PREFACE TO THE THIRD EDITION.

THE principal feature in this edition of the Maori Dictionary, which calls for special notice, is the arrangement of the words. There are certain changes in form which are applicable to a very large proportion of the words in the language, and especially to adjectives and verbs. These changes are effected by the reduplication of one or more syllables, by prefixing the causative 'whaka', and by the addition of a termination which forms a derivative noun. It has been thought better therefore, in this edition, not to place all words so changed in alphabetical order, as so many independent words; but to group them all under the simple forms, and to give, in an Introduction, an explanation of their usual effect in modifying the meaning of a word. If, therefore, a word having one or two syllables repeated, or a word beginning with 'whaka', or a word with the termination of a derivative noun, cannot be found in its place, according to the alphabetical order of the letters, it may be looked for under the simpler form of the word. Thus, papae, paepae, whakapae, paenga and whakapaenga may all be looked for under pae, and whakamaharaha and whakamaharatanga may be looked for under the simple form, mahara. If, in any such case, the particular development of the word is not to be found under the simple form, the meaning may be ascertained by a reference to the Introduction. A little experience will soon shew the advantage of having these various forms of each word thus grouped together.

The accents have been omitted, and the quantity of the vowels, as being of much more importance, has been indicated by the usual long and short marks. Rules for accentuation are appended to the Introduction.

The first, or Maori and English portion of the work has been submitted to very careful revision, and the additions amount to upwards of 1200 genuine Maori words, without reckoning the re-duplicated forms, the causatives with 'whaka', or the derivative nouns. The large number of corrections and additions and the alteration in the general plan of the work have involved the necessity of re-writing the whole.

It would be a great achievement, if it were possible, to obtain a collection of all known Maori words, with well authenticated examples of genuine Maori usage. This book makes no pretension to any such completeness. The difficulty of the task of collecting words can be fully appreciated by those only who have made trial of it. To make a collection at all approaching to completeness would require the co-operation of a number of individuals, each working in a different district, for there are many words, which, though well known in one district, may be absolutely unknown in another. Nor is it so easy to procure good illustrative examples as it may be imagined to be. A large number of examples have been taken from the "Mythology and Traditions of the New Zealanders" edited by Sir G. Grey, and published in London in the year 1854. The numbers appended to many of the examples now given refer to the pages of that work from which they have been taken. The other examples have for the most part either been copied from Maori letters or other writings or they have been taken down on the spot from the lips of Maori speakers.

The second part, containing the English and Maori vocabulary has undergone very little alteration. The Colloquial sentences remain as they were before, and the concise Grammar has been omitted altogether, as it may be considered to have been superseded by works which have been subsequently published.

TURANGA, DECEMBER, 1869.

EXTRACT FROM THE PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION.

It has indeed been proposed by some, that the New Zealand language should be discouraged as much as possible, and that the Natives should at once be instructed in English. It must be allowed that, if such a plan were practicable, the advantages arising from it would be great; and civilization cannot advance so favourably without it. Let this difficulty be once overcome, and the immense fund of information to be gathered from books in our own language is thrown open to this interesting people. But a knowledge of facts tells us the acquisition of English by the New Zealanders will only be partial, even in those districts in which our principal settlements are made, while the larger portion of the Natives will hold but little intercourse with our countrymen, who will have no inducement to settle in those districts which the Natives generally prefer. That it will be difficult to persuade the Natives, as a people, to adopt our language to the disuse of their own, may be inferred from the fact, that the Irish and Welsh, even though living in the heart of English towns, continue to use their favourite tongue, and that, too, after our connection, as one people, has continued for many centuries. While, therefore, every encouragement should be given to the Natives to learn English, it will not be the less necessary for those, whose position brings them into frequent communication with this people, to learn their language; and, it is interesting to know that many are ready to make use of every help which may be afforded them. As these attempts are persevered in, it is likely that a great accession of valuable materials will ere long be made from various sources. If, in the meantime, the present Compilation shall be the means of assisting those who are disposed to prosecute the study,—though it be only as a ground-work for something more extensively useful hereafter, it will have served the purpose for which it was undertaken.

