacrifice them to the manes of her son Achæmenes, yielded at last to her unwearied solicitations. Whereupon this inhuman princess, without any regard to the conditions which had been with the greatest solemnity ratified, caused Inarus to be crucified, and the heads of all the rest to be struck off.

Megabyzus, who had engaged his word, that their lives should be spared, looked upon this as a dishonour done him; and therefore, retiring to Syria, of which province he was governor, raised there an army, and openly revolted. The king immediately sent Osiris, one of the chief lords of the court, with an army of two hundred thousand men, to suppress this

Year of rebellion: but Megabyzus, in a general engagement, wounded the flood him, took him prisoner, and put his numerous army to flight. 1900. Artaxerxes hearing that his general was taken, sent a messenger Bef. Chr. to demand him; and Megabyzus generously released him, as 448. soon as his wounds were cured ^h.

^f PLUTARCH. in Cimon. THUCYD. l. i. DIOD. SIC. l. xi. p. 73.
^g DIODOR. ubi supra, p. 74. THUCYD. l. i. PLUTARCH. in Cimon.
^h CTESIUS, c. 35.

THE next year Artaxerxes sent another army against him, under the command of Menoftanes son to Artarius, the king's brother, and governor of Babylon. This general was attended with no better success than the other; for he was, in the same manner, defeated and put to flight, leaving Megabyzus master of the field, and all the baggage. The king, being sensible that he could not get the better of him by dint of arms, sent his brother Artarius, and his sister Amytis, who was wife to Megabyzus, with several other persons of distinction, to persuade him to return to his duty. By their mediation the difference being made up, the king granted him his pardon; and Pardoned, he returned to court. Not long after, a lion being ready and re- to fall upon the king as he was hunting, Megabyzus, to shew instated. his zeal and affection for his sovereign, threw a dart at the lion, and killed him. But the king, still retaining ill-will against him, upon pretence that he had affronted him in shooting first at the lion, commanded his head to be struck off: and it was with the utmost difficulty, that Amytis his sister, and Hamestris his mother, prevailed upon him to change the sentence of death into that of perpetual banishment: Megabyzus was therefore Banished. sent to Cyrta, a city standing on the Red sea, and sentenced to lead the rest of his life there, under confinement. However, five years after, he made his escape from thence, and, under disguise, got safe to his own house at Susa, where, by the intercession of his wife, and mother-in-law, he was reinstated Reinstated. in the king's favour, and enjoyed it till his death, which happened some years after, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. He was greatly lamented by the king and the whole court, being the best counsellor, and greatest general, of the whole empire. To him Artaxerxes owed both his life, and his crown, at his first accession to the government: but it is of dangerous consequence, in a subject, to have too much obliged his sovereign; for this was the true source of all the misfortunes that befel Megabyzus.

IN the thirty-fourth year of the reign of Artaxerxes, a war Year of breaking out between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, com- the flood monly called the Peloponnesian war, both parties sent embassa- 1917. dors to the king, imploring his assistance. But we do not Bef. Chr. find, that Artaxerxes returned them any answer before the fe- 431. venth year of that war, when he sent an ambassador to the Lacedæmonians, named Artaphernes, with a letter written in Artaxerxes's letter the Assyrian tongue, wherein he told them, that several em- to the Lacedæmo- bassadors had come to him from them; but the purport of their nians. embassies differed so widely, that he could not comprehend what they requested; and that therefore he had thought proper to send them a Persian, to let them know, that if they had any proposals to make, they should send a trusty person along with him, by whom he might be informed what they desired him to do. This ambassador, arriving at Eion, on the river Strymon in Thrace, was there taken prisoner by one of the admirals of the Athenian fleet, who sent him to Athens; where he was treated with the utmost civility and respect, the Athenians being extremely desirous to regain the favour of the king his master ^k. The year following, as soon as the season allowed the Athenians to put to sea, they sent back the ambassador, in one of their own ships, at the expence of the public; and appointed some of their citizens to attend him to the court of Persia, with the character of ambassadors. But, when they landed at Ephesus, they there received news of the king's death; whereupon the Athenians not thinking it adviseable to proceed farther, took their leave of Artaphernes, and returned to Athens ^l.

Xerxes II. ARTAXERXES favoured the Jews above all the kings of Persia: but what happened to them during his reign, we shall relate in the history of that people, as in a more proper place. This prince died in the forty-first year of his reign, and was succeeded by Xerxes, the only son he had by his queen: but by his concubines he had seventeen, among whom were Sogdianus, or, as Ctesias calls him, Secundianus, Ochus, and Arsites. Xerxes, having drank immoderately at a great entertainment, retired to his bedchamber, to refresh himself with sleep, after his debauch. This opportunity Sogdianus laid hold of; and, being led into the bedchamber by Pharnacyas, one of Xerxes's eunuchs, slew him after he had reigned forty-five days; and possessed himself of the kingdom ^m.

Sogdianus's cruelties. SCARCE was Sogdianus seated on the throne, when he put to death Bagorazus, the most faithful of all his father's eunuchs. He had been appointed to superintend the interment of Artaxerxes, and of the queen, Xerxes's mother, who had died the same day as her royal consort. After he had conveyed both their bodies to the burial-place of the Persian kings, he found, on his return, Sogdianus in possession of the crown, with whom he had formerly had some small difference. This Sogdianus remembred, and, taking, for a pretence to quarrel with him, something relating to the obsequies of his father, caused him to be stoned to death. By these two murders, he became very odious both to the nobility and the army; and, being jealous lest some of his brothers might treat him as he had treated Xerxes, he sent for Ochus, whom he chiefly suspected,

^k THUCYD. l. iv. p. 285, 286.

^l Idem ibid. p. 322.

^m CTESIUS. c. 47. DIOD. SIC. l. xii. p. 115.

spected, with a design to murder him the moment he arrived. Ochus had been by his father appointed governor of Hyrkania; and, being well apprised of his brother's design, under several pretences, put off his coming to court till he had drawn together a powerful army, with which he advanced to the confines of Persia, openly declaring, that he designed to revenge the death of his brother. This declaration brought over to him many of the nobility, and several governors of provinces, who, being highly dissatisfied with the cruelty and ill-conduct of Sogdianus, put the tiara on Ochus's head, and proclaimed him king. Sogdianus, seeing himself thus deserted, contrary to the advice of his best friends, came to an accommodation with Ochus, who, having him in his power, caused him to be thrown into ashes (O), where he died a cruel death.

OCHUS, being settled on the throne by the death of Sogdianus, changed his name, taking that of Darius; and is by the historians commonly called Darius Nothus, or Darius the bastard (P).

ARSITES, seeing in what manner Sogdianus had supplanted Xerxes, and had been afterwards driven from the throne by Ochus, began to entertain thoughts of treating Ochus in the same manner. With this design, though he was by the same father and mother, he broke out into an open rebellion against him, being encouraged thereunto, and assisted,

◦ CTESIUS, c. 47. DIODOR. I. xii. p. 322.

(O) This punishment was invented for him, and became afterwards common in Persia. Ochus had sworn, that Sogdianus should not die by the sword, by poison, or of hunger. To keep his word, he contrived this new sort of punishment; it is described in the thirteenth chapter of the second book of Maccabees, thus: An high tower was filled to a certain height with ashes, and the criminal being thrown headlong into them, they were, by a wheel, perpetually turned round him, till he was suffocated. Thus this wicked prince lost his life, and his empire, after he had reigned six months and fifteen days (75).

(P) He is placed in Ptolemy's canon as the immediate successor to Artaxerxes Longimanus, according to the stile of that canon, which constantly ascribes to the predecessor the whole year in which he dies, and places him as the next successor, who was on the throne in the beginning of the ensuing year. As the reigns of Xerxes and Sogdianus made up but eight months, and these did not reach to the end of the year, in which Artaxerxes died, they are, in the canon, cast into the last year of Artaxerxes, and Darius is placed next him, as if he had been his immediate successor.

(75) 2 Maccab. xiii, 4, & 5. Val. Max. I. ix, c. 2.

by Artyphius the son of Megabyzus. Ochus, whom henceforth we shall call Darius, sent Artasyras, one of his generals, against Artyphius, while he marched in person against his brother Arfites. Artyphius, with the assistance of his Greek mercenaries, twice defeated the general who had been sent against him: but these being gained over with large bribes, he lost the third battle; and, being reduced to great straits, surrendered himself to Darius, upon hopes given him of mercy. The king was for putting him to death immediately, but was diverted from it by Parysatis his wife and sister: she was daughter to Artaxerxes by another mother, an intriguing and crafty woman; and, by her advice, the king was intirely governed in affairs of the highest importance. The counsel she gave him, on this occasion, was, to treat Artyphius with great clemency, that by such usage of a rebellious servant he might the better encourage his brother to throw himself upon his mercy; and then dispose of them both as he pleased. Darius followed her counsel, and had the success he proposed; for Arfites being informed of the gentle usage Artyphius had met with, concluded that he, as a brother, should be treated, at least, with the same indulgence and good-nature. Flattered with this hope, he came to an agreement with the king, and surrendered himself into his hands. Darius having him in his power, was very much inclined to pardon him; but was prevailed upon by Parysatis to put both him and Artyphius to death, by suffocating them in ashes.

Put to death with Arfites.

He also put to death Pharnacyas, for being concerned in the murder of Xerxes; and Monasthenes, another eunuch, who was the chief favourite of Sogdianus, was condemned to die a cruel death; which he prevented, by laying violent hands on himself. These executions did not procure him the tranquillity he expected; for his whole reign was disturbed with violent commotions, raised in various parts of the empire. One of the most dangerous was that which was stirred up by Pisuthnes, governor of Lydia, who, setting up for himself, raised an army of Greek mercenaries, under the command of Lycon, an Athenian. Against him Darius sent Tissaphernes, appointing him, at the same time, governor of Lydia, in his room. Tissaphernes, who was an artful and crafty man, found means of gaining the Greeks who served under Pisuthnes, and inducing both them and their general to change sides. Whereupon Pisuthnes, not being in a condition to carry on the war, surrendered, upon promise of pardon: but the king, the instant he was brought before him, sentenced him to death; and accordingly he was, pursuant to the king's order, suffocated in ashes.

Year of the flood 1934.
Bef. Chr. 414.

Pisuthnes and his son put to death.

But his death did not put an end to the troubles which he had raised; for his son Amorgas, with the remainder of the army, still opposed Tissaphernes; and for two years continued to infest the maritime powers of Asia Minor, till he was, at length, taken prisoner by the Peloponnesians, at Iasus, a city of Ionia, and delivered by the inhabitants to Tissaphernes, who put him to death ^q.

DARIUS had scarce quelled this rebellion, when he found himself involved in new troubles. His court, and we may say, the whole empire, were governed by the eunuchs Artoxares, Artibarzanes, and Athous. These he consulted, and followed their advice, in all the momentous affairs of the government; but Artoxares was the chief favourite, and nothing was transacted but by his direction: intoxicated with this power, he began to entertain thoughts of ascending the throne; and, accordingly, formed a design of cutting off Darius. With this view, that he might not be thought an eunuch, which was a strong objection to his being acknowledged king, he married, and wore an artificial beard, giving out, that he was not what, to that time, the Persians had taken him to be. But his wife, who was privy to the whole plot, and, perhaps, glad to get rid of such a husband, discovered the whole matter to the king. Whereupon he was seized, and delivered up to Parysatis, who caused him to be put to a cruel and ignominious death ^r.

THE same year that Pisuthnes rebelled, the Egyptians not only shook off the Persian yoke, but, entering into a confederacy with the Arabians, resolved to carry the war into Phœnicia ^s. News of this being brought to the court of Persia, the fleet which the king had equipped, with a design to assist the Lacedæmonians, was recalled to the defence of his own dominions ^t.

WHILE Darius was carrying on a war against the Egyptians and Arabians, the Medes revolted; but being defeated, were forced to return to their former allegiance; and, in punishment of their rebellion, reduced to harder subjection than before, as is usually the case. Darius seems to have been likewise successful against the Egyptians; for Amyrtæus being dead, after a reign of six years, his son Pausiris succeeded him, as Herodotus informs us ^u, in the kingdom, with the consent of the Persians; which shews, that they were masters of Egypt.

DARIUS, having thus settled the affairs of Media and Egypt, Cyrus the youngest of all the provinces of Asia Minor. He was a very young

^q CTESIUS, c. 51.

^r Idem ibid.

^s See vol. ii. p. 101. of Asia

^t THUCYD. l. viii. init. JUSTIN. l. v. c. 2. DIODOR. l. xiii. Minor. p. 160.

^u HEROD. l. iii. c. 15.

Year of the flood 1941. Bef. Chr. 407. } man, to be intrusted with so much power; for, being born after his father's accession to the crown, he could not have been above sixteen years old when he received this important commission: but, as he was the darling of his mother Parysatis, who had an absolute sway over the king her husband, she obtained this command for him, with a view to put him in a condition to contend for the crown, after his father's death: and this use he accordingly made of it, to the great disturbance of the whole empire, as we shall see hereafter *:

Sent to assist the Lacedæmonians. } On his receiving his commission, he was ordered to assist the Lacedæmonians against the Athenians, contrary to the wise measures observed by Tissaphernes, who, by sometimes helping one side, and sometimes the other, had so balanced matters between them, that they continued to harass each other, without being at leisure to disturb the Persians, who had so long been the common enemies of both. This order given, Cyrus soon discovered the weakness of the king's politics; for the Lacedæmonians, having, with the assistance given them by Cyrus, soon overpowered the Athenians, sent first Thimbro, and after him Dercyllidas, and at last Agésilas their king, to invade the Persian provinces in Asia, where they made great conquests, and would have endangered the whole empire, had not Darius, by distributing large sums of money among the demagogues, or governors of the Greek cities, found means to rekindle the war in Greece; which obliged the Lacedæmonians to recal their troops for their own defence †.

Becomes obnoxious to his father.

CYRUS having put to death two noble Persians, sons to a sister of Darius, for no other reason but because they had not, in meeting him, wrapped up their hands in their sleeves, as was customary among the Persians in the presence of their kings, Darius recalled him to court, on pretence that he was indisposed, and desired to see him. Cyrus, well knowing how great an ascendant his mother had over the king, prepared for his journey; but, before he set out, he ordered such large subsidies to be sent to Lysander, general of the Lacedæmonians, as enabled him to gain that memorable victory over the Athenians at the Goats-river on the Hellespont, which put an end to the Athenian power, and the Peloponnesian war, after it had lasted twenty-seven years †. Darius was highly incensed against Cyrus, not only on account of the death of his two nephews, but because he had presumed to challenge honours that were due only to the king; and therefore designed to deprive him of his government. But, upon his arrival, the queen not only

* XENOPH. Hellen. l. i. PLUTARCH. in Artax. & Lysandro. JUSTIN. l. v. c. 5. DIOD. l. xiii. p. 368. † XENOPH. DIOD. JUSTIN. ibid. THUCYD. l. ii. PLUTARCH. in Lysandro.

Reconciled his father to him, but used all her art to have him declared heir to the crown, by reason he was born after his father's accession to the throne; which had given the preference to Xerxes in the reign of Darius Hystaspis. Darius could not by any means be prevailed upon to comply with her request; but however bequeathed him the government of those provinces which he ruled before. Not long after, Darius Nothus died, after he had reigned nineteen years; and was succeeded by Arsaces, his eldest son by Parysatis, who, on his ascending the throne, took the name of Artaxerxes, and was, for his extraordinary memory, by the Greeks called Mnemon, that is, rememberer ^z. While he was attending his father on his death-bed, he desired to be informed by what art he had so happily managed the government, that, by following the same rule, he might be blessed with the like success. The dying king gave him this memorable answer, that he had ever done, to the best of his knowlege, what religion and justice required, without swerving from the one or the other ^a.

Darius Nothus dies.

Year of the flood 1944.
Bef. Chr.
404.

UPON the death of Darius, his son Artaxerxes went to Parsagada, to be there inaugurated, after the Persian custom, by the priests of Bellona. He was no sooner arrived there, but he was informed by one of the priests, that his brother Cyrus had formed a conspiracy against him, with a design to murder him in the very temple. Upon this information, Cyrus was seized, and sentenced to death; but his mother Parysatis prevailed upon the king not only to save his life, but to send him back to the government of Asia Minor, which his father had left him ^b.

Artaxerxes Mnemon.

Cyrus's conspiracy.

ARTAXERXES was no sooner settled on the throne, but Statira's Statira his queen, whom he was very fond of, on account of her extraordinary beauty, employed her power with him to the utter ruin of Udiastes, who had killed her brother Teriteuchmes. This quarrel had its rise in the reign of Darius, and the whole was a complication of adultery, incest, and murder; which raised great disturbances in the royal family, and ended in the ruin of all who were concerned in it. Statira was daughter to Hydarnes, a Persian lord, and governor of one of the chief provinces of the empire. Artaxerxes, then called Arsaces, falling in love with her, married her; and at the same time Teriteuchmes her brother married Hamestris, one of the daughters of Darius, and sister to Arsaces; by reason of which marriage he was appointed, on his father's death, to succeed him in his government; but, falling in love with his own sister Roxana, no-ways inferior in beauty to Statira, that he might, without any constraint, enjoy her, he resolved to dispatch his wife Hamestris, and raise a rebellion in the kingdom. Darius, being acquainted with his wicked designs, engaged Udiastes, an intimate friend of Teriteuchmes; to murder him; which he did accordingly, and was rewarded by the king with the government of his province. Mithridates the son of Udiastes, who was one of Teriteuchmes's guards, and greatly attached to his master, hearing that his father had committed this murder, uttered all manner of imprecations against him; and, to shew his abhorrence of so vile an action, seized on the city of Zaris, and, openly revolting, declared for the son of Teriteuchmes. Mithridates was, by the king's forces, blocked up in the city of Zaris, and with him the son of Teriteuchmes. All the rest of the family of Hydarnes were apprehended, and delivered to Parysatis, to execute her revenge upon them for the ill usage done, or intended, against her daughter. That cruel princess began with Roxana, whose beauty had been the occasion of all this mischief, and caused her to be sawed in two. The others were all beheaded, except Statira, whom she spared, at the earnest intreaties, and through the importunate tears, of her husband Arsaces, contrary to the opinion of Darius, who told her, that she would afterwards have occasion to repent it. Thus the case stood at the death of Darius. But Arsaces was no sooner settled on the throne, than Statira prevailed upon him to deliver Udiastes into her hands; whereupon she caused his tongue to be drawn out at his neck, and made him die in the most exquisite torments she could invent, in revenge of the part he had acted in the ruin of her family. His son Mithridates she appointed governor of his province, for the attachment he had shewn to Teriteuchmes. But Parysatis, bitterly resenting this fact, poisoned the son of Teriteuchmes, and, not long after, Statira herself, as we shall hereafter relate ^b.

^z XENOPH. Hellen. l. ii. PLUTARCH. in Lyfandro & Artaxer. DIODOR. l. xiii. ^a ATHENÆUS, l. xii. dipnosophist. JUSTIN. l. v. c. 8, & II. ^b PLUTARCH. in Artax. XENOPH. de expedit. Cyri, l. i. JUSTIN. l. v. c. ult.

Parysatis's cruel revenge.

Cyrus designs a war against his brother.

Year of
the flood 1945.
Bef. Chr.
403.

CYRUS, returning to his government of Asia Minor, full of resentment for the sentence of death, which his brother had pronounced against him, resolved to revolt, and use his utmost endeavours to drive him from the throne. With this view, he employed Clearchus, a Lacedæmonian general, to raise a body of Greek troops for his service, under pretence of a war which the Lacedæmonians were to carry into Thrace. Alcibiades the Athenian, being well apprised of the true end for which these levies were made, passed over into the province of Pharnabazus, with a design to proceed from thence to the Per-

^b CTES. in Perf.

ian court, and acquaint Artaxerxes with the whole scheme. Had he arrived there, a discovery of such importance had, without all doubt, procured him the favour of that prince, and the assistance he wanted for the re-establishment of his country. But the partisans of the Lacedæmonians at Athens, that is, the thirty tyrants, fearing the negotiations of so superior a genius, found means to induce Pharnabazus to put him to death; whereby the Athenians lost the great hopes they had conceived of speedily recovering their former state ^c.

THE cities that were under the government of Tissaphernes revolted from him to Cyrus. This incident, which was the effect of the secret practices of that prince, give birth to a war between them. Cyrus, under pretence of arming against Tissaphernes, assembled troops openly, and, to amuse the court more speciously, made grievous complaints to the king against that governor, demanding his protection and assistance in the most submissive manner. Artaxerxes, being deceived by these appearances, believed that all Cyrus's preparations were designed only against Tissaphernes; and, not being displeas'd that they should be at variance with each other, suffered him to raise what forces he pleas'd ^d.

THE young prince lost no time on his side, and hasten'd the execution of his great design. As he had assist'd the Lacedæmonians against the Athenians, and put them in a condition of gaining those victories, which made them masters of Greece, he thought he might safely disclose to them his intent, and ask their assistance in accomplishing of it. The Lacedæmonians readily granted him his demand, dispatching immediately orders to their fleet to join that of the prince, and to obey in all things the command of Tamos his admiral; but they took care not to mention Artaxerxes, pretending not to be privy to the designs that were carrying on against him. This precaution they us'd, that, in case Artaxerxes should get the better of his brother, they might justify themselves to him for what they had done ^e.

THE army, which Cyrus had rais'd, consist'd of thirteen thousand Greeks, who were the flower of his army, and an hundred thousand regular troops of other nations. Clearchus the Lacedæmonian command'd all the Peloponnesian troops, except the Achæans, who were led by Socrates of Achaia. The Bœotians were under Proxenes a Theban, and the Thessalians under Menon. The other nations were command'd by Persian generals, of whom the chief was Ariæus. The fleet consisted of thirty-five ships under Pythagoras a Lacedæmonian, and twenty-five commanded by Tamos an Egyptian, admiral of the whole fleet ^f. Cyrus opened his design to none of the Greeks, except Clearchus, fearing the boldness of the enterprize might discourage the officers, as well as the soldiers. Proxenes, between whose family and Xenophon's an antient friendship subsisted, presented that young Athenian to Cyrus, who received him favourably, and gave him a commission among the Greek mercenaries ^g. Cyrus, having at length got all things ready, set out from Sardis, directing his march towards the upper parts of Asia, the troops neither knowing where, nor in what war, they were to be employed; for Cyrus had only given out, that he was marching against the Pisidians, who, with frequent incursions, harassed his province. However, Tissaphernes, judging these preparations to be too great for so small an enterprize, set out with all possible expedition from Miletus, to give the king a true account of them. Artaxerxes, being now well apprised of his brother's designs, assembled a numerous army to receive him. In the mean time Cyrus, advancing with long marches, arrived at the streights of Cilicia, where he found Syennesis, king of that country, prepared to dispute his passage; wherein he would have easily succeeded, had he not been obliged to abandon that important pass, to defend his own territories against Tamos, and the Lacedæmonian fleet, which appeared upon the coasts ^h.

^c XENOPH. de expedit. Cyri, l. i. PLUT. in Artax. ^d XENOPH. ubi supra. PLUT. in Artaxer. ^e XENOPH. ubi supra. PLUTARCH. ibid. JUSTIN. l. v. c. 11.

Tissaphernes discovers Cyrus's intention.

The Greeks mutiny against Cyrus.

Reduced by Clearchus

WHEN they arrived at Tarsus, the Greeks refused to proceed any farther, suspecting that they were marching against the king, and protesting, that they did not enter into the service upon that condition. Clearchus at first made use of his authority to quell the tumult; but with very ill success: and therefore, desisting from force, he pretended to enter into their views, and advised them to send deputies to Cyrus, to know from his own mouth against whom they were to be employed. By this artful evasion, he appeased the tumult, and was himself chosen one of the deputies. Cyrus, whom he had acquainted beforehand with what had happened, answered, that he was going to attack Abrocomas, who was at twelve days march distance, encamped on the banks of the Euphrates. The Greeks plainly saw, that this was not his true design; but nevertheless shewed themselves willing to proceed, on condition that their pay was increased. This Cyrus willingly granted; and, having gained their affections during the march, by treating them with extraordinary kindness and humanity, he at last declared, that he marched against Artaxerxes. Upon this, some com-

^f XENOPH. de expedit. Cyr. l. i. p. 252.
P. 294.

^h Idem, l. i. p. 248-261.

^g Idem, l. ii.

plaints were heard at first; but they soon gave way to expressions of joy and satisfaction, occasioned by that prince's magnificent promises¹.

CYRUS, after a long march, arriving in the plains of Cunaxa in the province of Babylon, found there Artaxerxes, with an army of nine hundred thousand men, ready to engage him; whereupon, leaping out of his chariot, he ordered his troops to stand to their arms, and fall into their ranks; which was done with great expedition, he not allowing them time to refresh themselves. Clearchus advised Cyrus not to charge in person, but to remain in the rear of the Greek battalions. This advice Cyrus rejected with indignation, saying, that he would not render himself unworthy of the crown for which he was fighting. As the king's army drew near, the Greeks fell upon them The battle with such fury, that the wing opposite to them was, at the very of Cunaxa first onset, put to flight; whereupon Cyrus was, with loud shouts of joy, proclaimed king by those who stood round him. But he, in the mean time, perceiving that Artaxerxes was wheeling about to attack him in flank, advanced against him with six hundred chosen horse, killed Artagerfes, captain of the king's guards, with his own hand, and put the whole body to flight. In this encounter, discovering his brother, he cried out, I see him; and, spurring on his horse, engaged him with great resolution, which, in some degree, turned the battle into a single combat, each of the two brothers endeavouring to assure himself of the crown by the death of his rival. Cyrus killed his brother's horse, and wounded him on the ground; Cyrus but he immediately mounted another, when Cyrus attacked wounds him again, and gave him a second wound, and had already the king; lifted up his hand to give him a third; which the king's guards observing, they all discharged their arrows, aiming at him alone; and he, at the same time, throwing himself headlong upon the king, was run through by his javelin, and pierced with innumerable arrows. He fell dead upon the spot; and but is slain all the chief lords of his court, resolving not to survive their with all master, were killed in the place where he fell: a certain proof, his friends. says Xenophon, that he well knew how to chuse his friends, and that he was truly beloved by them. Some writers tell us, Year of that Cyrus was killed by a Carian soldier. Mitbridates, a the flood young Persian nobleman, boasted, that he had given him the 1947. mortal blow with his javelin, which entered his temples, and Bef. Chr. pierced his head quite through. Artaxerxes, after having caused 401. his head and right-hand to be cut off, pursued the enemy to their camp, and there possessed himself of great part of their baggage and provisions. The Greeks had defeated the king's left wing, commanded by Tissaphernes; and the king's right wing, commanded by himself, had routed the enemy's left; and, as neither knew what had happened elsewhere, both parties believed they had gained the day: but, Tissaphernes acquainting the king, that his men had been put to flight by the Greeks, he immediately rallied his troops, in order to attack them. The Greeks, under the command of Clearchus, easily repulsed them, and pursued them to the neighbouring hills. As night was drawing near, the Greeks halted at the foot of the hill, much surpris'd that neither Cyrus himself, nor any messenger from him, appeared; for they yet knew nothing of his death, or the defeat of the rest of the army. They determin'd therefore to return to their camp; which they did accordingly: but found there, that the greatest part of their baggage had been plundered, and all their provisions taken; which oblig'd them to pass the night in the camp, without any sort of refreshment. The next morning, as they were still expecting to hear from Cyrus, they received the sad news of his death, and the defeat of that part of the army: whereupon they sent deputies to Ariæus, who had retired to the place whence they had march'd the day before the action, offering him, as conquerors, the crown of Persia, in the room of Cyrus. Ariæus reject'd the offer, and acquainted them, that he intended to set out early next morning on his return to Ionia, advising them to join him in the night. They followed his directions, and, under the conduct of Clearchus, began their march, and arriv'd at his camp about midnight, whence they set out on their return to Greece^k. They were at a vast distance from their own country, in the very heart of the Persian empire, surrounded by a numerous and conquering army, and had no way to return again into Greece, but by forcing their retreat through an immense tract of the enemy's country. But their valour and resolution master'd all these difficulties, and, in spite of a powerful army, which pursued and harass'd them all the way, they made a retreat of two thousand three hundred and twenty-five miles through provinces belonging to the enemy, and got safe to the Greek cities on the Euxine sea. This was the longest march, and most memorable retreat, that ever was made through an enemy's country. Clearchus had the conduct of it first; but, he being cut off by the treachery of Tissaphernes, Xenophon was chosen in his room, and to his valour and wisdom it was chiefly owing, that at length they got safe into Greece. As the same Xenophon has given a minute

¹ XENOPH. & PLUT. ibid.

The camp of the Greeks
plundered
by Darius.

Their noble retreat.

Under Xenophon.

^k XENOPH. l. i. p. 272—292. DIODOR. l. xiv. p. 255—257. PLUT. in Pericl. & Artax. DIOG. LAERT. in vita Xenoph. JUSTIN. l. v. c. 11.

account of this expedition, and the retreat of the Greeks from the place of the battle to their own country, we shall find a more proper place to mention it in the history of Greece, and return to what passed in the court of Artaxerxes after the battle of Cunaxa.

As he believed, that he had killed Cyrus with his own hand, and looked upon that as the most glorious action of his life, to dispute that honour with him, was wounding him in the most tender part. Being therefore informed, that the Carian soldier, whom we have mentioned above, laid claim to that glory, he caused him to be delivered to Parysatis, who had sworn the destruction of all those who were any ways concerned in the death of her son. She made that unhappy wretch suffer the most exquisite torments she could invent, during ten days, and then put him to a most cruel death. Mithridates likewise having boasted, that it was he who gave Cyrus his mortal wound, was treated in the manner we have described, where we spoke of the punishments used among the *Persians*¹. Masabates, one of the king's eunuchs, who, by his order, had cut off the head and hand of Cyrus, being delivered to Parysatis, was flayed alive, and his skin stretched before his eyes, upon two stakes prepared for that purpose. Nor did the cruelty and resentment of Parysatis stop here; for, having conceived an implacable hatred against Statira for reproaching her, as if she had countenanced her son Cyrus's revolt against his brother, that revengeful woman poisoned her own daughter-in-law, in the following manner: Parysatis, feigning to be reconciled to her, invited her one night to supper; and a certain bird being served up, which was a great rarity among the Persians, she divided it between Statira and herself, with a knife, which was poisoned on one side only: she found part she immediately eat, which encouraged Statira, though upon her guard, to eat the other: whereupon she was that instant seized with horrible convulsions, and died in a few hours. Artaxerxes, being greatly afflicted for the loss of his beloved wife, and suspecting his mother, caused all her domestics to be put to the rack, when Gygis, one of her confidants, discovered the whole. Artaxerxes caused Gygis, who was privy to the crime, to be put to a cruel death; and confined his mother to Babylon, telling her, that he would never set his foot within the gates of that city, while she was there; but, at length, time having alleviated his grief, he allowed her to return to court, where, by an intire submission to his will, she regained his favour, and bore a great sway at court to her death^m.

¹ See before, p. 128.

^m PLUTARCH. in Artaxer.

Tiffaphernes oppresses the Greeks.

The Lacedæmonians make war upon the Persians.

Year of the flood 1948. Bef. Chr. 400.

Dercyllidas's success against Tiffaphernes.

A Persian fleet put under Conon's command.

AFTER the death of Cyrus, Tiffaphernes being sent back to his former government, and moreover invested with the same power which had been given to Cyrus, he began to harass and oppress the Greek cities, that were within the verge of his authority, and had sided with that unfortunate prince. Whereupon they sent ambassadors to the Lacedæmonians, imploring their assistance and protection. The Lacedæmonians, having now ended the long war which they had waged with the Athenians, laid hold of this opportunity of breaking again with the Persians, and sent Thimbro with an army against them, which being strengthened by the conjunction of those forces that Xenophon brought back from Persia, they took the field against Tiffaphernes: but Thimbro being soon recalled, upon some complaints, and sent into banishment, Dercyllidas was appointed to succeed him. As he was both a brave general, and a famous engineer, he was attended with far better success than his predecessor. Upon his first arrival, finding that Tiffaphernes and Pharnabazus, governors of the two neighbouring provinces, were at variance with each other, he made a truce with the former, and, marching against the latter with all his forces, drove him quite out of Æolis, and several cities of other provinces. Pharnabazus, fearing he might invade Phrygia, the chief province of his government, was glad to make a truce with him, leaving him in possession of what he had taken. Upon this truce he marched into Bithynia, where he took up his winter-quarters, to avoid being chargeable to his allies. At the same time Pharnabazus took a journey to the Persian court, and there made loud complaints against Tiffaphernes, for concluding a peace with Dercyllidas, instead of assisting him against the common enemy. He likewise earnestly pressed the king to equip a great fleet, and appoint Conon the Athenian; then an exile in Cyprus, admiral, telling him, that as Conon was the best sea-commander of his time, he might, by that means, obstruct the passage of all farther recruits from Greece, and soon put an end to the power of the Lacedæmonians in Asia. His proposal was approved of by the king, who immediately ordered five hundred talents to be paid him for the equipment of a fleet, with instructions to give Conon the command of it ⁿ.

IN the mean time Dercyllidas, having reduced Atarna, marched into Caria, where Tiffaphernes usually resided; for the Lacedæmonians, believing that, if he were attacked there, he would comply with all their demands, in order to save that province, had sent Dercyllidas express orders to march thither.

ⁿ DIODOR. l. xiv. p. 417. JUSTIN. l. vi. c. 3. PAUSAN. in Atticis.

This Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus no sooner heard, but they united against Dercyllidas, whom they came up with in so disadvantageous a post, that, had they charged him immediately, he must inevitably have perished. Pharnabazus was for attacking him; but Tissaphernes, who at the battle of Cunaxa had experienced their valour, could not be brought to venture an engagement, but sent heralds to Dercyllidas, to invite him to a parley, in which proposals for a peace being offered on both sides, they made a truce till the answer of their respective masters should be known. Thus Dercyllidas, and his army, were saved from utter destruction, through the cowardice of his enemy, when nothing else could have delivered them. row escape

IN the mean time, the Lacedæmonians, receiving accounts from Asia, that the king of Persia was equipping a powerful fleet on the coasts of Phænice, Syria, and Cilicia, and supposing it to be designed, as it truly was, against them, resolved to send Agefilaus, one of their kings, into Asia, in order to make a diversion. All things being ready for this expedition, Agefilaus set sail with a considerable body of troops, and arrived at Ephesus before any of the king's officers had the least intimation of this design: with such secrecy and expedition was the whole managed at Sparta. Agefilaus, upon his arrival, took the field with ten thousand foot, and four thousand horse; and, finding no body in a condition to oppose him, carried all before him. Whereupon Tissaphernes sent a messenger, to inquire for what end he was come into Asia, and why he had taken up arms. Agefilaus replied, that he was come to assist the Greeks inhabiting Asia, and restore them to their antient liberty. Tissaphernes, being quite unprepared for a war, assured Agefilaus, that his master would grant him what he demanded, provided he committed no acts of hostility till the return of an express which he had sent to court. Agefilaus believed him, and a truce was agreed on, and sworn to on both sides: but Tissaphernes, without any regard to his oath, made no other use of this truce, than to assemble troops on all sides; and sent to the king for more forces; and, as soon as he received them, he sent word to Agefilaus to depart Asia, denouncing war against him, in case of refusal. This message greatly alarmed the Lacedæmonians, and their confederates, as not believing themselves in a condition to oppose the now numerous army of Tissaphernes, who had been joined by auxiliaries from all parts of the Persian empire. As for Agefilaus himself, he heard Tissaphernes's heralds with a gay and easy air; and desired them to tell their master, that he was under 1952.

Year of the flood
Bef. Chr.
396.

His army, and success
there.

Over-reached by Tissa-phernes.

His noble message to him.

• DIODOR. 1. xiv. XENOPH. Hellen. 1. iii. & orat. de Agefil.
ÆMIL. PROB.

Success in Phrygia.

great obligations to him for having made the gods, by his perjury, enemies to Persia, and friends to Greece. Having with this answer dismissed the heralds, he drew all his forces together, and made a feint, as if he intended to invade Caria; but, as soon as he understood, that Tissaphernes had caused all his troops to march into that province, he turned short, and fell upon Phrygia. As his coming thither was wholly unexpected, he over-ran great part of the province, without any opposition, took many towns, and, loaded with an immense booty, marched back, by the sea-coast, into Ionia, and wintered at Ephesus ^p.

Outwits Tiffa-
phernes.

EARLY in the spring, Agefilaus took the field, and gave out, that his design was to invade Lydia: but Tissaphernes, who had not forgot the stratagem of the former campaign, took it for granted, that he now truly intended to fall upon Caria; and accordingly made his troops march to the defence of that province: but Agefilaus led his army, as he had given out, into Lydia, and approached Sardis. Whereupon Tissaphernes recalled his forces from their former route, with a design to relieve the place: but Caria being a very mountainous country, and unfit for horse, he had marched thither only with the foot, and left the horse behind, on the borders of that province. Whence, on their marching back to the relief of Sardis, the horse being some days marches before the foot, Agefilaus took the advantage of so favourable an opportunity, and fell upon them before the foot could come up to their assistance. The Persians were routed at the very first onset; and Agefilaus, becoming, by this victory, master of the field, over-ran the whole country, and enriched both himself and his army with the spoils of the conquered Persians ^q.

Defeats
the Persians.

Tiffa-
phernes accused by Conon;

THE loss of this battle greatly incensed the king against Tissaphernes, and increased the suspicion which he had before conceived of him, as if he had something else in view, besides his master's interest. At the same time, Conon, arriving at the Persian court, heightened the king's displeasure with new complaints against him; for he had deprived the soldiers on board Conon's fleet of their pay, and thereby disabled him from doing the king any service. Queen Parysatis, actuated by an irreconcilable hatred against all those who had any share in the death of her son Cyrus, did not fail, on this occasion, to aggravate the charges brought against him. Hereupon the king resolved to put him to death; but, being afraid to attack him openly, by reason of the great authority he had in Asia,

^p XENOPH. Hellen. I. iii. PLUT. in Agefilao. PAUSAN. in Laconic. ^q XENOPH. ibid. p. 501—657. PLUT. in Artaxer. p. 1022. & in Agefil. p. 601.

he charged Tithraustes, captain of the guards, with that important commission, giving him, at the same time, two letters; the one directed to Tissaphernes, and empowering him to pursue the war against the Greeks, in what manner he thought best; the other was addressed to Ariæus, governor of Larissa, commanding him to assist Tithraustes with his counsel, and all his forces, in seizing Tissaphernes. Upon the receipt of this letter, Ariæus desired Tissaphernes to come to him, that they might confer together about the operations of the ensuing campaign. Tissaphernes, who suspected nothing, went to him with a guard only of three hundred men: but while he was bathing, according to the Persian custom, and disarmed, he was seized, and put into the hands of Tithraustes, who caused his head to be struck off, and sent into Persia. The king gave and put to it to Parysatis; an acceptable present to one of her revenge-death. ful temper ^r.

UPON the death of Tissaphernes, Tithraustes, who was appointed to succeed him, sent great presents to Agésilæus, telling him, that the cause of the war being removed, and the first author of all their differences put to death, nothing could prevent an accommodation: that the king his master would allow the Greek cities in Asia to enjoy their liberty, paying him the customary tribute; which was all that the Lacedæmonians required when they first began the war. Agésilæus replied, that he could not come to any agreement without orders from Sparta: however, as he was willing to give Tithraustes the satisfaction of removing out of his province, he marched into Phrygia, which was the province of Pharnabazus, Tithraustes paying him thirty talents to defray the charges of his march. Upon his march he received a letter from the magistrates of Sparta, giving him the command of Agésilæus the fleet, as well as of the land-forces. By this new commis-made chief sion he was appointed sole commander of all the troops in Asia,commander. both by sea and land. This drew him down to the sea-coast,by sea and where he put the fleet in good order, and appointed Pisander,land. his wife's brother, admiral, ordering him forthwith to put to sea. In this he was more influenced by private affection for his brother-in-law, than by the due regard he ought to have had for the public good; for though Pisander was a man of great courage and valour, yet he was not in other respects equal to that trust, as the event sufficiently proved ^s.

AGESILÆUS, having settled the maritime affairs, pursued his His success design of invading Phrygia, where he reduced many cities,against the and amassed great sums of money, maintaining his army on Persians.

^r XENOPH. ubi supra. DIODOR. l. xiv. p. 220. POLYÆN. fragtag. l. vii. ^s PAUSAN. in Laconicis. XEN. & PLUT. ubi supra.

Dascylium taken.

His interview with Pharna-bazus.

Agefilaus recalled.

Year of
the flood 1954.
Bef. Chr.
394.

His bitter sarcasm against the Greeks.

the territories of Pharnabazus, in great affluence. From thence he marched into Paphlagonia, being invited thither by Spithridates, a noble Persian, who had revolted from the king: there he concluded a league with Cotys, king of that country; and, returning into Phrygia, took the strong city of Dascylium, and wintered there in the palace of Pharnabazus, obliging the adjacent countries to supply his army with all sorts of provisions^t. Tithraustes, finding that Agefilaus was for carrying on the war in Asia, sent Timocrates of Rhodes into Greece, with large sums of money, to corrupt the leading men in their cities, and rekindle a war against the Lacedæmonians. This stratagem produced the intended effect; for the cities of Thebes, Argos, Corinth, and others, entering into confederacy, obliged the Lacedæmonians to recal their king, as we shall see in its proper place. In the beginning of the next spring, as Agefilaus was ready to take the field, Pharnabazus invited him to an interview; and, he accepting the invitation, Pharnabazus, after expatiating on the services he had done the Lacedæmonians in their war with the Athenians, reproached them with ingratitude, in the bitterest terms, since, in return for so many favours, they had pillaged his palace, and ravaged his lands at Dascylium, which were his hereditary estate. As what he had said was true, Agefilaus, and the Lacedæmonians that attended him, were to such a degree ashamed, in seeing themselves so justly upbraided with ingratitude, that they knew not what to answer, nor how to excuse such an ungenerous proceeding: however, to make him the best amends they could, they obliged themselves by a solemn promise, not to invade any of the provinces under his government, so long as there were others into which they might carry the war against the Persian king. They were as good as their word; and immediately withdrew, with a design to invade the upper parts of Asia, and prosecute the war in the very heart of the Persian empire. But while Agefilaus was projecting this expedition, a messenger arrived at the camp from Sparta, acquainting him, that the ephori recalled him, to defend his own country, against which several states of Greece had formed a strong confederacy: he readily complied with this order, and made all the haste thither he could; but complained at his departure, that the Persians had driven him out of Asia with thirty thousand archers, alluding to the Persian darics, which were pieces of gold, stamped on one side with the figure of an archer^u.

^t PLUT. in Agefil. XEN. Hellen. l. iv. p. 507, 510. ^u XEN. ubi supra, p. 513. PLUT. in Apophthegm. Lacon. & Artax. See also before, p. 129, 130.

CONON, on his return from the Persian court, having brought money enough to pay the soldiers and mariners their arrears, and supply the fleet with arms and provisions, took Pharnabazus on board, and forthwith set sail in quest of the enemy. The Persian fleet consisted of ninety vessels and upwards; that of the Lacedæmonians was not so numerous, but their ships were larger. They came in view of each other near Cnidus, a maritime city of Asia Minor. Conon, who had, in some measure, occasioned the taking of Athens, by losing the sea-fight at Ægospotamos, or the Goats river, was determined to use his utmost efforts, in order to retrieve that misfortune, and efface, by a glorious victory, the disgrace of his former defeat. On the other hand, Pisander was desirous to justify, by his conduct and valour, the choice which Agefilaus his brother-in-law had made in appointing him admiral. In effect, he behaved with extraordinary courage, and had at first some advantage. But Conon having boarded his ship, and killed him with his own hand, the rest of the fleet betook themselves to flight. Conon pursued them, took fifty of their ships, and, having gained a complete victory, put an end to the power of the Lacedæmonians in those parts ^u. The Lacedæmonians defeated at Cnidus.

AFTER this victory, Conon and Pharnabazus, being masters at sea, sailed round the islands and coasts of Asia, reducing the cities, which, in those parts, were subject to the Lacedæmonians. Sestus and Abydus were the only two cities that held out against them. Pharnabazus attacked them by land, and Conon by sea; but neither succeeding in the attempt, the former, on the approach of winter, retired home; leaving Conon to take care of the fleet, and strengthen it with as many ships as he could assemble from the cities on the Hellepont against the ensuing spring ^w. Conon and Pharnabazus's success against the Asiatic islands.

CONON having assembled, pursuant to his commission, a powerful fleet against the time appointed, he took Pharnabazus again on board, and, steering his course through the islands, landed in Melos, the most distant of them all. Having reduced this island, as lying very convenient for the invading of Laconia, the country of the Lacedæmonians, he made from thence a descent on the coasts of that province, pillaged all the maritime places, and loaded his fleet with an immense booty. After this, Pharnabazus returning to his government of Phrygia, Conon obtained leave of him to repair to Athens with eighty ships, and fifty talents, in order to rebuild the walls of that city; which he did accordingly, as will be related in the history of Greece.

^u XENOPH. ubi supra, p. 518. DIOD. l. xiv. p. 302. JUSTIN. l. vi. c. 2, 3. ÆMIL. PROB. in CONON. ^w XENOPH. ibid. p. 534. DIOD. l. xiv. p. 441. ÆMIL. PROB. ibid. PLUT. in Agefil. JUSTIN. l. vi. c. 5.

THE Lacedæmonians could not behold, without great concern, so glorious a revolution; and, finding themselves unable to maintain a war with men as brave as themselves, assisted with the treasures of Persia, dispatched Antalcidas, one of their citizens, to Tiribazus, governor of Sardis, injoining him to conclude a peace with Artaxerxes upon the most advantageous terms he could. The other cities of Greece, in alliance with the Athenians, sent, at the same time, their deputies; and Conon was at the head of those from Athens. The terms which Antalcidas proposed, were, that the king should possess all the Greek cities in Asia; but the islands, and other cities in Greece, should enjoy their liberty, and be governed by their own laws. As these proposals were very advantageous to the king, and dishonourable to the Greeks in general, the other ambassadors were all unanimous in rejecting them. The Lacedæmonians, bearing an implacable hatred to Conon for the restoring of Athens, had charged Antalcidas to accuse him to Tiribazus, of having purloined the king's money for carrying on of that work, and of having formed a design for the taking Æolis and Ionia from the Persians, and uniting them anew to the republic of Athens. Upon these accusations, Tiribazus seized him; and, having supplied the Lacedæmonians under-hand with considerable sums of money for the equipping of a fleet against the Athenians, set out for the Persian court, to give the king an account of his negotiations. Artaxerxes was well pleased with the terms, which the Lacedæmonians had proposed, and directed him to put the last hand to the treaty. At the same time, Tiribazus laid before the king the accusations which the Lacedæmonians had brought against Conon; whereupon he was, according to some writers^z, sent to Susa, and there put to death by the king's command; but the silence of Xenophon, who was his cotemporary, as to his death, makes us doubt of the truth of this event.

Conon
accused and disgraced.

WHILE Tiribazus was attending the court, Suthras was charged to guard the coasts of Asia in his absence. On this occasion, observing the havock which the Lacedæmonians had made in all the maritime provinces, he conceived such an aversion to them, that he sent what supplies he could spare to their enemies the Athenians. This obliged the Lacedæmonians to send Thymbro into Asia, to renew the war there; but as they were not in a condition to supply him with men or money sufficient for such an undertaking, he was soon cut off, and his army dispersed, by the superior power of the Persians. Diphridas was sent in his room to carry on the war with the scattered remains of his army; but was attended with no better success, all their attempts upon Asia, after the battle of Cnidus, being but faint struggles of a declining power. In the mean time, Tiribazus, returning from Susa, summoned all the deputies of the Greek cities to be present at the reading of the treaty, which had been already approved of by the king. The terms were; that all the Greek cities in Asia should be subject to the king of Persia, and, besides, the islands of Cyprus and Clazomena; that the islands of Scyros, Lemnos, and Imbros, should be restored to the Athenians; and all the cities of Greece, whether small or great, should be declared free. By the same treaty, Artaxerxes engaged to join those who had accepted the terms he proposed, and assist them, to the utmost of his power, against such as should reject them. These conditions were equally disadvantageous and dishonourable to the Grecian name: however, as Greece was extremely weakened and exhausted by domestic divisions, and therefore no ways in a condition to carry on a war against so powerful a prince, they were all forced to swear to the treaty. This is called the peace of Antalcidas; for he was the first that proposed it; giving up to the Persians, with the utmost injustice and baseness, all the Greeks settled in Asia, for whose liberty Agésilas had so long contended ^b.

^z CORNEL. NEP. in Conone.

The peace of Antalcidas.

Year of
the flood 1955.
Bef. Chr.
393.

ARTAXERXES, being now quite disengaged from the Grecian war, turned his whole power against Evagoras king of Cyprus, whom he had long before designed to drive out of that island; but had never been at leisure to put his design in execution. Evagoras was descended from the antient kings of Salamine, the capital city of the island of Cyprus. His ancestors had held that city for many ages, in quality of sovereigns; but were at last driven out by the Persians; who, making themselves masters of the whole island, reduced it to a Persian province. Evagoras, who was a man of extraordinary parts, not brooking to live in subjection to a foreign yoke, expelled Abdymon a Citian, governor of Salamine for the king of Persia, and took possession of his paternal kingdom. Artaxerxes attempted to recover that city; but, being diverted by the Greek war, and finding Evagoras determined to hold out to the last, gave over, or rather put off, that en-

Artaxerxes bends of all his forces against Evagoras.

^b XENOPH. l. iv. p. 548—551. DIOD. ubi supra, p. 447. PLUT. in Agefil. & apophthegm. Laconic. JUSTIN. l. vi. c. 5. ÆMIL. PROB. in Conone.

terprize. In the mean time, Conon, by means of Ctesias the Cnidian, who was chief physician to Artaxerxes, made up all differences between Evagoras and Artaxerxes; the latter promising not to molest him in the possession of his small kingdom: but Evagoras, who was every way qualified for great undertakings, could not content himself with the city of Salamine alone. He extended his dominions, and by degrees made himself master, in a manner, of the whole island of Cyprus. The Arbusians, Solians, and Citians, alone of those islanders, held out against him. These had recourse to Artaxerxes, who, becoming jealous of the power of this active and wise prince, promised them an immediate and powerful support; but, being employed elsewhere, he could not perform his promise so soon as he expected. Having at length concluded a peace with the Greeks, he bent all his force against Evagoras, determined to drive him quite out of the island. The Athenians, notwithstanding the treaty of peace lately made with the Persians, and the many favours received at their king's hands, could not forbear assisting their old ally, who had befriended them on all occasions. Having therefore equipped ten men of war, they sent them with all possible expedition, under the command of Philocrates, to assist him. But the Lacedæmonian fleet, commanded by Telautias, brother to Agesilaus, falling in with them near the isle of Rhodes, surrounded them; so that not one ship could escape. The Athenians, determined to assist Evagoras at all adventures, sent Chabrias with another fleet, and a considerable number of land-forces on board, to join him. This new supply arrived safe, and, in a short time, obliged the whole island to submit to Evagoras. But the Athenians being forced, by the articles of a new treaty concluded between Artaxerxes and the cities of Greece, to recall Chabrias, the Persians attacked, with all their forces, the island of Cyprus, not doubting but they should soon reduce it, since no supplies could be sent thither from Greece. The king's army consisted of three hundred thousand men, and his fleet of three hundred ships. The land-forces were commanded by Orontes, son-in-law to Artaxerxes, and the fleet by Gaus, the son of Tamus, whom we have mentioned above. Tiribazus was commander in chief, both of the sea and land-forces. Evagoras, finding himself threatened with so dreadful a war, had recourse to all those princes, who were at enmity with the Persians, receiving supplies both of men and money from the Egyptians, Libyans, Arabians, Tyrians, and other nations: besides, as he had amassed immense treasures, he hired a great number of mercenaries of various

Athenians assist him against the Persians.

Defeated by the Lacedæmo-nians.

Chabrias sent against them, but recalled.

The Persians invade Cyprus with 300,000 men.

Year of
the flood 1962.
Bef. Chr.
386.

^c XENOPH. ubi supra. DIOD. I. xv. p. 459.

nations. As he had about ninety ships, that is, seventy of his own, and twenty from Tyre, he constantly intercepted all the enemy's ships that brought provisions from the continent; and thereby reduced their numerous army, after their landing in the island, to such straits, that they began to mutiny, and killed several of their officers; but the whole Persian fleet putting to sea, the army was again plentifully supplied from Cilicia. At the same time Evagoras likewise received a great supply of corn, and fifty ships, from Egypt, which, together with those he had already, and sixty more which he caused to be fitted out with all speed, making up a fleet of two hundred sail, he advanced to attack the whole naval force of the Persians. At first he had the advantage, and took, or destroyed, several of the enemy's ships; but Gaus, advancing with a few of his fleet, fell upon him with such vigour, that Evagoras was obliged to retire, after an obstinate resistance. The rest of the Persian ships, being encouraged by the example of their admiral, returned to the charge, and at last obtained a complete victory, driving the enemy's ships into their harbours. Evagoras, with a few ships, escaped to Salamine; where he was immediately closely besieged both by land and sea. After this victory, Tiribazus went in person to acquaint the king with the success that attended his arms in Cyprus; and, having obtained two thousand talents for the use of the army, he returned, with that new supply, to carry on the war more vigorously than ever. During his absence, Evagoras, leaving the defence of the city to his son Pythagoras, got through the enemy's fleet in the dead of the night, with ten ships, and sailed for Egypt, in hopes of engaging Achoris, king of that country, to join him with all his forces: but, not obtaining from him the aid he expected, and finding, on his return, the city reduced to the last extremities, and himself destitute of all means of raising the siege, he was obliged to capitulate. The proposals made to him were, that he should abandon all the cities of Cyprus, except Salamine, which he should hold of the king, as a servant of his lord, and pay an annual tribute. The extremity, to which he was reduced, obliged him to accept the other conditions, hard as they were; but he could by no means be brought to consent to that of holding Salamine as a servant under his master, and persisted in declaring, that he would hold it no otherwise than as a king under a king. Tiribazus, who commanded in chief, would not make the least alteration, nor abate any thing of his pretensions; whereupon Evagoras, being determined to die sword in hand, rather than yield to such terms, broke off the conference, and applied himself intirely to the defence of the city^d.