In the first part of this Dictionary, the English words which are printed in Italics are to be regarded as the meanings, or English equivalents of the Maori words or sentences to which they are appended. Mere descriptions of words which may or may not have English equivalents, are printed in Roman type.

INTRODUCTION.

There does not appear to be any real necessity for encumbering the pages of a dictionary by treating as so many distinct words what are, in fact, only different regular uses of the same word. In an English dictionary, for example, no one would expect to find the plural form of every noun treated as a distinct word. But we may go further even than the usual practice in English dictionaries, and say that there is no necessity for setting down all the regularly formed participles, and the nouns ending in -er, as distinct words: for no one, who is acquainted with the habits of ordinary English verbs, would fail to see at a glance the meaning of such words as "doer", "doing" &c., as soon as he had ascertained the meaning of the verb from which they are regularly derived. Nor again, when one hears or uses the expression, "a stone house", is it necessary to consider the word "stone" as an adjective, distinct from the noun "stone", because it happens, in this particular instance, to be used as an adjective, any more than we should say that there is also an adverb, "stone", to explain such an expression as, "stone dead". But when the attempt is not made to present each word under every variety of form, and in every possible position in which it may be found in the language, it becomes the more important that the various modifications of form to which any word is liable should be pointed out, and that the effect which such modifications usually have upon the meaning of the word should be explained. This is the intention of the present introduction.

§ i. REDUPLICATION.

Adjectives and verbs are modified both in form and meaning by the reduplication of one or both of the syllables of the root*.

An adjective, with the first syllable of the root doubled, becomes plural: thus, He rakau pai, a good tree. He rakau papai, good trees. It is to be observed however that the simple form is used both as singular and plural; the reduplicated form, as plural only.

The effect of doubling both syllables of the root is to diminish the intensity of the meaning of the adjective, thus; Mate, sick. Matemate, sickly. Wera, hot. Werawera, rather hot; warm.

In the case of verbs, the effect of the two kinds of reduplication is somewhat different. The reduplication of the first syllable of the root denotes either, 1. a prolongation or continuance of the action with increased intensity, or, 2. a mutual action; while the doubling of both syllables of the root gives the verb a frequentative force, denoting that the action is frequently repeated, the intensity being diminished. Thus kimo denotes the ordinary involuntary winking of the eyes; kikimo denotes that the eyes are closed and kept fast closed; kimokimo again, denotes a frequent winking.—Kei te whaia tonutia te Hauhau e te Kawanatanga: kaore ano i tae noa mai he korero o te pipiritanga. The Hauhaus are still pursued by the colonial forces: no tidings have yet reached us of their having joined battle.—Hopuhopu kau ana; ka mate nga atua o Puarata; He caught Puarata's atua one after another, and thus they were destroyed.

In words of three syllables, the doubling of both syllables of the root causes a euphonious lengthening of the first syllable. Mānia, slippery, becomes māniana; and tīnei, extinguish, becomes tīneinei.

§ ii. WHAKA.

Nouns, adjectives and verbs may all have a prefix, whaka, (sometimes contracted to wha), the effect of which is to make a

* Most simple Maori words seem to be formed from a di-syllabic root; some consisting of the root only, and others of the root and a prefixed syllable. Of the prefixed syllables, mā generally constitutes the word an adjective. Long vowels and diphthongs are equivalent in this respect to two syllables, a consonant having certainly in some cases, if not in all, been dropped: thus “kē”, different, is, in the Tonga dialect, “kese”, and “tai”, sea, is, in the Sandwich Island dialect, “tahi”.

causal verb. WHakatangata signifies make into a man, or treat as a man; whakapai, make good, or pronounce good; whakanoho, cause to sit; whakamohio, cause to know. Nouns and some adjectives, having whaka thus prefixed, are often used intransitively, when they have a reflex signification, it being assumed that, where no object is expressed, the agent is himself the object of his own action. Thus whakatika, straighten, is commonly used, without an object expressed, to signify straighten oneself, or stand up; whakatariki, act the part of a child; whakatane, *play the man.

§ iii. PASSIVE TERMINATIONS.