Evagoras
defeated at sea.

Salamine besieged by sea and land.

Evagoras offers to capitulate.

Year of
the flood 1963.
Bef. Chr.
385.

^d DIOD. l. xv. p. 459, & seqq.

Obtains a better treaty from Orontes.

IN the mean time Orontes, who commanded the land-forces, not being able to brook the superiority which Tiribazus had over him, as being intrusted with the whole management of the war, and jealous of the success that attended him, wrote secretly to court, accusing him, amongst other things, of forming designs against the king's interest, and holding a private correspondence with the Lacedæmonians. Upon the receipt of these letters, Artaxerxes immediately dispatched orders to Orontes to seize Tiribazus, and send him prisoner to court; which being, without delay, put in execution (P), the chief command was conferred upon Orontes. Orontes, finding the army ready to mutiny under his command, made haste to conclude a treaty with Evagoras upon the terms which Tiribazus had rejected; viz. that he should hold Salamine as king of that city, paying only a small tribute to the king of Persia. Thus the siege was raised, and a peace concluded with Evagoras, after a war which had cost the Persians above fifty thousand talents, that is, near ten millions of our money. For the elogy and character of this prince, we refer the reader to Isocrates ^e.

Gaus revolts.

THE peace concluded with Evagoras did not put an end to the war in those parts; for Gaus, resenting the unjust usage of Tiribazus, whose daughter he had married, and fearing to be involved in the same prosecution with his father-in-law, and put to death on bare suspicions, sent deputies to Achoris king of Egypt; and, having concluded an alliance with him against the king of Persia, openly revolted, and was joined by a great part both of the fleet and army, most of the officers being intirely at his devotion. He likewise solicited the Lacedæmonians to come into the league, assuring them, that he, in his turn, would, at the end of the war, employ all his forces in their favour, and make them masters of all Greece. They hearkened favourably to these proposals, and embraced with joy such an opportunity of making war upon the Persians, being highly dissatisfied with the peace of Antalcidas. But, before matters were ripe for execution, Gaus was treacherously

Is killed.

^e ISOCRAT. in Evagor. DIOD. ubi supra.

(P) Orontes, it seems, dread- which was covered with some ing his power with the army, rich tapestry; so that he sunk was forced to catch him by a into the bottom as soon as he stratagem; that is, by inviting had seated himself on the chair him to a private interview, and prepared for him, and was that placing him upon the entrance very night privately sent bound of a deep cave, the mouth of to the king (1).

(1) Polyæn. stratagem. l. vii.

slain

slain by one of his own officers; and Tachis, who took upon him to carry on the same design, died soon after; whereby the vast preparations they made came to nothing: and the Lacedæmonians never afterwards meddled with the affairs of Asia ^f.

ARTAXERXES had no sooner finished the Cyprian war, but Artaxerxes entered upon another against the Cadusians, who probably had revolted from him. This people inhabited the mountains between the Euxine and Caspian seas, and, being from their infancy inured to an hard and laborious life, were accounted a very warlike race. The king marched in person against them, at the head of three hundred thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse; but the country, by reason of its barrenness, not affording provisions sufficient to maintain so numerous an army, they were soon reduced to feed upon the beasts of burden, which accompanied the army; and these became so scarce, that an ass's head was sold for sixty drachmas. The king's provisions too began to fall short, and only a few horses remained. In this sad posture of affairs, Tiribazus contrived a stratagem, which saved the king and the army. He followed the court in this expedition, or rather was carried about as a prisoner, being in disgrace by reason of the crimes laid to his charge by Orontes, as we have said above. The Cadusians had two kings, who were encamped apart from each other. Tiribazus, who took care to be informed of all that passed in the enemy's camp, found that there was some misunderstanding between them; and that the jealousy and mistrust which they had of each other, prevented their acting in concert. Whereupon he advised the king to enter into a treaty with them; and, taking upon himself the whole management of it, went in person to one of the kings, and sent his son to the other. Each of them informed the king to whom they applied, that the other had sent embassadors to treat separately with Artaxerxes, and advised him to lose no time, but make his peace as soon as possible, that the conditions might be the more advantageous. Their negotiations had the desired effect, and both princes were brought separately to submit to the king, which saved both him and his army from impending destruction ^h (Q).

Year of the flood 1964.
Bef. Chr.
384.

^f DIOD. l. xv. ^g STRABO, l. xi. p. 507—510. ^h PLUT, in Artax. p. 1023, 1024. DIOD. xv. p. 462.

(Q) A modern writer is of opinion (76), that the Cadusians were descended from the Israelites of the ten tribes, which the king of Assyria carried out of the land of Canaan; but as he has no other foundation to ground his opinion upon, but the similitude between the words Cadusian and Kedushim, which signifies holy people, we cannot fall in with him.

(76) Fuller miscel. l. ii. c. 5.

THE king lost, in this ill-projected expedition, a great number of his best troops, and all his horses. Among others who lost their lives on this occasion, was Camissares, by nation a Carian, a man of extraordinary courage and conduct. He was governor of Leuco-Syria, a province lying between Cilicia and Cappadocia; and was succeeded in that government by his son Datames, who attended Artaxerxes in this expedition, and distinguished himself in a very particular manner: Datames was the greatest commander of his time; and by none ever exceeded, as Cornelius Nepos, who has written his life, informs us, in courage, boldness, and abilities, for contriving and executing military stratagems. But his eminent qualities, and too great merit, occasioned his ruin, as we shall have occasion to relate hereafter.

Datames's excellent character.

Tiribazus acquitted, and in high favour.

Artaxerxes renews the war with Egypt.

Iphicrates's excellent discipline.

ON the king's return to Susa, the eminent service which Tiribazus had done him in that expedition, inclined him to have his cause thoroughly examined, and to grant him a fair hearing. For that purpose he appointed three commissioners, who were all of eminent rank, and distinguished probity: these, after an impartial discussion of the whole affair, were unanimous in declaring him innocent; whereupon he was by the king restored to his former honours, and Orontes, his accuser, with disgrace banished the court^h.

ARTAXERXES, being now at leisure from all other engagements, resolved to reduce the Egyptians, who had long before shaken off the Persian yoke; and accordingly made great preparations for that war. Achoris, who then reigned in Egypt, foreseeing the storm, was not wanting on his side to provide against it the best he could. He joined a great number of Greeks, and other mercenaries, under the command of Chabrias the Athenian, to his own subjects. Pharnabazus, being charged with the management of this war, sent ambassadors to Athens, complaining of Chabrias for engaging to serve against the king of Persia, with whom the state of Athens lived in amity, and threatening the republic with his master's resentment, if he were not immediately recalled. He demanded, at the same time, Iphicrates, another Athenian, and the best general of his time, to command the Greek mercenaries in the Persian service. The Athenians, who had then a great dependence on the Persian king's friendship, to support them against their domestic enemies, recalled Chabrias, ordering him to repair to Athens on pain of death, by a certain day. Iphicrates was sent to take upon him the command of the Greek mercenaries in the Persian army. On his arrival, having mustered the forces he was to command, he so exercised them in all the arts of war, that they became very famous among the Greeks, under the name of Iphicratesian soldiers: and, indeed, he had time enough to instruct them, before they entered upon action; for the Persians being very slow in their preparations, two whole years elapsed before they were in a condition to take the field. Achoris king of Egypt died in Achoris the mean time, and was succeeded by Psammuthis, who reigned dies in E- only a year. After him Nepherotes reigned four months, and gypt. then Nectanebus, the first of the Sebennytic race, twelve years ^{i.}

JOHNSON ON

^h DIOD. ubi supra, p. 463.

ARTAXERXES, that he might draw more auxiliaries out of Greece for his Egyptian war, sent ambassadors thither, to put an end to their domestic broils; and declare, in his name, to the different states and cities of that country, that it was his pleasure they should live in peace with each other, upon the terms of the treaty of Antalcidas; and that, all garisons being withdrawn, each city should be left to enjoy their liberty, and live according to their own laws. This declaration was received with pleasure by all the cities of Greece, except the Thebans, who, aspiring to the empire of all Greece, refused to conform to it ^{k.}

At length, all things being in a readiness for the invasion of His unsuc- Egypt, the Persian army was drawn together at Ace, since cessful ex- called Ptolemais, the place of the general rendezvous. In a pedition review there, the army was found to consist of two hundred against thousand Persians, under the command of Pharnabazus, and Egypt. twenty thousand Greeks, under that of Iphicrates. Their forces by sea were in proportion to those by land; for their fleet consisted of three hundred galleys, besides an incredible number of vessels which followed, to furnish both the fleet and the army with necessary provisions. The army and fleet began to move at the same time; and, that they might act in concert, they separated as little as possible. The war was to begin with the siege of Pelustum: but Nectanebus, having had sufficient time to provide for the defence of that place, had rendered the approach to it impracticable, both by sea and land. The fleet therefore, instead of making a descent, as had been at first projected, failed from thence to the Mendesian mouth of the Nile; for the Nile, at that time, emptied itself into the sea by seven different chanel; and each of these was defended by a fort and a strong garison: but the Mendesian mouth of The Men- the Nile not being so well fortified as the Pelusian, where the desian enemy was expected, they landed their forces there without fort taken. great opposition, carried the fortrefs that guarded it, and put Iphicra- all the Egyptians that were found in it to the sword. After tes's propo- this action, Iphicrates was for reimbarking the troops without sal of at- tacking

Year of
the flood 1973.
Bef. Chr.
375.

ⁱ EUSEB. CHRON. SYNCCELL. p. 257. ^k DIOD. l. xv. p. 478. Memphis lost rejected.

loss of time, and attacking Memphis, the capital of Egypt. Had this opinion been followed, before the Egyptians recovered from the consternation, which so formidable an invasion, and the blow already received, had thrown them into, they would have found the place without any defence, and must have certainly taken it, and re-conquered all Egypt. But the main body of the army not being yet come up, Pharnabazus would undertake nothing before their arrival. Iphicrates, in the utmost despair to see so favourable an opportunity lost, which perhaps might never be retrieved, made pressing instances for leave to attempt the place, with the mercenaries only that were under his command: but Pharnabazus, out of a mean jealousy of the honour that would redound to Iphicrates, should he succeed in the enterprize, would by no means hearken to his proposal. This delay gave the Egyptians time to recover their courage, and put themselves in a condition to oppose any farther attempts, as we have related elsewhere ^l. Thus ended this war, which had cost immense sums, two whole years having been spent in making the necessary preparations for so fruitless an attempt. The only effect that it produced, was an irreconcilable enmity between the two generals; for Pharnabazus, to excuse himself, laid the whole blame of the miscarriage upon Iphicrates; and he, with more reason, on Pharnabazus: but, being well apprised, that Pharnabazus would find more credit at the Persian court than he, and remembering what had happened to Conon, that he might not meet with the like fate, privately hired a ship, and retired to Athens ^m.

Iphicrates forced to retire to Athens.

The Egyptian war renewed.

Year of
the flood 1985.
Bef. Chr.
363.

TWELVE years after this expedition, Artaxerxes, who had not laid aside the thoughts of subjecting Egypt, notwithstanding his many miscarriages in that attempt, began to make new preparations for invading of that country. Tacnos, who had succeeded Nectanebus, drew together what forces he could, to defend himself against so powerful an enemy: but, having marched out of Egypt into Phœnicie, in order to attack the Persians there, the Egyptians revolted in his absence, and set up Nectanebus in his stead, who drove him quite out of Egypt, as we have related elsewhere ⁿ.

TOWARDS the latter end of the reign of Artaxerxes, great disturbances arose in the Persian court, rent into factions by his sons, each making parties among the nobility to support his pretensions to the crown. He had an hundred and fifteen sons by his concubines, and three by his queen, viz. Darius, Ari- aspes, and Ochus. To put a stop to these practices and contentions, he declared Darius the elder his successor; and, the better to settle him on the throne, allowed him to assume the title of king, and wear the tiara, even in his life-time; but this not contenting the young prince's ambition, who was also disgusted with his father, for refusing him one of his concubines, whom he demanded, he formed a design against the old king's life, and engaged in the conspiracy fifty of his brothers. Tiribazus, whom we have often mentioned in this history, contributed the most to his taking this unnatural resolution, and that for a like subject of discontent. Artaxerxes had promised him in marriage one of his daughters; but, falling in love with her, married her himself; and, to make him amends, having promised him another daughter, he married that likewise. These two disappointments provoked Tiribazus to such a degree, that, to revenge the affront, he stirred up the young king to that wicked attempt. The number of the conspirators was already very formidable, and the day fixed for the execution of their design; when an eunuch, who was privy to the plot, discovered it to the king; whereupon the conspirators were seized, as they were entering the king's palace, and all put to death^m.

^l See vol. ii. p. 103. ^m DIOD. l. xv. p. 478. ⁿ See vol. ii. p. 104. & DIOD. l. xv. p. 397—401. PLUT. in Agefil. p. 616, 618. XENOPH. PLUT. & CORN. NEP. in Agefil.

DARIUS being thus cut off, the same contention was revived, which, before his being declared king, had rent the court into several factions. Three of his brothers were competitors, Ariaspes, Ochus, and Arsames. The two first claimed the crown in right of their birth, being the king's sons by his queen; the third only by the king's favour, who tenderly loved him, though only the son of a concubine. Ochus, prompted by his restless ambition, found means to get rid of his two rivals; for Ariaspes being of an easy temper, and very credulous, he suborned the eunuchs of the palace to threaten him, in the king's name, in such a manner, that, expecting every moment to be treated as Darius had been, he poisoned himself, to avoid a more cruel death. But Arsames still remaining to rival him in his pretensions, and being, for his wisdom, and other princely virtues, in the opinion of his father, and all others, the most worthy of the crown, he caused him to be assassinated by Harpates the son of Tiribazus. This loss, added to the former, and the wickedness which attended both, overwhelmed the king, who was then ninety-four years old, with such grief, that, not being able to bear up against it, he broke his heart, and died, in the forty-sixth year of his reignⁿ. He was a mild and generous prince, and governed with great Artaxerxes declares his son Darius his successor, who conspires against him.

Tiribazus joins in the conspiracy.

They are detected, and put to death.

Ochus rid himself of his two contending brothers.

Artaxerxes Mneumon dies.

^m PLUT. in Artaxer. JUSTIN, l. x. c. 1, 2. ⁿ DIOD. l. xv. p. 506. PLUT. ibid.

Year of
the flood 1989.
Bef. Chr.
359.

Ochus takes the name of Artaxerxes.

clemency and justice; whence he was honoured, and his authority respected, throughout all the empire. This Ochus was sensible of, and well knew, that it would be quite otherwise with him; the death of his two brothers having alienated the minds both of the nobility and people. To avoid the inconveniences that might attend this general hatred and aversion, he prevailed with the eunuchs and others, that were about the king's person, to conceal his death; and took upon himself the administration of affairs, giving orders, and issuing decrees, in the name of Artaxerxes, as if he had been still alive. By one of these decrees, he caused himself, as by his father's order, to be proclaimed king throughout the whole empire°. After having thus governed near ten months, believing his authority sufficiently established, he at length declared the death of his father, and openly ascended the throne, taking the name of Artaxerxes. Historians however most frequently call him Ochus; and under this name we shall speak of him in the sequel of this history.

A great number of provinces revolt from him.

It was no sooner known, that Artaxerxes was dead, and Ochus in possession of the throne, but all Asia Minor, Syria, Phœnice, and many other provinces, openly revolted. The chief men concerned in this revolt were, Ariobarzanes governor of Phrygia, Mausolus king of Caria, Orontes governor of Mysia, and Antophradates governor of Lydia. Datames likewise, whom we have mentioned before, was engaged in the rebellion, being at that time governor of Cappadocia. By this, as we may call it, general insurrection, half the revenues of the crown were, on a sudden, diverted into different channels; and the remainder had not been sufficient to carry on the war against so many revolters, had they acted in concert; but they

Their leaders fall out among themselves, and betray each other.

did not long keep firm to each other; and those, who had been the first and most zealous in shaking off the yoke, strove who should soonest betray the others, and thereby make their peace with the king. The provinces of Asia Minor, on withdrawing their obedience, had entered into a confederacy for their mutual defence, and chosen Orontes for their general. They had also resolved to add twenty thousand mercenaries to their own troops, and charged Orontes with the care of raising them; but, when he had a sufficient sum both for the raising those forces, and maintaining of them for a year, he kept the money for himself, and delivered up to the king those who had brought it to him from the revolted provinces. Rheomitres, another of the chiefs of Asia Minor, being sent into Egypt, to negotiate succours in that kingdom, was guilty of the like treachery; for, having brought from thence five hundred talents, and fifty ships of war, and assembled the ring-leaders of the revolt at Leucas, a city of Asia Minor, under pretence of giving them an account of his negotiations, he seized them all, and made his peace with the king, by betraying them into his hands. Thus this formidable revolt, which had brought the Persian empire to the very brink of ruin, came to nothing; and Ochus was, without striking a blow, settled on the throne P. Only Datames, governor of Cappadocia, having possessed himself also of Paphlagonia, gave him much trouble. By what we read of him in Cornelius Nepos ^q and Polyænus ^r, it appears, that he maintained himself a long time in both those provinces; and was at last murdered by the treachery of Mithridates, one of his intimates (S). Datames holds out against Ochus, and is murdered.

° POLYÆN. stratag. l. vii.

OCHUS was the most cruel and wicked of all the princes of that race in Persia; for he had not been long on the throne, when he filled the palace, and the whole empire, with blood and slaughter. That the revolted provinces might have none of the blood royal to set up against him, and to rid himself at once of all the uneasiness, which the princes of the royal family might give him, he put them all to death, without any regard to sex, age, or proximity of blood. He caused Ocha, his own sister and mother-in-law, for he had married her daughter, to be buried alive; and, having shut up one of his uncles, with an hundred of his sons and grandsons, in a court of the palace, he ordered his archers to dispatch them with their arrows ^s. This uncle seems to have been the father of Sisigambis, mother to Darius Codomannus; for Q. Curtius tells us, that Ochus caused eighty of her brothers, together with their father, to be massacred in one day ^t. With the same barbarity he treated all those, who gave him any umbrage, sparing none of the nobility, who betrayed the least mark of discontent or disaffection to his person. Ochus's bloody reign, and character.

Year of the flood 1990.
Bef. Chr.
358.

P DIOD. l. xv. p. 504—506. POLYÆN. stratag. l. vii. q CORN. NEP. in vita Datam. r POLYÆN. stratag. l. vii. s JUSTIN. l. x. c. 3. VAL. MAX. l. ix. c. 2. t Lib. x. c. 8.

(S) Diodorus Siculus (79) places this revolt in the last year of Artaxerxes; but as he was highly esteemed and beloved by his subjects, it is not likely, that so great an insurrection happened under him. We have therefore placed it in the reign of his successor Ochus, whose cruelty, chiefly in the murder of his two brothers, incensed the nobility and governors of the provinces against him, who therefore refused to submit to him. As he took the name of Artaxerxes, this may have led Diodorus into the mistake of placing in the father's reign what happened in the son's.

(79) Diod. l. xv. p. 400.

Artabazus revolts. BUT all the cruelties he practised could not keep his subjects in awe. Artabazus, governor of one of the Asiatic provinces, rebelled, and engaged Chares the Athenian to join him with a fleet, and body of troops, which he commanded in those parts. Ochus sent an army of seventy thousand men against the rebels; but they were, by Chares, and his Athenians, all cut in pieces. Chares's success against Ochus. Artabazus, in reward of so great a service, gave Chares a sum of money sufficient to pay his fleet, and the forces he had on board. The king highly resented this conduct of the Athenians, and, as they were then engaged in a war with the Chians, Rhodians, Coans, and Byzantines, threatened to join their enemies with a numerous fleet, if they did not recal Chares. The Athenians, fearing to provoke so powerful an enemy, ordered Chares to return forthwith into Greece ^u.

Recalled.

ARTABAZUS, being thus deserted by the Athenians, had recourse to the Thebans; who sent to his assistance a body of five thousand men, under the command of the brave Pammenes.

Thebans success against Ochus, and bought off.

With this reinforcement Artabazus again took the field, and gained two very considerable victories over the king's forces; which greatly redounded to the honour of the Thebans, and their commander ^w. However, they made their peace soon after with the king, who having given them three hundred talents, they returned home. Artabazus, thus destitute of all support, was at last overcome, and forced to take refuge with Philip of Macedon ^x.

The Phœnicians, &c. revolt.

THIS rebellion was scarce quelled, when several others broke out in divers parts of the empire. The Sidonians, and other Phœnicians, being oppressed by those the king had set over them, taking up arms, entered into a confederacy with Nectanebus king of Egypt; and, being assisted by that prince with four thousand Greek mercenaries, drove the Persians quite out of their territories ^y.

Cypriots join in the revolt.

THE Cypriots, being likewise ill-used by their Persian governors, and encouraged by this success of the Phœnicians, joined with them and the Egyptians in the same alliance ^z. Hereupon Ochus dispatched his orders to Idriens king of Caria, injoining him to invade the island of Cyprus, and make war upon the inhabitants, putting all to fire and sword. Idriens, in compliance with his command, having equipped a fleet, sent it, with eight thousand Greek mercenaries, under the command of Phocion an Athenian, and Evagoras (T), to make

^u Diod. l. xvi. p. 527, 528. ^w Idem ibid. ^x Idem, p. 438. ^y See vol. ii. p. 360. & Diod. l. xvi. p. 531—533. ^z Diod. ubi supra, p. 532.

(T) Another Evagoras had Salamine, whom we have spoke formerly reigned in the city of of above. On his death, he was succeeded make a descent in the island. The troops landed without any considerable opposition, and, being reinforced with other bodies from Syria and Cilicia, besieged Salamine by sea and land ^a.

OCHUS, finding that his lieutenants made no progress against the Egyptians and Phœnicians, resolved to head his forces in person; and accordingly, having drawn together a formidable army, he marched at the head of it into Phœnice, where the city of Sidon was betrayed to him by Mentor the Rhodian, and Tennes king of the place, as we have related elsewhere ^b. The ruin and total destruction of Sidon terrified the other cities of Phœnice to such a degree, that they all voluntarily submitted to the conqueror; each of them making peace with the king upon the best terms they could: neither was Ochus unwilling to compound with them, that he might be no longer retarded from putting in execution the designs he had upon Egypt ^c.

BUT, before he marched thither, his army received from Greece a reinforcement of ten thousand mercenaries; for the Thebans sent him a thousand men, under the command of Lachares, and the Argives three thousand, commanded by Nicostratus: the rest joined him from the Greek cities of Asia. The Athenians and Lacedæmonians excused themselves, telling the king's ambassadors, that they should be glad to maintain peace and friendship with their master; but could not, at that time, spare him any succours ^d. The Jews also seem to have been engaged in this revolt of Phœnice; for Ochus, from Sidon, marched into Judea, where he besieged and took Jericho, carrying along with him into Egypt a great many captive Jews, and sending others into Hyrkania, where they were planted in the provinces bordering on the Caspian sea ^e.

OCHUS,

^a DIOD. ubi supra. ^b See vol. ii. p. 360, 361. ^c DIOD. l. xvi. p. 531, 532, &c. ^d Idem ibid. p. 533. ^e SOLIN. c. 35. SYNCELL. ex Africano, p. 256. OROS. l. xxxi. c. 7. JOSEPH. l. i. contra Apion. ARIST. in lib. de LXX. interpret. JUSTIN. l. xxxvi. c. 5.

succeeded by Nicoles his son; and this Evagoras seems to have been the son of Nicoles, and to have succeeded him in that kingdom; but, being driven out by Protogoras his uncle, was in banishment when this war began. He gladly joined the Persians, in hopes of recovering his crown; and the knowlege he had of the country, made him a very proper person to command in this expedition (80). Cyprus had then nine chief cities, and each of them had its king, but subject and tributary to the king of (80) Isocrat. in Evag. & Nicoel.

Cypriots OCHUS, at the same time, put an end to the Cyprian war, and compounded with the nine Cyprian kings. Having his mind intirely bent on the reducing of Egypt, he willingly redressed all their grievances, and confirmed them in their respective governments ^f.

1998. OCHUS, having thus settled the affairs both of Phænice and Cyprus, set out on his Egyptian expedition. On his march he lost a great many men, who were drowned in the lake of Serbonis, which lies between Phænice and Egypt, and extends about thirty miles. When the south-wind blows, the whole surface of the water is covered with sand from the desert, in such manner that no one can distinguish it from the firm land. Several parties of Ochus's army, for want of good guides, were lost in it; and we are told, that intire armies have there met with the same fate ^g. When he arrived on the frontiers of Egypt, he detached three bodies to invade the country, each body being commanded by a Persian and a Greek general. The first was led by Lachares the Theban, and Rofaces, governor of Lydia and Ionia; the second by Nicostratus the Theban, and Aristazanes; the third by Mentor the Rhodian, and Bagoas one of his eunuchs. The main body of the army he kept with himself, and encamped near Pelufium, with a design to watch there the events of the war: but of the success that attended him in this expedition, viz. the total and final reduction of Egypt, we have spoken in the history of that country ^h.

OCHUS, having thus ended the Egyptian war, sent back the Greek mercenaries to their respective countries, with ample rewards: but as all his conquests were chiefly owing to Mentor, he distinguished him above all the rest, not only rewarding him with an hundred talents, and other presents to a great value, but appointing him governor of all the coasts of Asia, and committing to his care the whole management of the war, which he was still carrying on against some provinces that had revolted in the beginning of his reign. These, what by cunning and stratagems, what by open force, he reduced, and restored the king's authority in all the parts of that vast empire ⁱ.

^f Diod. ubi sup. p. 534. ^g Idem, p. 534, 535. ^h See vol. ii. p. 105, 106. ⁱ Diod. p. 537.

Persia. All these joined together in this confederacy, with a design to shake off the Persian yoke, and make themselves each independent in his own city (81).

(81) Diod. l. xvi. p. 532.

ALL the revolted provinces being reduced, and peace established throughout the whole empire, Ochus gave himself up to ease, luxury, and pleasure, leaving the administration of public affairs intirely to his ministers. The chief of these were Bagoas his favourite eunuch, and Mentor the Rhodian, who agreeing to part the power between them, the former governed all the provinces of the upper Asia, and the latter those of the lower. Bagoas, being by birth an Egyptian, had a great zeal for the religion of his country, and endeavoured, on the conquest of Egypt, to influence the king in favour of the Egyptian ceremonies; but, in spite of all his endeavours, the king not only plundered the temples, but carried away the sacred records that were lodged in them; and, in contempt of their religion, slew the god Apis, that is, the sacred bull, which they worshiped under that name. This irreli-gious behaviour Bagoas deeply resented, and ever afterwards watched an opportunity of revenging the affront offered to his religion. The records he redeemed with a great sum of money, and sent them back into Egypt; but the injury done to his god he thought could be no otherwise atoned for, but by putting the sacrilegious king to death; which he did accordingly by the help of the king's physician, who, in his sickness, gave him a strong poison, instead of physic, in the twenty-first year of his reign. Nor did his revenge stop here; for the king's body he kept, causing another to be buried instead of it: and, because the king had caused his attendants to eat the flesh of their god Apis, he cut his flesh in pieces, and gave it so mangled to the cats, making of his bones handles for swords. Having, in this barbarous manner, dispatched his master and benefactor, and seeing the whole power of the empire in his hands, he placed the youngest of the dead king's sons, on the throne, and put all the rest to death, that he might the better secure to himself the authority which he had usurped; for the bare name of king was all that he allowed to Arses, reserving for himself the whole power and authority of the government^k.

ARSES did not long enjoy even this shadow of power, being slain by the same Bagoas, who, finding that the king, apprised of his wickedness and treachery, was taking measures to bring him to condign punishment, was beforehand with him, putting to death him and his whole family, in the second year of his reign^l.

^k DIOD. l. xvii. p. 564. ÆLIAN. var. hist. l. vi. c. 8. SEVER. SULPIT. l. ii. vid. & Suid. in Ωχαφ. ^l DIOD. & alii, ibid.

Darius
Codomannus.

Year of
the flood 2012.
Bef. Chr.
336.

His extract and rise.

Bagoas foreed to drink the poison he had prepared for Darius.

THE throne becoming again vacant by the death of Arses, Bagoas, who durst not yet usurp it himself, placed on it Darius, the third of that name in Persia. Before his accession to the crown, he was called Codomannus, and is said not to have been of the blood royal, because he was not the son of any king that reigned before him: however, he was of the royal family, being descended from Darius Nothus, whose grandson Arfanes, marrying his own sister Sisigambis, had by her Codomannus. Ostanes, the son of Darius Nothus, and father to Arfanes, was put to death by Ochus, on his first ascending the throne, and with him above eighty of his sons and grandsons ^k. How Codomannus came to escape this slaughter, is nowhere said. In the reign of Ochus he made but a very poor figure, being only an astanda, that is, one employed to carry the royal dispatches to the governors of the provinces; a mean employment for one of the royal family ^l. In the war which Ochus made upon the Cadusians, towards the latter end of his reign, one of those barbarians having challenged the whole Persian army to find a champion that durst encounter him in a single combat, Codomannus accepted the challenge, after all the others had declined it, and slew the Cadusian. For this gallant action he was rewarded with the government of Armenia ^m, and thence raised to the throne by Bagoas, in the manner we have already related. But he had not long enjoyed the sovereign power, before Bagoas, finding that he would not be intirely governed by him, which was all he aimed at in advancing him to the crown, resolved to remove him in the same manner as he had done his predecessor; and accordingly provided a poisonous potion: but Darius, being acquainted with his design, when the potion was brought him, made Bagoas himself drink it; and, having thereby got rid of the traitor by his own artifice, he settled himself on the throne, without any further difficulty or opposition ⁿ. Authors represent Darius as a prince of a mild and generous disposition, of great personal valour, and for his stature and shape far preferable to any of the whole Persian empire: but, having such a fortunate rival as Alexander the Great to encounter, he was not able, with all his good qualities, and personal courage, to withstand him: and he was scarce seated on the throne, when he found this powerful enemy preparing to drive him from it.

FOR Alexander, having settled his affairs in Macedon, and used all imaginable precautions to prevent any troubles that might arise there during his absence, set out for Sestus, and thence passed over the Hellepont into Asia, in the second year of Darius's reign. A war against the Persians had been resolved on some time before in a general assembly of the Amphictyons, to revenge the many injuries which Greece had received from the barbarians during the space of three hundred years; and Philip king of Macedon had been appointed commander in chief of the forces destined for this expedition: but Philip being in the mean time murdered, his son Alexander summoned a general assembly of all the states and free cities of Greece, to meet at Corinth; and, having prevailed with them to choose him in his room, he obliged each city to furnish its quota, both of men and money, for the carrying on of the war. His army, according to the highest account, amounted to no more than thirty thousand foot, and five thousand horse; but they were all chosen men, well disciplined, and inured to the toils of war, most of them having served under Philip during his long wars, and all of them been employed in several expeditions. Parmenio commanded the infantry; Philipotus, his son, had the command of eighteen hundred horse, all Macedonians; Callas, the son of Harpalus, led the same number of Thessalian cavalry; the rest of the horse had their particular commanders, each being set over those of his own nation. With this army he crossed the Hellepont, as we have hinted above; and, pursuing his march, arrived at the river Granicus, where he found the Persian governors of the neighbouring provinces encamped with an army of an hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, with a design to dispute his passage (U). Memnon the Rhodian, whom Darius had appointed governor over all the coasts of Asia, had advised the generals not to venture a battle, but to lay waste the whole country, and even destroy the cities, that the enemy might be obliged, for want of provisions, to return back into Europe; but Arsites, governor of Phrygia, opposed the opinion of Memnon, protesting, that he would never suffer the Greeks to make such havock in the countries he governed. This rash and impolitic counsel prevailed, and Memnon was even suspected to hold intelligence with the enemy, or, at least, to be desirous of spinning out the war, and thereby continuing the command to himself.

^k DIOD. ibid. PLUT. in Artax. ^l PLUT. de vita & fortuna Alexandri. ^m DIOD. ibid. JUSTIN. l. x. c. 3. ⁿ DIOD. ubi supra. Q. CURT. l. vi. c. 6. STRABO, l. xv. ÆLIAN. & alii.

Philip made chief commander of the wars against Darius. Is succeeded by his son Alexander the Great.

Year of the flood 2014. Bef. Chr. 334.

Memnon's advice rejected.

• ARRIAN. l. i. PLUT. in Alexandr. Q. CURT. l. iii.

(U) Justin and Orosius tells us, that the Persian army consisted of six hundred thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse; Arrianus makes it amount to two hundred thousand foot. We have chosen to follow Diodorus's account, which to us seems the most rational.

Alexander crosses the Granicus.

The battle of Granicus.

Year of the flood 2014. Bef. Chr. 334.

The Persians repulsed by Alexander.

THE Persian cavalry, which was very numerous, lined the banks of the Granicus, and formed a large front, in order to oppose Alexander, where-ever he should attempt a passage; and the foot, consisting chiefly of Greek mercenaries, was posted behind the cavalry on an easy ascent. Parmenio, observing the disposition of the enemy's army, advised Alexander to encamp on the opposite banks of the river, that his troops might have time to rest, and not to attempt the crossing over till the next morning, the river being deep, the banks very craggy and steep, his troops tired with their march, and those of the enemy quite fresh, as having been encamped in that place for several days. But all the reasons he could produce made not the least impresson on Alexander, who answered, that it would be a disgrace to him and his army, should he, after crossing the Hellespont, suffer his progress to be stopt by a rivulet; for so, out of contempt, he called the Granicus ^m.

THE two armies, being drawn up in battle-array on the opposite banks of the river, continued some time in sight of each other, as though they dreaded the event. The Persians waited till the Macedonians should enter the river, that they might attack them to advantage on their landing; and the Macedonians were looking for a convenient place to cross in; which they no sooner found, than Alexander ordered a strong detachment of horse to advance into the river, he himself following with the right wing, which he commanded in person, the trumpets in the mean time sounding, and loud shouts of joy being heard throughout the whole army. The Persians let fly such showers of arrows against the detachment of the Macedonian horse, as caused some confusion, several of their horses being killed or wounded; and, as they drew near the bank, a most bloody engagement ensued, the Macedonians endeavouring to land, and the Persians pushing them again into the river. As Memnon commanded in this place with his sons, the first ranks of the Macedonians were intirely cut off; and the rest, after having, with the utmost difficulty, gained the shore, driven anew into the river. Alexander, who followed them close, observing the confusion they were in, headed them himself, and, landing in spite of all opposition, attacked the enemy's cavalry with great vigour, and obliged them, after an obstinate resistance, to give way. However, Spithrobates, governor of Ionia, and son in-law to Darius, being surrounded by forty Persian lords, all of them his relations, still maintained his ground, and did all that lay in his power to lead the Persians back to the charge. Alexander, seeing in how gallant a manner he signalized himself, advanced full-gallop to engage him;

^m DIOD. ARRIAN. PLUT. CURT. & alii, ubi supra.

him ; neither did he decline the combat, and both were slightly wounded at the first encounter. Spithrobates, having thrown his javelin without effect, immediately advanced sword in hand against Alexander, who, being upon his guard, run him through with his pike, as he was lifting up his arm to discharge a blow with his scimitar ; but Rofaces, brother to Spithrobates, gave Alexander, at the same time, so furious a blow on the head with his battle-ax, that he beat off his plume, and slightly wounded him through his helmet. As he was ready to repeat the blow, Clitus, with one stroke of his scimitar, cut off Rofaces's head, and by that means saved the life of his sovereign. The Macedonians, animated by the example of their king, attacked the Persian horse with new vigour ; who, not being able to stand so violent a shock, first gave ground, and soon after betook themselves to a precipitous flight. Alexander did not pursue them, but immediately charged, at the head of the right wing, the enemy's foot ; who, seeing themselves attacked at the same time by the cavalry, and the Macedonian phalanx, which had crossed the river, made no great resistance. The Grecian infantry retired in good order to a neighbouring hill, whence they sent deputies to Alexander, demanding leave to march off unmolested ; but he, instead of coming to a parley with them, rushed, sword in hand, into the middle of this small body, where he was very near being cut to pieces, his horse being killed under him. The Greeks defended themselves a long while with incredible valour, but, being at last overpowered with numbers, were almost all killed on the spot. In this engagement the Persians lost twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse ; of the Macedonians, twenty-five men of the king's own troop fell in the first attack, whose statues, made by Lysippus, Alexander, some time after, caused to be set up in Dia, a city of Macedon ; whence they were, many years after, carried to Rome by Q. Metellus. About sixty others of the horse were killed, and thirty of the foot, who were all buried the next day with great solemnity, the king exempting their parents and children from all taxes and burdens ¶.

THIS victory was attended with all the happy consequences that could be expected ; for Sardis, which was the key of the Persian empire, immediately surrendered, and was, by Alexander, declared a free city ; the citizens being permitted to live according to their own laws. From Sardis he advanced to Ephesus, where he was received with great joy. Here he offered a great number of sacrifices to Diana, and assigned,

¶ PLUT. in Alex. DIODOR. p. 503. JUSTIN. l. xi. c. 6. ARIAN, l. i. c. 18.

Miletus besieged,
and taken.

to the temple of that goddess, all the tributes that were paid to the Persians. Before he left Ephesus, the deputies of Trallis and Magnesia waited upon him with the keys of their cities. From Ephesus he advanced to Miletus; which city, flattered with the hopes of being soon relieved, refused him admittance; and indeed the Persian fleet, which was very numerous, made as if they would succour the city; but, after various fruitless attempts, they failed off. Memnon had shut himself up in this strong-hold, with a considerable number of his men, who had escaped from the battle on the Granicus, and was resolved to make a vigorous resistance. Alexander, having surrounded the city with his whole army, planted scaling-ladders on all sides, thinking that the most expeditious manner of becoming master of the place; but his men being every-where repulsed, and the city well stored with provisions for a long siege, he began to batter the walls with all his engines, night and day, without intermission. Several breaches were made, but still he could not master the town, the besieged sustaining all his efforts with incredible bravery. At last, the town being almost quite dismantled, and the besieged tired out with the hard service, Memnon demanded to capitulate, and surrendered the city upon honourable terms: the Milesians were allowed to live according to their own laws, and Memnon, with his Greeks, to march out unmolested; but the Persians were either put to the sword, or sold for slaves †.

Memnon's brave defence of Halicarnassus.

HAVING thus possessed himself of Miletus, he marched into Caria, in order to besiege Halicarnassus, the metropolis of that province, which refused to submit. That city was, both by nature and art, one of the best fortified in all Asia; and, besides, Memnon had thrown himself into it with a considerable body of chosen men, resolved to signalize, in the defence of so important a place, his courage, and attachment to the interest of Darius, with whom he had left his wife and children as pledges of it: and accordingly he made a most vigorous resistance, being seconded by another general of great prowess, by name Ephialtes. Whatever could be expected from the most intrepid bravery, and the most consummate knowledge in the art of war, was practised, on this occasion, both by the besiegers and besieged. After the Macedonians had, with the utmost difficulty, filled up the ditches, and brought their engines near the walls, their works were all demolished in an instant, and the engines set on fire by the besieged. No sooner was any part of the wall beat down by the battering rams, but a new one was raised in its stead, † DIOD. ubi supra. ARRIAN. l. i. c. 19.

the Macedonians finding themselves no farther advanced, after an immense labour, than they were when they first sat down before the place. The city held out so long, and the besiegers had so many difficulties to struggle with, that any general, besides Alexander, would have given over the enterprize; but his troops were encouraged to pursue the undertaking by those very difficulties, which would have disheartened others; and their patience at last proved successful, Memnon being obliged to abandon the city, which he could no longer defend. As the sea was open, he placed a strong garison in the citadel, which was stored with all sorts of provision, and, going on board the Persian fleet, whereof himself was admiral, he conveyed the inhabitants, with all their effects, to the island of Cos, not far distant from Halicarnassus. Alexander, finding the city empty both of riches and inhabitants, rased it to the ground; but the citadel he did not think proper to besiege, it being of little importance to him after the city was destroyed.

Halicarnassus abandoned by Memnon.

Taken and rased.

Year of the flood 2015.

Bef. Chr.

333.

AFTER the reduction of Halicarnassus, all the Greek cities in Asia declared for Alexander, he giving out, where-ever he came, that he had undertaken this war with no other view but to free them from the Persian bondage. In the second year of this war, he reduced the provinces of Phrygia, Lycia, Pisidia, Pamphylia, Paphlagonia, Galatia, and Cappadocia; and appointed such of his friends to govern them as he thought fit. These transactions we shall relate more at large in the life of this great warrior.

Greek cities submit to Alexander.

IN the mean time, Darius was not wanting to prepare for a vigorous defence. Memnon advised him to carry the war into Macedon: and a wiser resolution could not have been taken for the Lacedæmonians, and several other Greek states, that were disaffected to the Macedonians, and jealous of their overgrown power, would have readily joined their enemies; which would have obliged Alexander to leave Asia, and return to the defence of his own country. Darius, being well apprised of the reasonableness of this advice, willingly embraced it, and charged Memnon to put it in execution, appointing him admiral of the fleet, and commander in chief of all the forces that were to be employed in this expedition. That prince could not have made a better choice; for Memnon was by far the best general in his service, and had, for many years, given undoubted proofs, not only of his courage and conduct, but of an extraordinary fidelity and attachment to the Persian interest, not abandoning his sovereign, as other mercenaries had done, when his arms were unsuccessful. Having received this new commission, he assembled the scattered remains of the army, Memnon's excellent advice to Darius.

Made his admiral.

* ARRIAN. l. ii. sub init. DIOD. ubi supra.

and appointed the fleet to rendezvous at the island of Cos, where he took on board the land-forces, and with them reduced the islands of Chios and Lesbos, except the city of Mitylene. From thence he designed to pass over into Eubœa, and make Greece and Macedon the seat of the war; but died before

His death. Mitylene, which city he had been forced to besiege. His death was the greatest misfortune that could befall the Persian empire, having defeated the wise measures which he had proposed; for Darius, not having one general capable of carrying on that enterprize, the only one that could have saved his empire, was obliged to drop it, and intirely depend upon his eastern armies.

Darius's army mustered at Babylon. These he appointed to assemble at Babylon; and, having set up his standard there, and mustered his forces, he found, that they amounted in all to the number of four, five, or six hundred thousand men, according to the various accounts of authors ^t.

THE news of Memnon's death confirmed Alexander in the resolution he had taken of marching immediately into the provinces of Upper Asia. Accordingly, he marched with all possible expedition into Cilicia; and, arriving at a place called Cyrus's camp (whether from Cyrus the Great, as Curtius tells us, or from the younger, as we read in Arrian, is uncertain), about fifty stades distant from the streights of Cilicia, he was informed, that the enemy guarded that important pass with a considerable body of troops: whereupon, leaving Parmenio there, he marched in person, at the first watch, to surprize them. But the Persians, having intelligence of his design, betook themselves to flight, and abandoned the pass; which Alexander entered, and, after viewing with attention the nature of the place, admired his good fortune, and owned, that he might have been stopped with great ease, seeing the road was so narrow, that four men could scarce pass abreast, and so broken in several places, and incumbered by large stones rolling down from the mountains, that a very small number of resolute men might have kept back, with no other weapons but stones, a more numerous army. From the streights of Cilicia, the whole army marched to the city of Tarsus, where they arrived the instant the Persians were setting fire to the place, in order to prevent the Macedonians from enriching themselves with the plunder of so wealthy and flourishing a city. They arrived very seasonably to stop the progress of the fire, and save the city from utter destruction ^u.

Alexander takes the important pass called Cyrus's camp.

Tarsus preserved from being burnt.

IN the mean time Darius had begun his march at the head of his numerous army, and was advanced as far as the vast plains of Mesopotamia (U). Here the commanders of the Greek mercenaries earnestly pressed him to wait for the enemy, that he might engage them with all the advantage his numbers gave him; but Darius would not hearken to their advice, Darius's hastening blindly to the mountainous parts of Gilicia, where march into his cavalry, and the number of his troops, would rather be an Cilicia. incumbrance to each other, than of any service in an engagement ^w.

^t Vide PLUT. in Alexand. ARRIAN. l. ii. c. 6. JUSTIN. l. xi. c. 9. CURT. l. iii. c. 4. ^u ARRIAN. l. ii. CURT. l. iii. c. 8.

THE order he observed in his march was as follows: Before The pomp- the army was carried, on silver altars, the sacred and eternal pous order fire, as they called it, attended by the mages, singing hymns, of his after the manner of their country, and three hundred and sixty- march. five youths in scarlet robes. After these came a chariot consecrated to Jupiter, drawn by white horses, and followed by one of an extraordinary size, whom they called the horse of the sun: all the equeries were cloathed in white, each having a golden rod in his hand. Next appeared ten sumptuous chariots, enriched with curious sculptures in gold and silver; and then the vanguard of the horse, composed of twelve different nations, and all armed in a different manner. This body of horse was followed by another of foot, by the Persians called Immortal; because, if any of them died, his place was immediately supplied by another: they were ten thousand in number, and remarkable for the sumptuousness of their apparel; for they all wore collars of pure gold, and were cloathed in robes of gold tissue, having large sleeves, garnished with precious stones. About thirty paces distance came the king's relations or cousins, to the number of fifteen thousand, apparelled like women, and surpassing even the Immortal body in the pomp and richness of their attire. They were honoured with the title of the king's cousins, and possibly several of the king's relations were in this body. After these came Darius himself, His cha- attended by his guards, and seated on a chariot, as on a throne. riot de- The chariot was supported on both sides by the gods of his scribed. nation cast in pure gold. From the middle of the beam, which was set with jewels, rose two statues of pure gold, a cubit

^w ARRIAN. & CURT. ibid.

(U) Contrary to the wholesome advice of Charidemus, whom Alexander had banished from Athens, and who advised Darius to march against him in person, but to commit the care of his army, which needed not to consist of above an hundred thousand men, and one third of them mercenaries, to some experienced general. But for this he became so obnoxious to the king, and his lords, that he was immediately put to death (1).

(1) Diod. l. xvii. Q. Curt. l. iii. c. 5.

in height, the one representing war, the other peace, and both shaded with the wings of a spread eagle of the same metal. The king was clothed with a garment of purple, striped with silver, wearing over that a long robe, enriched with a great many precious stones; and the scabbard of his scimitar, as our His guard. author tells us, was made out of a single precious stone. On either side of the king walked two hundred of his nearest relations, followed by ten thousand horsemen, whose lances were plated with silver, and tipped with gold. After these marched thirty thousand foot, the rear of the army, and, lastly, four hundred led horses belonging to the king. At a small distance followed Sisigambis, the king's mother, and his consort, both seated on high chariots, with a numerous train of female attendants on horseback, and fifteen chariots, in which were the king's children, and those who were charged with the care of their education. Next to these were the royal concubines, to the number of three hundred and sixty, all attired like so many queens. They were followed by six hundred mules, and three hundred camels, which carried the king's treasure, and were guarded by a body of bowmen. This pageant march was closed by a great many chariots, carrying the wives of the crown-officers, and lords of the court, and guarded by some companies of foot, lightly armed *.

His household and retinue.

Soli taken, and fined. ALEXANDER, upon advice that Darius was advancing towards the Euphrates, in order to enter Cilicia, detached Parmenio, to possess himself of another narrow pass (W), leading from Affyria, or rather Syria, into Cilicia. As for himself, he marched from Tarsus to Anchialos, and thence to Soli; which city he reduced, obliging the inhabitants, who refused at first to admit him into their city, to pay twenty thousand talents for the maintenance of his army. While he was at Castabala, a small city not far from mount Amanus, news was brought him, that Darius, with his whole army, was advanced as far as the city of Sochus, in Syria, within two days march of Cilicia. Hereupon Alexander summoned a council of war, wherein it was determined, that the whole army should march the next day, and wait for Darius among the mountains of Cilicia: which they did accordingly, encamping on a spot of ground

* ARRIAN. & CURT. ubi supra.

(W) For the clearer understanding of Alexander's march, and that of Darius, we must distinguish three streights, the first leading from Cappadocia into Cilicia, through which Alexander marched his army; the second leading from Cilicia into Syria, which Parmenio took possession of; and the third, called the streights of mount Amanus, lying to the north of the pass of Syria; through this Darius's army from Affyria entered Cilicia.
which

which was but just wide enough for two small armies to act in; and so reduced both, in some degree, to an equality. When intelligence was brought to the Persian camp, that Alexander had halted in the midst of the mountains, the Greek commanders, who served in Darius's army, advised him again to wait for the enemy in the plains where he was then encamped, or return to the plains of Mesopotamia, where he might have room enough to draw up his great army, bring them all to engage at the same time, and surround the enemy; whereas, within those streights there not being room any-where to draw up above thirty thousand men in battle-array, the Macedonians could bring all their men to engage, and the Persians not the twentieth part of theirs. If he did not approve of this counsel, they then advised him to divide his army into several bodies, and not to put all to the chance of one battle. But his adverse fate did not suffer him to follow so wholesome an advice; nay, the courtiers here again traduced those who had suggested it, as traitors, telling Darius, that they advised him to divide his troops with no other view, than that they might have, after such a separation, a fair opportunity of delivering up into the enemies hands whatever should be in their power. However, Darius thanked the Greeks for their zeal and good-will, and even condescended to lay before them the motives that induced him to reject their advice. The courtiers had made him believe, that Alexander was flying before him; and that therefore he ought to march forward with all possible expedition, and fall upon him while intangled in those streights, lest he should make his escape. Upon this it was agreed, in a council of all the Persian generals, that they should engage the enemy in the narrow passes; the gods, says our historian, blinding that prince, that they might pave a way to the destruction of the Persian empire. Darius, having sent his treasures, and most valuable moveables, to Damascus in Syria, under a small convoy, led the main body of the army towards the streights of mount Amanus, through which he entered Cilicia, and advanced as far as the city of Iffus, not knowing that Alexander was behind; for he had been told, that the Macedonians were retired in great disorder into Syria. In the city of Iffus he barbarously put to death the sick and wounded Macedonians that had been left there by Parmenio, sparing only a few, whom he dismissed, after making them view his camp, that they might be eye-witnesses of the immense number of his forces. These brought Alexander word of Darius's approach, which he could scarce believe, though he desired nothing more earnestly. However, having offered a sacrifice to the

The battle of Issus.

Year of the flood 2015.
Bef. Chr. 333.

333.

The Persians streightened, and put into disorder. Darius put to flight.

The Greek mercenaries obstinate bravery.

The Persian camp seized and plundered.

gods of the place, he advanced to meet him; and drew up his army on a spot of ground near the city of Issus, bounded on one side by the mountains, and by the sea on the other. Here, Darius not being able to extend his front beyond that of the Macedonians, by reason of the narrowness of the place, could dispose of his great army no otherwise than by drawing them up in many lines, one behind the other. But the Macedonians soon breaking the first line, and that recoiling upon the second, and the second again upon the third, and so on, the whole Persian army was put in disorder; and the Macedonians pursuing the advantage, by pressing forward, the confusion was increased to such a degree, that even the bravest among the Persians, who were desirous to signalize themselves, could neither stand their ground, nor manage their arms. As the croud which was made in the flight of so numerous an army, was very great, those who fell that day were, for the most part, trampled to death by their own men, as they pressed to escape. Darius, who fought in the first line, with much difficulty got out of the croud, and fled in his chariot to the neighbouring mountains, where he mounted on horseback, and pursued his flight, leaving behind him his bow, his shield, and royal mantle. Alexander was prevented from following him, by the Greek mercenaries, who, charging the Macedonian phalanx with incredible bravery, killed Ptolemy the son of Seleucus, with one hundred and twenty officers of distinction, besides a great many private men; and, though attacked in flank by Alexander in person, maintained their ground till they were from twenty thousand reduced to eight thousand. They retired then, in good order, over the mountains, towards Tripoli in Syria, where, finding the transports that had conveyed them from Lesbos, lying on the shore, they fitted out such a number as suited their purpose, and sailed to Cyprus, after having burnt the rest, to prevent their being pursued. Alexander no sooner saw them put to flight, than he hastened after Darius; but, growing weary of the pursuit, and night drawing on, he returned to the enemies camp, which his soldiers had just before plundered. Sisigambis, Darius's mother, and his wife, who was also his sister, with his son Ochus, not full six years old, and his two daughters, both marriageable, besides some noblemens daughters who attended them, were found in the camp, and taken prisoners. The rest had been sent to Damascus, with part of Darius's treasure, and all the rich furniture which the Persian monarchs used to carry with them into the field; so that in the camp they found only three thousand talents of silver: but the rest of the treasures fell afterwards into the hands of Parmenio, at his taking the city of Damascus.

cus.

cus^z. In this engagement the Persians lost, according to Arrian^a, ten thousand horse, and ninety thousand foot: and with him other writers agree, as to the number of the horse; but, as to the foot, they all vary not only from him, but from each other, some making the number of the dead amount to eighty, others to ninety, others to one hundred, and some to one hundred and twenty thousand; adding, that forty thousand were taken prisoners, while Alexander, according to the highest computation, lost in all but three hundred men^b.

THE next day, Alexander, after visiting the wounded, caused the dead to be buried in great pomp, in the presence of the whole army, which was drawn up in battle-array. The same honours he paid to the manes of the Persians of rank; and allowed Darius's mother to bury as many as she pleased, according to the customs and ceremonies of her country. But the prudent princess used that permission with great modesty and reserve, burying only a few, who were her near relations. Alexander treated her, and the other captive princesses, with Alexander's noble great humanity: they were, says Plutarch^c, in Alexander's noble camp, not as in that of an enemy, but as in an holy temple, treatment designed for the asylum of virtue; they all living so retired, of Darius's family that they were not seen by any one, none daring to approach their pavilion but such as were appointed to attend them. As mily.

Darius's consort, and her two daughters, were princesses of an extraordinary beauty, Alexander, after the first visit, resolved never to see them any more, that his frailty might not expose him to any danger. This memorable circumstance we find in a letter which he wrote to Parmenio, commanding him to put to death certain Macedonians, who had abused the wives of some captives: in short, he used them with such respect, good-nature, and humanity, that nothing but their captivity could make them sensible of their misfortune^d.

ALEXANDER, seeing himself now master of the field, detached Parmenio to Damascus, where Darius's treasures were lodged, with the Thessalian horse. As he was on his march thither, he met with a messenger sent by the governor of that city, with a letter to Alexander, wherein he offered to betray the city to the king. The fourth day, Parmenio arrived at Damascus Damascus, when the governor, pretending that he was not able to defend the city against a victorious army, caused, by Darius's treasure day-break, a vast number of beasts of burden to be loaded with the king's treasure, and rich furniture, as if he intended surely to betrayed to Alexander.

^z PLUT. in Alexand. CURT. l. iii. ARRIAN. l. ii. DIOD. l. xvii.
^a ARRIAN. ubi supra. ^b DIOD. PLUTARCH. ARRIAN. CURT.
 JUSTIN. ubi supra. ^c PLUT. de fortuna Alexandri. ^d PLUTARCH. ibid.

to retire, and save them for his master, but, in reality, to deliver them up to the enemy, as he had agreed with Parmenio, who had opened the letter directed to the king. At the first sight of the forces which this general headed, the Persians who convoyed the treasures, betook themselves to flight, and left the Macedonians masters of all the gold and silver that was designed to pay so numerous an army. Among the prisoners of distinction taken in the city, were three young princesses, daughters of Ochus, who had reigned before Darius, and his widow; the daughter of Oxathres, brother to Darius; the wife of Artabazus, or Artabanus, the greatest lord at court, with his son Ilioneus; the wife of Pharnabazus, whom Darius had appointed governor of all the cities on the coast; three daughters of Mentor; the wife and son of Memnon, that illustrious and renowned commander; insomuch that there was scarce one noble family in all Persia, which did not share in this calamity. Besides the immense treasures which the Macedonians had already taken, they found in the city two thousand six hundred talents in ready money, and five hundred in bullion, which was afterwards coined: they took thirty thousand prisoners; and, with the plunder of the city, loaded seven thousand camels. The Thessalian horse had the best share of this booty, having been sent by Alexander on this expedition, that they might enrich themselves with the plunder of so wealthy a city, in regard they had distinguished themselves above the rest, in the late engagement^e. The governor of the place was killed by one of his own men, and his head carried to Darius ^f.

Darius
writes to Alexander.

AFTER this victory Alexander marched into Syria, most of the cities of that country voluntarily submitting to the conqueror, and even Darius's governors and commanders delivering themselves and their treasures up into his hands. Being arrived at Marathon, he received a letter from Darius, in which he stiled himself king, without bestowing that title on Alexander. He rather commanded than intreated him to ask what sum he pleased, for the ransom of his mother, wife, and children: and, as to their dispute about empire, they might decide it, if he thought proper, in a general engagement, to which both parties should bring an equal number of troops; but, if he were still capable of wholesome counsel, he would advise him to be contented with the kingdom of his ancestors, and not invade that of another, to which he had no right: that, for the future, they should live in friendship and amity: and that he was ready to swear to the observance of these articles, and receive Alexander's oath. This letter, which was written with such an unseasonable pride and haughtiness, provoked Alexander to a great degree, who therefore, in his answer, began thus; Alexander the king to Darius: He then enumerates the Alexander's many injuries and calamities which the Greeks and Macedonians had suffered from the Persians; reproaches that nation with the sever. base and treacherous murder of his father Philip; and Darius, in particular, with setting a price upon his own head: whence he concludes, that he is not the aggressor, but has taken up arms in his own defence, and to revenge the death of his father, and the injuries done to his country: and that the gods, who always declare for the just cause, approved of this war, he shews, from the success that attended it, since, with their protection, he had already subdued great part of Asia, and defeated the mighty host of the Persians, in a pitched battle, with an handful of men. However, he engaged his word, that he would restore to him his wife, mother, and children, provided he repaired to him in the attire of a suppliant, and humbly begged him to give them their liberty; assuring him, that he might do it without the least danger. He concluded by desiring him to remember, when he next wrote, that he not only addressed a king, but his king. Thesippus was ordered to carry this letter &c.

^e PLUT. de fort. & CURT. l. iii. c. 25.

^f CURT. ibid.

ALEXANDER marched from thence into Phœnice, where Biblos, Sidon, and the citizens of Biblos opened their gates to him; and their example was followed by other cities, in proportion as he advanced into the country: but none received him with greater joy than the Sidonians, who had a few years before been so cruelly treated by Ochus. Since that time they bore such an hatred to the Persian name, that they were overjoyed at this opportunity of shaking off the yoke; and, indeed, were the first in Phœnice who submitted to Alexander, by their deputies, in opposition to Strabo their king, who was in the Persian interest. Alexander deposed him, and permitted Hephestion to elect in his room whomsoever of the Sidonians he should judge worthy of so exalted a station^h, as we have elsewhere related at lengthⁱ.

WHILE Alexander was in Phœnice, some of the Persian generals, who had escaped from the battle at Iffus, drawing together the remains of the scattered army, attempted, with the assistance of the Cappadocians and Paphlagonians, to recover Lydia; but were in several engagements routed, and at last intirely dispersed by Antigonus, whom Alexander had appointed governor of that province. At the same time, the

^h DIOD. l. xvii. p. 517, 518. ARRIAN. l. ii. p. 83—86. PLUT. in Alexandr. p. 678. CURT. l. iv. c. 1. JUSTIN. l. xi. c. 10. ⁱ CURT. l. iv. c. 2. JUSTIN. l. xi. c. 10. ^j Vol. ii. p. 362, & seq.

Year of
the flood 2016.
Bef. Chr.
332.

Macedonian fleet, sailing from Greece, fell in with that of the enemies, commanded by Aristomenes, whom Darius had sent to recover the cities on the Hellepont, and attacked them so briskly, that not one single ship escaped ^k.

ALL Syria and Phœnice were already subdued, except the city of Tyre, which he besieged, and took by assault, after the inhabitants had held out with incredible bravery for seven whole months, as we have related in the history of Phœnice ^l.

A second letter from Darius to Alexander;

WHILE Alexander was carrying on the siege of Tyre, he received a second letter from Darius, who, at last, condescended to give him the title of king: he offered him ten thousand talents, by way of ransom for the captive princesses, and his daughter Statira in marriage, with all the country he had conquered, as far as the Euphrates: he put him in mind of the inconstancy of fortune; and set out, in most pompous terms, the vast number of troops he could still bring into the field: he represented the difficulties he might meet with, in crossing the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Araxes, and the Hydaspes, which were so many barriers to the Persian empire: that he would not have always the opportunity of shutting himself up among rocks and mountains, but would be obliged some time or other to engage in an open and champain country, where he would be ashamed to appear before him with an handful of men. Upon the receipt of this letter Alexander summoned a council, in which Parmenio was of opinion, that he ought to accept the offers of Darius, declaring, that he would agree to them, were he Alexander: And so would I, replied Alexander, were I Parmenio. Without hearkening therefore to his advice, he answered, that he did not want the money Darius offered him: that it did not become him to offer what he no longer possessed; nor pretend to dispose of what he had already lost: that if he was the only person who did not know which of the two was the best commander, a battle would soon determine it: that he should not be frightened with rivers, after having crossed the sea; and would not fail to pursue Darius, and come up with him, at last, to what place soever he should think proper to retire ^m. Darius, upon the receipt of this letter, lost all hopes of an accommodation, and began anew to prepare for war.

and his answer.

The city of Gaza besieged and taken by Alexander.

ALEXANDER, having reduced Tyre, marched from thence to Jerusalem, and from Jerusalem to Gaza. On his arrival at that city, he found it defended by a strong garison, under the command of Betis, or, as some call him, Babemesis ⁿ, one of Darius's eunuchs, who, being a man of great experience in military affairs, and very faithful to his sovereign, resolved to hold out against Alexander till he was reduced to the last extremity. As this place was the only inlet into Egypt, Alexander could not pass thither till he was become master of it; and therefore was forced to besiege it. But, notwithstanding his men behaved with the utmost intrepidity, and his commanders exerted the utmost of military skill, yet it cost him, and his whole army, two intire months to reduce it. The stop which this put to his intended march into Egypt, and two dangerous wounds which he received in the siege, provoked him to such a degree, that, on his taking the place, he treated the commander, inhabitants, and soldiers, in a manner no-ways becoming a conqueror: for, having cut ten thousand of them in pieces, he sold the rest, with their wives and children, for slaves. When Betis, who had been taken prisoner in the last assault, was brought before him, instead of using him kindly, as his valour and fidelity justly deserved, and a generous enemy ought to have done, he ordered his heels to be bored, a cord to be drawn through them, and the unhappy captive, thus tied to a chariot, to be dragged round the city, till he expired; bragging, that herein he imitated his progenitor Achilles, who, as Homer relates, caused the dead body of Hector to be thus dragged round the walls of Troy, as though a man ought ever to take pride in imitating a bad example. Both acts were barbarous and inhuman, but that of Alexander much more so; for Achilles caused only Hector's dead body to be so abused, whereas Alexander thus treated Betis while alive; and for no other reason, but because he had served his sovereign with fidelity, in the post committed to his charge; which even Alexander, though an enemy, would have admired and rewarded, had he made the true principles of virtue and generosity the rule of his actions: but his sentiments and conduct began now to change with his fortune ^o. He sent great part of the booty he found in the city to Olympias, to Cleopatra, and his friends; and, having left a garison there, he marched directly for Egypt; and, in seven days, arrived before Pelusi-um, where he was met by great numbers of Egyptians, who flocked thither to make their submission to him. The hatred they bore to the Persians was such, that they willingly embraced all opportunities of shaking off the yoke they groaned under, and seemed not to care by whom they were governed, ⁿ JOSEPH. antiquit. l. xi. c. ult. EUSEB. chron. PLIN. l. xii. c. 25. ARRIAN. l. ii. p. 50. ^o CURT. l. iv. c. 10. ARRIAN. l. ii. prope finem. PLUT. in Alexand. p. 679.

^k CURT. l. iv. c. 4. ^l Vol. ii. p. 375, & seqq. ^m PLUT. in Alex. & apophthegm. CURT. l. iv. c. 16. ARRIAN. l. ii. p. 101. JUSTIN. l. xi. c. 12. VAL. MAX l. vi. c. 4.

Egypt submits to Alexander.

Year of
the flood 2016.

Bef. Chr.

332.

provided they could but meet with one who was able to rescue them from that insolence and indignity with which the Persians treated them and their religion. Ochus had slain their god Apis, in a manner highly injurious to themselves and their religion; and the Persian governors treated their gods in the same manner: which raised their indignation to such a height, that when Amyntas (X) came thither a little before, with an handful of men, he found them ready to join him in driving out the Persians. Alexander therefore no sooner appeared on the frontiers, but the Egyptians flocked to him from all parts, and received him with open arms. His arrival at the head of a powerful and victorious army, gave them secure protection, which they could not promise themselves from Amyntas; and, on this consideration, they openly declared, without reserve, in his favour. Hereupon Mazæus, who commanded in Memphis, seeing he was not in a condition to oppose this general insurrection, opened the gates to the conqueror, and put him in possession of the metropolis of that kingdom, with eight hundred talents, and all the king's rich furniture ^p. Thus Alexander, without any opposition, became master of all Egypt.

AT Memphis Alexander formed a design of visiting the temple of Jupiter Hammon; and, in his way thither, built Alexandria, which soon became the metropolis of that kingdom. On his return from the temple he settled the affairs of Egypt, and marched from thence, in the beginning of the

^p CURT. l. iv. c. 20. JUSTIN. l. xi. c. 11. ARRIAN. l. iii. p. 104—110. DIOD. l. xvii. p. 526—529.

(X) This Amyntas, having fled from Alexander to Darius, was one of the commanders of the Greek mercenaries at the battle of Iffus, from whence having brought off four thousand of his men, he got safe to Tripoli in Syria, where he embarked, as we have related above, and sailed first to Cyprus, and then to Pelusium in Egypt; which city he seized, making the garison believe, that he had been appointed governor of Egypt in the room of Sabaces, who had been killed in the battle of Iffus. As soon as he found himself possessed of this important place, he threw off the mask, and declared his design of seizing Egypt for himself, and driving the Persians from thence. Whereupon the Egyptians, out of hatred to the Persians, readily joined him, and he, having formed a considerable army, marched directly for Memphis, where he defeated the Persians in a pitched battle, and shut them up in the city. But, after this victory, permitting his soldiers to straggle up and down the country in quest of booty, the Persians sallied out upon them thus dispersed, and cut them to pieces, with Amyntas their leader (82).

(82) Arrian. l. ii. Curt. l. iv. c. 3. Diod. l. xvii. p. 587, 588.

spring,

spring, to find out Darius. On his return into Phœnice, he staid some time at Tyre, that he might there settle the affairs of the countries which he was to leave behind him, before he set out to make new conquests: and, having ordered matters as he thought fit, he began his march; and, with his whole army, arrived at Thapsacus, where he crossed the Euphrates, and continued his march towards the Tigris, in quest of the enemy. Darius, in the mean time, after several overtures for a peace, finding that there were no hopes of an accommodation, unless he resigned the whole empire, applied himself to make the necessary preparations for another engagement. For this purpose, having assembled, at Babylon, an army half as numerous again as that with which he fought at Iffus (for it consisted of one hundred and ten thousand men), he took the field, and marched towards Nineveh. Advice being brought him, that the enemy was not far off, he detached Satropates, commander of the cavalry, at the head of a thousand chosen horse, and Mazæus, governor of that province, with six thousand, to prevent Alexander from crossing the Tigris, and to lay waste the country through which he was to pass. But they came too late, Alexander having, with the utmost difficulty, crossed the river a little before they arrived. He encamped two days on the banks of the river; during which time there happened an eclipse of the moon, which so terrified the Macedonians, that they refused to proceed in their march, crying out, that heaven displayed the marks of its anger; that they were dragged, against the will of the gods, to the utmost extremities of the earth; and that even the moon refused to lend them her usual light. Hereupon Alexander, having summoned the officers of the army into his tent, commanded the Egyptian soothsayers to declare what they thought of this phænomenon. These were well acquainted with the natural causes of eclipses; but, without entering into such inquiries, they replied, that the sun was predominant in Greece, and the moon in Persia; whence, as often as the moon suffered an eclipse, some great calamity was thereby portended to the latter. This answer being immediately spread abroad among the soldiers, it revived their hopes and courage; and Alexander, taking advantage of this ardor, began his march after midnight, having on his right the Tigris, and the Gordyæan mountains on his left. At day-break the scouts he had sent out to reconnoitre, brought word, that Darius was on full march to meet him; whereupon he immediately drew up his forces, and put himself at the head of the army; but, as they drew near, he found that it was only a detachment of a thousand horse, which, as the 9 ARRIAN. l. iii. CURT. l. iv. c. 23, 24.

Macedonians advanced, retired in great haste to the main army; they were pursued by Aristo, commander of the Pæonian horse, who, having defeated that body, and killed Satropates their leader, brought back his head, and threw it down at Alexander's feet, telling him, that, in his country, such a present was usually rewarded with a cup of gold. Alexander replied smiling, With an empty one; but I will give you a golden cup, and that full of wine^r. Not long after, Alexander received intelligence, that Darius was not above an hundred and fifty furlongs off; whereupon he halted, to refresh his soldiers before the engagement, having in the camp great store of provisions. During this time, he intercepted some letters written by Darius to the Greeks, soliciting them, with great promises, either to kill or betray Alexander. The king was in doubt with himself, whether he should read them in a full assembly; for he relied as much on the fidelity of the Greeks, as on that of the Macedonians; but Parmenio dissuaded him from it, telling him, that even the raising of such thoughts in the minds of soldiers might be attended with some danger; and that the hopes of a great reward were capable of prompting a man to attempt the most enormous crimes. The king followed his prudent advice, and ordered his army to march forward^s. He was scarce set out, when an eunuch brought him word, that Statira, Darius's wife, was dead; whereupon he immediately returned, and, entering the pavilion where Sisgambis and the other royal prisoners were kept, comforted them in so kind and tender a manner, as plainly shewed his deep concern. He caused the funeral obsequies of the deceased princess to be performed with the utmost splendor and magnificence; which Darius hearing, and at the same time being informed with what respect Alexander had treated her in her life-time, he is said to have prayed the gods, that if the time ordained by the fates for the transferring of the Persian empire into other hands was come, none might sit on the throne of Cyrus, but so just, so merciful, so generous a conqueror as Alexander^t; and although he had twice sued in vain for peace, yet, being overcome by the tenderness and humanity which Alexander had shewn his wife, mother, and children, dispatched ten of his relations as ambassadors, offering him new conditions of peace more advantageous than the former, and returning him thanks for the kind treatment he had indulged his family. He had, in his former proposals, offered him all the provinces of Asia, as far as the Halys; but now he added the countries lying between the Hellepont

New conditions of peace offered by Darius;

^r ARRIAN. l. iii. CURT. l. iv. c. 23. PLUTARCH. in Alexandro.

^s CURT. l. iv. c. 25. ^t CURT. & PLUT. ibidem.

and the Euphrates; that is, whatever Alexander was already master of; and offered thirty thousand talents by way of ransom for his family. Parmenio again advised Alexander to accept of the conditions, telling him, that the provinces between the Euphrates and the Hellepont would be a great addition to the kingdom of Macedon; and that the Persian prisoners were only an incumbrance to the army; whereas the treasure offered for their ransom might be employed for the use of his troops, or to reward the services of his friends. But but reject-Alexander, without hearkening to his advice, returned the following answer to the embassadors; that the clemency he had shewn to the wife and children of Darius proceeded from his own good-nature, without any regard to their master; that he did not make war upon women and children, but upon such only as appeared in arms against him; that, if Darius had sued for peace in good earnest, he would have hearkened to his proposals; but since he continued to spirit up, with large bribes, his own soldiers to murder or betray him, he could not believe, that his offers were sincere; and therefore was determined to pursue him with the utmost vigour, not as a fair enemy, but as a traitor and assassin; that, as to the provinces he offered him, they were already his own; and if Darius could force him to retire beyond the Euphrates, which he had already crossed, he might then offer them as his; that he proposed to himself, as a reward for the toils he had already endured, all those kingdoms which Darius still enjoyed; wherein whether he flattered himself with a vain hope or no, the next day's engagement should determine. He concluded by telling the embassadors, that he was come into Asia to give, and not to receive; that the heavens could not hold two suns; and therefore, if Darius would submit to him, acknowledging him his lord and sovereign, he would then hearken to proposals. The embassadors returned back, and told Darius, that he must prepare for an engagement: whereupon Darius that prince encamped near a village called Gaugamela, in a large plain, at a considerable distance from the city of Ar-Gaugamela, having beforehand levelled the ground, that his cavalry and chariots might move and act with more ease. Alexander, hearing that Darius was so near, continued four days in his camp to rest the army, and surrounded it with deep trenches and palisades, being determined to leave there his baggage, and such of his men as were indisposed. He set out about the second watch, with a design to engage the enemy at break of day; and, arriving at a rising ground, whence he could discover their whole army, he halted, and summoned

* CURT. I. IV. C. 26. JUSTIN. I. XI. C. 12.

a council,

Parmenio's advice to Alexander, and his answer. a council, being in doubt whether he should encamp there, or immediately fall upon the enemy. Parmenio advised him to attack their camp in the night-time, alleging, that they might easily be defeated, if taken by surprize, and in the dark : but the king answered, that it did not become Alexander to steal a victory; and therefore he was resolved to fight and conquer in broad day-light. Accordingly he encamped there in the same order, in which the army had marched; and, after giving the proper orders, he retired to repose the remaining part of the night; but, being under no small concern, he could not sleep till towards the morning; so that when his generals were assembled at day-break before his tent, they were greatly surprized to find, that he was not yet awake. Parmenio, after waiting some time, thought fit to call him; and, seeming amazed that he should sleep so sound when he was upon the point of hazarding a battle, on which depended the empire of Asia, Alexander told him, that Darius, by bringing all his forces into one place, had freed him from the trouble of thinking how he might pursue them into different countries ^w. He then, without delay, put on his armour, mounted on horseback, and, having drawn up his men in battle-array, advanced to encounter the enemy, who were at a very small distance.

Both armies drawn up in battle-array.

BOTH armies were drawn up in the same order, the infantry in the centre, and the cavalry on the wings. Darius's front was covered with two hundred chariots, armed with sithes, and twenty-five elephants. Besides his guards, which were the flower of his army, he had posted the Grecian infantry near his person, believing this body alone capable of opposing the Macedonian phalanx. As his army took up a far greater space of ground than Alexander's, his design was to surround and charge them at the same time in front and flank; which Alexander suspecting, ordered those, who led the wings, to extend them as wide as possible, without weakening the centre. His baggage, and the captives, among whom were Darius's mother and children, were left in the camp, under a small guard. Parmenio commanded, as he had always done, the left wing, and Alexander the right. When the two armies were in sight of each other, the Macedonians halted, waiting till the enemy should advance to attack them; which they did accordingly, Darius himself charging in the first line. Arrian and Curtius ^x describe this battle at length. They tell us, that the Persians were often repulsed; but returned again to the charge; that victory inclined sometimes to one side, and sometimes to

The battle of Gaugamela.

Year of the flood 2017.
Bef. Chr.

331.

^w JUSTIN. l. xi. c. 13. CURT. l. iv. c. 30, 31. PLUT. in Alexander.
^x ARRIAN. l. iii. CURT. l. iv. c. 25, & seqq.

another;

another; that Parmenio, who commanded the left wing, was in great danger, and his men obliged to give ground; that Alexander's rear was put in disorder, and the baggage taken; that both kings wrought wonders, &c. But, after all, Curtius tells us, that the Macedonians, notwithstanding the great opposition they met with, lost only three hundred men; and Arrian allows not a third of that number slain: whereas of the Persians there fell forty thousand, says Curtius; thirty thousand, according to Arrian; and ninety thousand, if we believe Diodorus. From these accounts we can form no other judgment of this great encounter, but that the Persians, at the very first onset, betook themselves to flight, and the Macedonians pursued them; for, had the seven or eight hundred thousand men, which Darius brought into the field, thrown each one dart, or a stone, the Macedonians could not have bought the empire of the east at so easy a rate. In the heat of the battle, when the Macedonians were in the greatest danger, Aristander the soothsayer, clothed in his white robes, and holding a branch of olive in his hand, is reported to have advanced among the first ranks, and, in concert with Alexander, to have cried out, that he saw an eagle hovering over the king's head, a sure omen of victory. He pointed with his finger at the pretended bird; and the soldiers, believing him, and some even fancying they saw it, renewed the attack with more courage and resolution than ever. We are told, that Darius, seeing his numerous army put so shamefully to flight, drew his scimitar, and was some time in suspense, whether he should lay violent hands on himself, rather than fly in so ignominious a manner; but at last resolved to save himself by flight, and arrived at Arbela the same night (Y). After he had passed the Lycus, some, who attended him in his flight, advised him to break down the

The Persians routed.

(Y) This battle was fought at Gaugamela, near the river Beumelus, as Ptolemy Lagi and Aristobulus, who were present, aver: they are followed both by Strabo (83), and Plutarch (84). Nevertheless, because Gaugamela was only a small village, and the name not agreeable to the ear, signifying the camels house, the battle is said to have been fought at Arbela, which was a great and famous city in those parts (85).

Gaugamela and Arbela were at a considerable distance from each other; for between the river Beumelus, on which stood Gaugamela, and the Lycus, on the banks of which Arbela was situated, Curtius reckons eighty furlongs (86). According to Strabo's description of those places, Arbela, in Ptolemy's fifth map of Asia, ought to be placed where we find Gaugamela (87).

(83) Strabo, l. xxvi. p. 737.
l. vi. p. 101. Strabo, ubi supra.
Strab. l. ii. p. 79.

(84) Plut. in Alexand.
(86) Curt. l. iv. c. 22.

(85) Arrian.
(87) Vide

bridge,

bridge, in order to stop the enemy's pursuit; but he, reflecting how many of his own men were hastening to pass over the same bridge, replied, that he had rather leave an open way to a pursuing enemy, than shut it to a flying friend (Z). He arrived about midnight at Arbela, whither he was followed by a great many of his nobles, and commanding officers, whom he called together, and acquainted them, that he designed to leave all for the present to Alexander, and fly into Media, from whence, and from the rest of the northern provinces, he could draw together new forces, to try once more his fortune in battle. Alexander pursued him as far as Arbela; but, before his arrival there, Darius was, by the quickness of his flight, got over the mountains of Armenia, attended by some of his relations, and a small body of guards called Melophori, because each of them bore a golden apple on the point of his spear. In Armenia he was joined by two thousand Greek mercenaries, who, under the command of Pharon an Ionian, and Glaucus an Æolian, had escaped from the battle. Alexander took the city of Arbela, where he seized on immense sums of money, with all Darius's rich furniture and equipage, and returned to his camp. After having allowed his army some days of rest, he set out on his march to Babylon. Mazæus was governor of that city and province, and had, after the late battle, retired thither, with the scattered remains of the body he commanded; but, on the approach of Alexander's victorious army, he had not courage enough to oppose him. Marching therefore out to meet him, he delivered the city and himself, with his children, into the conqueror's hands. Bagaphanes, governor of the castle, where all Darius's treasures were lodged, did the same; and Alexander entered the city at the head of his whole army, as though he had been marching against an enemy. After a stay of thirty days in that city, he continued Mazæus in the government of that province; but, giving the command of the castle and garison to a Macedonian, he took Bagaphanes along with him, and marched towards Susa, where he arrived twenty days after his departure from Babylon. As he drew near the city, Abulites, governor of the place, sent his son to meet him, and acquaint him, that he was ready to deliver the city, and

Alexander takes the city of Arbela, and all Darius's rich furniture.

Marches to Babylon, which submits to him.

The city of Susa, and all the king's treasures, delivered up to him.

7 CURT. l. iv. c. 36, 37. JUSTIN. l. xi. c. 14.

(Z) In Justin we read Cydnius instead of Lycus, which last river runs through the city of Tarsus in Cilicia; and hence it is, that Orosius, who ever follows Justin, was led into so gross a mistake, as to think, that this great battle was fought at Tarsus (88).

(88) Oros. l. iii. c. 17.

all the king's treasures, into his hands. The king received the young nobleman with great marks of kindness, and, using him as a guide, advanced to the river Choaspes, where Abulites himself met him, with presents worthy of so great a prince: among other things he presented him with dromedaries, or running camels, of incredible swiftness, and twelve elephants, which Darius had sent for out of India. Having entered this city, the governor delivered up to him fifty thousand talents in bullion, and forty thousand in ready money, with all the king's furniture, to an immense value. Here he found part of the rarities, which Xerxes had brought out of Greece, namely, the brazen statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton, which he sent to Athens, where they were still standing in Arrian's time. As for the purple and scarlet robes, he sent them all to Sisigambis, together with some others, curiously wrought, which had been sent him out of Macedon; adding in his message to her, that, if she liked the Macedonian robes, he would send her those who had wrought them, that her grandchildren might learn the art, by way of amusement. At these words, she could not help betraying some concern and uneasiness, it being looked upon by the Persian women as mean and unbecoming to employ themselves in works of that nature: which when Alexander understood, he thought himself obliged to make an apology for what he had done; and accordingly went immediately to wait upon her, and beg that she would not consider that as an affront, which was intirely owing to his ignorance of the Persian manners; adding, that the robes he then wore, were not only a present from his sisters, but wrought with their own hands^z.

ALEXANDER, having thus comforted Sisigambis, took his leave of her; and, leaving a strong garison in the city of Susa, advanced towards the province of Persis. He arrived, in four days march, on the banks of the Pasitigris, which river he crossed with nine thousand foot and four thousand horse, and entred the country of the Uxians. This province He reduces extends from Susiana to the frontiers of Persis, and was go-^{the Uxi-}verned by one Madates, who had married the niece of Sisigambis. Madates, who was not, like the other Persian governors, a time-server, but faithful to his sovereign, resolved to hold out to the last extremity; and, with this design, retired into a strong-hold in the midst of craggy mountains, and surrounded on all sides by steep precipices. Here he held out for some time with great bravery; and, when the city was taken by assault, withdrew into the citadel, whence, seeing there were no hopes of being relieved, he sent thirty deputies to Alexander to treat of a surrender. The king, who was greatly provoked against Madates, would not at first hearken to any proposals; but in the mean time receiving letters from Sisigambis, wherein she intreated him to pardon her relations, he not only complied with her request, but set all the prisoners at liberty, restored Madates to his former dignity, left the city untouched, and the citizens in the full enjoyment of their antient liberty and privileges ^a.

^z CURT. l. v. c. 8.

HAVING reduced the Uxians, he ordered Parmenio, with part of his army, to march through the plain, while he himself, at the head of the light-armed foot, advanced by the way of the mountains, which extend to the frontiers of Persia. The fifth day he arrived at the streights of Persia. These Ariobarzanes held with four thousand foot, and seven hundred horse, which he had posted on the tops of the hills out of the enemy's reach. As soon as Alexander advanced to attack him, the Persians, from the tops of the mountains, rolled down stones of such a prodigious size, that they crushed at once whole ranks. The king, being greatly frightened at this sight, commanded a retreat to be sounded, and withdrew about thirty furlongs from the pass, where he lay encamped some time, not knowing how to advance, and being ashamed to return; but, in the mean time, a Greek deserter, coming to his camp, offered himself readily to conduct him through by-paths to the very top of the mountains; whence he might easily so annoy the Persians as to oblige them to abandon the streights, and leave an open passage to the whole army. He was as good as his word; for Alexander, at the head of some chosen troops, having followed his guide all that night through rocks and precipices, arrived, a little before day-break, at the top of a mountain, which commanded all the hills where the enemy was posted; which they observing, betook themselves to flight; and, at the same time, Craterus, who had been left in the camp, advancing with the troops under his command, possessed himself of the streights. Ariobarzanes, with part of the cavalry, breaking through the Macedonians, with great slaughter both of them, and of his own men, made his escape over the mountains, with a design to throw himself into Persepolis; but, finding all the passes leading to that city guarded by the enemy, he returned back upon those that pursued him, and was killed with all that followed him, after having cut in pieces great numbers of the Macedonians ^b.

Seizes the streights of Persia.

Ariobarzanes's gallant conduct.

^a CURT. I. V. C. 9. ^b CURT. ARRIAN. DIOD. PLUT. ubi supra, & POLYÆNUS, l. iy. stratagem.

BEING now possessed of the streights, Alexander pursued his march into Perfis, or Persia, properly so called. When he was at some distance from Persepolis, the metropolis of that province, he received letters from the governor of the place, acquainting him, that the citizens, upon the news of his approach, were ready to plunder Darius's treasures, with which he had been intrusted, and desiring him to march with all possible expedition, that he might seize them himself. Alexander, upon the receipt of this letter, leaving his infantry behind, marched the whole night at the head of the cavalry; and, having passed the Araxes on a bridge, which, by his order, had been built some days before, arrived by day-break within two furlongs of Persepolis. The next day, having Persepolis assembled the generals of his army, he represented to them, submits, that no city had ever been more fatal to Greece than Persepolis - but the in- lis, the antient residence of the Persian monarchs, and the habitants capital of their empire; that from thence those mighty ar- cruelly mies had been sent, which had over-run and laid waste great used part of Europe; and that it was therefore incumbent upon them to revenge, on that proud metropolis, the many injuries and calamities which their ancestors had suffered. The commanders, being encouraged by this speech, allowed their soldiers to practise all manner of cruelties against the miserable inhabitants, who were massacred in the most barbarous manner. After this cruel execution, leaving Craterus and Parmenio in the place, the king, with a small body, went to reduce the neighbouring cities and strong-holds, which all submitted at the approach of his troops; he then returned to Persepolis, and there took up his winter-quarters. In this city he is said to have found one hundred and twenty thousand talents lodged in the treasury to defray the expences of the war ^c.

DURING his stay at Persepolis, he gave himself up to feasting and drinking, making daily great entertainments for his and the officers, to refresh them after the great fatigues they had en- palace dured. In one of these entertainments, both the king and burnt his guests having drunk to excess, fire was set, at the motion of a drunken strumpet, to the king's palace, which reduced it to ashes, as we have related above ^d.

FROM Persepolis Alexander marched early in the spring to Pasargada, resolved to pursue Darius, who was fled to Ecbatan in Media. That unhappy prince had still an army of thirty thousand foot, among whom were four thousand Greeks, who continued faithful to the last. Besides these, he had four thousand slingers, and three thousand horse, most of them

Year of
the flood 2018.
Bef. Chr.
330.

^c CURT. l. v. c. 13. JUSTIN. l. xi. c. 14.
p. 108, & seqq. in the notes.

^d See above,

Bastrians,

Bactrians, and commanded by Bessus governor of Bactria. When he heard, that Alexander was in full march towards Ecbatan, he left that city, with a design to retire into Bactria, and there raise another army. But he was not far advanced when he altered his resolution, and determined to venture a third battle with the forces then about him. While he was making the necessary preparations for the engagement, Bessus governor of Bactria, and Nabarzanes a Persian lord of great distinction, formed a conspiracy against him; proposing to seize his person, and, if Alexander pursued them, to gain his friendship and protection, by betraying their master into his hands; but, if they escaped, their design was to murder him, usurp the crown, and renew the war. They easily won over the troops, by representing to them, that Darius was dragging them to destruction; that they were no-ways in a condition to make head against so powerful an enemy; that they would inevitably perish, if they followed Darius, crushed under the ruins of an empire which was ready to fall. Though these practices were carried on with great secrecy, yet they came to Darius's ear; but he could not believe them. Patron, who commanded the Greeks, earnestly intreated him to encamp among them, and trust the guard of his person to men on whose fidelity he might depend. Darius replied, that he had rather suffer any misfortune among those of his own nation, than seek for shelter among strangers, how faithful and affectionate soever he might believe them; and that he could not die too soon, if his own Persians thought him unworthy to live. Not long after, Darius had occasion to repent of his not following Patron's advice; for Bessus and Nabarzanes, seizing his person, bound him, out of respect to the royal dignity, in chains of gold, and, shutting him up in a covered cart, fled with him towards Bactria. The cart was covered with skins, and strangers appointed to drive it, without knowing who the prisoner was they had in their custody*. Bessus was proclaimed commander in chief, in Darius's room, by the Bactrian horse; but Artabazus, and his sons, with the forces they commanded, and the Greeks under the command of Patron, retired from the body of the army under Bessus, and marched over the mountains towards Parthiene†. In the mean time, Alexander, arriving at Ecbatan, was informed that Darius had left that city five days before. Here the Thessalians shewing a great reluctancy to accompany him any further, he gave them leave to return to their own country; and, at their parting, divided two thousand talents among them, over and above their full pay: to such as were willing to continue in his service, he gave three talents apiece ^z. He then commanded Parmenio to lay up, in the castle of Ecbatan, the remaining part of the treasures, which, according to Strabo ^h, amounted to one hundred and eighty talents; and afterwards to march with the Thracians, and great part of the cavalry, into the country of the Gadusians. He dispatched orders to Clitus, who had fallen sick at Susa, to repair, as soon as he recovered, to Ecbatan, and from thence to follow him into Parthia, with the cavalry, and six thousand Macedonians, that were left in Ecbatan. Alexander, with the rest of his army, pursued Darius; and the eleventh day arrived at Rages, having marched, in that space of time, three thousand three hundred furlongs. Most part of those who accompanied him died through the fatigues of so long and expeditious a march; insomuch that, on his arrival at Rages, he could muster but sixty horsemen ⁱ. Finding that he could not come up with Darius, who had already passed the Caspian streights, he staid five days at Rages, in order to refresh his army, and settle the affairs of Media. From thence he marched into Parthia, and encamped the first day at a small distance from the Caspian streights, which he passed the next, without any opposition. He had scarce entered Parthia, when he was informed by Bagisthenes, a Persian nobleman, that Bessus and Nabarzanes had conspired against Darius, and designed to seize him. Hereupon, leaving the main body of the army behind, under the command of Craterus, he advanced, with a small troop of horse lightly armed; and having marched night and day, without ever halting, except a few hours, came the third day to a village, where Bessus, with his Bactrians, had encamped the day before. Here he understood, that Darius had been seized by the traitors; that Bessus had caused him to be shut up in a close cart, which he had sent before, that he might be the more sure of his person; and that the whole army, except Artabazus, and the Greeks, who had taken another route, obeyed Bessus, and acknowledged him for their general. This was a fresh motive for Alexander to hasten his march: taking therefore along with him a small body of light-armed horse (for the others could not possibly proceed any farther), he set out again the same night; and early next morning was acquainted by Orcillus and Mithracenes, two Persian officers, who, in detestation of the treachery

* CURT. l. v. c. 18, 22, 23. ARRIAN. l. iii. p. 67. † CURT. l. v. c. 23. ARRIAN. l. iv. p. 68.

^z CURT. l. vi. c. 3. ARRIAN. l. iii. PLUT. in Alex. ^h STRABO, l. xv. p. 741. ⁱ ARRIAN. l. iii. PLUT. in Alex.

of Bessus, had fled over to him, that the Bactrians were not above five hundred furlongs off; and that they could lead him to them by a nearer way. Taking them, therefore, for his guides, he set out again the same night; and, after marching three hundred furlongs, was met by the son of Mazæus, formerly governor of Syria, who informed him, that Bessus was not above two hundred furlongs off; and that his army, as not apprehending any danger, was marching in disorder; and might easily be surpris'd, and cut in pieces. Hereupon Alexander again doubled his pace, and, at last, came in sight of the enemy. His unexpected arrival struck the barbarians, though far superior in number, with such terror, that they immediately betook themselves to a precipitous flight; and, because Darius refused to follow them, Bessus, and those that were about him, discharging their darts at the unfortunate prince, left him wallowing in his blood, to the mercy of the Macedonians. This done, they separated, and took different routs, Bessus flying towards Hyrkania, and Nabarzanes into Bactria, that, by this means, they might elude the pursuit of the enemy, or, at least, oblige him to divide his forces. They were attended only by a few horse, the rest, now destitute of leaders, dispersing themselves up and down the country, as fear or hope directed their steps. Alexander, seeing in what confusion the enemies were, sent Nicanor, with a troop of light-armed horse, to stop their flight; and himself followed, at the head of three thousand Macedonians. Nicanor put near three thousand of the stragglers to the sword, but could not come up either with Bessus or Nabarzanes; which Alexander observing, sent him orders to give quarters to all those that should throw down their arms, and submit. In the mean time, the horses that drew the cart in which was Darius, halted of their own accord; for the drivers had been killed by Bessus, near a certain village about four furlongs from the highway, whither Polystratus, a Macedonian, being pressed with thirst, in the pursuit of the enemy, was soon after conducted by the inhabitants, to refresh himself at a fountain not far from the place where they stopt. As he was filling his helmet with water, he heard the groans of a dying man; and, looking round him, discovered a cart, with a team of horses, not able to move, for the many wounds they had received. As he drew near, he saw Darius lying in the cart, and very near his end, having several darts still sticking in his body: however, he had strength enough to call for some water, which Polystratus, being by a Persian captive informed of this barbarous tragedy, readily brought him. Darius, after drinking, turned to the Macedonian, and told him, with a faint voice, that, in the deplorable state to which he was reduced, it was

Darius
Codomannus
slain.

Year of
the flood 2018.
Bef. Chr.
330.

no small comfort to him, that his last words would not be lost. He then charged him to return his hearty thanks to Alexander, for the kindness he had shewn to his wife, mother, and children; and acquaint him, that with his last breath he besought the gods to prosper him in all his undertakings, and make him sole monarch of the universe. He added, that it did not so much concern him as Alexander, to pursue and bring to condign punishment those traitors, who had treated with such cruelty their lawful sovereign, that being the common cause of all crowned heads. Then, taking Polystratus by the hand, "Give Alexander, said he, your hand, as I give you mine; and carry him, in my name, the only pledge I am able to give, in this condition, of my gratitude and affection." Having uttered these words, he expired in the arms of Polystratus. Alexander, coming up, a few minutes after, and beholding Darius's body, burst out in tears, bewailing the cruel lot of a prince, who, said he, deserved a better fate. He immediately pulled off his own military cloak, and covered the corpse, causing it to be embalmed, and sent in a rich and magnificent coffin to Sisigambis, that it might be interred with the other Persian monarchs ^k.

Thus died Darius, in the fiftieth year of his age, and sixth of his reign. He was a mild and pacific prince, his reign having been unspiced with injustice, cruelty, or any of those vices which most of his predecessors had been greatly addicted to. In him the Persian empire ended, after it had lasted, from the first of Cyrus, two hundred and six years, under thirteen kings; viz. Cyrus, Cambyses, Smerdis, Darius Hystaspis, Xerxes I. Artaxerxes Longimanus, Xerxes II. Sogdianus, Darius Nothus, Artaxerxes Mnemon, Artaxerxes Ochus, Artes, Darius Codomannus. Upon the death of Darius, all his commanders submitted to the conqueror, by whom they were restored to their former honours and employments: but, above all others, he distinguished Artabazus, in regard of his constant and unshaken fidelity to his master, and Oxathres, Darius's brother, whom he ever treated in a manner becoming his high station, and noble birth: he was even, to his great dishonour, prevailed upon to receive and pardon Nabarzanes, who, together with Bessus, had murdered Darius: but Bessus having fled into Bactria, and there assumed the title of king, Alexander, in the beginning of the next spring, marched against him. But his march out of Persia into these northern countries is by authors described with great confusion; for after they have told us, that he was resolved to find out Bessus in Bactria, they make him take the way of Hyrkania; from thence wander northwards into the country of the Mardi, bordering on the Caspian sea; and, after subduing the Mardi, cross mount Coronus into Aria and Drangiana. Be that as it will, he arrived, at last, after a long and tedious march, in Bactriana; and, having rested his army some time at Drapsaca, he advanced against, and reduced Aornos and Bactra, the two strongest cities of that province. Alexander had no sooner reached the confines of Bactria, but eight thousand Bactrians, who till that time had followed Bessus, abandoning him, withdrew to their respective homes. Hereupon Bessus, at the head of the few troops that continued faithful to him, crossing the river Oxus, retired into the province of Sogdiana, with a design to raise there a new army: in order to prevent Alexander from pursuing him, he burnt all the boats he had made use of in passing over his troops, hoping, that as the river was nowhere fordable, and the country affording no timber, he would thereby be obliged to return, and give over the pursuit. But no difficulties were unsurmountable to that conqueror, who, finding no timber wherewithal to make boats or floats, caused the hides which covered the soldiers tents and carriages, to be filled with straw, and tied together. By this means, he supplied the want of timber, and passed his whole army over that large and deep river, in the space of five days; which Bessus might have easily prevented, had he but dared to look the Macedonians in the face. When the Bactrians, who were encamped at a place called Nautaca, heard that Alexander had crossed the river, and was on full march to fall upon them, Spitamenes, whom Bessus most confided in, together with Gatanes and Dataphernes, formed a conspiracy to seize Bessus, and purchase their own safety, by delivering him up to Alexander; which they did accordingly, tearing in pieces his diadem and royal robes, of which he had stripped his lawful sovereign Darius; and, carrying him loaded with chains to the Macedonian camp, Spitamenes himself presented the traitor to Alexander, not only bound, but stark-naked, holding him by a chain round his neck; a sight no less agreeable to the Persians than the Macedonians. Alexander, having amply rewarded Spitamenes and his companions, and caused the traitor's nose and ears to be cut off, delivered him into the hands of Oxatres, Darius's brother, to suffer whatever punishment he should think proper to inflict, for so base and treacherous a murder. Plutarch ^m has left us an account of this execution: he tells us, that several trees being, by main force, bent down to the ground, and to each one of the traitor's limbs fastened, the trees, as they were let return to their natural position, flew back with such violence, that each carried with it the limb that was tied to it. Thus Bessus suffered the punishment that was due to his treachery; and, at his death, Alexander saw himself in quiet possession of the whole Persian empire. This is what we have gathered from the Greek and Latin historians, of the best account, concerning the affairs of the antient Persians: in the following section we shall hear the Orientals on the same subject.

^k CURT. l. v. c. 25. JUSTIN. l. xi. c. 15. ARRIAN. l. iii. p. 69, 72. PLUT. in Alex. JUSTIN. l. ii. c. 5.

¹ CURT. l. vii. c. 12. ARRIAN. l. iii. DIODOR. l. xvii.
^m PLUT. in Alex. & DIODOR. l. xvii. p. 554. ARRIAN. l. iv. c. 7.
 CURT. l. vii. c. 10.

Bessus put to death.
Year of the flood 2018.
Bef. Chr. 330.

In stating the times of the Persian empire, we have followed all along Ptolemy's canon, and the records of the Greek and Latin authors: for the Jews own such kings only as they find mentioned in the books of the Old Testament; whence, according to their computation in the greater chronicle Seder Olam Rabbah, the Medo-Persian empire, from the building of the temple in the second year of Darius Hystaspis, flourished only thirty-four years. Josephus acknowledges only the following kings of Persia: Cyrus, Cambyzes, Darius Hystaspis, Xerxes, Artaxerxes, and Darius. This Darius, who was Darius Nothus, he confounds with Darius Codomannus, who was conquered by Alexander; and refers to the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, whatever happened in the reigns of Artaxerxes Mnemon, and Artaxerxes Ochus.

S E C T. V.

The history of Persia, according to the oriental writers.

WE have been so long used to hear every thing transcribed from eastern authors censured as vain and fabulous, that, how unwilling soever we may be to trouble the reader with preparatory discourses, yet, in this case, there seems to be a necessity of saying somewhat in support of the narratives we are going to recite, that they may not be taken for mere fragments, or romances void of all foundation. It is far from being our opinion, that every thing recorded by the Persian writers is strictly fact; that would be to place them not on a level with the best historians of other nations, but in a class high above them: for what people, what kingdom, what republic, can boast of such a faultless series of history? or why should we expect a greater degree of clearness in the history of Persia, as written by oriental authors, than we find in the history of Greece, though written by Greeks, who were so proud of their own abilities, that they stiled all the rest of the world barbarians? It is sufficient for our purpose (which is no more than to gain the reader's proper attention for what we have collected of the Persian history from eastern writers), that we shew there is as just reason to suppose they have delivered us a great many truths in their accounts of these early times, as can be produced in favour of any other history as antient. In order to this, we shall neither multiply arguments nor words. In the first place, we are told by Moses^a, that there were kings in Persia in the age immediately following that, in which the Persian writers placed the beginning of their monarchy. It is therefore evident, that these writers are not wrong in making their kingdom so antient as they do. But, secondly, there is no just cause to doubt, that either as soon, or within a small time after the settling of regal government amongst them, histories, or at least historical poems, were also introduced. This was the custom in all places, at least as far as we are able to trace things back. First, a people lived miserably, and without order; then some great genius reformed and reduced them into society; successive kings cherished and increased that society; and men, having leisure and ease, considered these benefits, and gratefully sung the praises of their benefactors. Moses has preserved two fragments of an Amoritish poem, as old, in all probability, as the times we are speaking of; and if the bards of that country sung so early the praises of Sihon^b, why might not the Persians have persons among them as capable of transmitting to posterity the memorable deeds of their princes? Thirdly, it is universally allowed, that the present Persians have not only quick wits, but are wonderfully studious, and in a particular manner addicted to the conservation of the antiquities of their country. It may indeed be objected to this, that the modern and the antient Persians are not one and the same people: but hereto it may be replied, that the Persees, the unadulterated remnant of the old inhabitants of this wide empire, are still more studious and thoughtful than the present Persians^c. We may therefore conclude, that there were formerly many authentic histories of the reigns of the most antient kings of this realm; I say, we may conclude this from the reasons already given, if we had no other proof; but, as we have, it would be unfair not to mention it, especially since it may be drawn into very little room. The authorities which may be adduced in support of this assertion, that the antient Persians kept authentic records of their affairs, may be reduced under these two heads; viz. sacred and profane. The authors of the books of Ezra and Nehemiah speak frequently, not only of the immutability of the Persian laws, which implies, that they were recorded, but also of public acts and registers. In the book of Esther, we have not only frequent mention of these, but also of the chronicles of the kingdom, or rather of the kings of Persia, wherein every thing of moment was set down. As to profane writers, Herodotus and Xenophon are sufficient to satisfy any impartial person as to the wisdom and virtue of the antient Persians, and their care of all things which had regard to the honour or welfare of their country.

^a Gen. xiv. 1, 9. ^b Numb. xxi. 27. ^c CHARDIN, tom. iii. p. 130. ^d vii. 2. ^e iii. 7.

SUPPOSING it therefore as clear as the nature of the thing will admit, that the Persians had amongst them of old the histories of their kings and heroes, we are next to shew how these can be reasonably believed to be yet in being, and to have reached these distant times. Of this however we are not positive ourselves: all that we can say is this, that the Persians having lived under their own laws down to the time of Yezdegherd, there seems to be no difficulty in allowing, that, till then, their histories were frequent amongst them; for though the Macedonians might burn and destroy their records, yet it is incredible, that they should destroy all the books in the empire. Besides, we know, that the modern Persees have the zend or original code of Zerdhusht amongst them, with many other antient books. Now, it being generally agreed, that Zerdhusht flourished in the days of Darius Hystaspis, it will be hard to assign a reason, why some of their antient histories might not be preserved, as well as these books of their law. But further still, Mohammed Ben Emir Khoandschah, commonly called Mirkbond or Mirkbound, with other modern Persian authors, constantly and uniformly assert, that they write from such authorities; and therefore we have no just reason to doubt them, unless we could shew the contrary. (A)

How the antient histories have been preserved.

IT

^f ii. 23. vi. 1.

^g Lib. i. & ix. pass.

^h Cyropæd. pass.

(A) This famous historian is quoted by various names, and those names have received some alteration from the different orthographies used in oriental appellations: sometimes he is called Mirchond, sometimes Mirkbond, and sometimes Chondemir: he wrote a general history from the beginning of the world to the year of the Hegira 900, under the title of Raoudbat al Safa; he was a person of great natural parts, and of much learning, perfectly well skilled in the Persian antiquities, and wrote from the best histories extant in his time (1); for this reason we find him often quoted by the very learned Dr. Hyde (2); and

(1) D'Herbelot, tit. Mircond,

(2) Hyde rel. vet. Persar. c. 8. p. 152.

On what authorities this history is founded.

It is from the author before-mentioned that we take, for the most part, what is delivered in the following pages concerning the oriental history of Persia. He is allowed to have been a person of great learning and judgment by such as are well versed in oriental history; and his works are esteemed as oracles throughout the east. We may justly hope therefore, that what we transcribe from him, with the addition of such circumstances as we can meet with elsewhere, will render this section as useful and as agreeable as could be expected on so abstruse a subject. Without farther introduction therefore, let us proceed to the catalogue of kings afforded us in his writings.

A table of the kings of Persia, to the time of Alexander the Great, according to Mirkhond.

The first race,

Or the dynasty of the Pischaadians.

| | | | |
|-----|---|-----------|-----|
| 1. | Kejomaras or Cajoumaras | - - - - - | 40 |
| 2. | Siamek | - - - - - | |
| | Kejomaras resumes the kingdom | - - - - - | |
| 3. | Hushangh or Houschenk | - - - - - | 50 |
| 4. | Tahmurash | - - - - - | 30 |
| 5. | Giemsbid or Giamschid | - - - - - | |
| | Dahât, Zabâk, Zoâk | - - - - - | |
| 6. | Aphridûn, Phredûn, or Feridoun | - - - - - | |
| 7. | Manugjahr or Manougeher , surnamed Phirouz | - - - - - | 120 |
| 8. | Nodar | - - - - - | 7 |
| 9. | Apherâsiab or Afrasiab | - - - - - | 12 |
| 10. | Zab, Zaab, or Zoub | - - - - - | |

The second race,

Or the dynasty of the Kaianites.

| | | | |
|----|-----------------|-----------|-----|
| 1. | Kaikobad | - - - - - | 100 |
| 2. | Kaikaus | - - - - - | 150 |

indeed by all the writers of note on Persian affairs. His fame became known in Europe by an abridgment of his work, published in Spanish by Teixera, which is, however, far from being correct; there is a better extract extant in a book cited at the bottom of the page (3). We shall have occasion to speak hereafter of this author, and his works, when we come to the history of the age in which he lived; and shall therefore put an end to this note here.

(3) Les états, empires, & principautés du monde. Paris, 4to, 1662, p. 999.

| | | |
|---------------------------------------|-----------|-----|
| 3. Kaikofru | - - - - - | 60 |
| 4. Lohrasp or Lohorasb | - - - - - | 120 |
| 5. Gushtâsp, or Gustasp, or Kischtasf | - - - - - | 120 |
| 6. Ardschir, surnamed Babaman | - - - - - | 112 |
| 7. Queen Homai | - - - - - | 32 |
| 8. Darab I. | - - - - - | 4 |
| 9. Darab II. | - - - - - | 14 |

A table of the same kings, with the years of their reigns, according to other oriental authors.