The usual passive terminations of verbs are -a, -ia, -hia, -kia, -mia, -ngia, -ria, -tia, -whia, na, ina, whina. Thus

Poro	becomes	poroa;
WHawhati	„	whatia;
Waru	„	waruhia;
Moto	„	motokia;
Horo	„	horomia;
Rere	„	rerengia;
Mau	„	mauria;
Awhi	„	awhitia;
WHawhao	„	whaowhia, and whaowhina;
Tiki	„	tikina;
Aroha	„	arohaina.

It is questionable whether any rule can be laid down for applying one termination rather than another to any given verb. Usage varies in different parts of the country so much that it appears to be mere matter of custom, some regard being paid to euphony.

Intransitive, as well as transitive, verbs have a passive voice, requiring the addition of a preposition, in English, to make the sense complete. Thus, haere, go; haerea, be travelled over; noho, sit; nohoia, be sat upon.

Some adverbs, and all adjectives when used adverbially, take one or other of the above terminations whenever the verbs with which they are connected are passive. Example. Tokowha o ona hoa i kainga katoatia e ia; There were four of his companions who were devoured entirely by him.

* This reflex use is met with in other words besides those compounded with whaka. Neke, v. t. move, if no object is expressed, is always understood to mean, move oneself.

Nouns will also be met with occasionally, carrying the termination of a passive verb. This form expresses a change as having taken place into that which the noun signifies. Thus, Koroua signifies old man; Kua korouatia koe, you have grown into an old man.

Sometimes a phrase may be treated like a verb when it is impossible to consider it as a permanent compound word. For instance, the expression, ma te matapihi, through the window, might be welded together into one word, and a passive termination added, thus, Ma-te-matapihi-tia mai, Let it be passed through the window.

§ iv. NOUNS OF CIRCUMSTANCE.

These are derived from adjectives, participles or verbs by the simple addition of one of the following terminations, -nga, -anga, -hanga, -manga, -ranga, -tanga, -inga; the choice of the termination for any given word being, as in the case of the passives, somewhat arbitrary, and dependent upon usage which is not always uniform. Thus

mahi	makes	mahinga,
noho	„	nohoanga,
titiro	„	tirohanga,
ngaro	„	ngaromanga,
whakaatu	„	whakaaturanga,
pupuri	„	puritanga,
a	„	ainga.

In some few cases the final vowel is altered, for arahi makes arahanga, and nunumi makes numanga. These nouns denote the circumstance, time or place of the action or condition, and those which are derived from verbs may be either active or passive, according to the context. Thus, patu signifies strike, and patunga, the circumstance, time or place of striking or of being struck. Tana patunga i a au, the circumstance of his striking me. Tona patunga e au, the circumstance of his being struck by me.

§ v. NUMERAL PREFIXES.

These are 1. e, prefixed to all but tahi; 2. ko, prefixed to tahi only; 3. toko, used in speaking of persons, when the number is not higher than nine; 4. hoko, which expresses multiples of ten, but sometimes also is merely equivalent to toko; and 5. taki, which is distributive, as takiwhitu, by sevens. All of these except ko are used with the interrogative numeral hia, and in speaking of persons taki is used along with toko, as takitokowha, by four persons at a time.

Taki is also used sometimes with adjectives or participles to denote that the word applies to each and all of the things spoken of. Ka takimanu anake nga waka, the canoes are one and all afloat.

§ vi. -TANGA.

Passive verbs sometimes have a suffix, -tanga, which, if the verb is qualified by an adverb, is attached to the adverb in place of the passive termination. The force of this suffix it is not very easy to determine. Sometimes, at all events, it seems to have the same effect as 'ana' would have in the same position. Hiko tonuia ki nga ngarehu, apuatanga. He immediately snatched up the burning coals and crammed them into his mouth.—Apitiria tonutanga atu ko te pa, ka horo, The pa was then attacked in addition, and fell.

§ vii. NGE.

The syllable nge is sometimes prefixed to personal or possessive pronouns, as nge-au; nge-ona: and sometimes it appears as a suffix to the adverbs pea and koa, thus, peange, koange; but in none of these cases does it apparently affect the meaning of the word to which it is attached.

§ viii. DIFFERENT MODES OF SPELLING.

A Maori, in writing a long vowel, will frequently double it to shew that it is long, especially when it may be important to keep it distinct from another word which is similarly spelt, but differently pronounced, and thus we may have the same word spelt in two different ways. Kāinga, dwellingplace, is thus often written kaainga, to distinguish it from kāinga, act of eating. The words tangata, wahine, matua, tupuna, and a few others, may, in the same way, have the vowel in the antepenultimate syllable doubled, to shew that that syllable is to be pronounced long, to denote the plural number.

§ ix. DISGUISED WORDS.

Well-known words may sometimes be met with in such a disguise that it is difficult, at first sight, to recognize them at all. The disguise may be effected 1. by the transposition of single letters, or syllables; or 2. by the substitution, for one letter, of another which has, or may be assumed to have some affinity with it; or 3. by the substitution, in a compound word, for one of its elements, of another word having the same signification. Changes of the first class may perhaps be set down merely as peculiarities of dialect, though some of them have possibly had an arbitrary origin. Those of the third class, and probably those of the second, have originated in a desire to avoid the possibility of one's getting into trouble through the accidental resemblance of the name of some great chief to a word in common use. The mere fact of his name, or a word similar to it, being used in a manner which he considered disrespectful to himself, used to be considered quite sufficient justification for a chief in picking a quarrel with his neighbours, when the quarrel was determined on, and nothing but a plausible pretext was wanting. The following may serve as an illustration of this. Some years ago, the child of a chief of the NGatiporou tribe received the name of Te Wairama. In consequence of this the word honu came into common use for water, and the usual word, wai, was avoided for fear of giving offence.

Cases of transposition are not uncommon, and sometimes both forms of a transposed word may be found in use together in the same district. Thus ngaro, fly, is transposed into rango; and ngawhariki into *whanariki.

Interchangeable letters are 1. a and e; 2. a and o; 3. i and u; 4. m, n and ng; 5. k and ng; 6. k and p.

Examples.

1. teina, taina.
2. taimaha, toimaha.
3. taimaha, taumaha.
tupuna, tipuna.
4. momi, ngongi.
memenge, memene.
5. karengo, kareko.
kainga, kaika.
6. karengo, parengo.

* The word, engari, is probably only a transposed form of erangi. Some good authorities consider the two words to be distinct, both in etymology and signification, but after much close observation of the use of the two words by Natives, both in writing and speaking, I have been driven to the conclusion that they are identical, at least in meaning.

§ x. THE SAME WORD IN DIFFERENT ASPECTS.

The same word may at different times assume the functions of several different parts of speech. Thus nouns are frequently used as adjectives to denote the material of which a thing is made, the purpose to which it is applied, &c. He whare raupo, a house [built of] raupo. He roto tuna, a lake in which eels abound. Adjectives and participles are used as nouns to express the quality, apart from the individual person or thing in which that quality may reside. Haere koe, e hoki ki uta, hei korero i toku toa, Go, return to the shore, to tell of my bravery. Adjectives and participles are also commonly used as adverbs. I mauria maoatia mai te kai; The food was brought in a cooked state.

Verbs again frequently become nouns; the infinitive mood of the verb being, in fact, nothing more than the verb treated as a noun. Or again, they do the work of adjectives and adverbs. He matua whangai, a foster father.

Nouns also will sometimes assume the function of verbs, as in the case already mentioned, § iii, as well as in others. Nona ka kaumatua nei, ka timata tona mate; It was when he arrived at man's estate that his sickness began.

ACCENTUATION.

It may be set down as a general rule, to which there are some exceptions, that Maori words are always accented on the first syllable; but compound words, or words which have the disyllabic root doubled, have a secondary accent on the second portion of the word.

WHaka, beginning a word is always un-accented.

The Articles, he, te, nga, all the prepositions, the verbal particles, and the particles a and ko are un-accented; but when a precedes any of the singular personal pronouns au, koe, ia or the indefinite pronoun mea, these words throw back their accent upon the a, which thus becomes accented.