The first race.

| | | |
|--|-----------|------|
| 1. Kejomaras or Cajoumaras | - - - - - | 560 |
| Siamek, slain after a short reign | - - - - - | |
| Kajomaras resumes the kingdom, and reigned | - - - - - | 30 |
| An interregnum | - - - - - | 200 |
| 2. Hushang or Houschenk, surnamed Pischdud | - - - - - | 50 |
| 3. Tahmurasb | - - - - - | 700 |
| 4. Gienshid or Giamschid | - - - - - | 30 |
| 5. Dahâk, Zabâk, Zoak | - - - - - | 1000 |
| 6. Aphridûn, Phridun, or Feridoun | - - - - - | 120 |
| 7. Manugjahr or Manougeher, surnamed Phirouz | - - - - - | 500 |
| 8. Nedar | - - - - - | 7 |
| 9. Apherasiab or Afrasiab | - - - - - | 12 |
| 10. Zab, Zaab, or Zoub | - - - - - | 30 |
| 11. Gustasp son of Zoub | - - - - - | 30 |

The second race.

| | | |
|---------------------------------------|-----------|-----|
| 1. Kaikobad | - - - - - | 120 |
| 2. Kaikaus | - - - - - | 150 |
| 3. Kaihofru | - - - - - | 60 |
| 4. Lohrasp or Lohorasb | - - - - - | 120 |
| 5. Gushtâsp, or Gustasp, or Kischtasf | - - - - - | 120 |
| 6. Ardschir, surnamed Bahaman | - - - - - | 112 |
| 7. Queen Homai | - - - - - | 32 |
| 8. Darab I. | - - - - - | 14 |
| 9. Darab II. | - - - - - | |

It is evident enough from the years set down in the two tables above, that there is a great mixture of fable and uncertainty in the accounts we have of these princes reigns; but there may, notwithstanding this, be a great deal of truth in these relations; and, by comparing them with what the Greek and other writers of the Persian affairs have given us of the same times, it may be very possible to extract a better idea of the antient Persian empire, than could have been had without

The nature thereof in point of stile, &c.

con-

consulting the oriental writers at all. Reason will be everlastingly the supreme judge of facts; and, if an history be attended with continual improbabilities or absurdities, men of sense will either doubt or reject its authority, whether its author lived in the east, or in the west. On the other hand, where an history is composed of a series of mixed facts, some probable, and some romantic, the candid reader will receive those, though he throw away these, and will not destroy the wheat, because there are tares amongst it. As to the stile of the following history, we have not pretended to follow the rhetorical pomp of the Persian authors; on the contrary, we have delivered ourselves with the utmost plainness and perspicuity, and have endeavoured, as far as in our power lay, to rescue truth out of those metaphoric clouds, which often obscure the writings of the eastern historians. Farther remarks of the same nature we leave to the discernment of our readers.

Kejomaras.

KEJOMARAS, or Cajoumeras, is allowed, by all the oriental authors, to have been the first king of the first race surnamed the Pischedadians from Pischedad, which signifies a just judge, and was the surname given to Hushangh the second king of this race afterwards, however attributed to them all. The manner whereby Kejomaras ascended the throne was this: In the province of Aderbayagjan, the inhabitants, feeling the sad effects of anarchy, and finding that liberty could not be enjoyed, where every one was free to do what he pleased, unanimously resolved to elect one, who should be obeyed by all, and to whose judgment they would submit, as to an irrefragable law. His conspicuous virtues determined them on this occasion to Kejomaras, whom therefore they immediately owned for their monarch, invested him with royal robes, and put a bonnet called tagi on his head, kissing his feet, in token of submission; which customs last-mentioned were preserved in use by his successorsⁱ. His elevation had a proper effect on the mind of this new king; he applied himself to every branch of his duty; he erected courts of justice; he taught men to build houses, and to live in villages; he invented various manufactures, such as the making woolen cloth, and spinning and weaving silk: in a word, he civilized his people, and merited, by his wisdom, justice and goodness, that dignity, which, out of modesty, and a foresight of the cares it would be attended with, he, for a long time, refused^k. The happiness, enjoyed by such as lived under so excellent a prince, invited the neighbouring people to put themselves under his protection. Thus his empire was extended by the same means

ⁱ MIRKHOND proœm. hist. The select chronicle.

^k Tarik. Montekheb, i. c.

that

that it began, viz. thro' an opinion of his worth; and he, upon their submission, treated his new subjects with the same care and kindness as he had always shewn to his old. He sent his brother to take a view of these new-acquired dominions, and went afterwards to look upon them himself. In the province of Ghorasan he met with his brother, and, embracing him tenderly, he, to perpetuate the memory of that interview, erected the city of Balch, where it happened; that word being derived from a verb which signifies to embrace. He was also the founder of abundance of other cities of Persia, particularly Kabulstan, Sigistan, Gom, &c.¹ This prince had two sons; the name of the elder was Nazek, a young man of wonderful prudence, who addicted himself intirely to study; for which reason he withdrew from his father's court, and lived with his wife in a little hermitage, where he gave himself over to contemplation: his father, who was himself a very learned man, went frequently to visit and converse with his son in his cell. Once going thither on the same errand, he found his son dead with several wounds upon his body: on a strict inquiry he was informed, that this cruel fact was committed by certain robbers of Tabrestan. These Kejomaras pursued into their own country, defeated them, and, after putting many to the sword, made slaves of the rest, and employed them in his buildings^m. The other son of Kejomaras, or rather his grandson, was Siamek, with whom the wife of Nazek was big when he was murdered. This child, as soon as he was born, Kejomaras adopted, bred him up with the utmost care, and, having instructed him in all the arts of reigning, he, with the consent of the people, transferred the sovereignty to him, and made him king in his life-time.

SIAMEK proved a gracious and warlike prince. Within Siamek. a short time after his accession, some of his neighbours entered his dominions in a hostile manner; whereupon he immediately raised an army, marched against them, and gave them battle, where, fighting valiantly, he received a mortal wound; he was carried out of the battle, and died in the arms of his wife, whom he left, as his father left his, big with child, conjuring her with his last words, if she brought forth a son, to put him continually in mind of his unfortunate death, and to exhort him to revenge it on the people, who, in so short a time, had deprived him both of his life and empire. Kejomaras being forced by this unlucky accident to ascend the throne again, the first thing he did was to celebrate the obsequies of his deceased son with great magnificence; the next, to take vengeance of those who had slain Siamek; after which he is said to have reigned, with great applause, thirty yearsⁿ: but how long he reigned before he resigned the crown to Siamek, is uncertain (B).

¹ MIRKHOND hist. sect. i. oriental. tit. CAIAMURATH.

^m D'HERBELOT. biblioth.

Hushang. HUSHANG, or Houschenk, surnamed Pischdad, was a person of great parts, as well as great courage; and is equally famous throughout the east, for the extent of his knowledge, and his mighty feats of valour. He is said to have given a regular body of laws to his subjects; whence he was called Pischdad. He also divided his country, and established governors throughout, encouraged the working of mines, and invented most of the instruments of agriculture; as also the art of conveying water through subterraneous passages, for the moistening their grounds. To him likewise they ascribe the taming leopards, and other beasts of chase, and the introducing furs, for keeping the body warm in winter. As he made his kingdom flourish through his wisdom, so he extended it by his courage; and, after a reign of fifty years, was killed by the fall of a piece of rock thrown from the mountains of Damavend, by an army of barbarians, who came to invade his territories. Some are of opinion, that he made ⁿ SHARISTANI apud HYDE rel. vet. Persar. c. 25. p. 175.

(B) There is nothing more uncertain than the lineage of this king, and the time in which he flourished. Some oriental writers have fancied him Adam; and, because he was the first king, would needs have him to be the first man also; but men of better judgments, and cooler imaginations, have conceived, that this notion was owing to a mistake, and that the antient Persians called him Adam by way of honorary surname, signifying, that he was as much the father of their nation, as Adam of mankind. The most judicious among the Persian writers believe him to have been the son of Aram, the son of Sbem, the son of Noah; and that he chose to erect the seat of his empire not far from mount Ararat, and the countries first planted after the flood. His religion is another disputable point, some holding him an idolater, and believing that the magnificent pile he reared for the burning of the body of his son Siamek, gave birth to the fire-worship ascribed to the Magians. But, if we may credit graver authorities, Kjomasaras, like most antient kings, was at once both prince and prophet, taught his people the true religion of the patriarchs, particularly the existence of one infinite almighty Being, and of a created evil being, the indefatigable enemy of mankind. The romance-writers allow him a thousand years of life, and say, that of these he reigned five hundred and sixty.

the province of Chufistan the seat of his empire, by erecting there the famous city of Susa or Sushan ° (C).

TAHMU-

• Leb. Tarik. MIRKHOND. hist. sect. 3.

(C) There is hardly an ancient prince in the world, whose name is more famous in romance than that of Hushang; there is a Persian book which bears the title of Hushang Nameh, i. e. Hushang's history, which, for the many wonderful things it contains, has been translated into the Turkish tongue. In this famous piece it is recorded, that our hero bestrid a monstrous animal, called Rakhsche, which he found in the dry island, or new world, being the issue of a male crocodile, and a female hippopotamus; this steed fed upon nothing but the flesh of serpents and dragons: after once Hushang had made this animal submit to the saddle, there was no giant so terrible, no monster so frightful, but he attacked and subdued. Amongst the rest of his conquests, he reduced the people of Mabiser, so famous in the eastern romances, for their having fishes heads, and thence esteemed a race of formidable monsters. The truth seems to be, that this prince subdued that people on the Persic gulf, called by the Greeks Ichthyophagi, from their living upon fish; whence the fruitful imagination of eastern poets deduced a people with fishes heads. The same fabulous writers ascribe to this monarch a certain book, bearing the title of Giavidan Kbird, i. e. the wisdom of all times: this is a very famous piece, and is certainly very ancient, and has been translated into various languages, particularly into Arabic, by the son of the vizier of the caliph Almamon, and into Turkish, under the title of Anwar Sobaili; it has also been in part rendered into French, and is in itself a very excellent treatise; whence, in all probability, it came to be attributed to this monarch, so famous for giving laws, and teaching wisdom and civility to his people (3). It is penned with all the enthusiasm natural to eastern writers; there are in it, however, some very fine sentences; amongst others, these which follow:

“ Great kings are gods on “ earth, and have all the attri“ butes of power, wisdom, and “ mercy, in a superior degree, “ with respect to private per“ sons, as the Almighty hath “ over them. Let not this,
 “ however, encourage them to “ use their subjects with rigour.
 “ Thunder is seldom heard,
 “ but the sun shines every day;
 “ we see ten thousand instances “ of God's goodness, for one “ extraordinary act of venge“ ance; let kings imitate him
 “ by doing all the good they “ can, and always remember, “ that though death is in their “ power, yet life is not: they “ may order a man to be cut “ into a thousand pieces; but “ there their dominion ends;
 “ they cannot call him into be-

(3) D'Herbrot. art. Hushenk.

“ ing

Tahmurash.

TAHMURASH, surnamed Diubend, i. e. the humbler of the devil, supposed by some to be the son, by others the grandson of Hushang, and, by a third party, his cousin, succeeded that famous monarch, and governed with great reputation; for, finding that the wars of his predecessor had introduced both poverty and confusion in his dominions, he, to remedy the first, remitted all taxes for three years; and, to reduce things into order, made new laws, and took care, that the magistrates should every-where put them in execution. He is the first Persian prince recorded to have had a vizier or prime minister; it is very possible, that the disorder in which he found the affairs of his empire, engaged him to make use of such an officer. This king fortified the frontiers of Persia, to prevent sudden invasions; and shewed so happy a mixture of wisdom and valour in his disposition, that several of the neighbouring nations, struck with the felicity of his subjects, voluntarily submitted themselves to him, and acknowledged him for their sovereign. At last, after a glorious reign of thirty years, a pestilence, which raged throughout his dominions, and destroyed, with equal rapidity, both man and beast, cut the thread of his life at Balch, to the great grief of his subjects P.

P MIRKOND. hist. sect. 4. D'HERBELOT. tit. TAHMURASH.

“ ing again : beware therefore “ of sudden judgments, and of “ penitence coming too late.
 “ Ministers are as the hands “ or instruments of kings ; men “ look not for an account of “ their actions from themselves,
 “ but from their masters ; a king “ therefore should look well to “ his ministers ; for it is as vain
 “ to throw the weight of crimes “ upon them, when the people “ rise in rebellion, as it would “ be for a murderer to tell the “ judge, that it was not he, but “ his sword, that killed his “ neighbour. Bad princes have “ sometimes had good ministers, “ but good princes never have “ bad ones long.

“ The passions of men may,
 “ by long acquaintance, be “ thoroughly known ; but the “ passions of women are inscru“ table : therefore they ought to “ be severed from men, lest the “ mutability of their tempers “ should infect others. Their “ natures, humours, and con“ stitution, require restraint : “ large and coarse stones are “ employed in ordinary build“ ings ; marble and alabaster in “ palaces ; but diamonds we “ lock up in cabinets ; and as “ things are rare, or common,
 “ of small value, or of great “ price, we set them to shew, or “ shut them up close (4).”

(4) Humaioun Nameh. ap. Beauchamp's essays, sect. 3.

GJEMSHID, or Giamschid, or rather Gjem Schid, his Gjem-name being Gjem, to which Schid, as a surname, was added, shid. because of his wonderful beauty, Schid, in the Persic language, signifying the sun; his eyes having such a lustre, that none could look him steadily in the face; tho' some authors are of opinion, that he received this addition to his name, not from the beauty of his person, but from the glory which resulted from his actions. It is not very certain whether this prince was the son of his predecessor, his nephew, or his grandson; but all agree, that he was of the family of Kejomaras, and had a just right to the throne. The reputation of his ancestors inspired him with a laudable ambition of equalling at least, if not excelling them. With this view, he encouraged all learned and wise men to come to his court, where he highly preferred them: amongst the rest were two persons of singular abilities, on whom he chiefly relied; the one a Jew, says our author Mirchond, whose name was Fael Issuf Rabban, and the other a Greek, called Fithagores, i. e. Pythagoras: but this must be a mistake; for though we have no certainty as to the chronology of these times, yet it is easy to discern, from the circumstances of things, that Gjemschid flourished at a considerable distance from Pythagoras. But such errors as these are not infrequent in oriental writers, through their want of understanding thoroughly the history of Greece; of which, however, they have most of them a general idea. By the advice, in all probability, of these wise counsellors, Gjemschid divided his subjects into three classes; the first consisting of soldiers; the second of husbandmen; and the third of artizans^a. In his time, music vocal and instrumental, and astronomy, were first introduced into Persia. He was also the first who built granaries in Persia, into which he caused every year a certain quantity of corn to be carried, that, in case of any deficiency in their harvests, famine might not be felt. In his time likewise wine came to be esteemed, or rather brought into general use, throughout his territories, from the following accident: A woman, who was much in Gjemschid's good graces, was afflicted with an inveterate head-ach, which all the physicians in the court of Gjemschid were not able to alleviate or remove: this woman went into the place where the king's wine was kept, and drank of it very freely; and, finding that it, in some measure, relieved her, she returned thither again, after resting herself for some hours, and drank yet a greater quantity, which completed her cure: this she told to the king; and, it being divulged through the court, every body began to regard wine as an universal medicine, capable of removing the most stubborn diseases. Among the most illustrious events of this great monarch's reign, we may justly place the rectification of the calendar, which he undertook and perfected, instituting two years, a civil or ordinary year, and an ecclesiastic year, in which there was, in the space of one hundred and thirty years, a month intercalated^r. He likewise instituted the Nauruz, i. e. the solemn observation of the new year; concerning which we are told that it had its rise thus: King Gjemschid, going in progress through his provinces, arrived in Aderbayagjan; and, shewing himself on a royal throne to his people, the sun shone with such lustre on his crown, adorned with precious stones and feathers, that the people shouted aloud, and said, This is Nauruz, i. e. the new day; whence the king took the opportunity of instituting a festival, wherein, besides the presents made to the prince, it was usual for him to receive and grant the petitions of all sorts of people, to release prisoners, and to do all other acts of clemency and benevolence which could be expected from him. As to the particular ceremonies attending this festival, the reader may probably be pleased to know, that it lasted six days. On the first of these the king gratified his people, or, if the phrase may be allowed, his commons. The second day he paid the same regard to the learned men attending his court. On the third, his priests and privy counsellors presented their petitions. On the fourth, he heard the suits of his nobility and kindred. On the fifth, those of his children. The sixth belonged to himself. In the evening of the fifth day, a young man, handsome in his person, was picked out, and appointed to wait at the king's door all night. At day-break he entered the chamber without ceremony; upon which the king, with an air of familiarity, asked him whence he came, whither he went, what his purpose, and his name, wherefore he came, and what he carried: to which the youth answered, I am Al Mansur, i. e. August; my name is Al-Mobarek, i. e. the Blessed; I came hither from GOD, bearing the new year. Then he sat down, and immediately entered the nobility, bearing each a silver vessel, in which were wheat, barley, peas, vetches, pulse, a sugarcane, and two pieces of gold fresh from the mint. Out of this basin first the wafir or vizier, then the treasurer, afterwards the nobility, according to their rank, each offered his silver vessel to the king. At the conclusion of the ceremony, a very great loaf, made of several kinds of corn, was brought in, and placed before the king, who, after eating some of it himself, intreated such as were present, to eat the rest, in these words, This is a new day of a new month, the beginning of a new year: it is fit, therefore, that we renew our ties to each other. Then rising up, in his royal robes, he solemnly blessed his nobility, bestowing on them rich gifts^t. The evening of this day the Persians called Phristaph, on which they did every thing that might testify joy, and strong hopes of seeing a pleasant year. A great part of his reign Gjemschid remained in Sigjistan, thinking it the properest province of his empire for his court, till affairs in the east were thoroughly settled: then he changed it for the Proper Persia, where he erected the noble city of Eftechar, which most take to be the Persepolis of the Greeks, though some believe it the city of Schiras. If what the antient Persian writers deliver of the extent of this city of Eftechar be true; viz. that it contained a square of twenty-four leagues; then it is possible, that both opinions may be true: but if we measure the probability of this account by the other things related of this prince; such as, that he made the tour of the whole earth, was skilled in the occult sciences, and possessed a magic cup of incomparable virtues; we may safely restrain the bounds of this city: and though we allow it to have been very great, especially for those times, yet we may conceive it not to have taken up more than a third part of the space they have assigned it. It is universally allowed, that Gjemschid gave himself up intirely to the study of the arts of reigning; and some say, that he was much helped in his political contemplations by considering the transactions among the bees; and that he drew many customs from the hive into the court of Persia. Among other inventions, the signet-ring is ascribed to him, and that mode which still prevails throughout the east, of preferring the left hand to the right, as the more honourable: he likewise directed, that the different degrees of people should be distinguishable, from their garb: in a word, he made it the whole business of his life to render his kingdom flourishing, and his people happy; in which he succeeded to his utmost wish. But this great felicity proved the source of the deepest misfortunes; for, having reigned long and gloriously, he unaccountably took it into his head, that he was immortal; sent pictures of himself throughout his empire, and ordered them to be worshiped with divine honours. This madness soon lost him the hearts of the people; so that the province of Sigjistan, by the persuasion of a certain great captain, who was related to the king, and whose name was Abad, took arms; and, when they had formed themselves into a regular army, marched, under the command of Zoák or Dahác, towards Schiras,

^a MIRKHOND, hist. sect. 5.

^r HYDE rel. vet. Persar. c. 14.

^t CASUINI, ap. Hyde, p. 237.

where Gjemfchid met him with a powerful army, which he had raised. The engagement was fierce and bloody; but, in the end, Gjemfchid was defeated, and taken prisoner: upon which the tyrant ordered him to be immediately fawn afunder; which was performed in Zoak's fight. This is the account given by Mirchond, and the best Arabian histories: others say, that he escaped from the battle, and wandered through his dominions. He left behind him a son, whose name was Phridun or Aphridun, of three years old, whom his mother Phramak found means to conceal from his enemies, and to breed up privately, till providence enabled him to ascend the throne of Persia ^u.

Dehoc.

ДЕНОС, Dabac, Zahak, Zoak: some authors affirm, that the name of this prince is only an alteration of a nickname bestowed on him by the Persians; viz. Deh-ak, signifying, that he had ten ill qualities, which made him hateful and abominable; and that his real name was Piurash (D). As this monarch gained the crown by his sword, so he governed fiercely, and with little regard to his subjects. He was, however, a person of great genius, and deeply skilled in the occult sciences: in one word, he is represented to us as a completely wicked man; one whose abilities answered the evil intentions of his soul, and whose person struck beholders with horror; for he had a meagre pallid visage, eyes wild and sparkling, an air fierce and haughty; at the same time that his body was deformed, and his whole appearance terrible. The natural fierceness of his temper was irritated by a sharp and incurable disease, consisting in two painful ulcers, one on each shoulder, the anguish of which resembled the pain following the bite of a serpent; whence the story inserted in a famous oriental romance, that the devil, having for many years obeyed him, demanded,

^u D'HERBELOT. tit, Gjemfchid.

(D) It is very uncertain of what family this prince was; some report that he was lineally descended from Siamek, the son of Kejomaras; others, that he was an Arabian, the son of Ulu-an, descended in a direct line from Abad, the chief of the Adites. The truth seems to be, that he was an Arab by the father's side, but descended of the house of Kejomaras by the mother. There is indeed another fabulous genealogy or two, which scarce deserve to be mentioned, because they are glaringly false; the one supposes but two generations between him and Adam, the other, that he was descended from Ham, the son of Noah, and is to be looked on as the Nimrod of the Scriptures. It is very likely, that all these stories were invented to disgrace a prince whose cruelty rendered him odious, or that they happened through some mistakes in reading or transcribing the works of antient poets.

at last, as a full reward, that he might have leave to kiss his shoulders; which being granted, an ugly serpent immediately took post in each, and gnawed itself a den in his flesh. Either some forcerer, or the devil in a dream, suggested to Zoak an inhuman remedy for this evil; viz. that of washing these ulcers frequently with the warm blood of men; or, as others say, applying to them the brains of men newly slain. At first the tyrant put to death criminals of all sorts; but, when there were no more of these, he fell without mercy upon the innocent, that he might have wherewithal to alleviate his pain. The priests, and other persons in authority, employed all the arguments they could use, to engage him to have recourse rather to the blood or brain of sheep; but to no purpose: those, however, who were intrusted with the care of these unhappy wretches destined to slaughter, for the tyrant's ease, often, out of mere pity, let them make their escape: so that, flying to the mountains, in order to preserve themselves and their benefactors from danger, they there formed themselves into a particular nation, called since the *Curdes. All his reign long Zoak caused Phridun, the son of his predecessor, to be searched for, but to no purpose; his mother took care to hide him out of the reach of Zoak, and his other enemies: however, the tyrant discharged his wrath upon her father, whom he put to death, as he did many others, whom he suspected inclined to the interest of the young Phridun. The chief cause of these proceedings was a dream, wherein the tyrant beheld three men, who came to attack him; these, he thought, threw him down, and bound him: afterwards, one of them gave him a mortal wound on the head; then the other two loosened his girdle, tied his feet therewith, and carried him into the territory of Damavand. Having applied to the most skilful interpreters of dreams in his dominions, to know what this signified, they unanimously agreed, that it portended the loss of his kingdom, and of his life, because, among the Persians, the girdle is a mark of dignity: now this Zoak conceived could never be done but by Phridun, and his party. Among the numbers put to death, on various accounts, by Zoak, were the sons of a certain smith, whose name was Gao, or, as others write it, Kaob. This man, driven to madness at the sight of his children's blood, ran up and down the streets, crying out for justice and help against the tyrant, holding up a leathern apron in his hand, as if it had been a standard. In a short time, the army he got together became very formidable; so that he made himself master of various strong forts, and great cities, particularly of the city Heri, or Herat, the capital of Chorasan, where he staid for some time, to put his affairs in order; and when he found, that he was in a condition to offer Zoak battle, he made a long oration to encourage his people, assuring them, amongst other things, that he had not taken arms with any view to his private advantage; but that, as soon as he had restored them to their liberty, he would leave them to elect whom they would for a king. The people, with one accord, offered the sovereignty to him; which he as positively refused, telling them, that as the sense he had of his own injuries had put him upon first taking arms, so he would never consent to injure others; that Phridun, the son of Giamschid, was their lawful prince; that they ought to bring him immediately from his retreat, and put him at their head. Popular humours are easily turned: the army, on this speech, grew as loyal to Phridun, as they had been grateful to the smith. Phridun observing the spirit of his people, and being informed, that Zoak's army were by no means hearty in his interest, he marched, with the utmost expedition, to meet him; and the armies engaging, after a brisk action, Zoak's troops abandoned him, and he was taken prisoner: whereupon Phridun ordered him to be conducted to the mountains of Damavand, and gave directions for his being imprisoned in a cave there. This victory being gained about the time of the autumnal equinox, the Persians instituted a feast in memory thereof, which they called Mihirgjan, or rather Mibrag-jân γ (E).

* MIRKHOND. hist. sect. 6.

PHRIDUN,

γ HYDE rel. vet. Pers. c. 8. p. 158. D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. Feridoun, Gaoh.

(E) The history of Zoak makes a prodigious figure in the Persian romances; what is related in them of him being too absurd as well as fabulous, it would be to no purpose to swell out a note with such stories. It is very likely, that the poets, immediately after the time of this cruel prince, drew the most invidious characters of him they could devise, and heightened all the mischievous things he did with the utmost force of their inventions. If we conceive to ourselves poets writing with this view, and, at the same time, reflect on the genius of oriental writers in general, and of poets in particular, we need not be at a loss for all the strange things that we now read of Zoak, and yet allow the first authors of them to have been men of good sense too. Metaphors well understood, allusions readily apprehended, and allegories easily explained, in one age, appear all as matters, or, at least, as circumstances, of fact, in ages which succeed; and hence it comes to pass, that a stroke of poetic satire, or the rhetorical flourish of an author, is misapprehended for a strict assertion, and so delivered by historians, who come after, and transcribe all

PHRIDUN, Apbridun, or Feridoun. This prince proved Phridun. one of the greatest, wisest, and most successful monarchs that ever ruled in the east. His first act, after being quietly seated on the throne, was to make Kaob the smith general of his armies; after which he sent him towards the western parts of his dominions, in order to reduce such provinces, as, during the troubles of the kingdom, had shaken off the Persian yoke. Kaob spent twenty years in this enterprize, in which space he added many fine countries to the Persian empire. At length the king recalled him, and made him governor of Aderbayagjan, which he ruled ten years, with equal satisfaction to the people and his prince, and then died much regretted by Phridun, who, to do honour to his memory, gave all his estates among his relations; and then, taking his sons into his own court, bred them there in a most honourable manner, and, when they grew up, gave each of them greater possessions than their father had acquired². To shew his gratitude yet more, he made the leathern apron, which Kaob had hung upon a stick at the beginning of the insurrection, the royal standard of Persia, calling it dirfesch Kaviani, i. e. the standard of Kaob,

² MIRKHOND. hist. sect. 7.

all they find, without weighing or considering how or in what manner it was written. The first historians, in all countries, were poets; the second race prose-writers, who copied from them; and hence it is, that antient historians are full of grave fables, which, through length of time, are hard to be understood: this has been the fate of Greece, and of Rome, of Britain, of Ireland, and why not of Persia? But fiction, though it may obscure, yet it does not absolutely destroy truth. Zoak was, in all probability, an Arabian invader, who, after making himself master of Persia, used his new subjects ill, till the weight of the loads he laid upon them grew too heavy to be borne, and then they did, what a people may always do, throw them off their shoulders, and would bear no more. As to what we are told of his being confined in the caverns of Damawand, or rather of Dunbawand, we think it may be understood to mean no more, than that he was kept there in some strong castle. These mountains are in the province of Aderbayagjan, which, as we have more than once remarked, is part of the antient Media; they are rocky, full of caverns, and consequently have a gloomy appearance. The poets therefore, taking the same licence here, allowed them elsewhere, have feigned that Tahmura, after overcoming the divus, or evil geni, imprisoned them in these grottoes; and, by degrees, these expressions grew so frequent, that a wizard or a tyrant was as readily sent to the mountains of Damawand, as, among our common people, ghosts are chained, or, to preserve the true phrase, laid, in the bottom of the Red sea.

that he might perpetuate his name and services to all posterity. This standard he adorned with precious stones, to which his successors continually adding, it became at last of such inestimable value, that, being taken by the Arabians in the battle of Cadesia, it enriched the whole army^a. As Phridun was desirous of restoring peace and good order throughout all his dominions, he sent persons, not only of great parts, but eminent for their integrity, to govern all the provinces under his dominion. He married also, with a view of interest only, the daughter of his predecessor Zoak, by whom he had two sons, Salm and Tur; but these proving, like their grandfather, haughty, obstinate, and cruel, he took a Persian lady to his bed, by whom he had a son, named Irege, equally wise and courteous; so that he became at once the darling of his father, and the delight of the people. Thus things passed on, till Phridun, feeling himself beginning to decline under the weight of age and illness, summoned his grandees together, and, having informed them of his design to quit the regal dignity, desired to know, which of his sons they wished he should make his successor. These lords unanimously answered, that, if he would no longer govern himself, they desired to have Irege for their prince; to which Phridun assented: but, to prevent his brothers from taking this ill, he gave Tur all the eastern provinces of his empire; to Salm the provinces on the other side; and restrained Irege within the compass of Persia, Assyria, and Mesopotamia. From this division came the names of Turan and Iran, the one signifying that great extent of country which lies to the east of Persia, and the other Persia itself, and the provinces dependent thereon^b. As for Tur, he built a noble city, which he made the capital of his territories, calling it, after his own name, Turon, and the country Turquestan. This city was seated in the province of Mauaralnabar, in the neighbourhood of the Caspian sea; and hence the nation inhabiting that tract of country acquired the name of Turks^c. However large those shares might be which Salm and Tur had received from their father, they still hated him, and their brother Irege, whose ruin they concerted together. Things being at last ripe for the execution of their projects, Salm and Tur marched each with great forces into Aderbayagjan; and, having joined their armies, sent a sort of manifesto to their father, wherein they set forth, that, with just reason, they were displeas'd with the kindness which he had shewn Irege, whom they stiled a bastard; and declared at the same time, that they would never lay down

^a D'HERBELOT. biblioth. oriental. art. Dirfesch. ^b HYDE
rel. vet. Persar. c. 35. p. 417. D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art.
Feridoun, ^c MIRKHOND, hist. ubi supra, their arms till he was deposed, and the countries divided between them, which hitherto had been in his possession. Phridun, justly displeas'd at this undutiful behaviour, sent immediately his orders to Irege, to draw together all the forces he was able, and to march against his brothers. Irege, however, desired the king to have recourse to milder measures, in hopes of preserving the peace of the empire. Phridun was of a contrary opinion, and determin'd to reduce the rebels by arms. But Irege, unwilling to do his brothers any wrong, took with him some of his wisest counsellors, and went with them to his brothers camp, in order, if possible, amicably to adjust the differences between them. They, who wish'd for nothing more, immediately seiz'd him, and struck off his head; which having stuck on a pole, they insolently sent to their father. Phridun was excessively griev'd at his son's misfortune, and therefore resolv'd to carry on the war against Salm and Tur; in order to which, he gave the dominions of Irege to his son Manugeher, who immediately march'd with an army against his uncles. They, despising his youth, quickly came to an engagement, in which the two brothers were routed, and lost their lives by the hand of Manugeher, who, after this glorious victory, return'd in triumph to his grandfather Phridun, who was now grown blind. When he heard the acclamations of the people at the entrance of Manugeher, he ask'd, who it was that presum'd to enter his presence in such a manner. The young victor cried out, It is your grandson Manugeher, the avenger of the blood of Irege, who hath slain Salm and Tur with his own hand. Phridun then receiv'd him with open arms, and with all the demonstrations of paternal fondness. Afterwards he took the tagi or tiara from his head, and put it on that of Manugeher or Manugjar, declaring him thereby sovereign of Persia, appointing at the same time one Soam or Soham, a person of great wisdom and valour, to be his vizir^d. Within a short space after this, Phridun died, full of years and glory (E).

As

^d D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. Soham.

(E) The oriental writers are universally agreed, that the terms Touran and Iran, expressive of the two great empires on the other and on this side the Oxus, call'd by them the Gjeibun, took rise at this time. It may seem strange, that such large tracts of country should receive appellations from persons who liv'd and govern'd them so short a time; for it appears, that Irege, Tur, and Salm, all died in the life-time of Phridun, and within a small space after the partition of his dominions among them. But, when this is more thoroughly considered, the wonder will cease. The monarchs of these extensive kingdoms were, during a long course of ages, at war with each other; and this enmity proceed-

As to the personal qualifications of this prince, he is celebrated, by oriental writers, as the Soloman of Persia, one who made it his whole study to govern his people in such a manner, as that they might enjoy greater felicity than if they had lived in a state of freedom. He extended his dominions, with a view of extending happiness to those, whom he reduced under his obedience. He was a zealous worshiper of the true GOD, and took such care to repress Zabiiism, that some Mohammedan authors have not scrupled to assert, that he was a mussulman. It is also recorded of him, that he left this advice with his successor: Believe, my son, that the days of your reign are so many leaves of a book; be careful therefore to write nothing in any page thereof, that you would not have seen by posterity^e. Many other wise sayings of this great prince are scattered in various authors, which we have neither time nor opportunity to insert here. Some Persian writers think, that Pbridun was cotemporary with Abraham. On the other hand, the learned Dr. Hyde has entertained a notion, that this Pbridun is the Phraortes of Herodotus^f. It would take up too much time to discuss this controversy here; and, besides, we shall have occasion to resume this subject hereafter, and to consider the opinions of the critics on oriental history all at once. In the mean time, let us pursue the thread of our narration, and proceed to the reign of Pbridun's grandson (F). MA-

^e D'HERBELOT. art Feridoun. ^f HYDE relig. vet. Perf. c. 8.

ing originally from the quarrel of their ancestors, it was natural enough for them to call their dominions after those in whose right they held them. The whole empire belonged to Pbridun; the descendants of Tur or Tour kept up the claim of their ancestor to the whole; the kings of Persia succeeding Manugjabr asserted the right of Pbridun to divide his dominions as he pleased; and therefore it is likely, that Iran and Toucan were words first used in Persia, and by degrees spread themselves throughout the east. Whether Tur was the undoubted father of the Turks, will admit of some question, since almost all the oriental writers affirm, that Japhet had a son called Turk; and yet many of them admit, that Tarquestan had its name from the prince we speak of. It would be needless, and at the same time improper for us, to enter into a prolix discussion of that point here, since it must be examined when we come to write the history of the Turks; however, we think it not amiss to remark, that there is nothing stranger, or more perplexed, in this double derivation of the name of the Turks, than there is in that of the Hebrews, whom some affirm to have been so called from Heber the son of Salab, and others from the surname of Abraham, who was stiled the Hebrew from his coming from the other side the river, i. e. the Euphrates.

(F) The reader will easily perceive, from the characters he has MANUGJAHR, or Manugeher, according to some authors, Manugeher was not the son of Irege, but his grandson by a daughter. It is not very material to us which of these opinions is true &c. Certain it is, that he was a wise prince, and of a mild disposition; and had a minister, viz. the vizir Sobam before-mentioned, whose fame is still great throughout all the east. Manugeher, probably by his advice, made several just regulations in the government of Persia: he ascertained, more exactly than any of his predecessors had done, the boundaries of the provinces, into each of which he sent a president or governor, independent of whom he established, in every great town or borough, a mayor or provost; so that the governors had no opportunity of setting up for themselves; and the provosts were obliged to behave prudently, for fear the governor should write against them to court. Observing the infertility of Persia to be chiefly owing to the want of water, Manugeher considered every way of supplying this defect: he caused fine canals to be cut from the mighty rivers Tigris and Euphrates, to refresh the barren has already seen drawn in this history, that, among the oriental nations, wisdom, as well as valour, is thought necessary in a hero. Phridun is as famous among them as any of the heroes of Greece or Rome amongst us; and for the same reason, because he was a man great in all things, in war, and in peace, at the head of armies, and on the throne. On this account, oriental writers preserve, with as great care, the wise sayings of their princes, as the accounts of their conquests. We have excused ourselves above from the repetition of all that has been recorded of this sort, in relation to Phridun; but the reader will, in all probability, be pleased with the following specimens of his wisdom, because they contain rules easily applied, and which concern mankind in general.

& D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. Manugeher.

Man should weigh well the nature of himself,

*The varying frailness of this flat-t'ring world,
And the true excellence of heav'n's high Lord;
Then would he this despise, and trust in him.
The world deceives us all. — In God is truth.
Let not thy riches or thy pow'r prevail
To swell thy bosom with conceits of pride;
Look back, remember those thou hast seen high,
And mark, if thou hast never seen them sink;
Let this teach thee. One end awaits us all:
And when inevitable death commands,
That we should follow to his dreary realm,
Matters it much, if from a royal couch,
Or from a mattress thrown upon the ground,
We rise to take our journey? (5).*

(5) D'Herbelot. biblioth. orient. art. Phridoun.

coun-

countries in their neighbourhood ; he took care to collect all the streams issuing from the little springs on the tops of mountains, that their waters might be made as useful as possible. To encourage his subjects to cultivate their lands with care, he employed much time in gardening, and took great pains to discover the virtues of herbs and flowers, causing such as were most valuable to be transplanted from mountains, and uncouth places, into his own gardens, or those of his courtiers. But, while he was thus cultivating the arts of peace, Apberasiab, the descendant of Tur or Tour, invaded his dominions with a great army of Turks, in order, as he gave out, to avenge the death of his ancestor. Manugeher, finding himself too weak to resist so formidable an enemy, retired towards the country of Tabrestan. Some authors say, that there happened a battle between him and Apherasiab, and that Manugeher was routed. However that matter was, all are agreed, that the king of Persia withdrew into a fortress, and prepared to defend himself there against the attempts of his enemy. Apherasiab besieged him with all his army ; but to no purpose ; and the winter drawing on, the Turk, being afraid lest his own men should desert him, began to think of peace. Upon this, commissioners were dispatched on both sides, and a treaty concluded on these terms : That Apherasiab should possess all the country east of the river Gihon ; and that he should leave Manugeher, without molestation, in possession of Persia, and the provinces dependent on it. Such was the event of this cruel war, which threatened no less than the subversion of the monarchy of Persia^h. As soon as Apherasiab was retired into his own country, Manugeher began to provide against such invasions for the future, and ordered all his governors to get ready their quotas of troops. These measures alarming Apherasiab, he gave orders to his forces to make inroads into Persia ; but the Turk had not the same success in this as in the former war. The precautions of Manugeher perfectly answered his end ; so that the enemy were not only repulsed where-ever they made their courses, but also lost a great number of soldiers, who were taken prisoners. Apherasiab therefore very willingly renewed the peace, and left Manugeher to act as he thought fit in his own dominions. That wise and good prince made the city of Sigjistan for a time his royal seat ; and when, by his presence, he had put all things on that side in good order, he sent thither his vizir Soham to preserve them in that state ; and went himself to reside in the centre of his empire, where he applied himself, as he had done before, to the cultivation of arts and sciences, and to every thing which might render his people

^h MIRKHOND. hist. sect. 9.

powerful and happy. Soham managed so prudently in the province of Sigjistan, that he gained the good-will of the people, as well as the favour of the court; but, in the midst of his happiness, an accident fell out, which surpris'd him not a little: his wife was brought to-bed of a son with long yellow hair. Soham therefore gave him the name of Zal-zer, i. e. golden hair. This young man, when he grew up to years of discretion, gave manifest tokens of an exalted genius, insomuch that Manugeher sent for him and his father to appear at court. Thither they went; and the sight of the young nobleman augmented the esteem and gratitude Manugeher had for his father and family. Loaded with new honours and dignities, Soham and his son returned into their own country, and lived there with the same splendor and reputation that they had done before. One day it happened, that Zal-zer went to hunt in the province of Kablustan, dependent on the kingdom of Touran, but bordering northwards on the Persian dominions. Meherab, who was at this time governor of that province, being informed of this, went out to meet him, that he might shew his respect to the father by the honours paid to his son. The conversation he had with Zal-zer charmed him so much, and made so strong an impression on his mind, that he could not help talking of him to his family upon his return home; which had such an effect on the mind of Roudabah his daughter, that she fell violently in love with Zal-zer on his report; and, as womens passions are ever sudden and ungovernable, she sent immediately one of her maids into the place where Zal-zer was encamped, that she might find an opportunity of speaking with him. Her project succeeded perfectly well: the young nobleman, perceiving the maiden gathering flowers, entered into discourse with her, inquiring her condition, and with whom she lived. The girl, properly instructed, answered him, that she was the servant of Roudabah, the daughter of Meherab; and then, talking of the family, expatiated on the wit, beauty, and sweet disposition of her lady. Zal-zer immediately conceived a great esteem for this amiable person, which, by degrees, ripened into so warm a passion, that he could neither eat nor sleep till he had concerted the means of speaking to her. An interview, as our author observes, between two persons who equally desire it, is very quickly obtained. The lovers made the best use of their time; that is, they exchanged the most solemn vows of fidelity, and engaged to marry each other, as soon as the consent of their parents could be obtained. To cover his amour, Zal-zer made a visit at the same time to the father of his mistress, by whom he was very kindly received; and, after staying with him all night, set out on his return to his father in the province of Sigjistan. Almost as soon

soon as he came home, he acquainted Soham with all that had happened, and that it was impossible for him to live, at least in any degree of happiness, without the possession of the daughter of Meherab. Some difficulty there was in procuring the king's consent to this marriage; for it was hitherto a thing without precedent for a Persian to espouse a Turk. However, the many services of Soham, and the great merit of Zalzer, prevailed so far over Manugeber, that he at last yielded to all they desired. The nuptials were celebrated with prodigious magnificence, the inhabitants of Sigjistan and Kablustan vying with each other in their expressions of joy on this occasion: nor were the consequences of this match less happy, than its conclusion was splendid; for, at the end of nine months, the lovely Roudabah was brought to-bed of a son, who was named Rustan, the mighty hero of all the oriental romancesⁱ. The reader will hereafter perceive how the loves of this illustrious pair came to find a place in the Persian history. Let us now return to Manugeber, who spent all his time in putting the affairs of his kingdom in the best order imaginable, with respect both to peace and war; that is, he took care to banish luxury, to encourage virtue, and to render every man's condition so happy, as to engage him to fight for that government, on the continuance of which it depended. The personal qualifications of this monarch have been already, in some measure, displayed. It remains however, that we do him justice in one particular, of greater importance than all the rest: he was a most zealous worshiper of the true GOD, of which we have the most shining instances in the history of his life and reign written by Tabari^k, an antient Persian author. By him we are informed, that as soon as this prince heard of the Turks passing the river Gjeihan, in order to drive him out of his dominions, he assembled a great council of his nobility, wherein he delivered himself in these words: "The most holy and " high GOD delivered to me this kingdom, that I might ren" der him praise and glory by my actions as a prince, pre" serving my people in plenty and ease, and impartially dis" tributing justice, that thereby the glorious gift of GOD
 " might, in my hand, be strengthened and increased. If,
 " contrary to this my duty, I had acted ungratefully towards
 " my Creator, then I should justly have deserved to lose my " kingdom here, and to suffer everlasting punishment for my " wickedness hereafter. The most holy and high GOD having " caused me to be born of royal blood, and, in right thereof,
 " bestowed a kingdom upon me, let us not, my friends, basely

ⁱ MIRKHOND. hist. sect. 8. D'HERBELOT. art. Manougeher.

^k Apud HYDE rel. vet. Pers. c. 8. p. 156.

“ throw it away, or tamely suffer it to be taken from us.
 “ Consider well of the state we are in, and to-morrow I will “ more largely inform you of my sentiments of the matter.”
 The next day accordingly the nobles of Persia assembled again; and the king, being seated on his throne of state, with his royal crown upon his head, and the mubad mubadan, or high-priest, seated near him in his golden chair, rose up, and spoke as he had done the day before, ascribing all dominion to the Almighty, and acknowledging that the crown of Persia was his gift. He then observed, that all things depended alike on the will of the Supreme Being; and that nothing could take effect, but by his command, or with his permission. He said further, that GOD had long indulged the Persian nation in the full enjoyment of many blessings, in consequence of which, they were bound to live in exact obedience to his laws, that is, to make a proper use of the good things bestowed on them. He added, that, as to the point at present before them, viz. the invasion of the Turks, it came not, but by the permission of GOD; wherefore to him they ought first to apply themselves for its being taken away. He exhorted them to reform their lives, to be constant in prayer, to exert their courage, and their understandings, in the defence of their country, and to rest stedfastly in the hope, that the Almighty would not forsake them, but restore them again to peace and quiet, either by giving them a victory over their enemies, or inclining the hearts of their enemies to peace. The piety of this prince was rewarded with a very long life and reign. As to the extent of the former, we have no certainty; but, as to the latter, authors agree in fixing it at an hundred and twenty years. They say likewise, that the death of Manugjabr was, like his life, majestic and serene; that he called to him his son and successor, gave him, in few words, his advice as to the government of his dominions, and recommended his subjects most affectionately to his care¹.

NUDAR or Naudar succeeded his father; but his reign was Nudar, far from being as happy. He was scarce seated on his throne before his grandees began to form parties, and to create seditions in his empire; which weakened it so much, that the Turks immediately conceived hopes of conquering it; a thing they had long set their hearts on. With this view, Pashangh, at that time king of Touran, the direct descendant of Tur, the son of Phridun, called his sons together; and having expatiated, first, on the right which their family had to the kingdom of Persia, and, secondly, of the low state the Persian affairs were then in, he told them, that the intent of his drawing

¹ D'HERBELOT, biblioth. orient. ubi supra.

them together, was to know which of them had courage enough to assert the pretensions derived to him from his ancestors, and to undertake the reduction of the provinces on the other side the Gjeihon. Apherasiab, his eldest son, stung with ambition, and desirous of excelling his brethren, immediately offered himself to raise an army, in order to conquer Iran. Accordingly, he drew together four hundred thousand horse and foot; and, with this prodigious army, entered Sigjistan. Nudar, as soon as he was informed of this, caused his best troops to file off that way, and gave the command of them to Soham, the father of Zal-zer; but he being old and decrepit, was forced to march slowly towards the enemy; and even that fatigued him so much, that he died before he had reached the place of rendezvous: an event highly pleasing to Apherasiab, who very much dreaded the valour and conduct of this great man. Nudar, not doubting that Soham, and his troops, were already arrived at the place he appointed them, marched with his army towards Mazanderan, where, on a sudden, and before he expected it, they came within sight of the enemy. The camps being opposite to each other, a Turkish champion, whose name was Bafmon, challenged any of the Persian warriors to a single combat; which challenge was readily accepted by Kobad, the grandson of Kaob, of whom we have said so much in the life of Phridun. The combat terminated in favour of the Persian, who, having slain his antagonist, spoiled him of his arms, and carried them, as the trophy of his victory, to his tent. The Turks were prodigiously incensed at this accident, and resolved with themselves to revenge it speedily on Nudar, and his army. Accordingly, having possessed themselves of all the posts about it, they attacked the Persians in their camp, where a most obstinate battle was fought, till, at length, there happened such a prodigious shower of rain, attended with such an extraordinary darkness, that Nudar laid hold of this opportunity to retire, and to order his sons Thus and Gustam, who were at the head of separate bodies, to march speedily to his relief; which they did, accompanied by Karen the brother of Kobad, who had found means to withdraw the royal treasures out of Sigjistan, and to send them to a place of safety. Apherasiab observing the measures taken by Nudar, and conceiving that his intent was to spin out the war, he, to prevent its running into a length, which, in the end, would have been destructive to his troops, sent an officer of his, whose name was Karabon, with positive orders to attack Karen, and the body of Persians under his command; which accordingly he did, killed their commander, and effectually dispersed the rest. Not long after, Apherasiab attacked Nudar in his camp; and, after obtaining a signal victory,

victory, took that monarch prisoner, in his flight, with many Persian nobles. As soon as they came into his presence, Apherasiab ordered them to be cut in pieces; but his brother, a prince of great humanity and wisdom, hindered him, and prevailed on him to content himself with putting them in prison; to which, with much ado, he yielded. The next step, after this victory, was to possess himself of the court and treasures of Nudar; in order to which, Apherasiab instantly detached a body of thirty thousand men: they, entering the province of Sigjistan, made themselves masters of the capital, and of the royal palace, the Persians being every-where so intimidated, that they durst not stir; but submitted tamely to the yoke which conquest had imposed upon them. Meherab, it seems, after the marriage of his daughter to Zal-zer, had retired into Persia, and lived in great honour and affluence there, till this sudden overthrow of the empire threatened him, as well as the rest of its inhabitants. Meherab, being a man of great policy, bethought himself of a means to divert immediate danger, by sending a messenger to Apherasiab, with very rich presents, and a letter to this purpose; ‘That, though he lived in Persia, he was by nation a Turk; and not only so, but, in some measure, allied to him in blood, being lineally descended from Zoak: wherefore he hoped his family, and this early testimony of obedience, would be sufficient to recommend him to his special protection.’ Having thus amused the victor, he gave notice to his son-in-law Zal-zer, who, assembling as privately as he could several small bodies of men, appointed them a place of rendezvous, where he himself joined them; and, finding them numerous enough to attempt somewhat against the common enemy, he began to act offensively, and, in a short time, drove the Turks out of the province of Sigjistan. Of which when Apherasiab received intelligence, it provoked him so much, that he ordered the unfortunate Nudar to have his head struck off in prison; which was accordingly put in execution, without the least regard to his dignity. As to the length of his reign, authors are divided, some making it seven years, others enlarging it to nine. Mirkbond, whom we generally follow, adheres to the former number. Some oriental writers make this prince cotemporary with Joshua; others place him much higher: we shall not determine here who are in the right ^m.

APHERASIAB or Afrasiab, notwithstanding this rebellion, Aphera- or rather insurrection, looking upon himself as monarch of Persia, sent an account to his father Pashangh of the happy success with which his expedition had been crowned. But it siab.

^m MIRKHOND. hist. sect. 8. D'HERBELOT, art. Naudhar.

was not long before he had news of another nature to send him; for the Persians, universally detesting his haughty and insolent temper, began to raise seditions in every part of the kingdom; nay, their aversion engaged them in steps which carried their intrigues farther; and made them endeavour to stir up the brother of Apherasiab, who had, at first, saved Nudar's life, to put in his claim to the throne, promising him both assistance and obedience. He, burning with the ambition natural to his family, listened readily to the proposal, and advised them to engage Zal-zer to invade the provinces in the neighbourhood of Sigjistan, in the spring; assuring them, that, the war once begun, he would appear in their favour. These negotiations could not be carried on so secretly, but that Apherasiab gained intelligence of them; and immediately set all his wits to work, to prevent their taking effect: with this view he caused his brother to be assassinated, and then applied himself indefatigably to the raising troops, resolving to reduce all his opponents. Zal-zer, being informed of these proceedings, and vehemently regretting the loss of the young Turkish prince, openly excited the Persians to take arms, deriding their cowardice, and giving them to understand, that more than half their enemy's strength lay in their fears. His discourses, by degrees, had such an effect, that the inhabitants of Persia, assembling together in small bodies, marched by night through secret and by-ways to his camp; where, when they were all arrived, Zal-zer found himself at the head of a very formidable armyⁿ. Apherasiab, who had his spies every-where, receiving an exact account of Zal-zer's situation, immediately resolved to change his manner of making war, and to act altogether on the defensive. This gave the Persian captain a great deal of trouble; but, at last, he found an opportunity of bringing Apherasiab to a battle: it was very bloody, and so obstinate, that it lasted till it was dark; and then each army, retiring to its camp, found that neither side had any reason to boast of victory. The war continued for a long time after this, without any decisive action; whereby all industry being destroyed, there followed first a scarcity, then a famine, and, at the end of this, a grievous pestilence; which, falling at once into both camps, filled Apherasiab and Zal-zer with thoughts of peace. Negotiations were not long on foot, before a treaty was concluded, whereby it was stipulated, that Apherasiab should withdraw his troops and effects without molestation, and retire into Touran; while Iran, and all its dependencies, should remain under the protection of Zal-zer. This peace concluded and ratified, it would have been easy for that nobleman to have raised himself to the throne of Persia; but he, scorning to barter immortal fame for a short-lived royalty, fought out Zab or Zoub, the lawful heir of the house of Kejomaras, and put the crown upon his head °.

ⁿ MIRKHOND. hist. ubi supra.

ZAB, Zoub, or Bazab, at the time of his accession to the Zab. royal dignity, was far advanced in years, but had, notwithstanding, a tolerable share of health and spirits: he applied himself to the restoring, as well as he could, the shattered affairs of Persia: the more effectually to do this, he associated with him, in the empire, Gherschasp, his nephew, whom some have called Kischasp, and have made him not the nephew and associate, but the son and successor of Zab or Zoub: but this seems to be a mistake, and the ground of it pretty obvious, the father of this Gherschasp being called Kischasp. But to return to Zab, he sacrificed much of the prerogative of the crown to make the people easy, and to enable them to recover their losses, after the wretched depredations committed by Afrasiab, and his troops: he did more than all this; he threw open the royal treasury, and, as often as any sums were paid in there, he first paid his soldiers, and then distributed the rest among the poor. These were certainly high virtues; but this prince is branded for a vice particularly infamous on a throne, viz. that of gluttony, or rather luxury in eating; and is recorded to have been the author of various sorts of sauces and broths, unknown before in these regions. It is not very clear how long he reigned, or who was his successor. Mirkhond makes him expressly the last of the first race of kings, who, from the surname of Hushangh, were called, in general, Pischdadians, though to us it seems more probable, that they received this appellation, because, during the several reigns of these princes, the laws and constitution of Persia were thoroughly settled P. According to other authors, Gherschasp or Kischasp succeeded in the empire, by the voluntary cession of Zab or Zoub; his mother is said to have been a Jewess, of the tribe of Benjamin: he proved a prince of great merit, and deserving of a better fate than he met; for he did all in his power to restore the Persian diadem to its antient lustre. Afrasiab, little regarding his treaties, took advantage of the disorder the kingdom was in, to re-enter it with a formidable army, and to possess himself of various provinces. The new king fought under great disadvantages; but, in spite of these, he frequently defeated the Turks, and recovered various places out of their hands: at last, however, he fell into the error of many of his predecessors; that is, he put all his affairs to hazard in one battle, which he lost, and with it his life, being killed fighting bravely for the liberty of his country, after a reign some say of six, others of thirty years; but whether the former may not include the reigns of Zab, and of this prince too, or whether the latter ought to be accounted the time that this monarch reigned alone, we pretend not to determine. In this all are agreed, that here the empire of the Pischedadians ended; and that Afrasiab, the descendant of Tur, became a third time absolute lord of Persia 9. How he afterwards lost the possession of this empire, will be shewn in its proper place. In the mean time, it may not be amiss to insert here some remarks on the foregoing period, in order to justify the observation we have so often made, that oriental history, though mixed with fables, is not altogether useless (G).

° KHONDEMIR, in Khelassat Alakbar. D'HERBELOT. art. Afrasiab, Zal, Zoub. MIRKHOND. hist. sect. 10. P MIRKHOND. hist. sect. 10. D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. Naudhar.

As

9 D'HERBELOT. art. Gherfchtasb, Kischtasb.

(G) In the course of this work, our method has been to speak first of the chronology, and afterwards of the history of each country; in the present case it was impracticable, unless we had tormented the reader with needless repetitions, and nauseous tautologies. We have therefore chosen to give the series of the Persian history, relating to the kings of the first race, as it lies in Mirkbond, and other authors; and, after laying down these facts as foundations of our arguments, to lead the reader by degrees to what we esteem the true state of the antient Persian empire. In the first place it is remarkable, that the oriental writers make this race of kings Modes by descent. The province of Aderbayagjan, of which they make Kejomaras to have been at first sovereign, is a part of Media, taking in also a part of Armenia; so that, in all probability, it was one of the first peopled provinces of the dominion of Shem, if we suppose, that territories were ascertained and set out immediately after the flood. Within this province stands the little town, that is, considering it in its present condition, Nackbiwan, which the inhabitants affirm to have been the first town built after the flood; and indeed, in the Armenian language, the very name implies as much, it being equivalent to the first place, or first habitation (1). Thus the early erecting of a monarchy hereabouts is rendered everywhere probable, and consistent with the most antient accounts sacred and profane. As the power of Kejomaras increased, he extended his territories towards the east, and towards the south; for it is agreed, that he made himself master of Irak-agami, afterwards Parthia; and, in process of time, joined thereto the province of Pbars, or Proper Persia; where, some historians affirm, he founded the city of

(1) Tavernier voyag. tom. i. p. 43. Chardin. voyag. tom. i. p. 250.

As to the religion of these antient kings, we have already shewn it to be very near the true religion ; that is, the religion of the patriarchs. The worship of fire was indisputably a very antient doctrine ; and there seems to be no reason for doubting the truth of what some authors have affirmed, that it took its rise in, if not before, the time of Kejomaras. Certain it is,

Istachr, afterwards called Persepolis, though others deny it, and say it was later. The successors of this prince conquered Kbirman and Sigjistan, and afterwards many other countries on the east of the present Persian empire. It was Phridun, or Feridoun, who settled the dominions of Persia in pretty near the same order we find them at this day : it is evident therefore, that the kings of the first race were not petty princes or tributaries, but lords of a very extensive empire. As to the capital of their dominions in the time of Kejomaras, some think it was at Balch in Chorasán, others at Istachr. Perhaps he might first fix his residence at Balch, and afterwards remove it into the heart of his kingdom. Hushangh resided again at Balch; Gjemschid settled himself at Istachr, and is, by most of the Persian authors, esteemed its founder. In the reigns of succeeding kings, though their royal residence might sometimes be changed, yet Istachr remained the capital, and received, from time to time, great improvements from the Persian monarchs. Kischtasp, the last of them, had a peculiar liking to this place, and, no doubt, took pains to re-edify whatever injuries it might have sustained through the course of a long war. Thus the glory of this city, which was afterwards so famous among the Greeks under the name of Persepolis, began, as we observed in our description of Persia, under the first race of kings (2). How it was afterwards adorned with a royal palace, of which the ruins are still remaining, we shall shew in the history of the princes of the second race : in the mean time, let it be remembered, that several princes of the dynasty of the Pischedadians were great lovers of arts, and great encouragers of ingenuity and learning : if therefore there were in their time, especially in the days of Manugeber, who is particularly famous in the oriental history for delighting in architecture, and every thing dependent thereon ; if, in his days, we say, there were any artists capable of carving in stone, they might have employed their time in cutting some of those wonderful histories in bas-relief, which are yet visible in the living rock, behind the ruins of Chilminar, or of the other works of a like kind remaining in other parts of Persia. This, we say, is possible, and not improbable ; but we affirm nothing : the piety, however, of Manugeber is a circumstance nothing unfavourable to this conjecture, that the king, praying before the fire, and in sight of the sun, represented in the mountain before-mentioned, might be intended for him.

(2) D'Herbelot. biblioth. orient. art. Estekar.

that the province where he began to reign was the first in which magism prevailed; and was always held sacred by the professors of that religion, on that account: this the very name implies; for Aderbayagjan is no more than the place of fire, ader or azer signifying fire, and bayagjan a place; whence we frequently find this word thus written, Azerbayagjan. The high mountain of Albors was the principal place of worship in these early times; and the people were persuaded, that celestial fire was preserved there: on this account, when the treasures of Nudar king of Persia were removed out of Sigjistan, as we have before related, they were, for security, placed here. Nay, what is far more extraordinary, this superstition is not yet worn out of the heads of the Ghaurs, if we may believe Sir John Chardin; on the contrary, they yet speak confidently of celestial or elemental fire, which they say is still to be seen in this mountain^s. On the whole, therefore, the religion of the Persians, under the first race of kings, differed very little from that which still subsists among the Ghaurs. Some, indeed, have been of opinion, that there were no pyrea or fire-temples at all before the time of Zoroaster or Zerdust; others, on the authority of some Arabian writers, assert the contrary; but the former opinion to us seems nearest the truth, for the following reasons: First, The most antient historians extant say nothing of temples till after the time of the exodus of the children of Israel. Secondly, because Herodotus says expressly, that the antient Persians had no temples, but sacrificed on the tops of high mountains^t. And thirdly, because pyrea being at that time in use, is not consistent with the history of Zerdust, as we shall shortly have occasion to shew. As to the time when these kings reigned, we can determine nothing with any degree of certainty. The Scripture informs us, that Elam was a very antient kingdom; for Chedorlaomer came with a great army to reduce the region of Pentapolis in Canaan, and the circumjacent countries, to his obedience, in the days of Abraham: from thence we hear nothing of this nation till the kingdoms of Israel and Judah were on their decline. In respect to these antient times, the Greek writers are very insufficient guides, if we may believe the most judicious writer of history that nation ever produced, viz. Thucydides; who very frankly declares they knew very little of their own affairs beyond the memory of man^u; that is, they were able to give no account of them with order and certainty. Herodotus pretends not to say any thing of the history of the Medes above one hundred and fifty years before the time of Cyrus,

^s CHARDIN. voyag. tom. i. p. 253. ^t HERODOT. l. i. c. 131.
^u THUCYDIDES, proœm. hist.

where

where he places Dejoces, whom he makes the first king of Media, and speaks of his advancement to that dignity in terms * exactly correspondent to those made use of by Mirkhond, in his history of the election of Kejomaras. Diodorus Siculus gives us a list of ten Median kings, reigning in all, two hundred and eighty-two years †. But there is still a great gap of time between the rise of the Persian or Medo-Persian monarchy, and its being destroyed by the Affyrian emperors. If we allow the Persians to have had kings of their own during this interval, or any considerable part of it, which is not at all improbable, we make room for all the Pischedadians at once. But as to the precise time in which they reigned, we are quite in the dark; and therefore, instead of indulging conjectures, shall resume the thread of our history, and shew by what steps Apherasiab was expelled, and the Persian dominions once more restored to a prince of that country.

The history of the Persian kings of the second race, or of the dynasty of the Kainites.

K*Eykobad* or Caicobad, whom some writers make the son of Keykō-Zab, the son of Tahamasp, the son of Manugeher, king of Persia, and others call simply the nephew of Nudar was seated on the throne of Persia by the famous Zal-zer, who was so loyal to the family that raised him, that he twice refused the Persian diadem, because he would not injure them. At this time, he and his son Rustan put themselves at the head of such a body of troops, as enabled them to give Apherasiab abundance of trouble, and, by degrees, to put into the possession of Keykobad the greatest part of the provinces of Persia. This monarch proved at once a good prince to his subjects in general, and extremely grateful to the persons particularly concerned in raising him to the empire. He intrusted the command of all his forces with Rustan, and did nothing in civil affairs without the advice of his father. By degrees, his troops, under the command of the famous hero before-mentioned, gained such advantages, that Apherasiab retired before them, and was at last driven to such distress, that he desired to treat of a peace; but his commissioners, and those of the king of Persia, differing about the terms, Apherasiab hazarded a second battle, wherein, notwithstanding his troops fought with great resolution, he was totally defeated. In the heat of this engagement, Rustan desired some of the officers about him to shew him Apherasiab; which when they had done, Rustan spurred towards him with such an impetuous force, that he

* HERODOT. l. i. c. 97, 98. † Biblioth. l. ii. c. 3.

beat him from his horse, and, afterwards dismounting from his own, tied his hands and feet together with a cord; and, having laid him before himself upon his own steed, rode out of the battle, and threw him into a particular place. Apherasiab, finding himself left alone, struggled with such force, that he at last got loose: then taking the cord, he tied the hands and feet of a dead man, as Rustan had tied his, and retired to a troop of his own horse, with whom he made his escape. After victory had declared itself in favour of the army of Keykobod, Rustan rode up to salute him. Amongst other compliments of congratulation, he informed him, that the war was now at an end, himself having made Apherasiab prisoner, whom he also promised immediately to produce. Riding, to that end, to the place where he had thrown the Turkish monarch, he found, with surprize, a dead man tied in his place. For this oversight of his he asked pardon of Keykobod, and solemnly promised, that, if he met Apherasiab in battle again, he would not make the same mistake. But that prince, finding his affairs desperate in Persia, retired into Turquestan, and sent from thence an ambassador to treat with Keykobod; who was easily prevailed on not to carry his arms into Touran, when the right of him, and his family, to Iran, was acknowledged by Apherasiab, and all the scattered remnants of his army withdrawn^z. The peace once settled, Keykobod applied himself to the restoring the affairs of his kingdom; and, in the first place, fixed his court at Spahawn, which had been built by the famous king Houshangh, adorned by Pbridun, and afterwards given by him to Kaob the smith, and his family. The reason, in all probability, which determined Keykobod to reside here, was its convenient situation in the heart of his dominions. His court once fixed, the king next bestowed his favours on such as had been instrumental in the expulsion of the Turks. To Rustan he gave the province of Zablustan, on the borders of India, watered with many pleasant streams, and adorned with the finest prospects that can be wished. This province afforded a surname to Rustan, and received itself a new name from him, that hero being stiled, in most of the romances, Zabeli, because he was governor of Zablustan; and that province, or at least a great part of it, was thenceforward called Rustandar, because it had been the government of Rustan. Maharab, surnamed Kabuli, because he had been governor of Kabul, was another of Keykobod's generals, and highly esteemed by him. Kavun, one of the descendents of the famous Kaob the smith, was also a person highly esteemed by this king of Persia; but what particular rewards he received, authors do not mention. It seems he was a sort of knight errant, and acquired from thence the surname of Rezm Khuah, or the searcher of adventures. A fourth captain of Keykobod's was Keschvad, surnamed Zerin Kulah, from a golden tiara which he was allowed to wear, in reward for the mighty things he had done for the good of the empire. Keykobod divided all the spoil that had been brought into his treasury among his soldiers, regulated their pay very exactly, and afterwards employed them in making great roads throughout the empire, setting up public marks at the end of every four thousand paces; which space, by the Persians, is called pherfengh, and from thence parasang by the Greeks (H). In the last years of his life he grew blind, and continued so till the day of his death, which happened, as some historians say, after a reign of one hundred years; according to others, when he had reigned one hundred and twenty years ^a.

^z MIRKOND. hist. sect. 12. D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. Afrasiab, Caikobod, Rustan.

KEYKAUS or Gaikaus, the son, or, as some say, the grand-Keykaus. son of Keykobod, succeeded him in the throne of Persia; on which he was scarce seated, before a war broke out in Mazanderan, a province bordering on the Caspian sea, which required his presence. A rebel prince, taking occasion from the demise of Keykobod, made himself sovereign there, and fortified the capital in such a manner, that he made it the strongest place in the east. Keykaus marched immediately against him, and, coming with too great an army to be opposed, the rebel shut himself up in the city of Mazanderan, and prepared for a siege. Keykaus, having viewed the place, and received intelligence, that it was extremely well provided with all sorts of ammunition and victuals, gave over all hopes of reducing it by force: but as, in such cases, it is usual for experienced generals to have recourse to stratagems, Keykaus devised one, which answered his end effectually. He gave out in his camp, and corrupted people to give it out in the city, that he was extremely distressed for provisions, and should, on that account, be obliged shortly to raise the siege. His emissaries in the place immediately insinuated to the keepers of the stores, that, by

^a D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. artic. Rezm, Khuah, &c.

(H) As this monarch was renowned for his wisdom and prowess, so he was no less famous on account of his piety. The Mohammedan writers insist very much upon this: they assert that he had many prophets who resorted to his court; that he received, honoured, and obeyed them, and in time was a true believer; by which we are to understand, that he was not a fire-worshiper; but in this they are certainly mistaken. They make him also cotemporary with Samuel the judge of Israel, and assert that he had some intercourse with him.

supplying the king of Persia with small quantities of victuals, immense sums might be got. This trade once on foot, Keykaus paid so well, that, in a short time, there was not a loaf left. He then summoned the city peremptorily to surrender; and, on a discovery of their circumstances, the inhabitants were forced to submit^b. He had not the like success in another war, undertaken in this province against Apherasiab; for, the Persian army being defeated, king Keykaus was taken, and thrown into a prison, from whence he was released by the timely care of his general Rustan; who, entering Touran with a numerous army, wasted all before him with fire and sword, declaring, that he would destroy the whole country, if they did not set his master at liberty; which so terrified the people, that their clamour prevailed on Apherasiab to dismiss Keykaus, on his promise to recal Rustan. As soon as the Persian monarch had regained his liberty, he made use of the hero we have so often mentioned to curb his enemies on every side; and he is recorded to have carried his arms into Mezr, i. e. Egypt; Shamab, i. e. Syria; and Rum, i. e. Asia Minor. After these wars were over, and all things in a quiet situation, Keykaus, to shew the high esteem he had of Rustan's services, gave him his sister in marriage; the name of this princess is Gubernaz, i. e. endowed with all virtues; and with her, by way of portion, he gave him the office of generalissimo of all his armies, and made him vicar-general of his kingdom, with the title of pebelevan gihan, i. e. supporter of the Persian empire. We are not told who it was Keykaus himself married; but, whoever she was, he had by her two sons, named Siavek and Phrailorz. The eldest of these, viz. Siavek, was sent to live with, and to be bred up under, his uncle Rustan. How long things continued in this tranquil state, does not appear; but the next war we hear of was against Zulzogar king of Arabia. What provocation he gave Keykaus, is uncertain; but the king of Persia carried his resentment so far, that he had well nigh reduced the whole kingdom of Yemen, over which Zulzogar reigned, under his dominion. At length it came to the ears of Keykaus, that this Arabian prince had a daughter the most lovely woman in the world; upon which the Persian king sent to demand her in marriage. The king of Yemen, desirous to be rid at any rate of such an enemy, sent immediately his daughter to the king of Persia's haram. As soon as Keykaus beheld Saudabab, he was so struck with her beauty, that he conceived himself the happiest man in the world, by having her in his possession. Overcome therefore with the violence of his passion, he abandoned himself to all sorts of excesses, giving great entertainments, and encouraging all kinds of diversions in his camp, without so much as remembering, that he was in an enemy's country. Zulzogar, who foresaw all this, drew together privately a considerable body of horse; and, falling unexpectedly on the Persian army, absolutely defeated it, and made the king and all his court prisoners. The news of this no sooner reached Persia, than Rustan put himself at the head of the forces left under his command, and marched with them immediately into Yemen. Zulzogar knew very well, that he had no troops capable of contending with the veterans under the command of Rustan; and for this reason he treated the king of Persia, while in his power, with the utmost civility and respect; so that he had no great difficulty in prevailing on him to send his general orders to forbear hostilities, and to think of peace. A treaty was quickly concluded between the father and son-in-law, whereby the former quitted all pretensions to the kingdom of Yemen, and promised to invade it no more; while the latter engaged to be the friend and ally of the Persian nation, and to assist it to the utmost of his power: in consequence of which, Keykaus was immediately set at liberty, with all those who had been taken prisoners with him, and returned triumphantly into Persia, with his new spouse Saudabah^c. Not long after this, Siavek came to court, and was received with the utmost affection by his father. Saudabah, either charmed with the beauty of his person, or affecting so to be, solicited him to an incestuous amour; which he, being a prince of great virtue, rejected with abhorrence: upon which, waiting a proper opportunity, when the king was one day alone in his parlour, Saudabah rushed in, with her hair dishevelled, her night-gown torn, and her breast bloody, crying out for justice against Siavek, who had made an attempt upon her honour. The king immediately caused his son to be imprisoned, and obliged him to stand a tryal; some say, he underwent the ordeal by fire: however it was, the young prince was acquitted, and the wickedness of Saudabah clearly appeared. Upon which the king would have put her to death, if his son had not interceded for her on his knees. These proceedings having created some divisions and heartburnings in the court of Persia, Apherasiab, who waited all opportunities of distressing that nation, failed not to take this, and to pass the river Gjeihon with a great body of troops, in order to besiege Balch. Keykaus, roused by the impending danger, ordered his son to march into Sigjistan with twelve thousand horse,

^b MIRKHOND. hist. sect. 13.

^c D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. Caicus. MIRKHOND. hist. sect. 13.

there

there to join the forces under the command of Rustan, in order to make head against the enemy. Siavek readily obeyed, and, after joining his uncle Rustan, marched with such expedition, that they were soon in the neighbourhood of Apherasiab, and his army; but, not thinking fit to hazard an engagement immediately, they took care to pitch on a very strong camp. Apherasiab, knowing that his affairs would not permit him to carry on a long and lingering war, attacked them therein; which Rustan foresaw, and provided so well for his reception, that he was not only repulsed, but his troops suffered so much in the attack, that he began sincerely to think of peace, in order to prevent the coming of this army of Persians into his dominions. With this view he sent commissioners to the camp of Siavek and Rustan, in order to settle the terms of a perpetual alliance: they were very kindly received; and the young prince, his uncle, and two Persians of great quality, who were of his council, settled with them the heads of a treaty very advantageous to Persia; which being ratified by Apherasiab, the young prince dispatched an express to carry the peace to his father. It seems the intrigues of Saudabah had created this deserving young prince many enemies in his father's court, who took this opportunity of persuading the king, that Siavek had exceeded his commission, and injured the majesty of the Persian empire, by the treaty which he had made. Keykobod, influenced by these suggestions, dispatched his uncle Thus to the army, with letters full of sharpness, with respect to the young prince, and with directions to deliver up the command to Thus; and to signify to Rustan, that the king thought him now old enough to take his rest; and therefore desired him to retire to his government of Sigjistan. Rustan obeyed, and the prince continued in the army, which now marched to the frontiers of Turquestan, in order to act offensively against Apherasiab. When they were arrived in the neighbourhood of the river Gjeihon, the prince taking with him Piran-Vissch, an officer of distinction in the Turkish army, who had remained with him as an hostage, went directly to the court of Apherasiab, to shew him how contrary to his honour it was to be guilty of a breach of faith. Apherasiab received him with open arms, placed him on a throne by his own, and gave him his daughter Franghiz in marriage^d. The nobility of Turquestan were so much charmed with this young prince, and gave him continually such strong marks of their esteem, that Garsiavesch, brother to Apherasiab, took umbrage

^d D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. Rustan, Siavek, Piran-Vissch. MIRKHOND. hist. ubi supra.

at it, and resolved to have him taken off. Siavek, who was a prince of great penetration, discovered his intention; and, foreseeing that in a strange country it was impossible for him to guard against such attempts, he spoke of it to his wife, who was then with child; and conjured her, in case he should be murdered, to send his son, if she should be brought to bed of one, into Persia. A small time after, what he feared came to pass: he was killed by some assassins, hired by Garfiavesch, who would also have dispatched his wife, if Piran-Visseh had not luckily entered the room, and prevented it. Franghiz was afterwards brought to-bed of a son, called Key-chofrau, who, in time, succeeded his grandfather. The people of Turquestan were so much grieved for the death of Siavek, that, to shew their concern, they mourned in Persian habits; a custom which has ever since remained amongst them. The news of the prince of Persia's death reaching Rustan in his government, he, without expecting orders, entered Turquestan with a considerable army, burning and destroying all the country before him. Garfiavesch raised a body of troops as soon as he was able, and marched to oppose him; but, coming to an engagement, they were soon defeated, and Garfiavesch himself had his head struck off by the sword of Rustan^e. The desire this hero had to do all the good he could to the family of his pupil and nephew Siavek, put him upon inquiring for his son; but his mother kept him so effectually concealed, that neither his friends nor his foes could find him out; which gave Rustan inexpressible concern: some years after, however, Keykaus sent Guiu the son of Gudarz, a young Persian nobleman of great capacity, into Turquestan, in order to discover his grandson. Some say, that Guiu, having sought the young prince a long time in vain, met him by chance one day, as he was hunting; and, knowing him by the resemblance he bore of his father, addressed himself frankly to him, told him his name, and his commission. Key-chofrau listened greedily to the proposal made of retiring into Persia; but desired that he might carry his mother, and Piran-Visseh, the old and faithful friend of his father, with him, that they might be safe from the attempts of their enemies. This being agreed to, all things were concerted so well, that they quitted Turquestan, and got safe into Persia, little to the satisfaction of Apherasiab, who was mighty well pleased with having in his hands the heir of the Persian diadem. He ordered them immediately to be pursued by several roads, but all to no purpose, though they passed the river Gjeibon, in fight of their pursuers. On the arrival of Key-chofrau at the court of his grandfather, the face of affairs suddenly changed; those who had been avowed enemies of the prince Siavek, his father, were immediately removed; and Keykobad, to shew his affection for the young prince, made him generalissimo of his armies, and raised Guiv, who had brought him back, to the highest honours. Thus, who had been no friend to Siavek, began to be apprehensive of the power of Key-chofrau; and therefore took all opportunities of influencing Fraiborz, the son of Keykaus, by suggesting to him, that this new-come prince would rob him of the crown of Persia, which ought, by no means, to be placed on the head of one descended, by the mother's side, from Tur, the implacable enemy of their name and nation. These seeds of dissension sown, the Persian court was quickly in disorder, all the nobility taking one side or other, to the no small detriment of the affairs of the nation. Keykaus, in the mean time, was unwilling to declare either against his son or his grandson: at last, to prevent, as far as in him lay, the inconveniences that might attend a disputed succession, he resolved to give the competitors for the crown a fair opportunity of displaying their abilities, and to declare him who had the greatest desert his heir. One Bahaman, who had been intrusted with the city of Ardebil or Ardevil, in the province of Aderbayagjan, had made himself prince of that place, and thrown off his allegiance to the king of Persia. Keykaus sent a body of troops under the command of his son Fraiborz, to invest the town on one side, and an equal number, under Key-chofrau, to sit down before it, on the other; informing both the princes, when they set out for their respective commands, that whoever reduced the place, he would declare him successor to the throne. Thus, according to his repeated professions of friendship to Fraiborz, set out with him for the army, and did all that in his power lay to make him master of Ardevil, but to no purpose: Bahaman, apprised of the siege, had provided all things necessary for a long defence; and was himself so consummate an officer, that he triumphed over all the attempts of the Persian army under Fraiborz. Key-chofrau had better success; the troops commanded by this young prince behaved better than those under his uncle, insomuch that Bahaman, finding it impossible to hold out, surrendered Ardevil into his hands. According to agreement, therefore, when he returned to court, Keykaus declared him heir apparent to the crown; and thereby put an end to the contention which had so long subsisted. Some small time after this, the good old monarch, wearied with the fatigues of royalty, retired from the world, and left his grandson

^e D'HERBELOT, biblioth. orient. art. Caicus, Siavek, Gherfiavesch,

in

in the possession of the kingdom, after a reign of one hundred and fifty years † (I).

KEY-

† MIRKHOND. hist. ubi supra. D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. Caicaus & Caikofrau.

(I) According to the method we have hitherto pursued, we should here take leave of Keykaus's reign. But as it is our design to inform the reader, as far as we are able, of every thing relating to the history of those kings we speak of, we find ourselves obliged to take notice here of some variations in circumstances, into which the Persian historians have fallen, as to the most material facts reported in the history of Keykaus. Thus, as to Saudabab, some make her to have been the daughter of Gberschiarvesch, brother to Apherasiab: they say likewise, that she was the mother of Siawek; who taking some disgust in his father's court, he fled to that of his uncle in Turquestan, where, marrying the daughter of the king, he made himself so considerable, that his grandfather, by the mother's side, caused him to be destroyed (1). Mirkbond, speaking of the invasion made by Rustan on Apherasiab's dominions, in revenge for the death of Siawek, mentions one Keydab, the son of Apherasiab, who commanded the armies of his father, and who was slain in single combat by Rustan. If there be any fact in this, then it is probable, that this duel is represented in the figures cut on the rocky mountain of Tacks-Rustan, which we took notice of in our description of Per- sa (2). A Persian writer hath taken upon him to assert, that Keykaus ought to be regarded as the Nimrod of the Hebrews; and he will have it that both these names signify the long-liver, or the immortal; adding, that Keykaus was so called, because of his long reign, viz. of one hundred and fifty years. Mirkbond, like a good historian, reports this fact; and observes, that some have stigmatized Keykaus with building the tower of Babel, and attempting to scale heaven thereby; but he says expressly, that this story is fabulous, and ought not to be regarded; the king of Persia being a wise and pious prince, who knew well, that, to ascend to heaven, there was no need of towers.

To prevent the reader's falling into any confusion with respect to the wars recorded in this history, it may be necessary to observe, that the Persians had for their neighbours, under the monarchs of the first and second race, on the north-east, the inhabitants of the extended country of Touran. We have already spoken so copiously of the sense and derivation of this name, that there is no necessity for our adding any thing farther on that subject: here it is sufficient that we observe, the boundaries thereof were never well fixed; and that it was always designed by an indefinite term, as well by the

(1) D'Herbelot. biblioth. orient. art. Gberschiarvesch. See before, p. 113.

(2) Mirkbond. hist. ubi supra.

Key-
chofrau.

KEY-CHOSRAU, or Kay-khofru, succeeded peaceably to the throne of his grandfather, and shewed himself worthy of that pre-

Romans, as by the orientals : the former stiled all the provinces on the other side that river which they call Oxus, but the antient Persians Gjeihon, and the modern Amu, Transoxana ; and the orientals called the same provinces Mauaralnabar, i. e. on the other side the river (3). This country was inhabited by the Turks, properly so called, whom some conceive to be the same nation with the Tartars ; and that those we generally call Turks have very little right to that appellation (4). On the east of Persia lay the empire of the Indies, then governed by princes who were natives of that country. To the south of Persia lay the peninsula of Arabia, governed by its own kings ; and on the west, the territories of Sham or Schamab ; for so the Persians stiled Syria, and the other dominions of the kings of Nineveh and Babylon. Nothing can be darker, or more confused, than the accounts we have from the Persian historians, of the state of their neighbours in those times of which we are now speaking. To us, there seems some reason to doubt whether the word Khakan, made use of to signify the supreme monarch of grand Tartary by Mirkbond, was really heard of in those early times ; it seems more likely, that our Persian historians bestowed that title, which is now frequent, on the monarch mentioned by the antient historians to have reigned then in these parts, in order to familiarize the stile of his history to his cotemporaries. As the country of Touran bordered, as well as Iran, on the Caspian sea, and as the last battle fought by Apberafsiab happened in the plains of Kbuerezm, it was natural enough for him to fly into the mountains nearest at hand, in hopes of returning that way into Touran ; and, when he found the enemy possessed of the passes near the mouth of the river Gjeihon, he had no other way left than to endeavour to get through the mountains of Aderbayagjan, and so round the Caspian sea, till he entered Touran on the north ; in which, however, we need not wonder that he proved unsuccessful, since, from those times to ours, no conqueror whatever has had the honour to make that tour with his troops, excepting only the Tartar hero Zinjis Khan. From the observations in this note, it will be very plain to the reader, that Iran, under the reign of this monarch Key-chofrau, contained very nearly the same extent of country, and the same provinces, which are still comprehended under the empire of Persia ; and that whatever difference there might be, must have lain on the provinces on the west side of the empire ; the bounds of which are not exactly laid down by the Persian historians. As to the new kingdom on the Persian gulf erected in favour of Fraiborz, we shall have occasion to mention it here-

(3) D'Herbelot. biblioth. oriental. art. Touran.
vol. ii. p. 384.

(4) History of the Tartars,

after :

preference which had been given him ; for, in the first place, he took care to rectify all abuses in courts of justice throughout his whole dominions, displacing all such officers as had made themselves odious to the people, and taking every method he could devise to put the poor into a condition of eating bread, issuing for this purpose great sums out of his treasury, and giving audience with the greatest ease to all degrees of people. When he found his kingdom in tolerable order, he summoned a grand council of his nobility, wherein, having represented the miserable death of his father, and the mighty mischiefs which had been done them by the inhabitants of Turquestan, he desired them to speak their minds freely, whether it would not be for their interest, as well as for his honour, if an army were immediately raised for the reduction of Turquestan. They came unanimously into this proposal ; whereupon Piran-Visseh returned into his own country, from whence, as we have heard, he fled with Key-chofrau, and his mother. The king of Persia, knowing that without unanimity no war could be carried on with any reasonable hopes of success, took pains to reconcile himself to Thus, and to his uncle Fraiborz ; and, to shew that his reconciliation was sincere, he entrusted them with the command of thirty thousand horse, and sent them to open the war, by invading the dominion of Turquestan^k. At their setting out, he spoke to them thus : “ You must know, that, before my father married the “ princess Franghiz my mother, he had, by the daughter of “ his friend Piran-Visseh, a son called Ferud. This young “ man, I am informed, has at present a command in the army “ of Apherasiab ; but, where-ever he is, remember that he is “ my brother, and that, where-ever you find him, you do “ him no injury, but render him all honours due to so near a “ relation of mine.” It happened unluckily, that the Persian army no sooner entered the country of Turquestan, than Ferud came to reconnoitre them, at the head of a body of horse. His scouts informed him, that the Persians were by far more numerous than the troops under his command ; but he, to shew his valour, instead of retiring, attacked very briskly the army under the command of Thus ; who, as soon as he understood, that Ferud was at the head of the Turks, ordered his forces to retire, and, presenting himself before the young prince, informed him of the order he had received from his brother the after : in the mean time let us remark, that the situation of this kingdom proves the extent of Key-chofrau's empire towards the south-east to have been pretty near the same with the present Shah's.

^k MIRKHOND. hist. sect. 14.

king

king of Persia. Ferud, full of imprudent bravery, would not be persuaded to retire; but causing the Turkish horse to make a fresh attack, the Persians repulsed them with great slaughter; and Ferud, to the mighty regret of the whole army, was found dead upon the place¹. Key-chofrau received this news with great concern; and, apprehending that Thus had been, in some measure, instrumental in his brother's death, he sent orders to his uncle Fraiborz to take upon him the command of the army, and to send back Thus a prisoner, to answer in Persia for his conduct. Fraiborz executed the king's commands exactly with respect to Thus, and then marched farther into Turquestan. Apherasiab gave the command of the great army he had raised to Piran-Visseh, the most experienced of his generals, and who was perfectly acquainted with the Persian discipline. This excellent officer did all that could be expected from him: he gave Fraiborz and Gudar so much trouble, and knew so well how to encamp his troops out of danger of an attack, that at length the Persians were constrained to retreat, not without very considerable loss, Gudar, who commanded in the rear, having no less than seventy gentlemen of his own family slain^m. The news of this defeat obliged the king to take other measures; he therefore removed his uncle from the command of the army, and gave it to Gudar, to whose valour and conduct it was owing, that any part thereof escaped. He also sent Thus, who had fully justified himself as to the death of Ferud, with a reinforcement of troops, in order to enable him to carry on the war. Apherasiab, perceiving that the Persians were resolved to destroy his empire, called to his assistance the kha-khan or king of Great Tartary, and Schangal king of the Indies; and, by the help of his confederates, pushed the Persian troops so closely, that they, being far inferior in number, were forced to retire to the mountains of Chorassan, where they threw up intrenchments, and fortified their camp in the best manner they could. Key-chofrau, informed of their distress, sent orders to Rustan to march with the utmost diligence to their assistance. That experienced general readily obeyed his master; and the Persian army, that was besieged in the mountains, when they heard of his approach, made no question of carrying the victory. Rustan, as an earnest thereof, deceived the vigilance of the Turkish officers; and, passing their advanced guards in the night, entered the Persian camp, before the enemy was aware. The next day, the most bloody battle was fought, that hitherto had been seen in Persia. Ru-

¹ D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. Caichofrau. ^m MIRK-HOND. hist. ubi supra. D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. Caichofrau.

stan did wonders; he took prisoner the kha-khan and kaimus, one of the principal generals in the service of Apherasiab. In the end, victory declared itself for the Persians; and Apherasiab, having lost half his army, was obliged to retire with the rest into his own dominions. Notwithstanding this mighty loss, the king of Turquestan meditated new invasions, exhausting his whole country to draw together an army sufficient for this purpose. Key-chofrau, on the other hand, set four great armies on foot, the chief of which lay in the neighbourhood of Baleh, under the command of Gudar. Against him Apherasiab sent a detachment of his choicest troops, under the command of Piran-Vissch, the best officer in his dominions. The two armies had not long been in the neighbourhood of each other before an action ensued, wherein Piran-Vissch was killed, and his army beaten. When Gudar saw the body of Piran-Vissch on the ground, he alighted from his horse, and, remembering the courtesies that nobleman had formerly done to Sia-vek, and to Key-chofrau when a young man, bedewed it with tears, and took care afterwards to see it interred with all the honours due to so great and worthy a man. Of which when the king of Persia was informed, he highly commended his general, and spoke with very great regret of the death of his old friendⁿ. Apherasiab, when informed of this new disaster, sent his son Schidab to command the remains of the army, which he caused to be reinforced as soon as possible. By this time Key-chofrau was come in person to his army, and marched at the head thereof through the plains in the neighbourhood of the Caspian sea. Schidab, thinking this a proper place to give battle, advanced with his army, and attacked the Persians with great resolution: but his success was not answerable to his valour; for he was killed in the beginning of the engagement, and all his army cut to pieces. The king of Persia, surveying the field of battle, and the vast number of dead bodies which lay thereon, cried out aloud, Khuaresmi-bud, i. e. I have seen my desire: whence the plains in which this battle was fought, and the province wherein they lie, received the appellation of Khuareszm, which they still retain. Key-chofrau pushed on the war now with the greatest vigour, marching directly towards the capital of Turquestan, whither Apherasiab had retired; but this prince, not thinking himself safe there, because the people murmured loudly at the evils they felt, first sent away his haram, and then retired himself. His wives and children fell a short time afterwards into the hands of Key-chofrau, who treated them with all imaginable kindness and respect. Apberafiab wandered from province to province with a small body of troops, till, being shut up in the mountains of Aderbayagjan, he was at last taken prisoner, and, by the orders of Key-chofrau, put to death °. Thus ended this long and bloody war, which had well nigh exhausted both empires. After it was finished, Key-chofrau fixed his court at Balch, for the conveniency of governing Touran as well as Iran. There it was that, seeing himself in full possession of two great empires, this monarch did what none of his predecessors had thought of: he computed all the levies which had been made in Persia for the carrying on the war against the Turks; and, out of the mighty treasures which were fallen into his hands, he restored to every family the amount of the taxes they had paid. He sent for his uncle Fraiborz, and, after having commended him for his fidelity, erected several provinces on the shore of the Persian gulf into a kingdom, and made him sovereign thereof. He assembled the nobility of Touran, and, having shewn them the folly of hating the inhabitants of Iran, as they had hitherto done, advised them to consider of ways and means for re-establishing the peace of their country, and assured them, he would contribute to it as far as lay in his power. He then marked out the quarters, and settled the yearly pay of his soldiers; took an exact account of the state of all the provinces; reformed several abuses in religion; and, when he had done all this, said, He had reigned long enough for his own glory, and that it was now time for him to quit this world, and dedicate the rest of his days to GOD. With this view, he introduced his successor Lohrasp into a grand assembly of the nobility, put the tagi on his head, and retired himself to a cell in the desert, having attained to the age of ninety years, sixty of which he had passed upon the throne P (K).

ⁿ D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. ubi supra, & artic. Piran-Vissch.

Key-chof-rau resigns the crown.

DURING

° D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. Caichofrau. P MIRK-HOND. hist. ubi supra. D'HERBELOT. ubi supra.

(K) What has been above related of the reign of Keychofrau, is taken from the best and most credible historians, and connected with all the accuracy in our power; let us now see what other remarkable facts have been related of this monarch, which could not so well be reduced into the order we have followed. With respect to the decisive battle fought against the king of

Turquestan, some writers tell us, that it was not a general engagement, but that twelve Turks, and as many Persians, fought in the fight of both armies, which Providence decided in favour of the latter; and this combat is very famous in oriental romances, where it is generally stiled Genk duaxde rokh, i. e. the combat of the twelve heroes. The terms on which this combat was fought

DURING his reign flourished Lokman the famous philosopher of the east, called, by way of surname, Lokman al Hakim; i. e. Lokman the Wise. It would lead us far out of our way, should we enter here too deeply into the history of this extra-fought were these: that, if the Turks were victorious, the Persians should own Apherasiab for their lord; but, in case the Persians were successful, then the Turks were to retire into their own country, and so quit all pretensions to Iran (1). Apherasiab complied with the agreement, and marched directly back into his own country; but, say the same writers, he soon after broke the peace, by sending his son with a numerous body of horse to make inroads into Persia: in consequence of which followed the battle of Kbuarrezm, in which they make Apherasiab and his brother to have been present. They add, that, after the loss of the battle, Apherasiab, with the remains of his army, fled into the mountainous countries on the banks of the Caspian sea, intending to pass, if possible, behind it, and so through the extended territories of the Kippjaks into his own dominions; but his efforts were vain, the forces of Key-chofrau surrounding the handful of troops Apherasiab had with him in the mountains of Aderbayagjan; so that he was at last taken prisoner, and put to death (2). Mirkbond, and the writers we have followed, do not say much as to the personal bravery of Key-chofrau; but there are writers who inform us of a very extraordinary act of chivalry, performed by this monarch. They tell us, that in his reign there appeared in the mountains, which separate Irak Ajemi from Phars, or as we call them, Parthia, from Proper Persia, a monstrous serpent, which struck the people with such terror, that they abandoned their habitations, and left all the adjacent country desolate; this formidable dragon they stiled Gawfchid. The king, being informed of this, resolved, like a good prince, to go immediately and destroy this monster. Key-chofrau hunted it for some time before he came up with it; but at last found it in its den in the mountains of Aderbayagjan; and his guards flying at the sight of the dragon, he attacked it alone, and killed it with his own hand. On the spot where this remarkable deed was done, a pyreum, or fire-temple, was erected, called in succeeding times Deir Gawfchid, i. e. the habitation of Gawfchid, renowned to this day amongst the Persees, and held by some to be the first fire-temple erected in Persia (3). Though some writers are silent as to the valour of this prince, yet all who treat of his reign, expatiate loudly on his wisdom and piety. Some believe him a prophet; most acknowledge that he conversed with the prophets, and was in a peculiar manner favoured by the Almighty for the great regard he always shewed towards religion, and religious persons.

(1) D'Herbelot. biblioth. orient. ubi supra.

(2) Mirkbond. list. ubi supra.

(3) D'Herbelot. biblioth. orient. artic. Deir Gawfchid.

ordinary person : we shall therefore content ourselves with observing, that it is generally agreed he was by birth an Ethiopian or Nubian, the oriental word Habafchi including both, his parents mean, and himself sold for a slave, and carried from one place to another, till, at last, he was brought into the land of Israel, where he lived under the reigns of David and Solomon. The Arabian writers tell us, that, sleeping, in this condition, during the heat of the day, the angels entered his room, and awaked him, with this salutation; Lokman, we are the messengers of God, thy Creator and ours, who hath sent us to thee, to inform thee, that he will make thee a monarch, and his lieutenant over the whole earth. Lokman, after remaining silent for a small space, returned this answer: If, by the absolute command of God, I am to become what you say, his will must be fulfilled in all things; and I hope, if it comes to pass, that he will afford me the necessary assistance of his grace, that I may exactly execute his orders: but if he would give me leave to choose, I wish rather to continue in the state I am in, and that he would prevent me from offending him; without which grace, all the pomp and grandeur of the world would be to me no more than a cumbrous and insupportable load. This, say these authors, appeared so just in the sight of God, that he bestowed on Lokman such an excellent understanding, that he composed, say they, ten thousand apologues, moral maxims, and wise sayings, each of them more valuable than the whole world: a phrase implying no more, than that they are highly useful, as well as wonderfully sublime. They tell us also, that Lokman standing one day in the midst of a great number of people, who all greedily listened to his wise and pleasant discourses, an Hebrew of great quality asked him, if he was not the black slave whom he had seen formerly tending the sheep. Lokman readily answered, I am. And how then, said the nobleman, have you attained so high a degree of virtue? Why, answered Lokman, by these three easy steps: I have always spoke the truth, I have constantly kept my word, and I have never meddled in any thing which did not concern me. A Persian poet hath recorded another extraordinary instance of Lokman's presence of mind: his master sent him, with some other slaves, to gather fruit in his garden; the rest eat the best: and when his master missed them, they roundly swore, that Lokman eat them whether they would or not. The matter, sir, said Lokman, is easily decided; let us all drink heartily of warm water, and then let us join hands, and run round: his lord commanded the experiment to be immediately made; upon which they all fell to vomiting, with this difference, that they brought up the fruits which they had eaten, and Lokman nothing but the warm water.

water. The comment of the Persian poet on this story is so remarkable, that the reader will doubtless be pleased to see it :
 ‘ When we shall all drink of this hot water, at our tryals, in ‘ the day of the last judgment, then whatever has been con‘ cealed in the heart, and hidden far from the sight of men, ‘ shall be thrown up, in the view of all the world ; and the ‘ hypocrite, who acquired the reputation of a saint by his dis‘ sembling, shall then be covered with shame and confusion of ‘ face.’ What we have reported is sufficient to shew, that there is a strong resemblance between the history of Lokman, as reported by the eastern writers, and that of Æsop, as we find it written by the Greeks. Both were mean in their original, both slaves, through the severity of fortune, both famous for their wisdom, and both delivered their maxims in the same manner, that is, by way of apologue. But there is a wide difference between the times in which the oriental authors say Lokman lived, and those wherein the Greeks place Æsop. As to the first, it is generally allowed, that Lokman lived in the reign of Solomon, whereas Æsop is said to have been cotemporary with Cræsus king of Lydia, and Solon the Athenian legislator. From the history of their lives, and from the comparison of their fables, there is all the reason in the world to believe, that Lokman and Æsop were the same person ; the difficulty seems to lie here, whether the Greeks stole him from the orientals, or whether the orientals took him from the Greeks. It seems most natural to believe the former, since, in such cases, the Greeks are found to have been notorious thieves, and to have altered every point of antient history they were able, to their own advantage : besides, the apologue was certainly the favourite mode of teaching in the east, long before that or any other kind of learning was known to the Greeks : after all, this is but conjecture, which we offer to the reader’s consideration, rather than his belief. The chief reason why Lokman is so much considered in the east, is, because Mohammed has mentioned him in terms of respect, in the koran ; and has affirmed, that God bestowed on him the gift of extraordinary wisdom^t. His fables, which are far from being numerous, have been printed in Arabic and Latin, at Leyden ; so that Europe is now no stranger to the wisdom of that famous person^u. But to return to Key-chosrau, he is reported to have been himself a very wise and very learned prince, as well as remarkably pious. He was very fortunate throughout his reign, and yet he was so little exalted by an uninterrupted series of good fortune, that he not only resigned the crown, and retired into

^t Koran. Sor. LOKMAN, ;
 art. Lokman, note H.

^u D’HERBELOT. biblioth. orient.

the deserts on the skirts of the province of Aderbayagjan, but left also this remarkable memento to all his successors, by causing it to be engraved in one of the rooms of his palace w (H).

“WE

w MIRKOND. hist. sect. 14. D'HERBELOT. art Kaichofrau.

(H) It is very fit, that we should give an account in this note what our reasons were for inserting the life of Lokman in the Persian history. Not to trouble the reader with too long a detail, we shall acquaint him with no more than two: First, Lokman wrote in the Persian language, as is generally agreed, and as the learned editor of his fables in Holland positively affirms (8). Secondly, It is from Persian writers that we have the best and fullest accounts of Lokman's life and manners; and as they constantly speak of him as cotemporary with Key-chofrau, the third king of their second dynasty, it was but just, that we should insert his memoirs under that reign. Having thus justified our speaking of Lokman here, let us be indulged a few thoughts on fable, and on the high reputation which this author has obtained from his writings in that way. It is universally agreed, that the apologue was one of the most antient methods of instructing; and, of consequence, that it was invented in the east, where indeed all kind of science took birth. That this mode of teaching was far elder than Lokman's days, admitting that he lived where the oriental writers have placed him, we know from the sacred writings. And that this method was long, if it be not still, cultivated in the east, is a point so notorious, that we need not undertake its proof. Bishop Patrick has advanced a very ingenious, though it may be no very solid opinion, in relation to the rise and decay of fable. He says, that it was invented in early times, when mankind were as yet rude, and histories unwritten; that, as these came into vogue, fable declined, because truth being always preferable to falsehood, men chose rather to appeal to facts which had happened, than to suppose things which might never come to pass (9). But, with the bishop's good leave, the other side of the argument may be taken, and supported with greater force; for points of history are very seldom exactly agreed on in all their circumstances, and consequently can hardly ever be similar one to another; whereas fables, which are indeed representations of facts without names, may be adjusted to the utmost nicety, and consequently are able to strike with far greater vigour than any history applied. We will give an instance, which will effectually support what we say: Might not Nathan the prophet, when he reproved David for taking the wife of Uriah, have easily bethought him of some history, which would nearly have represented the case of that prince? but will any man say,

(8) Præfat. Erpen. Læm. fab. Proverbs.

(9) See preface to his paraphrase on the

that

“ WE ought not to value ourselves too much on our exalta“ tion above the ordinary rank of men, since we are no more “ secure that a lecture from history would have penetrated the soul of David with so lively a sorrow as Nathan's noble application of his parable, Thou art the man (10)? Fables shew us truth in an easy natural light, and the mind having thus consented to a doctrine proposed, the understanding afterwards applies; and we learn with the greater ease, because we do not discern the teacher. But to return to Lokman; his fame is so great, and so universal throughout the east, that, to express an high idea of any man's wisdom, they are wont to say, as the learned Erpenius expresses it, Non necesse est docere Locmanum. There is no need of teaching Lokman (11). His fables were doubtless almost without number; but the collection we have of them is not large. Sir John Chardin has printed a French translation of them, which agrees exactly with the Arabic and Latin version above referred to. We call them versions, because, as we observed before, Lokman wrote originally in Persian; and, at this day, Sir John Chardin tells us, this nation is so fond of them, that they are the first things they teach their children, and spare no pains to make them enter into, and comprehend their meaning. An instance or two may not be unacceptable (12).

The boy in the river.

A little boy went one day into a river, and, not having learned to swim, had like to have been drowned: seeing a man at a distance, he called out to him for help: the man, as soon as he saw the lad's distress, began to expostulate with him on the folly of going into a river before he had learned to swim: the boy, instead of answering him, cried out, Save me, save me, and then chide as long as you will.

The smith and his dog.

An honest smith had a dog that slept all the while his master was at work; but as soon as he left off, and sat down with his companions to dinner, the dog waked, and solicited him for meat: Worthless animal! said the smith, how canst thou sleep amidst the noise of hammers, which shake the very earth, and yet wake at the wagging of one's jaws, which scarce make any noise at all?

The goose and the swallow.

The goose and the swallow entered into a league of friendship, and resolved to live together. They came unluckily to a place where the fowlers were watching: the swallow, as soon as she saw them, flew away: but the poor goose, not being able to make use of her wings, was taken and killed.

The passage in the Koran, referred to in the text, is the whole thirty-first chapter, which therefore bears the title of Lokman. Mohammed speaks in his own

(10) 2 Samuel c. xii. (11) Præfat. Erpen. Lokman. fab. p. 7. (12) Chardin. voyag. tom. iii. p. 227.

“ secure of our crowns, than they of their estates. That “ which descended from several monarchs to me, will descend, “ when I am gone, to several others; who then would be “ proud of what is uncertain in itself, and cannot at best last “ long? ”

Lohrasp.

LOHRASP, or Lohorasb, was the successor of Key-chofrav, and his near relation, that prince having no heirs male. The authors, who have recorded the principal events which happened under the reigns of the several princes of the first and second race, differ in no part of their account so much as where they speak of the actions of this prince. For the reader's ease, as well as our own, we will first give, as succinctly as we can, the story of this monarch's reign, according to Mirkbond; and we shall afterwards set down such variations as seem of greatest importance, affixing the authors names from whom they are taken. Lohrasp was the nephew to king Key-kaus's brother, and was the next heir male of the royal line. He was elected king, and not without considerable opposition. His temper was known to be severe and haughty; the grandees therefore were many of them for putting the sceptre into a milder hand;

person at the beginning thereof, vehemently declaiming against irreligious persons and idolaters, such especially as despised the Koran, and lived in the errors of their fathers. He then makes God speak thus: We inspired knowledge into Lokman, and taught him to give God thanks; he that returneth thanks to God for his graces, doth good to his soul; for God hateth the ungrateful, and praise is in all places due to him. Remember thou, that Lokman said to his son, O! my son, believe not that God hath equals; it is an exceeding great sin; we have commanded man to honour his father and his mother; his mother bringeth him forth with sorrow, and weaneth him at two years old: be not thou forgetful of God's benefits; honour thy father and thy mother; for thou shalt be one day judged before God.

The rest of the chapter contains a great many excellent admonitions, which are all put into the mouth of Lokman, and consequently shew how high this philosopher stood in the opinion of Mohammed. To say the truth, Mohammed was a very artful person, and took care never to run counter to popular opinions, where it might be avoided. The character of Lokman was too well established to be overturned by him; and therefore he very wisely represented him as one who had long ago taught the same doctrines which he now sought to recommend. Hence, however, it has come to pass, that some commentators on the Koran have taught, that Lokman was a prophet; though others understand what Mohammed says of that sage's having only the gift of teaching (13).

(13) D'Herbelot, biblioth. orient. art. Lecman.

and at the head of this faction was Zal-zer, the father of Rustan; but their cabals were in vain: Lohrasp carried it in spite of them all, and was declared king. As soon as he was seated on the throne, he determined with himself to raise his reputation, and to extend his empire, by making war on both sides thereof. In consequence of this resolution, he fixed his court at Balch, and took all possible methods for putting every thing in the best order in the eastern provinces of Iran. He sent, in the mean time, his general Gudarz, with a puissant army, into Shamah or Syria, with orders to reduce the whole of that large country under his power. Gudarz effectually answered his master's expectation: he conquered all Syria as far as Damascus, and also Palestine, with the famous city of Jerusalem, called by the Persians the habitation of the saints. The reigning king of the Jews submitted, and promised to pay tribute; for which he put as hostages into the hands of the Persian general several persons of quality, whom Gudarz quickly after caused to be slain. This provoked the Jews to a rebellion, and gave Gudarz the opportunity he wanted of sacking Jerusalem, where he treated the inhabitants with inexpressible cruelty, and, having loaded his soldiers with riches, retired, carrying into Persia with him a vast number of captives. King Lohrasp had two sons, the eldest called Gushtasp, the younger named Zaris. The former was of a fierce, haughty disposition; but was at the same time warlike, and of great abilities. This young prince drew in many, who were fond of novelty, to join him in a rebellion against his father; in which he had at first success, and gained over to him a very considerable party. But Lohrasp, having drawn together all his friends, and done every thing in his power to engage the people to his service, marched so briskly against his son, that Gushtasp's adherents, fearing the fortune of the day in case of a battle, abandoned him by degrees; which he observing, began immediately to provide for his own safety, by retiring into Turquestan, in so distressed a condition, that he lived at that court even unknown and unsuspected. Here, by a very odd accident, he married the daughter of the reigning prince, It was, it seems, a custom in that country, that, whenever the king had a mind to dispose of a daughter in marriage, public notice was given, and the people assembled in great numbers in an open court, where being disposed into the best order the place would allow, the king entered with his daughter, one of whose hands was held in his, and, in the other, she had a golden apple, enriched with precious stones. When they were advanced into the middle of the place, the king let loose his daughter's hand; and she, after walking round, and observing every body diligently, bestowed herself, and her apple

apple, on the man she liked best. It happened, not long after Gushtasp's arrival in Turquestan, that the king determined to give his eldest daughter in marriage; and, having brought her out into the court, after the manner before described, she, after looking a little about her, gave her apple to this unknown person. The grandees of Touran were inexpressibly vexed at seeing themselves despised by the princess for a stranger, whom they supposed of low birth. They therefore engaged the king to make a law, that, for the future, the princesses of Touran should have their choice only out of people of high quality, that the royal line might not be drawn into contempt. The king had still two daughters, as remarkable for their beauty, as for their birth. These were demanded in marriage by the two sons of a neighbouring and potent prince, to whom the king of Touran made no scruple of promising them, on this condition, that they would reduce under his obedience two lords who had revolted, and who committed great devastations throughout all Touran. The young princes, considering the difficulty of this task, had recourse to Gushtasp, of whose prowess they had sufficient proofs, and engaged him to be assistant therein. Gushtasp, as soon as he had undertaken to serve them, appointed an hunting-match, and invited the two brothers to be of the party: he also brought to the chace a small body of resolute friends. When they were assembled, he discovered to them his project, which was to go immediately to a certain castle, where, he was informed, the two rebel lords had an interview, and to storm it, before they could have any intelligence of their expedition. This was immediately agreed to, and instantly carried into execution. Gushtasp entered the place first himself; and, having seized the rebels, put them into the hands of the two princes, who conducted them to court, and presented them to the king. The Turkish monarch was prodigiously pleased with this feat of arms, and very readily made good his promise to the princes, by giving them his daughters in marriage. A few days after, he caused great feasts to be celebrated, and appointed public tournaments; wherein Gushtasp behaved himself in such a manner, that he carried the glory of the day from all who were present. The king, who had hitherto shewed him but little countenance, spoke to him on this occasion very kindly, and gave him the highest praises. Gushtasp took this opportunity of saying, that, if he had excelled in combats that were not in earnest, he had likewise been of some use in quelling the disturbers of the public peace. This struck the king's mind, who easily comprehended the meaning; and, having diligently sought out the truth, made Gushtasp henceforward his favourite. It is to be observed, that, after the conquest of Touran

by

by Key-kofrau, though the people were left to live under their own laws, and their own princes, yet they were obliged to own the superiority of the monarchs of Iran, and to pay them a considerable tribute. Gushtasp persuaded his father-in-law, that this was at once dishonourable, and needless; and therefore advised him to throw off the yoke, by refusing tribute, and by making preparations for, and declaring war against Lobrasp, in case he should dispute his independency. This Gushtasp did to be revenged of his father, and from an apprehension, that, if ever he was discovered, the nobility of Touran, in a time of peace, would certainly deliver him up. Lobrasp was exceedingly surpris'd at the arrival of the Turkish ambassador in his court. He treated him, however, with great civility, and endeavoured to get out of him the true source of these extraordinary proceedings. The ambassador, at first, thought to put him off with trivial answers; but, on the king's pressing him, he acknowledged at last, that a certain stranger, who had married his master's daughter, was the true author of all this mischief. Lobrasp no sooner heard this, than he guessed it was his son, and immediately dispatched a messenger to inquire privately, whether it was so, or not. As soon as he was certain, that this new and dangerous enemy was his son Gushtasp, he took at the same time a most strange and most generous resolution; which was, to spare his people at the expence of his crown. He found he was grown old; he saw the ambition of his son was to be satisfied with nothing less than the diadem; and, as he knew he was brave and wise, though undutiful to him, he determined to resign to him his dominions; and, in order to this, he sent his younger son Zaris with the tagi, or ensign of the royal dignity in Persia, to his brother in Turquestan. Zaris took care to give his brother private notice of his arrival. Gushtasp went immediately to pay him a visit; and, being informed of his father's resolution, accepted the tagi or tiara, and caused himself to be solemnly proclaimed king of Persia. His father-in-law was at first prodigiously disturbed, conceiving that there was some treason against him in these proceedings; but, when he found things were really as they had been represented, he was overjoyed to the highest degree: and the nobility of Touran came in crowds to pay their compliments to the new king of Persia. These ceremonies over, Gushtasp took leave of his father-in-law, and, with his wife Karathun, set out for his own dominions, carrying with him a grand retinue, and a considerable number of camels loaded with riches. Lobrasp received his son Lohrasp with all the marks of tenderness and joy. Gushtasp retained with- him at court for many years, and did nothing without his ad-draws to a vice. At last the good old man withdrew to lead a solitary solitary life; life.

life; to meditate on the vanities of this world; and to contemplate the wisdom and goodness of GOD. A short time after, he died, having first sent for his son, and given him, in his last moments, the most salutary counsels in respect to his own glory, and the good of his people. This Lobrasp was surnamed Balki, i. e. the Balchian, because he resided mostly at Balk or Balch, one of the antientest cities in his dominions ^P (L).

GUSH-

P MIRKHOND. hist. sect. 15.

(L) It must be owned, that the foregoing account, taken from Mirkbond, is by no means agreeable to what other Persian authors have written on the same subject. In two of the most celebrated histories of this people, we find it recorded, that Lobrasp was the grandson of Keykobod, and that he was opposed by the Persian nobility, not for his cruelty or pride, as Mirkbond suggests, but because his father and himself had led their lives in privacy; whence it was believed he had not the capacity of reigning: it is also said, that he was the first Persian monarch who enacted martial laws, and obliged his troops to live like the rest of his subjects, according to the rules of equity and justice, and not as they had hitherto done, at free-quarter, and in contempt of both. He allowed his general officers, and governors of provinces, to give audience on a tribunal, raised one story from the ground, and railed round about, reserving to himself only this distinction, that he had a carpet or cloth of state thrown before his foot-stool. We are likewise told, that the name of the general, sent by this prince to invade Syria and Palestine, was Raham; and that he was surnamed by the Persians Bakhtalnassar, from whence the Hebrews framed the name of Nebuchadnezzar, and the Greeks Nebuchadonosor. We have also, on the same authority, the history of Gushtasp's flight, marriage, and succession to the throne of Persia; but we are likewise told, what little agrees with Mirkbond's history, that Lobrasp, within a short time after he resigned the throne, was besieged in the city of Balch by Arjasp, nephew of Apherasiab, the famous Turkish monarch, who, after the town fell into his hands, caused the old king of Persia to be put to death, after he had reigned one hundred and twenty years (13). Kbondemir, the famous Persian historian, differs not only from Mirkbond, but the writers last cited; he says, that Lobrasp was the son of Keykaus's brother, and that he was elected on account of his extraordinary virtues: according to him, it was Gudarz who conquered Palestine, and was surnamed by the Persians Bakht-Nassar; which surname has occasioned such confusion among the Hebrew and Greek writers. As to the flight of Gushtasp, this writer says, that he retired to the court of a certain Greek prince, where he mar-

(13) Lebtarik. Tarir. Montekeb.

GUSHTASP, or Kischtasp, the son of Lobrasp, succeeded Gushtasp his father with general applause: he was a prince of great strength

ried the king's eldest daughter, called by him Kenaioum, and, who, as he tells the story, presented him publicly with an orange, which is plainly substituted for the golden apple. Instead of the two rebellious lords, he speaks of two terrible monsters, that this Grecian prince, whoever he was, insisted should be killed by those who pretended to the young princesses, who were still unmarried.

The first of these was a furious serpent, which had its den in a wood so very thick, that it was thought almost impossible to penetrate it, in order to combat this destructive animal: the other was a lion prodigiously fierce, which traversed the plain country, and tore to pieces all he met with, whether of human kind, or cattle. Two of the chief princes of Greece, who were pretenders to the daughters of the king in whose court Gushtasp lived, were quite abashed at these proposals, despairing of the conquest of these monsters, and consequently of the princesses. However, they informed Gushtasp of the answer the king had given them. Gushtasp readily offered them his assistance, and accordingly attacked the monsters, killed them both, and gave all the honour of these extraordinary feats of chivalry to the two Greek princes, which procured for them the wives they desired. Some time after this, Gushtasp growing a little into the king's favour, that prince asked him one day how he passed his time. Gushtasp answered, that sometimes he went a hunting; and that lately, as he was taking that diversion, he killed two extraordinary creatures. The king immediately understood what he meant, and, having caused the matter to be thoroughly inquired into, found that Gushtasp had slain the monsters; upon which he immediately made him his chief minister, as well as favourite; and, at his persuasion, refused to pay the king of Persia that tribute which he was wont to send him yearly, and also declared war against him. Lobrasp, being informed of all this, immediately conceived it was his son who had influenced this king to such bold proceedings; and therefore, instead of providing for the war, he sent his younger son with the tiara, or royal diadem of Persia, to Gushtasp, as a pledge of his friendship, and a certain sign, that he intended him for his successor. On his return to his father's court, continues our author, the venerable old man went out to meet him; kissed his feet, according to the Persian custom in submitting to a sovereign; and, after tenderly embracing him, placed the crown upon his head with his own hands; after which he retired from the world, to lead a recluse life at Balch, where he was killed. The prophets Jeremiah, Daniel, and Esdras, were his cotemporaries (14). If we may believe the eloquent author of the Shah Nemeb, or strength and activity of body, of great wisdom, and extraordinary abilities of mind. He, leaving Balch to his father, went to reside at the antient metropolis of the kingdom, Istachr, i. e. cut out of the rock; which he adorned with many fine structures, and reigned there in peace and glory about thirty years; at the end of that space, there appeared, in his dominions, a very extraordinary person, who took upon himself the character of a prophet, and declared that he was sent by GOD to teach such as would listen to him, the right way: this person was the Zoroastres of the Greeks, and the Zerdust of the Persians; but as the history of this famous person is of very great consequence, we have found it necessary, to prevent confusion, to detach it from the reign of Gushtasp, and to deliver what hath been collected of this wonderful man, by authors of all nations, in a regular narration, with all the candour and impartiality we are masters of.

(14) Khondemir, in Kheleffat, Al Akbar.

Royal Chronicle, Balch, at the time Lobraasp resigned the kingdom to his son Gushtasp, was esteemed by the Persians as the holy city, the fountain of their religion, and the place worthiest of their esteem, as Mecca is now by the Mohammedans; on this account therefore, Lobraasp made it the place of his abode, where, laying aside his royal robes, he put on the habit of a priest, applying himself wholly to devotion, in imitation of his predecessor Gjemschid, for the space of thirty years, till he was slain, as will be hereafter related, in a cloyster of his own building, which he called Nau-bahar, i. e. the new spring (15).

In this note we have mentioned two histories, besides that of Mirkbond; and shall here give the reader a short account of their authors, that he may be able to judge, in some measure, of the credit due to each. Tarikh Montekheb is the Turkish name of a translation of a Persian history, stiled in that language Tarikh

Khozideh, i. e. the chosen chronicle, written originally in Persian verse, and afterwards reduced into prose by its author Hamdallah Ben Abikekr Ben Ahmed Ben Nasser Al Mastoufi Al Cazvini, i. e. native of the city of Casbin. It contains a general history from the creation to A. H. 730 (16). The book commonly cited under the title of Lebtarik, is properly called Lobb Al Taovarikh, i. e. the marrow of histories: it was written in the Persian language by Jabia Ben Abdallahif Al Cazvini: it is divided into four books; the first, containing the life of Mohammed, and the twelve Imans; the second, the lives and reigns of the kings who governed before the introduction of Mohammedism; the third, the history of the reigning family in Persia; the fourth, an universal history of the dynasties prior to Mohammed; it comes down to A. H. 948, the author dying in 960, or in the year 1552, according to our account (17).

(15) Pbirdausi in Shah Nameh. Hyde rel. vet. Pers. c. 23. p. 302. (16) D'Herlet. biblioth. orient. art. Tarikh Khozideh. (17) Idem ib. art. Lobb. Al Taovarikh.

The life of Zoroastres, Zoroaster, or Zerdusht; extracted as well from Greek and Latin, as oriental historians.

IF to be famous after death can afford any joyful sensation to the immortal spirit, that of this man, whether prophet, impostor, or philosopher, must needs receive high satisfaction from the wide extension of his fame, which has been diffused throughout the whole learned world, and subsisted even to latest ages. The Greeks, who were very inquisitive after the inventors of science, amongst the nations whom they stile barbarians, and from whom, notwithstanding, they drew all the learning they had themselves, have written so confusedly, and so obscurely, concerning Zoroasters, that it is hard to know how many famous men bore this name, when they lived, or for what they were eminent. Arnobius is thought to have reduced them to four; but such is the misfortune of all who have written about Zoroaster, that the sense of this very passage is disputed, some affirming, that Arnobius speaks but of three Zoroasters; others, that he mentions only two (K).
How-

(K) In the text we have mentioned a passage from Arnobius, which has been very differently understood. This Arnobius was a rhetorician, and the master of the famous Lactantius; being converted to the christian faith, he wrote a large work, in a declamatory stile, against the gentiles; wherein there are many things contained of high use in respect to the history of learning among the antients; for though, as a christian, he wrote but indifferently, these books being composed soon after his conversion, and before he was well instructed in the faith; yet, as to heathen learning, he was a great proficient therein; and his authority, in such a case as this, must have consequently considerable weight. The passage, which has been so differently interpreted, runs thus:

*Age, nunc veniet quis super igneam zonam magus interiore ab orbe Zoroastres, Hermippo ut assentiamur auctori. Bactrianus & ille conveniet, cujus Ctesias res gestas historiarum exponit in primo, Armenius Hostanis nepos, & familiaris Pamphylius Cyri (16). Patricius, the famous collector of the Zoroastrian oracles (17), Gabriel Naude, a man of distinguished learning (18), and Kircher, who well understood these things (19), believe that Arnobius mentions here four Zoroasters; the first a Chaldean; the second a Bactrian; the third a Pamphylian; the fourth an Armenian. Salmasius will needs have the text read thus (20): *Age, nunc veniat, quæso, per igneam zonam magus interiore ab orbe Zoroastres, Hermippo & assentiamur auctori, Bactrianus, & ille conveniat, cujus Ctesias res gestas historiarum exponit in primo,

(16) Declam. contra gentes. log. pour les grands hommes, &c.

(17) Comm. sup. orac. Zoroast.

(18) Apolog.

(19) Obel. Pamphil.

(20) Exerc. Pinit.

Arme-

However, four was certainly not too large a number, since authors undoubtedly mention many more. Of these we shall speak

Armenius, Hostanis nepos, & familiaris Pamphilus Cyri. It is evident, by these alterations, that Salmasius has got rid of one Zoroaster, though one would think he has introduced another; since, of the three Zoroasters, which he admits to be spoken of in this passage, the first is said to be an Ethiopian, or one coming from a country near the torrid zone; for so Salmasius expounds per igneam zonam, & ab interiore orbe; which Ethiopian or Lydian Zoroaster Hermippus makes a Bactrian; the second Armenius, nephew of Hostanes, of whose actions Ctesias gives us an account in the first book of his history; the third named Pamphilus, friend to Cyrus. Ursinus, from the same words, is positive that Arnobius mentions but two, exploding the Bactrian Zoroaster of Hermippus, and shewing, from Ctesias, that Zoroaster was not so antient as Eudæxus fancied, but that he lived in the time of Cyrus (21). We are afraid our readers are already fatigued enough with these dry researches as to the Zoroaster of the Greeks: we hope, however, they will have patience enough to hear what we have to offer by way of apology for this profusion of quotations, of which, in the other parts of this Persian history, we have been as sparing as possible. Our reasons are these; first, in order to gain any credit for the history of Zerduſht, as written by oriental authors, there was a necessity of destroying the credit which has been so long given to the Greeks; and, to do this, the best and shortest method was to shew what the Greeks had said, and what, from their writings, the most able of their disciples had been able to collect, which, we presume to say, is very little or nothing. Secondly, We thought it necessary to shew the reader, that, in order to make some sense of the varying stories of the antients in relation to Zoroaster, who, by the way, is called by a greater variety of Greek names, than he is in the oriental languages; though in them, as we have shewn, the orthography of his name is far from being settled; I say, we thought it convenient to shew, that several Zoroasters have been supposed, in order to the distribution of the several stories about him. After all, the candidates for the honours bestowed on the true Zoroaster, may be reduced to two, the Chaldean and the Persian; and the very ingenious Mr. Stanley has, with great impartiality, divided these honours between them. But, thirdly, our history of Zerduſht will set this matter in its true light, by shewing that there is in reality but one Zoroaster. If it be inquired, how the Chaldean magi came to derive themselves, and their doctrines from this Persian; and how this is to be reconciled to that chronology, which hitherto has been approved by all the learned, and sets the Chaldean speak as succinctly as we can: the first is thought to have been a Chaldean: Suidas calls him an Assyrian; and says also, that he was struck dead by fire from heaven ^t. It is very probable, that this is the same Zoroaster spoken of by Dion Chrysostom, and said to have appeared in fire ^u. The second was a Bactrian, and a king, whom Justin, and the authors who follow him, make cotemporary with Ninus the Assyrian, by whom he was vanquished in battle, and slain ^x. He is reputed to have been the inventor of magic; and is said by Arnobius to have contested with Ninus, not only with steel and strength, but by magical force, and the occult sciences of the Chaldeans ^y. The third was a Persian, as Laertius informs us ^z; Clemens Alexandrinus styles him a Mede ^a; Suidas, a Perse-mede ^b: but they all speak darkly and ambiguously. The fourth was a Pamphylian, commonly called Er, or Erus Armenius. Concerning this Zoroaster, Clemens Alexandrinus quotes Plato, affirming, that he began a book thus: ‘This wrote I Zoroaster Armenius, by descent a Pamphylian, dying in war; and, be-

(21) In Zerduſht.(22) Chaldaica Philoſophy, p. 4.

^t Sub voce Ζωροάστρου.
^y Decl. contra gentes.
 ALEXAND. Strom. lib. i.
 Ζωροάστρου.
^u Orat. Boristh.
^z LAERT. in procem.
^b In vocibus Μάγοι, Ἀστρονομία, Ζωροάστρου.
^x Lib. i.
^a CLEM.

Zoroaster far higher; we shall answer, that, in the first place, we are not accountable for the mistakes of others: the Greek writers knew not what to call him, or where to place him; for, as Mr. Stanley justly observes, “The same name it is, which some call Zabratis, others Nazaratas, others Zares, others Zaran, others Zaradas; all which are but several corruptions from the Chaldee or Persian word, which the Greeks most generally render Zoroaster (22).” What certainty can be expected from such writers? But then, secondly, lest this should seem an evasive answer, we allege, that Zoroaster was not the institutor of the magi, nor the author of a new religion, which we shall shortly prove at large; and this, as we conceive, occasioned the great confusion about Zoroaster: it was a received opinion, that he was the founder of magism; it was easily discoverable, that magism was as antient as the days of Abraham, and that it was the religion of Chaldea: it was natural enough therefore, for such as looked upon Zoroaster to be the institutor of the magian doctrines, to say with assurance, that he lived in these times; but then, discovering from the Persian records, at what time he truly lived, they chose, rather than abandon their former opinion, to make two Zoroasters; the first a Chaldean or Assyrian, cotemporary with Ninus; the second a Persian, flourishing in the reign of Darius Hystaspis.

(22) Chaldaic Philosophy, p. 4

‘ing in Hades, I learned of the gods.’ He is reported, by the same author, to have risen again after being ten days dead; and to have told strange things which he had seen in that space ^c. The fifth was a native of Proconnesus, mentioned by Pliny ^d. Some have imagined, not without reason, that he is the same with Aristeus the Proconnesian, mentioned by Suidas to have had an art of letting his soul go out of his body, and return as often as he pleased ^e. The sixth lived at Babylon, at the time Pythagoras was carried thither by Cambyses, as we are told by Apuleius ^f. As the Greeks made several Zoroasters, so they placed them in different ages of the world: Justin makes him thirteen years older than Sardanapalus ^g; Eudoxus, cited by Pliny, placed him six thousand years before the death of Plato ^h; Plutarch makes him flourish five thousand years before the war of Troy ⁱ. Some authors, mentioned by Suidas, fix him five hundred years before the Trojan war ^k; Apuleius ^l, Iamblichus ^m, Porphyrus ⁿ, Clemens Alexandrinus ^o, and Agathias ^p, place him where he ought to be placed, about the time of Cyrus; and Pliny, discoursing on this very subject, says, that the most accurate writers were of opinion, he lived a little before Xerxes ^q. But however they might differ in circumstances, they all agreed in paying him great honours: Plato ^r, Aristotle ^s, Plutarch ^t, and Porphyrus ^u, acknowledge him to have been a person of extraordinary learning. Pliny tells us, that he laughed the same day he was born; that his brains beat so hard, that they lifted up the hand laid upon them; which was a presage of his future sagacity: he adds what is very extraordinary, that he lived in the deserts twenty years, upon cheese so mixed, that it did not grow stale ^x. Solinus draws his character in few words: he was, says he, optimum artium peritissimus; in the best arts most skilful ^y. Apuleius styles him, omnis divini arcani antistes, the chief doctor in all divine mysteries: and adds, that he was the preceptor of Pythagoras ^z: Agathias tells us, he lived under Hystaspes; and that he was the author of magism among the Persians, changing their old religion, and introducing new opinions ^a. Dion Chrysostom says more of him than any of these writers, and from better authority, since what he delivered he had from the Persians themselves, as we shall hereafter have occasion to shew ^b. Ctesias, an author universally condemned, was, in all probability, more in the right about Zoroaster than those who have answered him, since we know, from Arnobius, that he affirmed him to have lived under the reign of Darius Hystaspis, and spent the first book of six, which he wrote on Persian affairs, in delivering his history ^c. The sum and conclusion of all we have hitherto said, is this, that, except Ctesias and Dion Chrysostom, all the antients who have written concerning Zoroaster, knew little about him more than this, that he was a very learned and wise man, and the principal of the magi; in respect to which, Eusebius indeed says, that he wrote a book, which, from the citations he has given us, seems to have contained the chief doctrines of the Persian religion ^d.

^c PLATO. polit. lib. x. c. 16. ^e Sub voce 'Αρτεμύς. ^d Hist. nat. lib. xxx. c. i. & l. vii. ^f Florid. ii. ^g Ubi supra. ^h Hist. nat. l. xxx. c. i. ⁱ De Iside & Ofiride. ^k Sub voce Ζωροάστρης. ^l Florid. ii. ^m In vita Pythagoræ. ⁿ Idem ibid. ^o Stromat. l. v. ^p Hist. lib. ii. ^q Ubi supra. ^r In Alcibiade. ^s In libro de magia, citante LAERT. in proem. ^t De Iside & Ofiride. ^u In vita Pythagoræ. ^x Hist. nat. l. xxx. c. i. ^y Cap. i. ^z Florid. ii. ^a Hist. lib. ii.

THE oriental writers are somewhat better agreed, in relation to this wonderful man, whom they call Zerdusht, Zaradusht, Zaratusht, and Zard-busht; for they, generally speaking, acknowledge that he flourished in the reign of Gushtasp. The author of Lebtarikh, indeed, says, that some old writers confound him with Dobak or Zobak, one of the Pischedadian princes ^e; but all the Persian historians, who are to be supposed best acquainted with the affairs of their own nation, speak of him, not as the author, but as the reformer of the magian religion, which, they say, he performed by the assistance of Gushtasp (L). With respect to his family; the common opinion

^b Orat. Boristhen. ^c Contra gentes. ^d Præpar. evangel.

^e D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. Zerduscht.

(L) Some Arabian writers have endeavoured to insinuate, that what they call the religion of the fire-worshippers, is not of great antiquity; but all impartial authors agree in rejecting this notion, and admit that magism began very early, nay, even before the time of Abraham: certain it is, that the oldest book extant in the world favours this opinion; for thus speaks Job in his protestation of his integrity, and his fervent declarations, that he had always held the true faith, and done all the good he could: “ If I beheld the sun,

“ when it shined, or the moon “ walking in brightness, and “ my heart hath been secretly “ enticed, or my mouth hath “ kissed my hand, this also were “ an iniquity cognisable by the “ judge; for I should have de“ nied the God who is above
 “ (2).” Nothing can be clearer than this, nor can any thing more fully prove, that this heresy was as old as the Persians make it, who affirm that Kejo- maras, their first king, was the author of their religion; and therefore of old they affected much to call themselves Kejo-

(2) Job xxxi. 26.

nion of the Persian and Arabic writers is, that he either was a Jew, or went very early into Judea, where he received his educa-marfians, or Kejomarthites. But the point they chiefly laboured, in respect to antiquity, was the persuading themselves, and others, that their religion was the religion of Abraham. It would be no difficult matter to shew the probable source of this opinion, which we have also touched elsewhere; but as this work is intended for a body of history, and not a collection of critical inquiries, we chuse to insert here some extracts from a celebrated Arabian history of the religions of the east, rather than to amuse our readers with conjectures of our own, "The Persian kings in general, says this writer, adhered to the religion of Abraham, and their subjects were always of the religion of their prince; there was likewise a chief or high-priest, reputed the wisest of wise men, from whose mandate there was no appeal, and whose sentence was never reversed, the same reverence being shewn to them, as we heretofore shewed unto our caliphs." A little after, he says, "The peculiar doctrine of the magi was the duality of the spiritual nature, which they affirmed to be good and evil, virtuous and wicked, benevolent and destructive; these natures they distinguished, by calling the one light, and the other darkness, or rather, in their own terms, Yezdan and Abriman. Hence it came to pass, that their whole religion, and all the questions of the magi, turned on these two " points, the explication of " light being mixed with dark-

 " nefs, and of light freeing it" self from darkness." Some pages farther, the same author speaks thus: " Though the " magi affirm these two prin" ciples, yet the most antient of " them did not think themselves
 " under a necessity of affirming,
 " that both existed from eter-
 " nity; on the contrary, they " held only light itself existent,
 " and that darkness was pro" duced; but in accounting for
 " this, they were sometimes at " a loss; however, they con" stantly asserted, that they re" ceived these doctrines from
 " wise men and prophets, among " their ancestors; first, from " Kejomaras; secondly, from
 " Zervan the Great; thirdly,
 " from another prophet, whose " name was Zerdusht. The " Kejomarthites insist, that Kejo-
 " maras is the same with Adam,
 " wherein they agree with some
 " Indian and Persian chrono-
 " logers; yet they are contradicted
 " by others skilful in that art.
 " The Kejomarthites also affirm,
 " that their great master esta" blished the opinion of two " spiritual beings, Yezdan and
 " Abriman, acknowledging the " former to be eternal and self-
 " existent, and owning the lat" ter to be produced and cre" ated, and that after this man" ner: Yezdan, i. e. God, said
 " in himself, Unless I am op" posed, how shall it be, i. e.
 " how shall my glory arise?
 " which thought produced dark-
 " nefs, which is opposite to " light;

education under one of the prophets, with whom he lived as a servant; and, emulous of his glory, set up for a prophet afterwards himself ^f. Who this prophet was, is not well agreed; some say Elias, others Ezra, and some again, one of the disciples of Jeremiah. Doctor Prideaux thinks Elias was too early, and Ezra too late; he therefore fixes upon Daniel ^g. Doctor Hyde inclines to Ezra ^h. How true the whole of the story is, is hard to say, since the Mohammedans are all great enemies to Zerduſht; and, if we take a part of their evidence, we ought to take the whole; and then it will stand thus: he quitted the service of the Hebrew prophet, because, having deceived and cheated him, the holy man prayed God to strike him with a leprosy; which accordingly followed: if so, then Zerduſht must have been the same with Gehazi, the servant, not of Elias, but Elisha; and, consequently, the credibility of the whole tale will be destroyed. The Persees in India pretend, that Zerduſht was originally a Chinese; that his father's name was Eſpintaman, and his mother's Dodo. But in this they are mistaken; for, as to his genealogy, we are not at all at a loss, since it is thus set down in the book of Sad-der; Zarataſht was the son of Purthaſp, who was the son of Piteraſp, the son of Hitcheraſp, the son of Thechshuneſch, the son of Eſpintaman ⁱ: hence Zerduſht, being frequently called the son of Iſpeutamen, the Persees in India mistook him for his immediate parent; whereas, indeed, he was only his remote ancestor. He first took upon him the character of a prophet, in the province of Aderbayagjan, which was always the residence of the fire-priests, as we have already shewn. Khondemir gives us this account of his turning prophet: he says, that Zerduſht, from his great skill in astrology, discovered, that another prophet was to arise, not inferior to Moses, whose voice all the world was to obey: he from thence took it into his head, that he must needs be that prophet: upon this, retiring into a cave, and revolving these things in his mind, a

^f ABU MOHAMED MUSTAPHA in vita Gushtasp, apud HYDE rel. vet. Persarum, p. 313. MEGIDI in Zinato l'Magjalis, apud HYDE, p. 315. ^g Connection of the Old and New Testament, part i. book iv. p. 213, 8vo. ^h Relig. vet. Persar. c. 24. p. 314. ⁱ Idem, p. 312.

“light; and then began the “controversy which has since “subsisted between them (3).”
We are informed by the same author, that Zerduſht himself owned Kejomaras to have instituted that religion he came to reform; so that it may pass for a point tolerably well established, that the religion of the Per- sians is as antient as their monarchy.

(3) Sbaristani apud Hyde relig. vet. Persar. c. 22. p. 294.

light suddenly appeared, being no other than an illusion of the devil, who, conversing with him out of the midst of the fire, Zerduſht no longer doubted that he had received the mission of prophecy, but immediately set about a book, containing a system of diabolical doctrines, which he called zend; and, having finished it, he made it his business to go about the world, teaching this new religion, and erecting fire-temples ^k. There is certainly a great deal of truth in what this writer says; but, we presume, his notion of the devil's appearing in the fire, and dictating diabolical doctrines to Zerduſht, is a stroke of Mohammedan zeal, and not much to be depended on. That Zerduſht really retired into a cave, and there studied and composed his zendevastā, is certainly true; and that, in this cave, he gave himself up to prayer and contemplation, imbellishing it with a great number of curious symbols, is acknowledged, and may be proved: but that he was either prompted by the devil, or acted from a spirit of imposture, is what we dare not assert, since his doctrines, if we except his permission of incest, which, however, is no-where found in his writings, and is fixed on him only by his enemies; we say, his doctrines, if we except this, do not seem calculated at all for supporting the empire of Satan: and, if we may believe the divines, and a greater than all divines, the devil is too wise to do or teach any thing which may destroy his own kingdom. We shall content ourselves, therefore, with observing what has not been observed before, that the Almighty had a peculiar favour for the Persians, and even for Darius Hystaspis, the patron of Zerduſht; and spoke many things by his prophets, as we shall prove at the bottom of the page, insinuating his care, that they should not be deceived in the first and principal point of a religion, which, it is agreed, Zerduſht made it his business to fix, beyond dispute (M). How long he remained in this cave, or how

^k D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. Zerduſcht.

(M) To clear the memory of Zerduſht, we shall shew here, first, that the Almighty spoke of and to Cyrus, as of and to a prince acquainted with him the true God; and never reproaches either him, or his people, with idolatry. Thus the prophet Isaiab having, with wonderful eloquence, displayed the power of God, and assured his countrymen, that, after all their sufferings, which their sins would bring upon them, he would yet turn again, and remember them in mercy, and raise up a deliverer for them; which was Cyrus king of Persia; " This, saith

" the prophet, is the God that
" saith to Jerusalem, Thou shalt
" be inhabited; and to the ci" ties of Judah, Ye shall be " built; and I will raise up the " decayed places thereof: that
" saith to the deep, Be dry, and " I will dry up thy rivers:
" that

how many books he wrote there, is not very certain: we are told, indeed that he brought twelve volumes to Gushtasp, each

“ that saith of Cyrus, He is my “ shepherd, and shall perform
 “ all my pleasure; even saying “ unto Jerusalem, Thou shalt “ be built; and to the temple,
 “ Thy foundation shalt be laid.
 “ Thus saith the LORD to his “ anointed, to Cyrus, whose “ right hand I have holden, to “ subdue nations before him;
 “ and I will loose the loins of “ kings, to open before him
 “ the two-leaved gates, and the “ gates shall not be shut; I will “ go before thee, and make the “ crooked places strait; I will “ break in pieces gates of brass,
 “ and cut in sunder the bars of “ iron. And I will give thee
 “ the treasures of darkness, and “ hidden riches of secret places,
 “ that thou mayest know, that I
 “ the LORD, which call thee by “ thy name, am the God of “ Israel. For Jacob my ser“ vant’s sake, and Israel mine “ elect, I have even called thee
 “ by thy name; I have furna“ med thee, tho’ thou hast not “ known me (4).” This remarkable prophecy, which does so much honour to Cyrus, was spoken of him an hundred years before he was born; and surely, if language can prove any thing, the stile of this prophecy will be sufficient to shew, that Cyrus was no idolater. We are very well aware, that there is an expression at the close of what Isaiab says of this glorious monarch, which has been construed in this sense; but we can easily, and, at the same time, fully prove, that it ought not so to be understood; the expression is this: I have surnamed thee, though thou hast not known me. The meaning of which, we say, is this; that GOD gave him the title of his shepherd, and his anointed, and actually employed him as the minister of his will, before Cyrus knew any thing of the matter: but how does this shew he was an idolater, or that he worshiped not the true GOD, though he was unacquainted with the Jewish dispensation, and knew not that GOD by the name of Jehowah? After the taking of Babylon, Daniel certainly explained all these prophecies to Cyrus; and shewed him, that while he believed himself acting only in consequence of the schemes he had formed, he was indeed fulfilling what GOD had foretold of him;

 in all which he was furthered and assisted by the divine power, particularly in his amazing strata-gem for taking of Babylon, by altering the course of the great river, which, in the prophecy before quoted, Isaiab had distinctly foretold, making the Almighty speak thus, That saith to the deep, Be dry, and I will dry up rivers. As soon as Cyrus was acquainted with these prophecies, he readily testified his obedience to Jehowah, and his sincere belief, that he was the only true GOD, as appears by his edict for restoring the Jews, which begins with these remarkable words: “ Thus saith Cyrus

(4) Isaiab xlv. 26. xlv. 1—6.

each of which contained an hundred skins of vellum : but this will be the less wondered at, if we consider, that the antient Persian character took up a great deal of room; and Zoroaster

“ king of Persia, Jehovah, God “ of heaven, hath given me all “ the kingdoms of the earth,
 “ and he hath charged me to “ build him an house at Jeru- “ salem, which is in Judah.
 “ Who is there among ye of all “ his people? His God be with “ him, and let him go up to Je- “ rusalem, which is in Judah,
 “ and build the house of Je- “ hovah, God of Israel: he is “ God, who is in Jerusalem (5).”
 We suppose there needs no commentary to prove, that Cyrus was now acquainted with Jehovah, and was convinced, that Jehovah, who revealed himself to the Hebrews, was the only true God, or, as Cyrus himself styles him, God of heaven. The very king, of whose reign we are now speaking, viz. Gushtasp, knew all this as well as Cyrus; for, in his decree relating to the temple of Jerusalem, we find these words: “ That which “ they have need of, young bul-“ locks, and rams, and lambs, “ for the burnt-offerings of the “ God of heaven, wheat, salt, “ wine, and oil, according to “ the appointment of the priests “ which are at Jerusalem; let it “ be given them day by day “ without fail, that they may “ offer sacrifices grateful unto
 “ the God of heaven, and pray “ for the life of the king, and “ of his sons (6).” But the close of this decree is yet stronger: “ God, who hath caused his “ name to dwell there, i. e. at “ Jerusalem, destroy all kings and “ people that shall put their hand

 “ to alter, or to destroy this house
 “ of God at Jerusalem. I Darius “ have made a decree: let it be “ done with speed (7).” But let us return a little to Isaiab, and mark what God says of himself, after the long description given by him of the power and empire of Cyrus: “ I am Jehovah, “ and none else; there is “ no god besides me; I girded “ thee, i. e. Cyrus; though thou “ hast not known me, i. e. by “ my name Jehovah; that they “ may know from the rising of “ the sun, and from the west,
 “ that there is none besides me;
 “ I am Jehovah, and none else;
 “ I form the light, and create “ darkness; I make peace, and “ create evil; I, Jehovah, do “ all these (8).” It is most evident, that this declaration was made in regard to the errors which had crept into the magian religion, in respect to light and darkness, and the powers presiding over them. That Zerdusht rectified these errors, and expressly taught what is declared in the text, that there was one self-existent Being, author of light, and of darkness, of good, and of evil, is acknowledged by antient and modern authors, by the friends and enemies of Zerdusht, nay, by dean Prideaux himself, who yet loads him with reproach, and never mentions him but by the opprobrious name of impostor (9).

(5) Ezra i. 2.
 xlv. 5, 6, 7.
 & seqq.

(6) Ezra vi. 9.

(7) Ezra vi. 12.

(8) Isaiab

(9) Connect. of the Old and New Testam. part i. book iv. p. 212.

did not only deliver the principles of his religion, but also his own history, and the rudiments of most sciences, therein, as we shall have occasion to shew hereafter, when we come to speak particularly of that book, and of its contents. In the mean time, we need not wonder, that he retired so long from the world, or chose a cave for his abode, since works of this nature require silence and composure. The antient prophets resided much in deserts; that is, in unfrequented places. Epictetus, and other philosophers, had their cells, whither they retired, to avoid the noise and tumult of the world; and they did all this without reproach. And why should Zoroaster's cave be made the strong proof of his being an impostor? We shall shew, that his retiring to a cave was highly commendable, if the instructing mankind may be esteemed so (N).

As

(N) Porphiry has quoted an oracle, which, he says, was pronounced at Delphos, of a very extraordinary nature; it runs thus:

Chaldees and Jews are wise in worshipping
A self-begotten God, of all things king.

These Chaldees were the magi, which we can easily prove from another learned writer, viz. Laertius, who speaks thus (10): "It is said, that philosophy had its original from the Barbarians, since among the Persians were magi; among the Babylonians or Assyrians, the Chaldæans; among the Indians, the gymnosophists; and among the Celtes, the druids." For this Laertius quotes Aristotle; nay, Porphiry himself had the highest esteem for the magi, since he describes them thus: Among the Persians, those wise persons who were employed about the Divinity, and served him, were called magi. Laertius, on the authority of Aristotle, or the author of the treatise of magic, speaks of the manner in which they lived: They refrain, says he, from rich attire, and from wearing gold; their garments are mostly white; their beds the ground; their food nothing but herbs, cheese, and bread; their chief employment is praying to God, and exhorting men to live uprightly. Dion Chrysoptom, the most polite writer among the Greeks, corrects the errors of his countrymen with respect to those magi, in these words: "The Persians called those magi, who were employed in the service of the gods; but the Greeks, being ignorant of the meaning of that word, apply it to such as are skilled in magic, a science unknown to the Persian sages (11)." These magi were not only the scholars, but the masters of Zoroaster or Zerdusht; they flourished long before his time, and he doubtless acquired the rudiments of that knowledge, which he afterwards so much improved, from them. Dion Chrysoptom has very happily set down what from good autho-

(10) In præm. hist. dogm. & vit. philosoph. (11) Orat. Boristhen.

As our design, in this section, is to follow the oriental historians, we think it necessary to insert here what is delivered by rities he learned in relation to Zoroaster. "It is reported, says that admirable writer, that, through love of wisdom and justice, he, i. e. Zoroaster, withdrew himself from men, and lived alone in a certain mountain; that afterwards leaving the mountain, a great fire, descending from above, continually burned about him. Upon this the king, with the prime nobility of Persia, came and prayed with him to GOD; that he was unhurt by the fire; delivered himself in terms, which discovered more than human wisdom, exhorting the people to be chearful, and to offer certain sacrifices, as if GOD had come with him to that place; thenceforward he conversed not with all men, but with such only as were most addicted to truth, and, by reason of their studies, more capable of the knowledge of the gods, whom the Persians stile magi (12)." Having thus learned from an unbiased author, what it was that led Zoroaster to mountains and deserts, let us next see what we can discover as to his employment in his cave. But, before we proceed to quote authorities on this head, let us observe, that, according to all the accounts we have hitherto had of the magi, they were very indifferently fitted to act in subserviency to an impostor, such as Zerdusht has been reported; for they were spiritual people, who sought not power and wealth; but wisdom and truth; they resemble rather the baptist in his coarse cloathing, and his simple diet, than those who are to be seen in the courts of kings, prostituting religion to private ends, and unworthily taking the name of GOD in vain, to gratify the pride of mortals. In our account of the Persian religion, we have given Zerdusht's rule for the clergy of all ranks; and from thence it evidently appears, he thought not of erecting an empire over the consciences of men, for the aggrandizing the priesthood, which, among the Persians, was hereditary; but endeavoured to make his priests superior to other men by the single method whereby one man can excel another, viz. through purity of morals, and improvement of the understanding (13). Such a scheme as this needed neither conjuring nor fanaticism to recommend it; and therefore, prima facie, it should seem, that a man of Zerdusht's character retired to a cave for the sake of privacy and silence, and not to raise devils, or coin lying fictions: these are fit works for illiterate and ambitious men, such as Mohammed was, but not for Zerdusht. It so happens, however, that we have some proof of this great man's employment in his cell. Porphyry tells us, that Zoroaster, first among the Persians, did consecrate a natural cave in the mountains, in honour of Mitbra, the king

(12) Orat. Berisben.

(13) See above, p. 162. in not.

"and

by the Persian historians, relating to the appearance of Zerduſti, when he first took upon him the character of a prophet, and demanded from Gushtasp, and his subjects, the obedience due to a messenger from God. In regard to this, we

“ and father of all ; signifying
 “ by this cave the world framed
 “ by Mitbra, by the other things “ disposed within it, in fit dis“ tances, the elements and quar“ ters of the world (14).” The very learned Celsus, as we find him quoted by Origen, gives us also an account of these caves in these words : “ The Persians, “ says he, in their Mithrian
 “ rites, represent symbolically
 “ the twofold motion of the “ stars, viz. of those stiled “ fixed, and of the planets, and “ the passage of the soul through “ them. To demonstrate this,
 “ they set up a ladder, on the “ ascent of which there were “ seven gates, with the eighth at “ the very top ; the first of “ lead ; the second of tin ; the “ third of brass ; the fourth of “ iron ; the fifth of a mixed “ mass ; the sixth of silver ; and “ the seventh of gold. They “ attributed the first to Saturn,
 “ the slowness of that planet’s “ motion being intimated by “ the lead ; the second to Venus,
 “ on account of the softness “ and brightness of tin ; the “ third being of brass, than “ which nothing is more solid “ or durable, to Jupiter ; the “ fourth to Mercury, because,
 “ like iron, he is suited to all “ sorts of labours, from whence “ profit may be drawn ; the fifth,
 “ because of its mixture, vari-“ ableness, and irregularity, to “ Mars ; the sixth to the moon ;
 “ and the seventh to the sun, be“ cause of the likeness in their “ colour to silver and gold (15).”

 Here is a great deal of philosophy, but no witchcraft or enthusiasm, in these representations ; and if Zoroaster be condemned either as a magician or impostor, on account of the furniture of his cave, what will become of our makers of orreries ?
 We will conclude this very note, with observing, that the most judicious Dion Chrysostom, whom we have so often quoted and commended, knew well the folly and falshood of the Greeks, in what they reported of the religion of the Persians, and of their consecrating horses to the sun (16). They were far, says he, from fancying the chariot of the sun, the most sublime spectacle in nature they were acquainted with, the supreme charioteer, who put the universe in motion, and still guides it.
 Of this subject, not Homer, not Hesiod, but Zoroaster, and the magi his disciples, taught by him, have sung in strains worthy of the glorious theme. But all their discourses are to be interpreted in a very different manner, nay, directly opposite from the comments of our writers.
 They acknowledge, that the director of the universe is inaccessible and inscrutable ; they compare the motions of the sun and moon to horses under direction ; but, as to horses consecrated to them, the Greeks have reported numberless fables.

(14) In antr. nymphae.

(15) Celsus apud Origen. contra Celsum, lib. vi.

(16) Orat. Boristhen.

have a copious relation, written by a Persee, from authentic memoirs of antient times, preserved by the judicious doctor Hyde; the substance of which, as it never appeared before in our language, we hope will be well received, though, doubtless, it stands in need of great allowances, as to the miracles mentioned in it, and other things: however, the fabulous history of the Persians is at least as well worth knowing as the conjectures of western authors on this subject, which are often as improbable, and always as uncertain. Thus then proceeds our author: ‘In this reign flourished Zerduſht the prophet. ‘He, coming into the presence of Gushtasp, informed him of ‘his commission, in these terms: I am a prophet, sent to thee ‘by the most wise God; and this book, viz. the zendevasta, ‘I brought from paradise: also he gave me this cassock, and ‘this girdle, saying, Put on this cassock, and gird thyself ‘with this girdle, that thy soul may be delivered from Gehenna, and that thou mayest find salvation: go also and propagate the true religion throughout the world. When Gushtasp had heard this message from the prophet, he said, ‘But ‘how shall I know, that thou art really a prophet, and came ‘to me from the most high God? for without a sign, the ‘truth of what you say cannot be known; neither ought a ‘religion to be received till it be supported by miracles: if, ‘therefore, thou art truly a prophet, shew us some sign, that ‘I may know, and be assured, that thou art a messenger of ‘God. When Zerduſht heard what the king demanded, he, ‘in compliance therewith, wrought the following miracle: ‘he planted before the gate of the palace a cypress-tree, which ‘grew, in a few days, so wonderfully, that it was near ten ‘fathoms in girth, and full ten in height; and, in the top of ‘this tree, he erected a summer-house. When the king had ‘beheld this miracle, he was convinced; and determined, in ‘his mind, to embrace the religion of Zerduſht. He was, ‘however, advised to call for certain wise men, who might ‘dispute with Zerduſht. This was accordingly done; but ‘they could not convince him; on the contrary, Zerduſht ‘prevailed. These, however, hating him, devised this method for his destruction: Zerduſht had his lodgings in the ‘palace; and, as often as he went out, he left his keys with ‘the porter: this porter they corrupted, and engaged him to ‘be silent, and not discover any thing they did. They then ‘made use of him to gain entrance into the lodgings of Zerduſht, when he was abroad; and, when they had so done, ‘they threw into his wardrobe, put into his book zend, and ‘into his cloakbag, all sorts of unclean and impure things; ‘such as the bones of cats and dogs, and the hair and nails of ‘dead bodies: these they scattered amongst his things. Which ‘when

when they had done, they went out, shut the doors carefully, and returned the keys to the porter. Zerduſht, in the mean time, walked in the ſimplicity of his heart, praifing God; but his enemies conſidered not this. They immediately addreſſed themſelves to the king, to this purpoſe: This wicked man, viz. Zerduſht, is employed every night in diabolical practices; by which, O king, thy heart will be inevitably inſnared, unleſs thou wilt inſtantly ſend ſome of thy guards to ſearch his apartments, that thou mayeſt be certified whether theſe things be ſo or not. The king ſent hereupon his guards to the apartments of Zerduſht, to ſearch them, and to bring all things they found in them before him. This accordingly was done; and all ſorts of unclean things, ſuch as the bones of dogs and cats, the hair and nails of dead bodies, were found in his cheſt of cloaths, his book of zend-evaeſta, and in his cloakbag. The king, ſeeing all this, turned to Zerduſht, and ſaid, in an high paſſion; How is this, thou profligate; and what is it thou haſt been doing? Zerduſht heard his accuſers, and the king, patiently, and without emotion. At laſt, he thus answered for himſelf; O king, all thou ſeeſt, I know nothing of, neither belongeth it to me. Then the king called for the porter; and having examined him, the king threw from him the book zend, and commanded Zerduſht to be ſhut up in priſon. Thus, notwithſtanding his innocence, Zerduſht was thruſt into confinement; which he endured chearfully, ſtanding all day in one poſture, praying to and praifing God, without receiving any ſuſtenance whatever. It happened ſhortly after, that a black horſe, of which the king was particularly fond, was taken in an odd manner, its fore-feet ſhrinking up to its belly in ſuch a way, that the creature fell down to the ground, and could no way be raiſed up. The maſter of the horſe, called in the Persian language, Mib-mard, when he came, as he was wont, into the ſtables, and perceived what had befallen the king's favourite ſteed, he went immediately, and acquainted Gushtaſp. The king no ſooner heard it, than he went in perſon to the ſtable; and, having viewed the horſe, called for the wiſe men who had engaged him to impriſon Zerduſht, and deſired them to contrive immediately ſome remedy for this extraordinary malady of the horſe; which they were unable to do, and confeſſed as much to the king. When Gushtaſp found this, he grew very uneaſy, becauſe he valued his horſe extremely. On the fourth day, the porter went to ſee Zerduſht in priſon: of him Zerduſht inquired news, and why he came not before to viſit him. The porter told him, the court was much diſturbed on account of a miſfortune which had befallen the king's black courſer.

courser. Zerduſht bid the porter tell the king, that, when he ſhould be releaſed out of priſon, he would quickly reſtore his horſe. The porter ran with this news to the king, who, as ſoon as he was informed thereof, ſent for Zerduſht out of priſon, and carried him with him to the ſtable. Zerduſht ſeeing the condition the horſe was in, turned to the king, and ſaid, Sir, this is no eaſy matter, but, on the contrary, a cure very difficult to be performed. One thing, however, I have to deſire, that what you wiſh may be effected; it is this:
 That you believe with your whole heart, that the religion
 I taught you is true, and came from God; which if you do ſincerely, I ſhall be able to reſtore your ſteed; otherwiſe, it muſt remain in the ſtate it is in. Then the king, ſtruck with the awful ſteadineſs of Zerduſht, believed according as he deſired. Upon which the prophet, advancing to the black horſe, ſtroked his right fore-foot with his hand; whereupon the fore-foot immediately withdrew out of the belly of the horſe, and hung in its natural poſition. Then Zerduſht, turning to the king, ſaid, It is neceſſary, ſir, that both your ſons come hither, embrace the religion I have taught, and promiſe to make war on infidels for the propagation of this religion. Then came inſtantly Baſbuten and Iſphendiyar, the ſons of Guſhtaſp, and embraced the religion of Zerduſht, as he had deſired. Upon this the prophet went again to the horſe, and with his left-hand ſtroked the horſe's left fore-foot, which immediately the creature extended in its natural ſtate. Then turned Zerduſht to the king, and ſaid, Sir, it is ſtill neceſſary, that Keytayun, the mother of Iſphendiyar, ſhould embrace this religion. Then Guſhtaſp ſent one of his attendants, with Zerduſht, to the palace; and the prophet, being come into the queen's preſence, addreſſed her thus: O thou, matron of matrons, whom God hath preferred above all women, and raiſed high above your ſex, by giving thee Guſhtaſp for thine huſband, and Iſphendiyar for thy ſon, like whom there is none upon the earth; behold now the king of kings, and thy ſon Iſphendiyar, have embraced, and with their whole hearts believe, the truth of the religion I have taught; it is neceſſary, O queen, that you alſo receive and believe it. Then answered Keytayun, Whatſoever my huſband and my ſon believe, that alſo will I embrace and believe. Then Zerduſht, returning to the black horſe, put up his prayers; and, ſtroking with his right-hand the right hind-foot, it was reſtored to its natural ſtrength.
 Then Zerduſht, turning to the king, ſaid, You ſee your horſe has recovered three legs; it is neceſſary, for the recovery of the fourth, that you interrogate your porter, and get the truth out of him, that the innocent may not be blamed,

' blamed, seeing, if the porter told the truth, then the horse
 ' will fully recover, or otherwise remain in the state it did.
 ' The king thereupon ordered the porter to be brought, and ' caused him to be severely threatened, that he might discover
 ' the truth, as to the scattering unclean and abominable things ' in the lodgings of Zerduſht. The porter, dreading the ' king's anger, most humbly besought him to grant him his ' life; which the king having promised, he then opened the ' whole conspiracy, in these words: Four of these wise men,
 ' who are so much in your favour, that I was afraid of re' fusing them any thing, gave me a bribe, and taking the keys
 ' from me, did all that your majesty has heard and seen.
 ' When the king had heard all that the porter had to say, he ' was extremely sorry; and made a long apology to Zerduſht
 ' for the injury he had done him, in causing him to be so long
 ' imprisoned, without any grounds at all, beseeching him to ' pass by and forgive it. Then the four wise men were ' hanged on a gibbet; and Zerduſht, having lifted up his hands
 ' in prayer, stroked with his left-hand the left hind-leg of the ' horse, which immediately fell from his belly, and rested on ' the ground, as it used to do; so that quickly after the beast
 ' rose, and stood up on all his feet. At this the king greatly
 ' rejoiced, treating Zerduſht with greater honour and respect
 ' than ever, causing him to be placed on a golden seat; him' self, i. e. the king, believing the book zendevaſta, and live-
 ' ing in exact conformity to its precepts. It is reported, that ' some time after this king Gushtasp applied himself to *Zer-
 ' duſht*, and said, There is one thing that I desire of thee; and
 ' I desire it so earnestly, that I hope you will not refuse it,
 ' since, if you grant me this request, then shall I be thoroughly
 ' satisfied, that thou art a prophet sent unto me by the most ' high God. Zerduſht desired the king, that he would ex' plain himself, that he might apply to God for the gratifica-
 ' tion of the king's will. Then king Gushtasp said, My de' sire is this, that, while I am yet alive, my soul may be satis' fied, as to its future state, by beholding the joys of heaven,
 ' that it may be certain concerning them, and at ease. More-
 ' over, I desire that I may know all things that shall pass till
 ' the day of judgment, with the same exactness as I know
 ' things present. 3dly, I desire, that, in all the wars I wage
 ' on account of religion, my body may remain as it is; and I
 ' become invulnerable. 4thly, I desire, that my soul may ' continue to exist to the day of resurrection; and that I die
 ' not at all. The prophet of God, hearing this, answered, I ' will certainly put up my prayers to the Creator of all things;
 ' neither doubt I at all, but that the most high God will grant
 ' what you have desired. But your four requests must be ' yielded

yielded to four different persons, since it belongs to God alone to enjoy them all at once: do you, therefore, consider who these persons shall be; and I will put up prayers, that one of your requests may be granted to each. Then king Gushtasp desired for himself, that he might be permitted to behold his place in paradise, and take a distinct view of all that was therein. He likewise mentioned three other persons, on whom the remaining blessings should be bestowed. Then Zerduht, being satisfied, retired to his own lodgings, and spent the whole night in prayers and praises to God, beseeching him, that, if it were possible, all these things might come to pass. The next day, when light appeared, and the sun displayed his beams on the tops of the mountains, it came into the mind of Zerduht to consecrate the four following things; viz. wine, a rose, a cup, and the kernel of a pomgranate. And, after he had consecrated these by prayer, having the sacred twigs in his hand, he presented the wine to Gushtasp; and, as soon as the king had drank thereof, he fell down, as if in a deep sleep, and continued for three days and three nights in the same position, his soul, within that space, ascending into heaven, and beholding there the joys of the blessed. At the end of three days he awaked; and, going to Zerduht, besought him to pardon his incredulity. Then the prophet gave to Gjamasp the rose which he had consecrated; which he no sooner smelt, than he knew all things that had passed, all that had happened from the beginning, and which were to happen, and which should happen to the day of resurrection. Then Zerduht gave milk, in the cup, to Beshuten, the son of Gushtasp, who, by drinking thereof, was made immortal. As to the fourth thing, Isphendiyar, having eaten the kernel of the pomgranate, had his body rendered as invulnerable as brass. After this, the religion of Zerduht spread, and was propagated every-where, all men readily yielding belief thereto, excepting Argjasp king of Touran, who embraced it not¹.

THE great desire all people have to magnify the princes who have ruled, and the prophets who have taught them, hath doubtless encouraged the Persees to propagate a multitude of strange things in relation to Zerduht. The foregoing long quotation is sufficient to shew the nature of their notions, and to excuse us from making any further transcripts from their books. Let us return therefore to the story of propagating his doctrines.

THE two reigning heresies, before the birth of Zerduht, were zabiiism and magism. The latter was far less gross than the former; and consequently there required more care to keep its professors from going over to the opposite religion; for history informs us, and the experience even of our own times renders it manifest, that the bulk of mankind embrace more readily superstition than truth. Hence it came to pass, that the Zabians gained ground in Persia, and multitudes, especially of the common people, were fallen into wrong notions of the Deity, and into gross errors in their manner of worshiping him, living also in continual fear of the evil spirit, whom they conceived to be the enemy of their species, and the continual disturber of the world. Zerdusht took pains to root out all these notions, and to make the people easier than they had been, by inspiring them with reasonable opinions. He taught them, that the Supreme Being was independent, and self-existent from all eternity; that light and darkness, good and evil, were continually mixed, and in a continual struggle, not through any impotency in the Creator, but because such was his will, and because this discordancy was for his glory; that, in the end, there would be a general resurrection, and a day of retribution, wherein such as had done well, and lived obedient to the law of God, should go, with the angel of light, into a realm of light, where they should enjoy peace and pleasure for evermore; and those, who had done evil, should suffer, with the angel of darkness, everlasting punishment in a land of obscurity, where no ray of light or mercy shall ever visit them; that thenceforward light and darkness shall be incapable of mixture to all eternity. He took great pains to persuade his disciples of all the attributes of the Divinity, especially of his wisdom and his justice; in consequence of which he assured them, that they had none to fear, but themselves, because nothing could render them unworthy of the divine favour, but their vices. Of all virtues, he esteemed what the Greeks called philanthropy, and the apostles brotherly love, the greatest; for which reason he exhorted all his followers to acts of charity and beneficence, sometimes alluring them by promises, at other times driving them, as it were, by threatenings. The credenda of his religion were not numerous, nor perplexed, though, according to the mode of the east, he sometimes made use of parabolic relations; as for example, when he taught, that, on the fourth day after death, the soul came to the bridge Tchinavar, and was there met by the angels Mibr-Izad and Reshu-Izad, who weighed in the balance the good and evil actions of the soul attempting to pass; and, in case the former prevailed, then it went safely over the bridge; if the latter, it was thrown thence into Gebenna, that is, into the region of darkness, where the souls of the wicked are punished^m. That this is really a parabolic description, and not a literal account of what is to happen after death, we suppose appears from the very face of the relation; for it cannot be supposed, that Zerdusht, who was indisputably a very wise and learned man, and who took pains to make all his disciples so, should nevertheless attempt to impose upon them so absurd a thing as this, taken in a literal sense; viz. that a spirit, divested of matter, should travel over a bridge lying across hell, and leading to heaven; and that, after weighing his actions in a pair of scales, the good angel should either lead him over safe, or the bad one push him down: this is absolutely incredible. But that he should make use of these terms to insinuate, that the effects of our good and evil deeds transcend the grave, and either lead us to everlasting rest, or plunge us into never-ending misery, is easy to be understood, and might as easily have been believed. In the book sad-der, which is a compendium of the doctrines of Zerdusht, collected in his own words, this description of the state of the dead is placed in the first chapter; and, in the second, it is thus applied: Men, who believe the religion of Zerdusht, will be afraid not only of great, but of small sins; for, since all are weighed and numbered, and, according to the preponderating of this or that scale, they are to be happy or miserable for ever, whoever thinks of this will be afraid of adding weight to the left-hand scale, and earnestly desire to heap meritorious actions into that on the right-hand; because his all rests on this trial. This is found divinity, and very intelligible, where the mind is unprejudiced; otherwise it is easy to ridicule the soul-supporting bridge, and the action-weighing angels, and consequently to expose Zerdusht, not only as a wicked, but as a weak impostor. But to proceed: he carefully instructed those who heard him, and directed them to instruct all who would believe in his religion, that no man ought to despair of the mercy of GOD, or suppose that it was too late for him to amend. He declared, that though we had a faculty of distinguishing between good and evil, yet that man has no conception of the value which GOD sets on our actions, nor how far the intention may sanctify even a trivial act; wherefore even the worst of men may hope the divine favour from repentance and good works. This he exemplified by another parable, which is also recorded in the book sad-der, and which runs in these words: "It is reported of Zerdusht, the author of our religion, that one day, retiring from the presence of GOD, he beheld the body of a man plunged in Gebenna, his right foot only being free, and sticking without. Zerdusht thereupon cried

¹ E lib. rariss. cui titul. Shah-nama-nesr.

^m Sad-der, part i.

“ out, What is this that I see? and wherefore is this man in “ this condition? He was answered, This man, whom you “ see in this condition, was formerly the prince of thirty-“ three cities, over which he reigned many years, without “ doing any one good action; for, besides oppression, inju“ stice, pride, and violence, nothing ever entered his mind;
 “ and, though he was the scourge of multitudes, yet, with“ out regarding their misery, he lived at ease in his palace.
 “ One day, however, as he was hunting, he beheld a sheep “ caught by the foot in the thicket, and thereby held at such “ a distance from food, that it must have perished. This “ king, moved at the sight, and alighting from his horse, re“ leased the sheep from the thicket, and led it to the pasture.
 “ Now, for this act of tenderness and compassion, his foot “ remains out of Gehenna, though his whole body be plunged “ therein for the multitude of his sins. Endeavour therefore “ to do all the good thou canst, without fear or apprehension;
 “ for GOD is benign and merciful, and will reward even the “ smallest good thou dost n.” These hints of his doctrines, compared with what has been already delivered in speaking of the religion of the antient Persians, cannot but be sufficient to shew the general import of Zerdusht's scheme of religion. As to exterior rites, he altered the old method of burning fire on the tops of mountains, and in other places, under the open air, engaging his followers to erect pyrea or fire-temples throughout all the dominions of Persia, that this symbol of the Divinity might not, at every turn, be liable to be extinguished.
 He gave them likewise a liturgy, which they hold to have been brought to him from heaven; and therefore refuse to make any alterations therein, though the language, in which it is written, is long ago grown obsolete, and is very little understood by the priests themselves. The priests, or, as we stile The magi them, the magi, were, according to his institution, of three of three ranks: the first consisted of the ordinary or parochial clergy, ranks.
 as Dr. Prideaux very significantly terms them. Their duty was to read the holy offices daily in the chapels, and, at certain stated and solemn times, to acquaint the people with the contents of Zerdusht's books, and to paraphrase on and explain them. In these parochial chapels there were no fire-altars, but lamps only, before which their devotions were performed.
 The next degree of their clergy had the superintendency of these ordinary priests, and were to them what bishops are to ours. These too had their churches, in which were altars, whereon fire was continually kept, there being a certain number of the inferior clergy appointed to attend them, who, by four at n Sad-der, part v.

a time, waited constantly near the altar, to supply it with fuel, and to assist such devout persons as resorted thither with their advice, and their prayers. Above these was the archimagus, The archi- or i. e. the high-priest, or, as the Persians stiled him, the mubad magus, or mubadan. Zerduſht himself assumed this office, and resided in the city of Balch, where he governed his magians, and instructed them in all sorts of learning. As the austerity of his own life, and his extensive knowlege, supported him in the high reputation he had gained among his cotemporaries, he recommended, as we have seen in the rules given by him for the conduct of the archimagus, the same behaviour, and the same application to study, unto his successors. These injunctions were, for many ages, pursued by them, and was the reason that they were admitted into the king's councils, sat with him in judicature, and had the education of the heirs of the crown; infomuch that Pliny tells us, in this time, this religion was received by many nations, and bore sway in the east over the king of kings. It remains now, that we give an account of the book of the laws still extant among the Persees, and indubitably written by Zerduſht, whether he was a prophet, or impostor; for, as to the remaining actions of his life, and his immature death, they belong to the reign of Gushtasp, and shall be accordingly taken notice of therein.

Zer- ZERDUSHT's book, containing the institutes of his religion, duſht's is stiled zend, or zendevasta, usually pronounced zund, and book, or zundavastaw, which is not a Persian, but an exotic word, the zende- signifying a tinderbox; its author, in compliance with the oriental custom of giving all important treatises allegorical names, vasta. having pitched on this to express the nature of his book, which was to inspire its readers with divine zeal. He likewise caused it to be stiled the book of Abraham, intimating, that it contained the doctrines held by that patriarch. It is written, not in the ordinary Persian character, but in the old Perfic, called from thence, among the ordinary Persees, the zund character. The very learned Dr. Thomas Hyde proposed to the world the publishing a correct edition of it, with a Latin translation; but, meeting with no encouragement to undertake so laborious and expensive a work, the world has been deprived of the sight of this great curiosity. It was originally written in twelve hundred skins, and consists of one-and-twenty parts, or different treatises, all comprehended under the general title of zend, or zendevasta; which is the reason that we have had, in Europe, so many different accounts of this book, and its contents. For the sake of the people who profess this religion, and who have, notwithstanding, no knowlege at all either of the zund character, or of the language in which that book is written, a very learned priest has taken the pains to make a compendium thereof in modern Persian, which is the book sad-der, so often quoted by us from the Latin version published by Dr. Hyde, and annexed to his impartial history of the religion of the antient Persians. This learned critic is of opinion, that Zerduſht did not originally intend to have made this book consist of any more than two parts, viz. the zend and pazend, resembling the mishna and gemara in the Jewish talmud; the first containing the liturgy and principal doctrines of his religion; the second a commentary on them, explaining and shewing the rationale of them: but, as new adversaries rose up daily, and other occasions required new treatises, Zerduſht continued to write them, and to add them to his zendevajta, which still retained the general title of the volume. Amongst the pieces comprehended under that title, there is one bearing the title of Zeratusht-nama, i. e. the history of Zerduſht, which is no other than his life, written by himself. This, that it may be more generally known, has been rendered into the common Persian by the priests who published the book sad-der ^p. The celebrated Dr. Prideaux, speaking of this book, acknowledges, that the rules and exhortations to moral living are written very pressingly, and with sufficient exactness, excepting only in one particular, which is that of incest; for this, he says, is wholly taken away by Zerduſht, who teaches, that nothing of this nature is unlawful; but that a man may not only marry his sister, or his daughter, but his mother; and he very justly observes, that this is such an abomination, that, though all things else were right in that book, this alone were sufficient to pollute it. But, in support of all this, the doctor does not quote either the book itself, or its compendium the book sad-der, or any other treatise written by an avowed Persee, but the authorities of Diogenes Laertius, Strabo, Philo Judæus, Tertullian, and Clemens Alexandrinus ^q. It is but reasonable, that we should suspend our belief, till we have a decisive account of this matter, especially if we consider, that, in other respects, these authors are frequently mistaken. It may indeed be urged, that incest was commonly practised by the Persian kings (if we give intire credit to the Greek historians); but, admitting this to be so, it is no direct proof, that Zerduſht allowed it, any more than the contrary practice of the Persees at this day is a demonstration, that he did not allow it. As to the rest of the contents of this book, we shall not insist farther on them here, because it would lead us into

° Hist. vet. Persarum; p. 25.

^p Hist. relig. vet. Perfarum, c. 25, 26. ^q Connection of the hist. of the Old and New Testament, part i. book iv. p. 223, & seqq.

too long a digression from the thread of our history; but the inquisitive reader will find, at the bottom of the page, some farther accounts relating to the works of Zoroaster (O).

W E

(O) In this note we shall speak of Zerdusht's writings: and, that we may do this clearly, we will consider them, first, as they are known to the Persees, and oriental nations in general; secondly, as they are known to the Greeks.

The zend-vesta, as we have said in our text, is divided into one-and-twenty treatises, each called by the Persees Nesick; or, broadly pronounced, Nush, i. e. a part. Every one of these treatises has its proper title suited to the subject of which it treats. Thus pa-zend, which is the name of the second treatise, signifies the prop or buttress of the zend, because it comprehends the reasons supporting the doctrines delivered in the first part, called simply the zend; the sixteenth treatise is that called zerdusht-nama, or the life of Zerdusht, mentioned in the text. Dr. Hyde, who, like a generous man, desired that all the world should partake of the treasures he had in his hands, published the contents of this book, in hopes they might so far move the curiosity of the public, as to enable him to publish the book itself. It contains forty chapters, and about an hundred and forty pages; wherein the whole mystery of Zerdusht's character as a prophet, and the methods made use of by him for propagation of his religion, are set forth at large (17). The twentieth treatise in the zend-

vesta is called bizisfok-nama, i. e. the book of physicians, because it treats of the virtues of drugs, and how they may be applied. Thus the writings of Zerdusht contain not only the religion, but the learning, of the magi; and therefore he recommended it to all his successors in the office of high priest, to be perfect masters of all useful learning. As the book zend is the bible of the Persees, so, to express a right or just thing, they say zendaver, i. e. permitted by the zend; and an evil action they call na-zendaver, i. e. not permitted by the book zend. Zend-laph signifies a zealous Persee; but zend-chuan, which, literally rendered, is a reader of the zend, signifies not a common reader, but him who reads it in the parish-church; so that it is equivalent to what the Jews call chacham, and the Mohammedans imam. As to the notion of Curtius, of the magi singing their prayers, it is not, strictly speaking, true, though they have a particular tone of voice proper to the recital of their prayers, in which they agree with the modern Jews, and perhaps with many other nations (18).

As to what the Greeks knew of Zoroaster's writings, it is difficult to say what ought to be believed: Eusebius speaks of a collection of physics written by this great man; and quotes from thence the following descriptions

(17) Hist. vet. Perfar. c. 24. p. 329, 330.(18) Ibid. p. 342.

WE will conclude our account of this extraordinary person with observing, that he is said, by credible authors, to have pre-of God's attributes, affirming them to be the express words of Zoroaster: "God hath the head of an hawk; he is the first, incorruptible, eternal, unbecome, indivisible, most like himself, the charioteer of every good, one that cannot be bribed, the best of things good, the wisest of things wise; he is moreover the father of equity and justice, self-taught, self-existent, infinitely perfect, omniscient, and the sole ruler of nature (20)." Suidas ascribes to him four books of nature, one of precious stones, five of the wisdom of the stars (21). Pliny says he wrote two millions of verses, on which Hermippus wrote commentaries, a treatise on agriculture, and a book of visions (22). But, of all the works mentioned by the Greeks, his oracles are the most considerable, because of them there are still some remains, could we be sure they were genuine; but Porphyry says expressly, that some Christian heretics, boasting of the secret works of Zoroaster, attempted to deceive the world; and, if they believe what they say, are deceived themselves; since these treatises are no better than forgeries (23). The famous prince of Mirandula gave the oracles yet extant some reputation, by the following account of a manuscript in his own possession: "I was, says he, forcibly taken off from other things, and engaged to study the Arabian and Chaldaean learning, by certain books in both those languages, which came to my hands, not accidentally, but, questionless, by the disposal of God in favour of my studies: hear the inscriptions, and you will believe it. These Chaldaic books, if I ought to call them books, and not treasures, are the oracles of Zoroaster, Abenezra, and Melchior, magi, in which those things which are faulty and defective in the Greek, are read here perfect and intire. There is also an exposition, by Chaldaic men, concise, and somewhat obscure indeed, but full of rare mysteries, and curious learning. There is, besides, a book of the Chaldaic theology, with a copious and admirable discourse of the wisdom of the Persians, Grecians, and Chaldeans (24)." Ficinus, to whom he directed this letter, found these books after his decease, but so worn and illegible, that nothing could be made of them. Some of these oracles, which escaped the injuries of time, were first published at Paris by Louis Tillet in 1563, with the commentaries of Gemistus Pletho: the same were afterwards translated, and with the comment of Psellus published at Paris, 1607. But Franciscus Patricius, having greatly enlarged them by excerpts from Proclus, (20) Eusebius, præp. evang. (21) In voce Ζωροάστρου. (22) Hist. nat.

 l. xxvii. c. 21. (23) In vita Plotini. (24) Epist. ad Ficinum.

predicted the coming of the Messiah; and this not in dark and obscure terms, such as might have been applied to any other person, but in plain and express words, and such as could not be mistaken: nay, farther, it is affirmed, that the wise men out of the east, recorded by the evangelist to have come to Bethlehem, and there worshipped our Saviour on account of his star, which they had seen in their own country, were the disciples of Zerduſt (P). Some of the learned indeed, slighting this Matth. ii. 1.

Hermas, Simplicius, Damaſcius, and Arnobius, sent them into the world with an accurate translation of his own. From him our ingenious countryman, Mr. Stanley, took them; and published them with the commentaries of Pletho and Pfellus, at the end of his Chaldaic philosophy, in 1661 (25).

(P) The wisdom of the east was not only a scripture-phrase, but used also by the best profane authors, who knew very well, that notwithstanding the boasting of the Greeks, science came originally from that other corner of the world. It is a common, but no very probable opinion, that they were kings who visited our Saviour in his cradle; tho' they might indeed come from a king, that is, from the king of Persia, to inquire for the Messiah. That they might come, as some have insisted, from Arabia, is true, because Arabia lay in their way; but that the magi came from another country than Persia, in which they always flourished, is what cannot easily be believed: but that these magi, or wise men, went into Judea, in pursuance of Zerduſt's prophecy, is a point to be proved, not by us indeed, who have not seen the zendevasta; but, even without seeing it, we shall be able to justify what we have said in the text, and defend ourselves from the imputation of superstition, if we can but produce probable authorities. Sbaristani, whom we have more than once quoted, in his history of the religions of the east, says expressly, that Zerduſt prophesied in his zendevasta, that in latter times there should arise a man called Osbanderbegha, i. e. homo mundi; which differs little from the title Christ often gives himself of the son of man, of whom Zerduſt prophesied, that he should teach the world true religion and justice; that, for a time, his kingdom should be oppressed by the devil; but in the end this righteous person should triumph, and establish peace and happiness upon earth (26). To this let us add a very extraordinary passage from the travels of M. Tavernier: "They give," says he, "three children to their prophet; and though they have not hitherto appeared in the world, their names are, however, settled. As he passed the river, say they, ab ipso ceciderunt tres seminis genitalis gutta, which are preserved to the end of the world: that God shall send

(25) Vide preface to the Chaldaic oracles, ed. vet. Perſar. c. 31, p. 383.

(26) Sbaristani apud Hist.

relation, have fixed on Balaam's prophecy^s, in order to account for that event; and hence, without doubt, it happened, that

^s HYDE hist. relig. vet. Persar. p. 384.

“ a virgin for whom he has a “ favour, into the same water,
 “ who, per receptionem primæ “ guttæ, shall be impregnated, “ and bring forth a son, who “ shall be called Ousbider; he “ shall appear in the world with “ great authority, and shall “ oblige it to receive the law
 “ of his father, and shall dis“ course with much eloquence,
 “ and confirm what he says with “ miracles. The second, who “ shall be called Ousbiderma, “ shall be conceived in the same “ manner; he shall second his “ brother in his designs, and “ shall assist him in preaching;
 “ he shall stop the course of the “ sun ten days, to force, by “ that sign, the belief of the “ people whom he teaches. The “ third shall be conceived by the “ same mother, in the same “ way; his name shall be Sen- “ noiet-hotius; he shall come in,
 “ to the world with greater au“ thority than either of his bro“ thers, that he may reduce all “ nations to the true religion;
 “ after which shall be the gene“ ral resurrection, when the “ souls in heaven, and in hell, “ shall return, and take posses“ sion of their bodies; the “ mountains, and all the metals, “ shall then melt, and, sinking “ into the gulf of hell, shall “ fill it up; so that the man“ sions of the devils shall be “ ruined. After this great “ change, the earth shall be “ plain and pleasant, and men

“ shall live happily therein, “ praising God, and his pro“ phet (27).” Dr. Hyde ob“ serves very judiciously, that these “ three sons represent the three “ states of the Messiah; his na“ tivity, when his coming was “ published to the world by va“ rious means; his ministry, while “ he continued upon the earth, “ preaching, and doing miracles;
 “ and his second advent, when he “ shall judge the world in righte“ ousness, and his saints shall re“ joice and sing (28). But the “ strongest evidence of this mat“ ter is the testimony of the fa“ mous Abul Pharajius, who writes
 “ thus: “ Zorodost, or Zerdust,
 “ the preceptor of the magian
 “ sect, began to teach in Ader- “ bayagjan, or, as some say, in “ Assyria. He taught the Per- “ sians, that our LORD Christ “ would manifest himself, com“ manding them to carry him “ gifts, telling them, that, in “ the latter times, a virgin “ should conceive without the “ help of man; and that, when “ she should bring forth, a star “ should appear shining in the “ day-time, in the middle of “ which the figure of a virgin “ should be seen. You there“ fore, O my children, having “ notice of his birth before all “ other nations, when ye see “ that star, follow it, which “ will direct you to the place “ where he is born; adore him, “ offer him your gifts; for he “ is that Word which established

(27) Tavern. voyag. tom. i. lib. iv. p. 435.
 f. 31. p. 383.

(28) Hist. rel. vet. Persar.

“ the

that so learned a man as Hornius was of opinion, that Zoroaster might have been the same person. On the whole, we may be permitted to say, that, on a view of what different authors have delivered concerning Zerdusht, and his writings, he stands fairly intitled to the character we have given him of an extraordinary person; especially when we reflect, that his ministry was of no long continuance; according to the most authentic accounts, not above five years; that is, from the time of his presenting himself to Gushtasp, to his being slain at the sack of Balch. But it is now time for us to return to the history of Gushtasp; and of the remarkable events which happened during his reign (Q).

THE

Hist. philosoph. lib. ii. c. 4. p. 80.

“the heavens (29).” This passage is quoted by Dr. Hyde; but there is another in the same author, which he has not mentioned, which we therefore shall, from that excellent author, exhibit to our readers: “The same year Cæsar the emperor sent Cyrenius into Judea, in order to tax it. Joseph, the husband of Mary, going up, upon this occasion, from Nazareth to Jerusalem, that he might give in his name, when he came to Bethlehem, in the way Mary did bring forth a son. The magi brought their gifts from the east, and offered to Christ gold, myrrh, and frankincense. Being questioned on this head by Herod in their passage, they answered thus: A person of great fame among us, in a book which he left us, hath thus admonished us: There shall hereafter be born in Palestine a male child, descending from heaven, whom the greatest part of the world shall obey: now the sign of his appearance shall be this: Ye shall see a “strange star, which shall direct you till it stops, which when you shall behold, take ye gold, myrrh, and frankincense, and offer them to him, and adore him; then return ye, lest great evil should overtake ye. Now, therefore, this star appearing, we come to do as we were commanded (30).” A noble testimony surely!

(Q) The death of Zerdusht was violent indeed, but we cannot call it unhappy, since his religion did not perish with him, which certainly it would have done, if he had been as bungling an impostor as some would make him. A Persian historian tells us, that Argjasp overturned the fire-temples erected by Zerdusht in Balch, and slew seventy priests, putting out the sacred fire with the blood of the magi (31): whether this must be understood literally, or figuratively, it would be difficult to tell, if another historian had not related it more at large: “Notice, says this writer, being given to the king of Turan of certain merchants, that

(29) Abul Pbarajius in hist. dynast. p. 83. apud Hyde hist. relig. vet. Persarum, p. 319.

(30) Ibid. p. 110. (31) Mogjidi.

“there

THE old animosities between the inhabitants of Touran and New war Iran broke out into a fresh war, while Gushtasp sat on the throne between of his ancestors. It is not easy to say, whether this monarch, the inha- or Argjasp, who then reigned in Touran, was the aggressor. bitants of Mirkhond inclines to the former opinion, and makes this a re- Touran and Iran. ligious war, undertaken to reduce Argjasp, and his subjects, to the faith of Zerdust. Be that as it will, Gushtasp, having assembled the whole forces of his empire, marched with them into Touran; and, meeting Argjasp in battle, vanquished him, slew his son in the field, and, before the Turkish monarch could assemble a new army, possessed himself of his capital, and gave the plunder of it to his soldiers. After which, returning triumphantly into Persia, he, on some jealousies or suspicion, imprisoned his son Isphendiyar in a strong castle, seated on the top of an high mountain, called Gbird Kouch, i. e. the round mount: but he had soon reason to repent the ill usage of so deserving a prince; for Argjasp, irritated by the treatment he had met with, raised all the forces of Touran, and, making a sudden inroad into the province of Chorassan, sacked the city of Balch, where he killed Lobrasp, the father of Gushtasp, in his cloyster, and slaughtered Zerdust, with all his priests at- Zerdust killed. tending there on the chief fire-temple, which he likewise overturned, committing all the outrages that a mind, stung with the remembrance of what the Persian king had done in his own country, could suggest^u. Elated with this conquest, he

^u MIRKHOND. hist. sect. 16. LEBTARIK.

“ there were no soldiers left in “ Balch, all of them having “ repaired to the army of Gushtasp;
“ and that his father Lobrasp “ was left alone in that “ city, with such as attended on “ the pyrea, and eighty priests;
“ Argjasp, on this information,
“ drew together an army of fif“ teen thousand men, sending “ his son Kchram before him,
“ and following with all expedi“ tion himself. It is said, “ that, when Argjasp entered “ Iran, Lobrasp, receiving advice “ thereof, came out of his re“ treat, and, putting himself at “ the head of a small troop, “ with them he killed many

“ of the enemy; but in the “ end, Lobrasp, with the eighty “ priests before-mentioned, were “ slain, and the holy fire extin“ guished with their blood:
“ with these priests also fell “ Zerdust the prophet, who “ then resided at Balch (32).”
Hence it came to pass, that Suidas affirms of the Assyrian Zoroaster, that he desired to die by fire from heaven, and advised his countrymen to preserve his ashes, assuring them, that, while they were kept, their kingdom should never fail (33). All which the Alexandrian chronicle refers to the Persian Zoroaster, or our Zerdust (34).

(32) In Shabnama nesr. apud Hyde rel. vet. Persar. p. 325. (33) Ubi supra.
(34) Chron. Alexand. p. 89.

Argjasp defeated by Isphendiyar.

Isphendiyar's stratagem to surprise
Argjasp.

advanced so briskly into the dominions of Iran, that Gushtasp did not think fit to meet him in battle; but chose rather to consider, how an army might be drawn together able to fight that of Argjasp on his return. His counsellors advised him to set his son Isphendiyar at liberty, and to intrust him with the management of the war. Necessity compelled him to take their advice; and he accordingly sent his brother Gjamasp to Isphendiyar, not only to release him, but also to assure him, that his father would resign to him the throne, in case he proved victorious. As soon as Isphendiyar arrived at the army, the Persians took new courage, and numbers resorted to his standard, though they had declined following his father. The young prince failed not to make use of these advantages; and, coming suddenly on Argjasp, defeated intirely all his numerous army, obliging him to retire out of Persia, and to make all the haste he could into his own dominions. After this glorious victory, Gushtasp received his son with all imaginable marks of kindness and esteem. However, he declined putting him in possession of the crown; and, in order to amuse him, observed, that it would be unbecoming so brave a prince to put his father's crown upon his head, while his sisters, who were taken prisoners at the sack of Balch, remained still in captivity. Isphendiyar, piqued at this pretence of his father, which shewed, that he did not think the prince had thoroughly humbled his enemies, immediately determined to undertake a new expedition, that his father might have no excuse left for the non-performance of his promise. With this view, he selected out of his army twelve thousand foot, and as many horse, with whom he advanced towards the frontiers of Touran, accompanied by his brother Bashuten, who was elder than himself. Having received intelligence, that Argjasp was retired to one of the strongest places of his dominions, to which there were three different roads; the one plain and easy, fit for the caravans, but so round about, that it required no less than six months time to reach the place; the second pretty difficult, but so direct, that, by it, a man might reach the court of Touran in a month; and the third, which was hardly passable, lay through woods and morasses, and afterwards over high mountains covered with snow; Isphendiyar, having directed his brother to advance as expeditiously as he could through the second of these roads, he, with some resolute friends, threw himself into the third. They were all habited like merchants, and carried with them jewels, and other curiosities, of great value. The instructions he gave his brother were these; that, when he drew near the residence of Argjasp, he should post his army, with all the silence imaginable, in the neighbourhood of certain meadows, which lay near the city; and that, as soon as he should perceive a great number of fires lighted in that meadow, he should order his horse to advance, and execute the orders which should then be given them. Isphendiyar, and his retinue, making the best of their way, reached in seven days the court of Touran. The prince being introduced to Argjasp as a merchant, who fled from the severity of Isphendiyar, and was desirous of selling his goods in the dominions of Touran, the king received him, and his companions, with all imaginable courtesy, and accepted very kindly the magnificent present which the prince thought fit to make him. This lucky beginning was followed by a train of success answerable to Isphendiyar's wishes; for, in a short time, he wrought himself into the highest degree of confidence with the king, and his principal courtiers. When therefore he was apprised, that his brother, with his forces, was arrived at the place appointed, he invited the king and court to a grand collation in the meadows adjoining to the town. Thither they came in the evening; and, great fires being lighted for dressing the provisions, these served as signals to Bashuten, who, at the head of his horse, suddenly charged the Turks, and made himself master of the city. Isphendiyar, and those who were about him, dispatched, without delay, the most considerable of the nobility, the prince killing with his own hand Argjasp king of Argjasp Touran. Then, putting his sisters, whom he had released out of captivity, into the hands of his and their brother Bashuten, he advised him to retire, with part of his forces, into Persia, while he, with the rest, marched against several Indian princes, in order to force them, and their subjects, to abandon idolatry, and receive the religion of Zerdust; in which expedition Isphendiyar had prodigious success, and returned afterwards into Persia, crowned with laurels. When he arrived at Istachr, he expected that his father would, without delay, perform the promise he had so solemnly made, and so often repeated, of resigning to him his dominions; but the politic Gushtasp intended nothing less. He received his son, as before, with all the tokens of amity and tenderness; but, instead of putting the crown upon his head, he entertained him with a studied discourse on his great abilities, and the laudable obedience he had hitherto paid to all his commands. After this, the crafty old prince complained, that there was still one enemy left to be subdued, even in the heart of his dominions, viz. Rustan; who, having fortified himself in the provinces committed to his charge, absolutely refused to obey the king's commands, or receive the religion of Zerdust. Gushtasp insinuated, that it was necessary for Isphendiyar to reduce this nobleman, before he assumed the diadem, since otherwise he would receive from his father but half a kingdom. Piqued at this this behaviour, the generous Isphendiyar set out for Sigjistan, carrying with him his son Bahaman. On their arrival there, Rustan met him, and conferred with him at first with great civility and respect; but, when the prince insisted on his yielding obedience to his father's commands, and professing immediately the faith of Zerdust, Rustan grew angry, and, from hard words, they quickly came to blows. As they were both men of great strength and agility of body, as well as of high spirit, and unconquerable valour, the combat was long and doubtful. At last it inclined to Isphendiyar; but Rustan, collecting all his strength into one blow, gave the prince so deep a wound, that he died upon the spot, having only time to recommend his son to Rustan, and to desire his brother Bashuten to take care of his body. Both his requests were exactly complied with; Bashuten carried back his body into Persia, where it received the highest funeral honours; and Rustan carefully sent home his son. Gushtasp was inconsolable for the death of so deserving a prince: his grief, however, was forced to give way to the necessity of the state; for the new king of Touran no sooner heard what had happened in Persia, than, raising a great army, he invaded that kingdom, and wasted it without mercy with fire and sword. Gushtasp, having collected as great an army as the time would permit, marched with all possible diligence to oppose him; and, after having encountered, and intirely routed his forces, constrained him to retire into his own dominions. The public peace being now restored, Gushtasp, to shew the respect he had for his son's memory, resigned the crown to Bahaman the son of Isphendiyar, and, according to the example set him by his father, retired from the world to a magnificent pleasure-house he had erected not far from Schiras, a palace of such superb architecture, that, in after times, as Mirkhond tells us, it was attributed to Solomon the son of David, to express its excellence*. In all probability it stood in the neighbourhood of that mountain, which, lying behind the famous palace of Persepolis, is held to be the sepulchre of the antient Persian kings. We have seen, from various instances, that it was a common thing among the Persian monarchs to quit their thrones, when they found their health and spirits decay, and to spend the last years of their life in contemplation. If we admit, that Gushtasp was the Hystaspes of the Greeks, then we may apply what Ammianus Marcellinus says of the latter to this retreat: “Hystaspes, says this historian, was a most wise person, who, boldly penetrating into the inner parts of Upper India, came to a woody desert, whose calm silence was possessed by those Isphendiyar killed by Rustan.

soon

Gushtasp resigns the crown to Bahaman.

* MIRKHOND. hist. sect. 16.

“ high genius’s the Brahmans. From these he learned the true “ system of the heavenly bodies, and their motions, and the “ true rites of pure religion; with which knowlege he returned “ into Persia, and taught it to the magi, amongst whom it “ has, by tradition, been preserved even to this time.” But perhaps, admitting Gushtasp and Hystaspes to be one and the same person, we ought to refer this expedition to his junior years, when he fled from his father into Touran, from whence his journey into India was not difficult. There are some Per- sian writers, however, who give a very different account of this matter; of which the reader will have a clearer apprehension, if he recollects what we cited from an antient Persian historian, as to Zerdust’s promising king Gushtasp to fulfil his extraordinary requests. These historians say, that not Gusht- asp, but his son Bashuten, addicted himself to divine meditations; and that this Bashuten, in conformity to the prophet’s promise, was transported to the mountain Dunbavand or Da- mavand, with thirty of his guards, where they yet live in the most quiet and happy manner; the approach of all living creatures to their sacred retreat being prevented by thick steams of sal armoniac issuing from all sides of the mountain^a.
 Our famous traveller Sir Thomas Herbert ascended this mountain, and passed directly over it, without meeting any such steams. He acknowleges, however, that there are vast quantities of sulphur thereon; and that, in the night, some luminous vapours are seen thereabouts, which, he thinks, proceed from the sulphur^a. But the learned Dr. Hyde is for the old opinion, and is for attributing them rather to sal armoniac;
 but confesses, not only that the history of Bashuten is fabulous, but that some stories of the same sort, related of Gushtasp, are likewise unworthy of belief^b. We may, with tolerable certainty, affirm, that the reign of Gushtasp was the reign of learning in Persia. In his time flourished a celebrated astrologer, whose name was Gjamasp, surnamed, according to the Gjamasp oriental custom, Al Hakim, i. e. the wise, or the sage. That a celebratsuch a person there was, and that he flourished about this time, ed astrolois pretty clear; but who he was, is very far from being cer- ger.
 tain. Some have made him the son of Daniel the prophet^c;
 others the counsellor of king Gushtasp: but the greater number, and those too of the most credible writers, say, that he was the brother of that prince, and not only so, but his confident and chief minister^d. The science, for which he was ^a AMMIAN. MARCELL. hist. l. xxiii. ^z HYDE hist. relig.

vet. Persar. c. 23. p. 306. ^a HERBERT’S travels, p. 112.

^b HYDE relig. vet. Persar. ubi supra. ^c CHALIL SUPHI apud

HYDE relig. vet. Persar. p. 385. ^d MIRKHOND. ubi supra.

LEB. TARIKH.

particularly famous, was astrology; and, from his skill therein, he is said to have predicted the coming of the Messiah. Some treatises under his name are yet current in the east, of which the reader will meet with some account in the following note (R).

BAHA-

(R) Dr. Hyde, speaking of the philosopher mentioned in our text, cites a passage from a very antient author, having before told us, that this author asserted there had been among the Persians ten doctors of such consummate wisdom, as the whole world could not boast the like; then he gives the author's words, to the sense following: "Of these the sixth was Gjamasp, an astrologer, who was counsellor to Hytaspes. He is the author of a book, intitled, Judicia Gjamaspis; in which is contained his judgment on the planetary conjunctions. And therein he gave notice, that Jesus should appear; that Mohammed should be born; that the magian religion should be abolished, &c. nor did any astrologer ever come up to him (35)." Of this book there is an Arabian version, the title of which runs thus: The book of the philosopher Gjamasp, containing judgments on the grand conjunctions of the planets, and on the events produced by them. This version was made by Lali; the title he gave it in Arabic was Al Keranat, and he published it A. D. 1280. In the preface of his version it is said, that after the times of Zoroaster, or Zerdusht, reigned Gushasp, the son of Labrasp, a very powerful prince, who possessed not only Iran, but Touran, and Habaschia, i. e. Ethiopia; that, in his reign, flourished in the city of Balch, on the borders of Chorassan, a most excellent philosopher, whose name was Gjamasp, author of this book; wherein is contained an account of all the great conjunctions of the planets which had happened before the time of this astrologer, and which were to happen in succeeding ages; and wherein the appearances of new religions, and the rise of new monarchies, were exactly set down. This author, throughout his whole piece, styles Zerdusht, or Zoroaster, our prophet (36). That astrology, by which we mean foretelling future events, or pretending to foretel them by contemplating the heavenly bodies, was a science, if we may be allowed so to call it, very early in vogue among the Persians, might be easily proved, if this were a proper place. To say the truth, the very terms in use among astrologers, are irrefragable proofs of it; for they are most of them either Arabic or Persian; and for this reason, Chaldaea, the mistress of our western astrology, was, in antient times, always in the possession either of the one or the other of these nations. The notion of predicting the rise and progress of religions from

(35) E lib. Muej. p. 227. apud Hyde rel. vet. Pers. c. 31. p. 385. (36) D'Herc. beloc. lib. orient. ant. Giamasp.

BAHAMAN, the son of Isphendiyar, succeeded his grandfather Gushtasp in all the mighty empire he had acquired. Before the grand conjunctions of the planets, has been likewise propagated in our western parts: Cardan was a bold assertor of this doctrine, and, if he did not intend it himself, we are pretty certain, that his scholar Vaninus actually thought of subverting the belief of the gospel-dispensation, by pretending that all religions owed their force and predominancy to the influence of the stars (37). The modern Persians are still great votaries to this sort of knowledge; but they distinguish between astronomy and astrology; they stile the former elm-nejoum, i. e. the science of the stars; and the latter este-krag, i. e. the revelation of the stars: they have, however, but one word to express astronomer and astrologer, viz. manegjim, which is exactly equivalent to the Greek word astrologos. Of all the provinces of Persia, Chorassan is the most famous for producing great men in that art; and in Chorassan there is a little town called Genabed, and in that town a certain family, which, for six or seven hundred years past, has produced the most famous astrologers in Persia; and the king's astrologer is always either a native of Genabed, or one brought up there. Sir John Chardin affirms, that the appointments in his time, for these sages, amounted to six millions of French livres per annum; which shews how highly these sort of people are yet esteemed in that country.
we

As to the notions they have of the transcendent skill of the ancient professors of that art, the author, just now mentioned, gives us a singular instance in the history of Alkendi, a Jew, who was professor of judicial astrology at Bagdad, in the caliphate of Almamoum. Against this Jewish astrologer all the Mohammedans had a very great spleen: one, more hardy than the rest, resolved to attack his reputation, and to endeavour to dispossess him of the caliph's esteem: to this end he repaired to Bagdad, and, finding Alkendi in the caliph's presence, he asked him why he took upon himself to know more in astrology than other people. Because I know, replied Alkendi, what you know not, and you know not what I know. This provoked the Mohammedan doctor so much, that he would needs make a trial of his boasted knowledge in the sight of the caliph. In order to this, each drew a circle about himself, and sat down therein, with his books and instruments. The Mohammedan doctor at last took a piece of paper and a pen, and, after seeming to write a good deal, folded it up, and gave it the caliph; desiring Alkendi to give a proof of his skill, by telling what was written in his paper; to which the other, after a little time, answered, You have written but two words in your paper: one is the name of a plant, the other of an animal. The caliph, (37.) In amphibieatr. & dialog.

we enter upon the reign of this prince, it is necessary, that we should settle his name. Mirkhond calls him, as we do, Babaman;

opening the paper, found this to be true. And this adventure spread the fame of Alkendi throughout all the east. It happened there was then resident in the college of Balch a young student, of bright parts, who had been scholar to the Mohammedun sage, over whom Alkendi had triumphed: he was so much piqued at the dishonour done his master, that, as soon as he heard this story, he bought himself a poniard, and took a journey of twelve hundred English miles from Balch to Bagdad, on purpose to murder Alkendi. When he arrived at this last-mentioned city, he inquired the time when Alkendi taught in the public schools; which when he had learned, he went thither, with his poniard under his gown, as if he had been a student come to hear him. Alkendi was in the midst of his lecture when he entered the room; but he immediately made a full stop, and, turning his eyes to this stranger, addressed him thus: I know who you are, and to what purpose you come: your name is Albumazar (the true orthography is Abu Ma Sbar); and you will become one of the greatest astrologers of your time; but then you must lay aside the bloody design which brought you hither, and you must throw into the midst of the school that poniard which you carried on purpose to kill me. Albumazar, struck at this speech, first threw down his poniard, and then himself, at the feet of Alkendi:

thenceforward he applied himself strictly to the study of astrology, and became, as that sage had predicted, wonderfully famous, being known to the learned world by the name of Albumazar of Balch (38). What credit this account may deserve, we leave the reader to judge. Gjamasp predicted, as we hinted in the text, the coming of Christ. A very learned countryman of our own has reported the same thing from Albumazar; his words are these: “In the sphere “ of Persia, saith Aben Ezra, “ there ariseth upon the face of “ the sign Virgo a beautiful “ maiden, she holding two ears “ of corn in her hand, and a “ child in her arm: she feedeth “ him, and giveth him suck,
“ &c. This maiden, saith Albumazar, we call Adrenedesa, “ the pure virgin. She bring“ eth up a child in a place “ which is called Abrie (the “ Hebrew land); and the child’s “ name is called Eisi (Jesus).
“ This was enough to make “ Albertus Magnus believe, that “ our Saviour Christ was born “ in Virgo; and therefore car“ dinal Alliac, erecting our “ LORD’s nativity by his de“ scription, casteth this sign in-
“ to the horoscope. But that “ was not the meaning of Albu- “ mazar; his meaning was “ (saith frier Bacon), Quod beata
“ Virgo nata fuit, quando sol fuit
“ in Virgine; & ita habetur fig- “ natum in calendario; & quod “ nutriit filium suum in terra

(38) Chardin. voyag. tom. iii. p. 203.

“ Hebræorum:

man; and says, that he had two surnames, the one Dirazdest, Why sur-
i. e. Long-hand, because his right hand was longer than his left; named Di- and the other Ardshir, on this account: When his mother was razdest.
big with this son, there came a great astrologer to the court of Gushtasp his grandfather; and, addressing himself to Isphendi- yar, presented him a small basket, which, he told him, was for the use of the son that should be born to him: upon opening it, there was found a vessel full of milk, and a little flour; the person who brought it alleging, by way of excuse, that his circumstances did not allow him to bring any thing better.
Isphendiyar and his wife were so much satisfied with the present, that they took from thence the name of their son, ard signifying flour, and shir milk, in their antient language:
hence it came to pass, that this prince was better known by his surname than by his proper name, being generally called, in the oriental histories, Ardshir Dirazdest, and by the Greeks, Artaxerxes Longimanus. He is represented by Mirkbond as His cha- one of the wisest and best princes that ever swayed a sceptre: rafter.
he was so solicitous for the impartial distribution of justice to all his subjects, that he sent some favourites of his own privately into the courts of all his governors, that they might bring him exact informations of their behaviour: and, when the time of their governments was expired, he sent for them into his presence, and either rewarded and commended their virtues, or else punished what they had done amiss, according to the nature of the offence. In a year after his accession to the throne, he summoned the states of his kingdom, whom he addressed in terms full of tenderness and love: he told them, that he had assumed the regal dignity, not to gratify his own ambition, but to do good to them: he therefore intreated them, if they knew any wrong steps he had taken, or any vices that he had, which were detrimental to the public, that they would freely censure and reprove them; nay, if they held him utterly unworthy of the empire, he exhorted them to depose him; for he said, that kings ought to be public blessings, and that such as were not so ought not to wear the title. The states, after highly commending the king's zeal, and receiving from him whatever they desired, separated, and, going into their respective provinces, carried with them the highest senti-

“ Hebraeorum: That the said “ brew land (39).” The reader “ virgin was born, the sun be- is to observe, that Albumazar
“ ing in that sign, as also we wrote expressly from the Persic “ have it set down in the ca- astrologers, it may be from the “ lendar; and that she was to very works of Gjamasp, which “ bring up her son in the He- induced this note.

(39) Mr. John Gregory's notes on various passages of Scripture, p. 152.

ments of duty and respect for so deserving a prince. Ardshir, or Bahaman, took care to repair all the cities, fire-temples, and public edifices, which, during the wars in Iran, had either been beaten down, or, through the injuries of time, had fallen to decay. This being done, and his empire every-where in a flourishing condition, he thought it a proper time to revenge the death of his father, and to reunite the provinces of Sigjistan and Kabul to his estates; and, to this end, he raised a considerable army, and marched into the territories of Rustan; whither he was no sooner come, than he was informed, that this great warrior was dead; but that his son Feramorz had taken possession of his government, and was marching to oppose him with a great army. The king of Persia, being desirous that the war should have a speedy determination, did not decline a battle, in which he had all the success he could desire, the enemy being intirely defeated, and Feramorz killed upon the spot. He took likewise Zal-zer, the father of Rustan, prisoner, and returned triumphantly into Persia, after obliging the inhabitants of those provinces to acknowlege him for their lawful lord. Mirkhond gives us a very extraordinary account of the death of Rustan, which happened a little before this war commenced: he had, according to this historian, a brother whose name was Chajal, whom he sent to collect his revenues in Kabul, where it happened, that Chajal fell desperately in love with the governor's daughter, who was a woman of most accomplished beauty, and of the rarest qualifications. The governor, observing how much the young man was smitten, made him promise to do for him whatever he desired, provided he might have his daughter. Chajal having promised this, the governor proposed to him the delivering his brother into his hands, that he might secure to himself the absolute possession of his own territories, by putting him to death: to which Chajal, for the sake of his mistress, assented. On his return home, discoursing with his brother, he informed him, that the governor of Kabul, whom he trusted so much, was indeed a very tyrant, and grievously oppressed the people under his jurisdiction. Rustan, highly inflamed at this, threatened to put that governor to death, and to extirpate his family; to which end he assembled all his forces: but his brother, laying hold of the predominant quality of vanity, which was always prevalent in Rustan's temper, persuaded him that his presence alone was sufficient to frighten the governor of Kabul into submission: whereupon he set out, attended only by a friend, and this treacherous brother. As soon as they arrived in the neighbourhood of Kabul, the governor, with a very few of his attendants, came, and made his submission; and, having most humbly besought Rustan's pardon, which Rustan readily gave him,

Defeats
and kills Feramorz
the son of Rustan.

Account of the death of Rustan.

him, the governor intreated him to rest that night at his house, which was but a small distance from them. When they came near its gates, Chajal rode on his brother's right, and the governor on his left; when, on a sudden, the ground gave way, and Rustan and his horse fell into a deep pit which had been prepared for him, and so artfully covered with earth and leaves, that he did not perceive it. Rustan, being apprised of their treachery, intreated one of the governor's attendants to give him a bow and arrows, that he might not be devoured alive by wild beasts. The man, touched with his misfortunes, put them immediately into his hands; whereupon Rustan, drawing the bow with all his strength, let fly two arrows with such dexterity, that he struck the treacherous governor, and his perfidious brother, each to his heart, dying a little after himself of the wounds he received on his fall. Such, if we yield an implicit belief to the Persian historians, was the end of this mighty warrior, the glory and support of his country, and of its kings. But we shall shew, in the note below, that this story of the life and adventures of Rustan must not be understood exactly as they have related it (S). After the reduction

(S) The title of this section is The history of Persia, according to the oriental writers. It is therefore our duty to report whatever we find in authentic historians; but it does not follow, that we must either believe ourselves, or obtrude on our readers, all things contained in them, for matters of fact. We are as sensible, as the most inveterate critics can be, that there is much of fable perhaps in the best Persian historians; and it is not impossible that we may sometimes mistake their meaning. For example; we know that Aphorasiab, king of Touran, must have lived several hundred years, if what we have set down in our history be true; or else, for a long series of years, the princes of that country were stiled Aphe-rasiab, as the kings of Egypt were called Pharaohs, and the kings of the Philistines were intitled Abimelech. But then the same difficulty recurs as to Rustan. His father Zal-xer lived to be carried away prisoner by Babaman, of whose reign we are now speaking: he must then have been near seven hundred years old, and Rustan, who was lately dead, must have been greatly upwards of six hundred: these are incredible things, and therefore we must suppose, that, notwithstanding the Persian historians speak all as of one man, there was a succession of heroes in the same family, who were hereditary governors of the province of Sigjistan, and called, from their famous ancestor, Rustans. Something of this sort we meet with in Scripture, where not only two kings of Gerar are called Abimelech, but both the captains of their hosts are stiled Phicols (40). What renders our conjecture still the more production of the provinces formerly held by the hero we have just now mentioned, Bahaman, or Ardshir, extended his empire bable, is, that the provinces governed by this family took their name; which is more likely to have happened under a succession of governors, than in the time of one man. We mention this merely to prevent a suspicion, that we swallow, without consideration, all that oriental writers have delivered. When we shall have closed our history of the Persian kings, natives of that country, we shall give a large account of the chronology of these times, and make it as intelligible as we can. In the mean time, let us add a few circumstances, which we have not had occasion to insert in the text, as to the family of which we were just now speaking. The author of the Gulistan tells us, that Zal-zer gave his son Rustan this caution: Never despise an enemy, however impotent he may seem at present; for a stream which will scarce bear a straw at its source, grows in its course strong enough to carry away a camel, and its burden (41). We have frequently taken notice of the mighty encomiums bestowed by the oriental romance-writers on our hero Rustan. Of all his exploits, none, however, furnishes them with so much room to expatiate on, as his two days combat with Isphendiyar. These stories were so pleasant in themselves, so agreeably embellished by those who took them for their theme, that they gave no small interruption to Mohammed, in his settling his new religion. It seems there was one Nesser, who had been in Persia about his concerns as a merchant, and there picked up the relation of Rustan's combats with Isphendiyar; he vehemently opposed Mohammed, and laughed at his pretended mission; and, the better to carry his point, he diverted the people with these stories; which had such an effect, that, when Mohammed brought them a new chapter of the Koran, they would frequently cry out, This is an odd story; there is no great matter in this; it is not half so pleasant as the stories of Nesser: which provoked the pretended prophet very much, and put him upon cursing this Nesser violently as an enemy to God, and the true religion (42). It is to these stories of Nesser's, and to the behaviour of the people thereupon, that Mohammed alludes in the following passage of his Koran: “ There is “ with God great reward for “ the righteous. O ye that believe, if ye fear God, he “ shall remove your enemies far “ from you, and pardon your sins;

(40) Genes. xxi. 22. xxvi. 26.

“ his goodness is infinite. The “ wicked have conspired against “ thee, to punish and slay thee,
“ or drive thee from Mecca;
“ but God hath rendered their “ conspiracy ineffectual; he “ knoweth all the designs of “ conspirators. When his miracles were related to them, “ and his commandments taught “ them, they said, we have heard “ them: we had said the like “ things, had we so inclined; it “ is but a song, and a fable of

(41) D'Herbelot, biblioth. orient. art. Zal.

(42) Ibid. art. Alcoran.

pire on all sides. Some historians say, that Kiresh, i. e. Cyrus, was his governor in Babylon; but this is a palpable mistake, grounded on a real fact, viz. the great kindness which this prince expressed for the Jews: some have reported, that his mother was of that nation; however it was, we may be assured, that he had a very great regard for the chosen people, and did them great kindnesses. This prince had a son, whose name was Sassan, a man much addicted to learning, and especially to astrology: whence it came to pass, that either through his own modesty he pretended not to the empire, or was precluded therefrom by his father, on account of his studious life, which that active prince thought incompatible with the duties of a sovereign: however it was, historians are agreed, that he did not succeed, nor did pretend to the succession, on the demise of his father; but led contentedly a private life, though his descendants afterwards recovered the kingdom, as will be shewn in the next period of our Persian history from oriental historians. After a long and glorious reign, wherein he so far extended his dominions, that some will have his surname of Dirazdest derived from thence, Bahaman, or Ardshir, died, and Bahaman left his empire to his wife Homai; whom some writers also affirm to have been his daughter, and who, at the time of his decease, was big with child. The favourite saying of this prince was, That the gate of a king ought never to be shut.

Homai, or Khamani, about five months after her accession to the throne, brought forth a son of wonderful beauty. According to the custom of those times, the astrologers were consulted as to the fortune of this young prince. They, it seems, were unanimously of opinion, that his fate would by no means correspond with his face; but, on the contrary, he would bring great misfortunes on his country as well as himself; for which reason they advised, that he should be immediately de-

^e MIRKOND. hist. sect. 17. D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. Bahaman.

“ old men. Remember thou “ they said, My GOD, if what “ Mohammed declareth be true, “ cause a shower of flint-stones
 “ to fall upon us, and rigorously “ chastise us. He shall not cha“ stise them when thou art with “ them, neither when they beg “ pardon of him. Who is he “ that is able to hinder GOD to “ punish them? They are not “ in his grace, when they hin“ der true believers to enter the “ temple of Mecca; he protect-“ eth only such as have his fear “ before their eyes, but most of “ them understand it not. Their “ prayers are very light; they “ go hand in hand in the tem“ ple, but shall one day feel “ the punishment of GOD be“ cause of their iniquity (43).”

(43) Koran, cap. Alfan, i. e. Of the booty.

Is exposed by his mother.

But found and brought up by a dyer.

Serves and distinguishes himself in the army.

The queen owns him, and declares him her successor.

stroyed. The tenderness of a mother would not permit Homai to follow their counsels; and yet her love for her country extended so far, that she determined, at any rate, to prevent his bringing on it those mischiefs the astrologers had threatened. With this view she caused a little wooden ark or chest to be made; and, having put the child in it, covered him with precious stones, and then suffered the vessel to sail down the Gihon, or Oxus. The floating cradle came, at last, within the view of a poor man washing linen, who was by trade a dyer. He, struck with the novelty of beholding a chest on the water, took pains to draw it on shore; and was mightily surpris'd on finding therein a child with things of such value, not doubting but it was the descendent of some great family. He carried it, with the precious stones which were in the cradle with it, to his wife; who, concurring with him in opinion, that it was the son of some person of distinction, bred it up with as much tenderness and care as if it had been her own, the dyer giving him the name of Darab, from the vessel in which, and the element wherein he was found, dar signifying a wooden vessel, and ab water. When this child was grown up to such an age as required its learning some trade, the dyer would willingly have taught him his own; but the boy shewed a visible reluctancy thereto, and appeared to have a strong genius for war. The good old man, who had brought him up, far from checking his inclinations, strained his abilities to the utmost, to furnish the young Darab with an equipage necessary to his serving in the army, then rais'd for the reduction of Roumestan, into which the young hero readily went. This war was of no very long continuance; but Darab performed therein such extraordinary feats of arms, that they rung thro' the whole army; wherein, though the flower of the Persian army had served, yet none had attained to so high a reputation as this unknown youth. At their return, therefore, from the war, the commander in chief reported such favourable things of him to the queen his mistress, that she would needs see him. Darab, upon this, was introduced into the royal presence, where, after some discourse about the war, and the great things he had done therein, the queen demanded of him what was his name, and who were his father and mother. He answered, as to the first, that his name was Darab; but that, as to his parents, he was able to say nothing: that the persons he lived with, and whom he acknowledg'd for his father and mother, were a dyer and his wife: that the man had taken him out of the water, where he floated in a little chest; and that, from thence, they had given him the name of Darab. The queen, having considered and inquired into this story, own'd him for her son, and declared him her successor, with the general

neral approbation of her people ^f. This princess, all the oriental writers who speak of her agree, had a prodigious capacity, and was wonderfully careful in ordering all things for the good of her people. Above all things, she studied the adorning of the glorious capital of her dominions, Istachr : to this end she erected a noble palace therein, the ruins of which are glorious even to this day, and are the same which the Persians call Chilminar, and in the palace of Persepolis. We will not take upon us to affirm, that these authors are in the right; but we may safely say, that, in all human probability, this palace was built about this time; and the reason which the eastern writers assign for queen Homai's choosing to erect it here, is neither absurd nor incredible: they allege, that Gushtasp having erected several pyrea, or fire-temples, and cut for himself, and for his successors, superb tombs in the rock which lies behind this palace, Homai was tempted to build a royal house in their neighbourhood, that all these marks of Persian magnificence might appear together, and set off each other: also are attributed several other monuments of a royal mind, and a deep desire of fame, such as a multitude of pyramids smaller, but not unlike those in Egypt, scattered throughout all Persia, and every-where overturned by the soldiers of Alexander the Great. This princess is likewise said to have built a city called Semrim, or Semirah: whence a famous Persian author hath been led to think, that the Homai of the Persians was the Semiramis of the Greeks: but in this, perhaps, there is more of criticism than solidity ^g. The author of another Persian chronicle is so far from thinking her either the Semiramis of the Greeks, or so famous a queen of Persia as other authors make her, that he has totally omitted her name in his history of the Persian monarchs of the dynasty of the Kainites ^h. Mirkhond, however, assures us, that she reigned thirty-two years, and then resigned the crown to her son Darab ⁱ (T).

ALL

^f MIRKHOND. hist. sect. 18. D'HERBELOT. artic. Homai.
^g TARIK. MONTEKEBH. ^h TARIKCOZIDEH. ⁱ MIRKHOND.
 ubi supra.

(T) The oriental histories mention various queens, who flourished, and did great things, in their respective countries, and yet are little known to us in the west. If we consider what the Persian historians say of her building the glorious palace at Istachr, we shall find it not so improbable as at first sight it may seem. We have shewn before, from authorities of all kinds, that in the reign of Gushtasp arts and sciences flourished exceedingly in Persia: his grandson and successor Bahaman must have

Darab.

ALL historians agree, that Darab ascended the throne as the son of Babaman, or Ardshir; and that he gave the highest proofs of his royal descent, by his wise and gentle administration (V). His valour had been sufficiently distinguished before have carried them still higher; for he was extremely successful in all his wars, and, after he had finished them, applied himself to the adorning his country with stately buildings, as Mirkbond expressly informs us. That his widow therefore, who was also a potent and successful princess, should endeavour to establish her fame, by erecting so magnificent a pile, has nothing in it unlikely or incredible: she might adorn this new-raised palace of hers with the spoils brought by her immediate predecessors out of Egypt and Syria: and as to the grand procession, which yet appears on the walls of that palace (plate VII. VIII. p. 104.) if one might be indulged to conjecture, why may it not be supposed to represent the homage paid to Babaman or Ardshir by the states of Persia, when he assembled them in the first year of his reign, and submitted his conduct, and even his qualifications for the royal dignity, to their censure? That he did this, Mirkbond affirms; and that they were profuse in their expressions of gratitude and loyalty on this occasion. What more noble transaction could this princess chuse, than this recognition of her husband's right to his crown, from virtue as well as descent, by a generous and wise people? But let this procession be what it will, it may as well be placed here as any-where else; and till the learned, by dint of their inquiries and criticisms, can furnish us with a better account, we may as well accept of this from the Persian historians. As to the modern Persians, they, as we have here before observed, speak very tenderly on this head; and if we bar their tales of king Solomon, and the fairies, have nothing to offer against queen Homai's being the founder of that stupendous fabric, the ruins of which are now called Cbilminar, i. e. forty pillars; tho', if we may trust Dr. Hyde, its old Persic name was Hazar-sutun, i. e. a thousand columns (44).

(V) Darab, as we have already heard, was educated by a poor dyer, or fuller, who took all the care of him that could be expected from a man in his low condition. It is reported by a Persian writer, that the young Darab, being one day at the water-side with his supposed father, addressed himself thus to the dyer: I should be very glad if you would tell me the truth as to my birth; for I begin to imagine, from the aversion I have to this business, and from my contempt of all manual labour, that I am not really your son, as you have hitherto made me believe. Whoever, said the dyer, beheld a ruby, and supposed it dropt from a common stone, might conceive, that a youth of your shining parts was, what till this time you have

(44) Hist. relig. vet. Persar. cap. 23. p. 304.

fore he ascended the throne: he suffered it not to rust after he assumed the royal dignity; for, at the same time he loved justice, and took care to have it exactly administered throughout all his wide dominions, he was likewise a munificent patron of arts and sciences, easy of address, eloquent in speech, and one of the most humane princes that ever swayed a sceptre. On some account or other, he found it necessary to turn his arms on Filikous, that is, Philip king of Macedon, at first by his captains, and, at last, in person, with such success, that Philip, being driven to extremities, was obliged to accept such terms as Darab thought fit to impose: and they were these; that the king of Macedon should pay yearly the sum of forty thousand pieces of gold, by way of tribute; and should give his daughter, one of the handsomest princesses in Greece, to Darab for a wife: which was accordingly done. The very first night that Darab passed with his new spouse, he found her breath so offensive, that he resolved to send her back to her father, notwithstanding that, as some writers say, she was with child. After the Macedonian war, Darab applied himself wholly to the arts of peace, and to the settling such things as were still in disorder, and inventing new methods for giving ease and satisfaction to his subjects. Amongst other glorious acts of this good prince, the settling posts throughout all Persia is particularly recorded; which he executed with such skill, that he had news brought him from every corner of his empire, by couriers setting out regularly twice a day. He was the founder of a pleasant and beautiful city in Persia, on which he bestowed his name, calling it Darabgerd,

Wages a successful war with Philip of Macedon.

Marries his daughter, but sends her back.

Settles posts throughout Persia.

His other works.

passed for, the son of a fuller. Whatever my parts may be, returned Darab, I should be much pleased to hear, without either allegories or metaphors, who I am to suppose myself, and whether that spirit of ambition which I feel in my breast ought to be checked or cherished. Upon this, the honest old man related to him all he knew; which, as soon as Darab heard, he demanded the jewels; and, having received them, went directly to the army; and, applying himself to the commander in chief, told him all that his reputed father had related. The general was at that very time about to give battle to the Greeks; he therefore gave no answer to Darab, but advised him to keep his own counsel, and to serve the queen valiantly in the approaching engagement. Which instructions of his he exactly pursued, and behaved with such prudence and vivacity in the battle, that the general gave easy credit to what he had told him; and, on his return from the war, presented him to the queen, and gave it as his opinion, that he was her son. Which of these stories is true, or which comes nearest the truth, we pretend not to determine.

i. e. Mount Darab; in the middle of which rose an hill, in the shape of a tent or pavilion; and without its walls lay a circle of hills, producing salt of various colours, transported from thence into all the provinces of Persia. He likewise erected another city called Khourch: and, after a reign of four years, according to Mirkhond^k; of fourteen, says another writer^l; at the end of twelve, says a third^m; he died universally lamented, and left the crown to his son (V).

DARAB

^k Hist. sect. 19. ^l TARIKH MONTEKEBH. ^m LEBTARIKH.

(V) It is certainly no bad caution to an historian, that, in his writings, he should forget his country, or rather, that he should lay aside that partiality which a man naturally has for his country. The Persian historians, as we have said in our text, represent Darab moralizing in his last moments, and reading a lecture on the vicissitudes of this world with his expiring breath, closing all with passionate intreaties, that Alexander would use his subjects kindly, and take his daughter Rouschengh to wife. Who can avoid admiring a prince, so truly a prince, even in the fight of death? The Greek writers, on the other hand, make Darius moralize too; but then it is in favour of their hero: he was so struck with the virtues of the Macedonian, that he yielded to him his sceptre rather with admiration than disgust. Let us hear what Plutarch puts into the mouth of Darius on this subject, and we shall be constrained to own, that the desire of making all facts contribute as far as possible to the glory of one's country, is not peculiar to Persian writers. Plutarch, having long expatiated on the virtues of Alexander, tells us, that Darius was a long time of opinion, that he owed his successes to fortune; but, when he understood the truth, he said, Well, I do not yet perceive the condition of the Persians so deplorable; since the world can never tax us now with imbecillity or effeminacy, whose fate it was to be vanquished by such a person. Therefore my prayers shall be to the gods for his prosperity, and that he may still be victorious in war, to the end that in well-doing I may surpass Alexander. For my emulation and ambition leads me, in point of honour, to shew myself more cordial and friendly than he. If then the fates have otherwise determined of me and mine, O Jupiter, preserver of the Persians, and you his equal deities, to whom the care of kings belongs, hear your suppliant, and suffer none but Alexander to sit upon the throne of Cyrus (45). One may safely say, there is as just ground to suspect this passage of forgery, as any of the romantic stories in the Persian authors. Darius worshiped no god but the true God; he was utterly unacquainted with the Jupiter of the Greeks; and it does not appear, that, even after Alexander conquered Persia, he established

(45) Plutarch. de fortuna Alexandri.

DARAB the second, or the younger, surnamed Darab Ku-Darab II. chek, came very young to the crown, and, what was much worse, came to it without any of the qualities of a prince. He was of an ill disposition, haughty, brutal, false, and cruel; properties which rendered him in a short time hateful to his people, and obnoxious to his neighbours. The Persians, unused to such treatment, entered into private negotiations with Ascander the son of Filikous, that is, Alexander the Great the son of Philip, whom many of the Persian writers believe to have been the son of Darab the first by the daughter of Filikous, whom he sent back because of her offensive breath; and persuaded him to enter Persia with an army, promising to join him as soon as he arrived with a force sufficient to protect them, and to put him in possession of an empire, of which they held Darab to be unworthy. As a pretence for making war, they advised Ascander to refuse payment of the tribute which his father had agreed to send annually into Persia; and with these negotiations the king of Macedon readily fell in. Darab, finding that Ascander did not send his tribute as usual, sent an embassador to demand it; to whom Ascander answered, that those who paid tribute in his country were dead. But others say, that the pieces of gold, in which the tribute was payable, being called by a name, which signified at once a piece of corn and an egg, Ascander answered Darab's embassador in derision, when he demanded a mighty sum of gold for the tribute in arrear, that the bird which had laid those eggs was flown into another world, alluding to his father's death, who had burdened his subjects with this tribute. This answer terribly provoked Darab, who, to shew at once his resentment and contempt of so weak an enemy, sent a second embassador with an harsh message, accompanied with a present more expressive of his master's sentiments, than any speech or letter could have been. This present was a little casket, containing a dibble or planting-stick, a bag full of small stones, and another full of small coin; the first to intimate that he was young and inconsiderate, and that he had better employ himself in his gardens, the superstitions of the Greeks there. That Darius might commend his kingdom, or his daughter, to Alexander, or that he might intreat him to use his subjects well, is credible; but that Darius fell in love with the virtues of an enemy, who came unprovoked to lay waste his empire, is a stroke of Greek eloquence, which may please us well enough in an oration, but can hardly be digested for history. We must therefore bear with the Persians as well as the Greeks, seek truth in the writings of the one as well as the other, receive her kindly as oft as we find her, and not charge one people more than another, with concealing or disguising her, to serve a turn.

Ascander enters Asia.

Reduces the province of Ghilan.

Defeats Darab in a pitched battle.

than in matters of state; the second shewing the power and strength of the Persian nation; and the third their riches: the whole implying, that it was a rash, imprudent thing for such a petty prince as him to oppose so great and powerful a monarch. However, this ambassador, with his present, found Ascander on the point of going into the field; and had therefore no opportunity of carrying back to his master any answer. The troops of the king of Macedon were not very numerous; but they were all chosen men, such as were valiant in their persons, and, at the same time, inured to hardships. On his entering Asia, he met with little opposition, partly through the hatred which the people had conceived against Darab, and partly from the generosity of Ascander's behaviour, who treated them not as enemies, but subjects. When he arrived in Armenia, he received a letter from Darab, wherein that monarch pretended great concern for his welfare, advised him not to hazard a battle, but rather to consent to a peace while it was yet in his power; adding some menaces at the close. Ascander returned him for answer, that empires were bestowed by God alone, who changed them as he thought proper. After this, he continued his march till he entered the province of Aderbayagjan, where he defeated one of Darab's captains, who endeavoured to oppose his passage; and, having done this, he advanced into Ghilan. This province, according to Mirkhond, was, in old times, a flourishing kingdom, called by its inhabitants Endsafet, i. e. the White Indies, in allusion to the beauty of the country, which is far preferable to that of the Indies properly so called; its situation also being remarkably happy, by reason of the Caspian sea on one side, and their easy correspondence with Tartary, Persia, and Armenia, all lying round them. This country Ascander quickly subdued. From thence he marched into the heart of Persia; where, in the province properly called by that name, Darab met him with a prodigious army. After an obstinate and bloody battle, Ascander carried the victory; and Darab was forced to fly, leaving his camp, his wives, and his daughters, in the power of the victor. In their flight, the Persians met with a river, wherein many entering heedlessly, were drowned. At last a ford was discovered, through which Darab, attended by the principal persons in his army, passed; but the soldiers, who followed him, crowding each other, the weakest were thrown down, and perished miserably in the water. As soon as the king was come to a place of safety, he sent once more ambassadors to Ascander to treat of peace, offering, in case he would send back his wives and daughters, and retire with his troops back to Greece, to renounce all right of tribute, and make some other concessions. At the same time that he proposed this treaty, he dispatched ambassadors also to the kings of India and Macherek, intreating them to yield him assistance, that he might be able to drive the Greek out of his dominions; which they furnished with such readiness, that, in a short time, he had an army on foot more numerous and potent than that which he had lost. As for Ascander, he treated the offers made him by Darab with derision, making all the haste he could to engage the Persian forces a second time, notwithstanding he was well informed of the great reinforcements they had received. It was not long before he brought them to a battle, Gains an- in which the Greek gained another complete victory, Darab other com- flying, with a few of his captains, to a strong fortress, where, plete vic- before he could well recollect himself, some of his own sub- tory. jects most treacherously put him to death; that is, they gave Darab him several mortal wounds with their poniards, and then fled murdered to the camp of Ascander, leaving their unhappy prince welter- by his own ing in his blood. Ascander no sooner received the news, than subjects. he went with the utmost expedition to Darab's fortress, and found him in his last agonies; which sight so touched the Greek, that, melting into tears, and holding up his hands to heaven, he protested he had neither knowlege of, nor pleasure in, so execrable a deed. The dying king expressed great satisfaction thereat, assured him that he thoroughly believed all that he said, besought him to chastise the traitors by whose hands he died, and intreated him to espouse his daughter Rouschengh, and not to put the several provinces of the empire under the direction of strangers; with all which Ascander promised to com- Ascander's ge- ply. Then Darab, after making many pitiful complaints of nerous be- the misery of human life, and the inconstancy of fortune, all haviour. which are repeated by Mirkbond, yielded up the ghost, after a reign of fourteen years. Thus far we have followed, for the most part, the author last-mentioned (W). The reader might

(W) An author informs us any of the Persian lords, to whom he had given the direction of provinces. It is very certain, that this circumstance is not, strictly speaking, agreeable to truth: Aristotle neither accompanied Alexander in this expedition, nor took upon him to dictate to him in matters of state, except in general terms; otherwise it is not at all improbable, that he would have given him the advice mentioned by

(46) Jabia al Casvini in Lebtarikh.

this might very well expect, that we should here put an end to this section, especially since he has already seen the history of Persia, according to the Greek writers, concluded at the death of Darius. But so it is, that, in order to pursue the theme laid down in the title of this section, we are bound to carry on our history to the death of Alexander; for, as we have shewn before, the oriental writers, in order no doubt to save the credit of the Asiatics, have pretended, that the empire of Iran, with its dependencies, which were then very great, came into the hands of Alexander, not so much by conquest, as by right. In this light therefore, Alexander was the last monarch of the dynasty of the Kainites, and consequently his reign ought as much to be taken notice of here, as the reigns of any of his predecessors ^P.

Alexander.

ALEXANDER, son of Philip king of Macedon, is, by the Persian writers, stiled Islander Ben Filukous, which signifies the same thing; only they pretend, that it was a kind of surname bestowed on him for the following reason: they will have it, that he was the son of Darab the first by the daughter of Filikous, whom he sent home because of her nauseous breath; but that Philip bringing him up as his own son, and leaving to him the kingdom, he called himself, out of gratitude, Alexander the son of Philip, though he put in his claim to the kingdom of Persia as heir to Darab his father (X). The oriental

^P MIRKHOND. sect. 20, 21. D'HERBELOT. biblioth. art. Dara, Escander.

this author, since it would evidently have contributed to the keeping the people quiet and easy; and would also have been very conformable to the temper of Alexander, who, when in a right frame of mind, always professed a generous regard for mankind in general, and a desire of behaving as an universal parent towards those over whom, as an universal monarch, he sought the power of ruling; at least, this is the idea Plutarch (47) would give us of him, and of Aristotle, who, though a philosopher, was a great politician, and had perhaps better conceptions of this conqueror's intentions, than most of the writers who have taken upon them, not only to record, but to criticize his actions.

(X) The history of Alexander the Great has not only been intermixed with fables by the Persian writers; the eastern authors in general, even those most esteemed, abound with very extraordinary circumstances relating to that conqueror. Joannes Malela, a very celebrated writer, to whom we are indebted for a very curious history of the Constantinopolitan emperors, hath given us some strokes in his ac-

(47) De fortuna Alexandri.

oriental writers in general bestow another surname upon him, viz. that of Dhoulcarnein, or rather Dulcarnein, which signifies lite-count of Alexander, which do not very well agree with what the Greek writers have delivered, though he follows them in the main: for example, he makes Roxana the daughter of Darius, in which he joins with the Persian historians, who, as we have seen, allege, that the emperor of Persia, in his last moments, intreated Alexander to marry his daughter Rouschengb; whereas Arrian makes Roxana the daughter not of Darius, but of Oxyartes; but this is a small matter: we have in the same author a story of some length, which is quite in the oriental taste: "It was the custom, says he, of Alexander the Great, in the expeditions he made after the conquest of Persia, to go in disguise with such ambassadors as he sent to the courts of neighbouring princes, that in this situation he might make such observations as might facilitate his designs. Of this, it seems, Candace, queen of the inner or higher Ethiopia, had notice; whereupon she made strict inquiry as to the form and presence of this conqueror. The result of this was, that we were told he was low in stature; had large broad teeth; some of which stood out; that of his eyes, one was of a light grey, the other quite black; which marks she carefully remembered. When therefore Alexander appeared with his ambassadors in her presence, she instantly singled him out, addressing herself to him in these words: "You, O Alexander, have been too wise for all the world, and yet one woman has been too wise for you. To which he replied, I therefore grant you, and your subjects, my protection, as a reward for your extraordinary capacity; I also accept you for a wife. To which Candace readily yielded. After this marriage, Alexander went into Ethiopia, and several other countries (47)." If we were critically to inquire into the origin of such stories, we should perhaps find it no difficult thing to shake off all romantic circumstances, and leave only the naked truth; but the compass of these notes neither admits of such disquisitions, nor indeed does the nature of this work allow them. Our present business is to shew what oriental writers have said of affairs mentioned in the text; and this therefore leads us to recite what is recorded by Abul-Pharajius. This celebrated historian calls Nebuchadnezzar by the name of Bochtanser, as the Persian writers do; and, in his short account of the Persian kings, preserves exactly the names recorded by Mirkbond; we mean the latter race of kings, the descendants of Gushtasp, who succeeded after the Greek power ceased to have dominion in Persia: he calls the last king of Persia Darab, the son of Darab; of Alexander he speaks thus: "Alexander, the son of Philip, literally with two horns, in allusion to the two ends of the world, the east and the west. Of the first nothing can be said with “reigned six years after the “death of Darius, having also “reigned six years before his “death. He subdued many “nations; so that his domi“nions extended even to In- “dia, and the frontiers of Cbina.

(47) Chronographia, p. 449.

 “He was called Dhul-Kharnain, “i. e. two-horned, because he “seemed to have passed from “one horn of the sun to the “other, i. e. from west to east.
 “Five-and-thirty kings he slew,
 “and twelve cities he founded;
 “two of these in the province “of Chorasán, viz. Hera and “Marwa; one in the region “Alfogd, viz. Samarchand; and “in Egypt, Alexandria. When “he returned out of India, he “went to Babylon, where he “died of poison; and his body “being put into a chest of gold,
 “it was borne on the shoulders “of kings and nobles to the “Egyptian Alexandria, where “it was interred. It was Alex- “ander, who began the wall Ya- “juji, which was composed of “stone and iron, the iron being “let into the stone, to fasten it “by the help of fire, each of “the stones being twelve cubits
 “in length, and eight broad.
 “This wall, when it was finish“ed, came down to the place “called Babo l’Abwab, in the “valleys of the region of Xaph- “jak, from whence it was car“ried over and through the “mountains, as far as the sea
 “of the Greeks; nor were there “wanting many of the Persian “kings, who, to defend their “dominions from the incur“sions of the Turks, sought to “find the foundations of this “wall. At last they were found “by Yazdegerd, the son of Bab- “ram Jur, who began to carry “on the work, but did not live

 “to see it finished; several suc“ceeding kings prosecuted the “same design, but none of them
 “with effect, till God rendered
 “it easy to Chosroes Nushervan, “who built it strongly, uniting “it to the mountains, and at “last brought it down to the “sea, placing iron gates at the “end, so that an hundred men “were then able to defend what “would otherwise require an “army of an hundred thousand “(48).” Of this wall, as it “nearly concerns the history of “Persia, it is necessary, that we “should give some further ac“count. The famous Abu l’Ghazi “Baliader Khan of Khovarazm, “in his genealogical history of “the Tartars, has given us the “following account of it:—
 “Those of Kitay have built a “great wall to cover their coun“try, in which there are two “iron gates for the passage of “the merchants, and other tra“vellers. This wall is called “Sat in Arabic, which signifies “fortress; in the antient Turk- “ish language it is called Turk- “urga; and, in the language “of Kitay, Ungu. Alexander
 “the Great caused a like wall
 “to be raised to cover the fron“tiers of his dominions; but it “was composed of all sorts of “metals. His design, by this “wall, was to hinder the na“tion of Jadsutz-Madzuth, i. e.
 “of Gog and Magog, from car-

(48) Histria dynastarum, p. 97.

with certainty, or even with probability. To the second the eastern writers, and especially the Persian historians, pay great honours, and tell a multitude of things concerning him, which are not to be met with in the Greek or Latin historians: for example, they tell us, that this monarch, being asked why

“ rying their ravages into the “ lands under his dominion, “ where they had done great “ mischief in times past. ’Tis “ a general tradition with the “ Tartars, that those people “ have the muzzle of a dog;
 “ and that this wall being made “ up of all sorts of metals, they “ did all in their power to make “ a passage through it by dint “ of licking, but they could “ not succeed; that neverthe“ less, before the day of judg“ ment, they shall come and lick “ their way through the wall;
 “ and that then they shall do a “ great deal of mischief in the “ world. Nausbir Wanadill, sul“ tan of Samachy, caused, in “ like manner, a wall of earth “ to be built round about his “ kingdom (49).” On this pass“ age the ingenious editor of that “ curious work has added the fol“ lowing remarks: “ The remains “ of this wall, which the Persians
 “ pretend their king Naw-shir- “ wan caused to be drawn from “ the Caspian to the Black sea, “ are at this day to be seen up-
 “ on the confines of the pro“ vince of Shirman and Geor- “ gia: it begins at the higher “ town of Derbend, and extends “ thence north-westward across “ the mountains of Georgia to“ wards the Black sea. These “ remains are every-where three “ feet thick, but its height is “ very unequal; for in some “ parts it is still six and seven “ feet high, in others only one “ or two, and in some places it “ is quite beaten down. It ap“ pears at first sight to be built “ of stone; but, when one comes “ to examine it near, it proves “ to be only a kind of petrified “ earth, sand, and shells, which “ has formed so solid a body,
 “ that there is no free-stone “ better than it: and it is “ on this account that our “ author thinks it might be “ called a wall of earth. The “ late emperor of Russia, in his “ Persian expedition, had the “ curiosity to go see the re“ mains of this wall, so far as “ the situation of the country,
 “ and his affairs, would permit “ him; and he could not but “ admire the solidity of that “ composition, which he found “ every-where so exceeding “ hard, that there was no break“ ing off any pieces of it, with“ out employing a good deal of “ strength. He found also, some “ leagues within the mountain,
 “ a skirt of it, which seemed to “ be intire, and was about fif“ teen feet high. In all pro“ bability, this wall had stood “ intire to this day, if it had “ nothing to fear but time; but “ the hands of men which built “ it, have also destroyed it;
 “ and most of the towns, bo“ roughs, and villages of the “ countries thereabouts are built “ with the ruins of this wall
 “ (50).”

(49) Genealog. hist. of Tartars, vol. i. p. 42. (50) Ibid. vol. ii. p. 722.

he paid greater honours to his tutor than to his father, answered, that it was but just, because his father made him descend from heaven on earth; whereas the instructions of his master had made him rise from earth to heaven^r. One day he said to a counsellor of his, who had been long about his person, "I am not satisfied with your service for this reason: I know that I am a man, and that, as a man, I am liable to errors and mistakes; for which you never have reprov'd me. If this happened for want of perceiving them, then you must be ignorant, and unworthy of your office; but, if you did know them, and yet were silent, it was treason^s." It is likewise reported of him, that, to make an experiment of a courtier's temper, he removed him from an higher to a lower office, and afterwards took occasion to ask him, how the latter agreed with him, and how he brought himself to discharge its functions. "Very well, answered the courtier, since it is not any office or dignity that does honour to a man, but the man that does honour to it; since every post requires sense and honesty to execute it well; and he who possesses these, cannot fail to discharge his duty with reputation." Alexander, having heard this, commended him highly, restored him to his former employment, and gave him a great reward^t. Somebody wondering, in the presence of Alexander, at his acquiring so young so large an empire, and adding, it was still stranger he preserved it; he thereupon turned about, and said, "By two maxims I have done all this: I have taken care to treat my enemies so well, that they have found it their interest to become my friends; while, on the other hand, my care of my friends has been such, as to raise, out of gratitude, a double affection for my service." Khondemir the famous historian, speaking of Alexander the Great, informs us, that a person in a very bad apparel presented him one day a petition admirably well penned. The king, having read it with pleasure, and much admiring both the thoughts and the stile, looked next on the person of the man, and then answered him thus: "Friend, if you had taken care to appear before me in an habit as neat and decent as that in which you have cloathed your thoughts, I should have been much better pleased with you than I am." To which the man readily answered, "Your servant has received from nature that capacity of speaking and writing, which you are pleased to commend; but it is to you, great monarch, who are so much famed for your bounty and generosity, that he must be indebted for such a garment, as may render him worthy

^r Vit. RABIALAKIAR. ^s HAFEZ. in Baharistan. ^t MOR-ANNABI apud D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. Escander.

“ of your regard.” Alexander was so well pleased with the modesty and justice of this answer, that he ordered a magnificent habit to be brought, and, with a considerable sum of money, gave it to this wise man in necessity, whose learning till then had left him in rags. In the nighiaristan, i. e. a book so called, the word signifying literally a gallery, or place to walk in, we are told, that a certain flagrant rebel being brought bound hand and foot into the presence of Alexander, that monarch generously restored him to his freedom; which surprising those about him, one of his favourites had the boldness to say, “ Sir, if I were in your place, I would not have extended mercy to such a man:” “ And I (replied Alexander), who am not in yours, have pardoned him.” Then, after a short silence, he added, “ I the more readily pardon my enemies, because there is no comparison between the pleasure one tastes in an act of clemency, and in an act of vengeance.”

Khondemir, speaking of the death of Alexander, assures us, that, finding his last moments approach, he wrote to his mother two verses to console her, to the purport following: Your son, after having counted some moments of life, is delivered to death. He is gone like a flash of lightning, and has only left behind him matter of discourse ^u. It may be supposed, that the intent of these verses was to put his mother in mind, that, as human life, so human glory, was a mere nothing; and that therefore she ought not to grieve at his being snatched so soon from an empire so lately acquired, since, if he had lived longer, it would have been of no great consequence to himself, and would have furnished only more matter of speculation to those who amuse themselves with repeating the actions, and sometimes censuring the conduct, of others. On what authority these stories are grounded, it is difficult to say. They are chiefly recorded by moral and political writers, who aim rather at instructing men by paraphrasing on remarkable actions, and wise sayings, than at delivering a dry detail of facts, which, without such reflections, instruct very little. A Persian author of great genius hath related a remarkable story of the hero we are now speaking of, which is, in all probability, founded on what the Greeks tell us of his sparing Thebes, because it gave birth to Pindar. The Persian story runs thus: Alexander having issued orders, after the reduction of a very strong place, that it should be given up to the mercy of his soldiers, some of his courtiers informed the king, that there was in this place a philosopher of great name, who deserved his majesty's notice. The king ordered, that he should be immediately sent for. When he appeared, it so happened, that he made but a very indifferent figure : upon which Alexander, turning to those who had sent for him, said, with a smile of contempt, "What strange figure have you brought me here?" which so piqued the philosopher, that he repeated immediately the following lines, which he made upon the spot :

^u D'HERBELOT, biblioth. orient. art. Escander.

*O prince ! of manners void, though great in fame,
Why shouldst thou slight my person, though uncouth ?
Dost thou not know, that man's exterior form
Is but the scabbard of th' enliv'ning mind ?
Why shouldst thou judge then of the weapon's edge,
When yet you've nothing seen, except the case ?*

He added to this poetical reproof the following words in prose :
 " One may say of a man unindued with virtue, that his body
 " is no better than a prison ; since the soul must find itself so
 " penned up therein, that any other confinement would seem " liberty in comparison thereof. The vicious man is tortured " continually ; there is no occasion for an executioner and
 " guards to punish or distress him : the very skin, which covers
 " his body, is at the same time the unsurmountable wall of " a perpetual prison." The same philosopher added, " There " is nothing more unreasonable than to envy others those gifts
 " which GOD and nature have bestowed upon them. The " bosom of the envious man is continually full of anger and " spleen against his Creator : he thinks every thing amiss
 " which is given to others, and at the same time covets
 " whatever is not designed for him. As it is thus the custom " of the envious to oppose constantly the conduct of him
 " who governs the world with infinite wisdom, so the mouth,
 " that thus murmurs against Providence, deserves no other
 " answer, than to be filled with earth. One of this disposi" tion exclaims at every thing he sees in the hands of his " neighbour, For what reason should this man have more than
 " I ?" At these words he stopped. But Alexander, admiring the boldness as well as prudence of the man, bad him go on ; assuring him, that he took all that he said in good part. The philosopher, on this, proceeded in his harangue : " Wise men
 " (continued he) are liberal of their wealth, and give part of
 " it to their friends while they are alive ; but the covetous
 " are such fools as to fatigue themselves in laying up riches
 " for their enemies. The railleries thrown out by the great
 " against such as are in low condition, tarnish the lustre of " their high qualities, and take off that deference, which " otherwise would be paid them. Whoever wearies himself " with striking those who dare not strike again, will be easily
 " beaten, when he meets one who dares oppose him ; and he

“ who puts to the sword without pity, will one day feel, without pity, the edge of a sword.” Alexander at this stopped him, revoked his resolution, pardoned the citizens whom he had destined to destruction, and rewarded the philosopher for his timely advice ^w. It may possibly happen, that some rigid critic may object to the inserting this dubious relation in our history; but we hope, though it should be exploded as a fact, it will yet be received as a proper instance of the Persian mode of writing history; and, at the same time we remark this, let us be indulged another observation, that the writings of Xenophon, who was very well acquainted with the antient Persian learning, correspond nearly with the manner of those authors we have lately cited; for he reasons on all the facts which he delivers, insomuch that his moral and political reflections have, in the opinion of many, removed him, as well as the Persian writers, from the class of historians into that of romance-writers: but, as his excellent treatise of the education of Cyrus has, within these few years, found many warm and learned defenders, it may be the time is near, when we shall see apologies written in favour of oriental historians, who, like Herodotus, may have their credit perhaps restored, when the subjects they treat of come to be examined to the bottom (Y).
The

^w FAREZ in Baharistan.

(Y) The Greek writers would persuade us, that the Persian kings concealed themselves from the sight of the people, that they might conceive extraordinary ideas of one who dwelt in such state. But that they were therein mistaken, if the oriental writers are to be credited, will appear from an antient custom in use among the kings, of whom we have been speaking, on the first day of April, called from thence, that is, from this custom, Chorrem-rux, i. e. the day of mirth; on which, as a very antient writer informs us, the king descended from his throne dressed in a white garment; afterwards riding abroad on a white horse, accompanied by his nobility, he and they gave open and indiscriminate audience to all who approached them, laying aside all distinctions, and acting as if they were equals: husbandmen and clowns sat down at the same table with the king; without ceremony told him their minds, and without fear made such requests as they thought fit. The king, on the other hand, addressed them in these terms: I am one of you; and, notwithstanding the elevation of my station, I know that all I have arises from your labour; and that kings could not be without you, any more than you could be without kings: let us then agree like brothers, since nothing but union can preserve us. (51). The foregoing history hath shewn us, that the Persian kings, in antient times,

(51) Hyde hist. relig. vet. Persar. c. 19. p. 253.

The Persians are not only much charmed with the character of the great Alexander: they are also wonderfully pleased with that were really as wise, as humane, and as condescending, as any that have reigned in the north or west. As to the modern Persians, on whose credit we are now forced to take the history of these early times, they speak and write as freely about government as we do. For example; the famous poet Sabdy wrote an express treatise on this subject, called An advice to kings: among other wise and prudent admonitions, he delivers these: It is the wisdom of kings to be kind to the poor, and not to oppress the rich. The felicity of a state depends on the good sense and right disposition of the sovereign. The security of his country depends on his administering justice impartially. Prosperity follows security, and will be where that is. If a country is once known to be secure, merchants will resort thither; the gain from thence will be large, and all temporal blessings will abound. If the country become rich, the king cannot well be poor; and, besides, at the last day he shall be recompensed amply by GOD for so well discharging his duty; whereas he who acts in a contrary manner, will, in every respect, meet with a contrary fate. Be always kind to merchants, and public ministers, that strangers, being well received, may carry a good report of you into their own country. Soon will that kingdom fall, wherein the souls of strangers are afflicted: be wise therefore, use the traveller well, that whersoever he goes he may speak well of you.—A prince ought always to have before his eyes this maxim; Dominion really belongs to GOD, and he has no certainty how long it shall be delegated to him: he ought likewise to remember, that the country he rules was given by GOD to the people who inhabit it, to the end he may not be misled by the false ideas of things that have no solidity, and place his trust on joys that may not perhaps last five days. It is reported of the caliph Aron Reshid, that he one day said to the famous Beloul his brother, "Give me some good advice." He answered, "There is nothing to be carried out of this world into the other, but good and bad works; it is in your power to carry which load you please."—This Beloul was a very knowing man, who, that he might have the more leisure to attend his studies, would never marry. The caliph his brother asked him another time for his advice, how he might govern his people for their advantage and his own. The sage answered, "Let your decisions become laws through their apparent equity, and never let reason yield to your will; prevent, as far as you can, requests; give little to such as ask, but think of giving in time to such as merit, and do not ask. The king is the head; the people are the body of the state: if the king is either ignorant or wicked, the head will devour the body with its teeth."—The government of an empire is an affair which requires a genius attentive and collected, and an heart which turns itself continually towards the most high GOD, to isvete

that of his vizir, as they call him, or, as he was in truth, his preceptor, Aristotle. This wise man they call sometimes by the name of Aristhathialis, but commonly, by way of abbreviation, Aristou. They report, that he was wonderfully sagacious, even in his childhood; that he addicted himself very early to the school of Plato, and continued therein upwards of twenty years, till he set up for himself, and became author of the sect of maschaion, i. e. the peripatetics. They affirm likewise, that he died very old, and in high reputation throughout all Greece. They are very positive, that he was prime minister to Alexander the son of Philip; and, in consequence of this notion, they report a multitude of fine sayings, and moral maxims, under his name. Ben Cassan informs us, that Aristotle composed above an hundred different treatises on various subjects; and, amongst the rest, mentions one, which is neither found among his works as we have them at present, nor is at all taken notice of by any of the Greek writers. Its title runs thus, A discourse on the conduct which a great general ought to observe after the gaining or losing of a battle; which, Ben Cassan says, he dedicated to Alexander the Great. As to his philosophy, we cannot find, that it was thoroughly studied by the antient Persians, though, in after-times, it came to be in high credit with the Arabians *. But to return to Alexander: Mirkbond, who has written very copiously of his conquests, affirms, that he reduced many nations to the east of Persia under his dominion, and that he advanced as far as the Indies; that he was the founder of many glorious cities, particularly of Heri or Herat, and Samarkand. He reports likewise, that this prince, being mightily taken with the Persian learning, caused three celebrated treatises, written in that language, to be translated into Greek; the first relating to physic,

* D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. Ariththalis.

voke his aid, that its owner may turn his feet, his hand, his tongue, and his pen, aright; and the king, who acts thus, GOD will undoubtedly endue with grace, to conserve his empire and his piety (52). It is evident from these citations, that the Persians have at present, and have always had, very rational sentiments as to the reciprocal duties of governors and subjects; and it is likewise plain, that the diffuse manner of writing, peculiar to the east, is not without its advantages; since the intent of history is not tiring the memory, but directing the judgment, which is perfectly answered by the oriental mode of delivering the wise sayings, as well as great actions, of famous kings.

(51) Apud Chardin voyag. tom. iii. p. 253.

the second to astrology, and the third to natural philosophy (Z). He divided, says the same historian, his ample dominions

(Z) At first sight it may seem, that Mirkbond might have inserted this story of Alexander's causing books to be translated out of the Persic language into Greek, merely to do honour to his country; but it would be unreasonable to suppose this, when we have good grounds to believe, that the fact was really as he reports it. These grounds are, first, that Alexander was a very learned and inquisitive prince; and secondly, that it was his custom to transmit whatever he thought might be useful to the commonwealth of learning into Greece; as for instance, the astronomical observations which were found in Babylon. But, as Mirkbond has set down the subjects of the books which he alleges were translated by the conqueror's command, the matter seems to be put out of dispute, since all the sciences he mentions were indisputably better understood in Persia than in Greece. First, as to physic, if we consider the prescriptions of Hippocrates, and other antient physicians, we shall find, that the drugs then in use, were most of them brought from the east, and not a few from Persia; and if they had their drugs from these places, why should we question their learning from the inhabitants of these places how to use them? But farther still; among the works of Zerdusht, there is a treatise which bears the title of Bizistk-nama, i. e. the book of physicians, which is said to treat intirely of the virtues of herbs, and how they ought to be applied; nay, he is reported to have been so very skilful in these matters, that Sbaristani, in his treatise of the religions of the east, which we have so often quoted, attributes expressly all the miracles Zerdusht is said to have done to his skill in simples only (53). Now, take it either way; if he was inspired, he knew all things; if not, he knew so much of simples as to pass himself for a prophet; consequently there might be treatises on physic among the Persians well worth Alexander's directing to be put into Greek. Secondly, as to astronomy and other mathematical sciences, we have proved in our note (N), p. 393—395, that they were well known to this people, when they were very little known to the Greeks, and that from the testimony of the Greeks themselves. It is true, that the modern Persians stand indebted for most of their knowlege in these sciences to the writings of the Greeks, which are translated into Arabic and Persian; but the reason of this is plain, because the antient books, relating to these abstruse sciences, were not so carefully preserved as those which regard history and morality; these being valuable in the sight of many, those precious only in the eyes of few. As to moral philosophy, which was the subject of the third book mentioned by Mirkbond, it was the darling study of the antient Persians, (53) Sbaristani apud Hyde relig. vet. Pers. c. 22. p. 300.

minions into ninety governments; and, after a short and glorious life, ended his days at Babylon, in the thirty-sixth year of his age, and seventeenth of his reign ^v, leaving his conquests

^v MIRKHOND. hist. sect. 21.

if we may venture to credit any thing which oriental writers have delivered. Morality is the subject of the book, intitled, Gjoudan Cbrad, ascribed to Hushang, a king far older than Zerdusht. Morality was the subject of most of Zoroaster's writings, as we gather from such fragments of them as we have seen, and especially from the book of Sad-der, which though calculated for the vulgar in verse, and in a ballad stile, contains as many moral sentences as are to be found in Diogenes Laertius's lives of the philosophers. To these arguments, in favour of the learning of the antient Persians, we may add the amazing love of science visible in the modern Persians; for we can hardly account for it any other way than by their mixing with the antient inhabitants of this country, and borrowing from their stores, since they far exceed the Turks, and indeed all the eastern nations, except the Chinese, in their affection for learning: as a proof of which, we shall allege the reigning maxim in their schools, not unworthy perhaps of being echoed in our universities: Daubting is the beginning of science; he who doubts nothing, examines nothing; he who examines nothing, discovers nothing, is blind, and must remain blind. An extraordinary affection for mysterious theology seems to have been the reigning passion of the antient Persians, and of the Persees at this day. Among the latter, there is a sect stiled Suphi or Sopbi, who profess themselves admirers of the Pythagoric philosophy. To describe the notions of the Suphi in few words, we must say, that, according to their own account, they are quietists or enthusiasts; in the opinion of the vulgar, atheists. They fast often, and to excess; they pretend to ecstasies, and conversations with God; they profess themselves friends alike to all men, and believe that the good in all religions are saved; they have a remarkable aversion for churchmen, which is owing perhaps to the outrageous antipathy the clergy shew towards them. Sir John Chardin gives us a whimsical instance of this: he says, he was present when a preacher at Spaharwn told the people in his sermon, that the Suphi were atheists; that they deserved to be burnt; and that he who killed one of this sect did an action more pleasing in the sight of God, than if he saved the lives of ten other men. As soon as he came out of the pulpit, five or six Suphi, who were among his audience, cudgelled him heartily; and when our author interposed, and begged them to give ear to the poor man's cries, one of them answered briskly, What! ought a fellow, who preaches up murder, to complain of a beating (54)?

(54) Chardin voyag. tom. iii. p. 211.

to be divided among his captains, who are distinguished by the Arabians and Persians with the title of molouk al shaouaif, i. e. the kings of nations or families. The Persians likewise take notice of Alexander's brother Aridæus, whom they stile Ardous, and, generally speaking, make him the son, instead of the brother, of that monarch. They agree, however, with the Greeks in representing him as a prince little qualified for empire; but they soften this account, by pretending, that he despised grandeur for the sake of wisdom, having learned from Aristotle to think those goods only valuable, which neither fortune nor force can take away.

WE have now conducted the history of the Persian empire from its origin to its dissolution after the death of Alexander the Great. In our next period, we shall see it revive under a prince descended from their antient kings, and of the magian religion. We have referred our researches into the chronology of the writers from whom we have taken this history, till we come to the utter extinction of the monarchy of the native Persians in Yezdegherd. But, before we close this section, it will be proper to obviate some objections to the bulk of the foregoing history (A).

(A) First, It may be said, that there is so much of confessed fable in almost every reign of these Persian monarchs, and the years, generally speaking, assigned for the reign of each, are so incredible, that a prudent man will be tempted to reject the whole, rather than take up with a tale full of apparent absurdities. To this we answer, that if it once becomes an established rule to reject every history which carries in it a mixture of fable, all the antient historians must be condemned in the mass. Berosus, if we may judge from the fragments which still remain of his work, inserted many fabulous narrations in his Babylonish antiquities. Manetho, the Egyptian historian, can expect no mercy, if once this law be owned. Herodotus, Xenophon, and innumerable others (55), will share the same fate with Mirkbond, and the rest of the Persian writers.

As to the incredible length of the reigns of the Persian kings, we admit this charge to be just; but at the same time we can safely say, the same charge may be brought against every antient history extant among the orientals. To give but one instance from the history of the Tartars, written by Abu l'Ghazi Babader, khan of Khow-arazm, from records the most antient and authentic, if the royal author is to be believed; and yet he places but seventeen khans between Bertizena Khan and Kabul Khan; though, according to his history, there intervened two thousand five hundred and fifty years between those princes; and, in another part of his history, he allows a thousand years for the reign of six princes (56). These are mistakes as great as any that are to be met with in the historians we have cited; and it would be no difficult thing to draw together many examples of the like nature, if this were a proper place. But this single one is sufficient for our purpose: we do not pretend to say, that the numbers set down in our catalogues of kings are right, or capable of being defended; we only allege, that they are not more preposterous than the numbers which are met with in other oriental historians; who are, notwithstanding, allowed to have some truth in their works. This confession, we hope, will procure us some favour, and pave the way to those amendments which we shall offer in due time. But, secondly, it may be objected, that our Persian history from the oriental writers being, in most respects, directly opposite to the history in the foregoing section, which is extracted from the Greek writers, one of the two must be rejected, since opposites can never be alike true. To this we may say, that we would be glad to compound the difference, and to allow, that the Persian history by the Greeks is frequently to be preferred to this; and that this is, in other places, frequently to be preferred to that. Something in support of this demand has been already said on account of Xerxes's expedition, the life of Zoroaster, and the death of Darius: besides, as we have before observed, the Greeks differ among themselves; and to this we may add, that they, like all other writers, were notoriously partial to their country and countrymen, as indeed were the Persians; so that, on the whole, what we ask will not appear very unreasonable; especially when we refer it to the judgment of the reader, to compare, to weigh, and to decide, as he pleases. But, thirdly, it may be objected, that these accounts, being opposite to what is recorded by the Greek writers, and having no authority to support them, but their reputed antiquity, they ought, for this reason, to be rejected; since true history is always supported by concurrent testimonies of natives and foreigners, the latter of which is wanting here. The strength, however, of this objection, which is the last, and perhaps the most plausible, of all that can be offered against the foregoing series of facts, will be effectually weakened, from the following considerations: First, among those writers that are best known to the learned, there are none who come near the times contained under the beginning of this period. Among the Greek historians, the history of the Medes and Persians ascends, as we have shewn, very little higher than Cyrus, if we except what Diodorus Siculus has transcribed from Ctesias, which has been generally

(52) Stillingfleet origines sacre, lib. i. c. 5.

(56) Preface to the general hist. of the Tartars, p. 8.

generally exploded by the critics. With respect therefore to writers of great antiquity, if our history be unsupported by them, it is likewise uncontradicted. As to writers of a later date, our Persian history is not destitute of friends among them, such as are unbiaſed, and whose authority ought to be of some weight. The royal author of the history of the Tartars, ſpeaking of the original of his nation, places Kejomaras juſt where the Persian hiſtorians place him (57); and it is likewise plain, that the belief of the true religion is reported, by the ſame records, to have remained untainted in theſe countries, which is exactly what our Persian writers ſay. The ſame author agrees with them in many other things, ſuch as making Sam, i. e. Shem, and his deſcendents, the original inhabitants of Iran or Persia, and in acknowledging Huſhang, the grandſon of Kejomaras, his ſucceſſor: he relates likewise the wars carried on by the deſcendants of Turk againſt the monarchs of Iran, and proportions the reigns of thoſe khans to the reigns of the kings of Persia, mentioned in the foregoing hiſtory. In Dr. Hyde's learned book of the religion of the antient Persians, there are many Arabic and other hiſtorians quoted in ſupport of ſuch paſſages of the antient Persian hiſtory, as he has occaſion to touch on in that work. It is true, that learned and judicious writer is far from conceiving, that all theſe oriental hiſtorians have delivered ought to be taken on truſt; on the contrary, he points out many of their errors, as he does alſo thoſe of the Greek writers; whence he argues, as we do after him, that intire credit ought to be given to neither; but that the likeliſt method for attaining truth, is to read and compare both (58). Secondly, the whole ſeries of antient hiſtory teaches, that in the moſt remote ages of the world theſe countries were very populous, and under the dominion of potent monarchs. This is exactly conformable to what our writers of the Persian hiſtory, and other oriental authors, affirm; ſo that we muſt either renounce that opinion, which has hitherto been generally entertained, of theſe eaſtern countries being firſt and moſt fully peopled; or we muſt admit, that theſe accounts are probable, if it were in reſpect only to this point. Thirdly, there remain, of the antient Persians, thoſe poor diſtreſſed creatures who are now ſtiled Perſees, as ſo many living witneſſes of the truth of this hiſtory. We can no way avoid affording our belief to this propoſition, that the religion they profeſs is the very ſame which their anceſtors held in the reign of Yezdegerd; and, if ſo, we muſt trace this religion from their accounts, thoſe of their conquerors, and ſuch as are to be met with among their neighbour nations. Now the Perſees, as well thoſe in India as thoſe who ſtill remain in their own country, affirm ſteadily, that it was ſettled by

(57) P. i. c. 2. p. 6.(58) Hyde hiſt. relig. vet. Perſ. & in præf.

Kejomaras, reformed by Zerduſt, and ſo continued till the diſſolution of the empire of the native Persians. The modern Persians, and the Arabic hiſtorians, acknowlege theſe facts to be ſo; they are likewiſe admitted by ſuch of the oriental Chriſtian writers as have come to our knowlege: we may therefore conclude, that there is not ſo much in this third objection as at firſt ſight there may ſeem; but that, conſidering the nature of the thing, this hiſtory has as ſtrong evidence in its favour as moſt other hiſtories of equal antiquity.

The END of the FIFTH VOLUME.

